A. M. Grimes: Country Teacher and Itinerant Minister

By Berlin B. Chapman

IN Appalachia, as in most of America, ministers of the gospel operating from villages exercised great influence on populace, but few kept full records of experience and service. They were doers of the word, seldom scribes of it. Those who pursue history of ministry in West Virginia always will be indebted to Rev. Addison McLaughlin Grimes, a typical Methodist Episcopal preacher who kept a minute record from 1895-1920.

Grimes was licensed to preach at Fairview Methodist Church in Webster County. He served fifteen charges. He listed dates, addresses, names and dates of those whose marriage service he performed. Of those whose funerals he held, he cited text of scripture used. He delivered sermons, recording for same the date, text, subject, place and remarks. Moreover, he continued the record after retirement, and on his 100th birthday delivered a sermon in Fairmont.

Grimes' record is a valuable case study. To know well how he operated at the turn of the twentieth century is to know much about services of his colleagues in related denominations. Hence it is not only important to study the ministerial record, but to know much about the man who kept it.

He was born in Webster County, July 4, 1863, an event coinciding with the fourth and final day of the Battle of Gettysburg. He attended rural schools in terms of about four months. On July 21, 1869, Rev. T. S. Coulter baptized Grimes by sprinkling. In 1882-84 he attended the seminary later known as West Virginia Wesleyan College. Always a student, he largely was self-educated. He believed that the secret of scholarship is serious and prolonged self-effort. By 1891 he held a teacher's certificate, "Grade No. One," the highest awarded by Webster County, based on written examination. He taught eight terms of school in the county, each term being four months. Beginning in 1888, he kept for several years careful account of earnings and expenditures.

ORIGINAL.

No. 40

Teacher's Certificate.

GOOD FOR ONE YEAR ONLY.

Grade No. One

It is Hereby Certified, That A. M. Grimes is a person of good moral character, competent to teach and govern a common school, and has passed an examination in the following Branches with the annexed results:

ORTHOGRAPHY	90	ENGLISH GRAMMAR	75	TOTAL PERCENTAGES	1120
READING	90	GEOGRAPHY	100	AVERAGE PER CENT.	92 1/3
PENMANSHIP	90	HISTORY	75	LOWEST PER CENT. IN ANY ONE BRANCH	80
ARITHMETIC	95	ART OF TEACHING	100
PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE with special reference to the effects of Alcoholic Drinks and Narcotics upon the Human System	100	Com. Phis	95
		Pol. Ec.	90
		Civil Gov.	80

P. M. Bunfly President,
R. N. B. McCray
J. M. Hoover
Board of Examiners.

Oct 7 1891

Webster County, W. Va.

EXPLANATION.—Grade No. 1 indicates an average grade of merit from 90 to 100 per cent. and not below 75 per cent. in any one branch taught; No. 2 from 77 to 87 and not below 60 per cent.; No. 3 from 67 to 77 and not below 50 per cent.

Duplicate of this Certificate filed in my office this 14th day Oct, 1891.
B. D. Hutchison
Secy. B. E.

Fork Lick Dist.

You are drawn as a Juror for Nov. Court
Petit Juror.

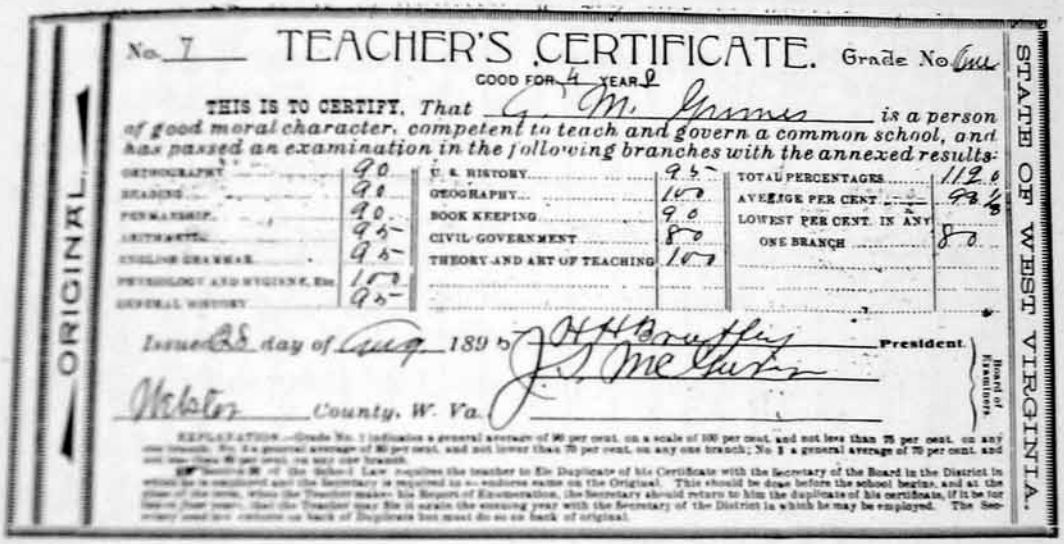
A. M. Grimes

The county seat of Webster is Webster Springs, officially known as Addison, and it was named for Addison McLaughlin. Grimes was named for this man. The first newspaper in the county was the "Mountain Echo." It appeared January 26, 1883, and consisted of eight pages 8 x 15 inches. In memoirs Grimes wrote: "I visited Addison the first time in March, 1883. To me it was wonderful to see Robert Townsend, Jr., with a step of his foot, print a page of the newspaper."

News media quoted Grimes: "I was gloriously converted on Abraham Lincoln's birthday, in 1884." Ten years later he was teaching school in the vicinity of Fairview Methodist Church, an institution of which he was a charter member. Dedication was September 9, 1894, and is described by Sampson N. Miller:

This was a great day for both old and young. It was the largest crowd ever to assemble at the church. People came from quite a distance in sleds, wagons, buggies, on horseback and many on foot. You talk about food, they certainly had it that day. Dedication was on one of the most beautiful autumn days I ever saw. Why the enthusiasm? Because the good people of the community had something to look forward to. No lad of ten would ever have forgotten that day.

In listing young men who went out from the church as ministers, Miller said: "First was A. M. Grimes who at the 3rd Quarterly Conference in May, 1895, was licensed to preach." The record of his 25 years is best read in the table of figures he kept. On its completion he wrote: "I am sorry in my heart that results are so meager. How humiliating these meager results! But for all this I must now go into judgment. The Blood! The Blood! Is all my plea! Enough to



ORIGINAL

No. 7 TEACHER'S CERTIFICATE. Grade No. Cus

GOOD FOR 4 YEARS

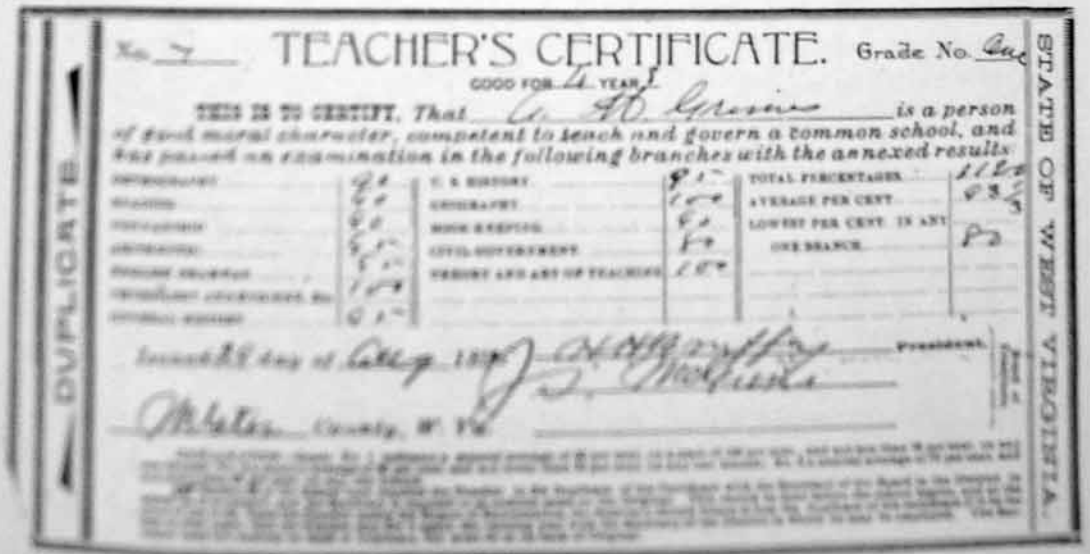
THIS IS TO CERTIFY, That A. M. Grimes is a person of good moral character, competent to teach and govern a common school, and has passed an examination in the following branches with the annexed results:

ORTHOGRAPHY	90	U. S. HISTORY	95	TOTAL PERCENTAGES	112.6
READING	98	GEOGRAPHY	100	AVERAGE PER CENT	93 1/2
PENMANSHIP	90	BOOK KEEPING	90	LOWEST PER CENT. IN ANY ONE BRANCH	80
ARITHMETIC	95	CIVIL GOVERNMENT	80
ENGLISH GRAMMAR	95	THEORY AND ART OF TEACHING	100
PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE, Etc	100
GENERAL HISTORY	95

Issued 28 day of Aug. 1895 H H Brantley President.
J. S. McClung
Webster County, W. Va. Board of Examiners.

EXPLANATION.—Grade No. 1 indicates a general average of 90 per cent. on a scale of 100 per cent, and not less than 75 per cent. on any one branch; No. 2 a general average of 80 per cent, and not lower than 70 per cent. on any one branch; No. 3 a general average of 70 per cent. and not less than 60 per cent. on any one branch.

Section 36 of the School Law requires the teacher to file Duplicate of his Certificate with the Secretary of the Board in the District in which he is employed and the Secretary is required to endorse same on the Original. This should be done before the school begins, and at the close of the term, when the Teacher makes his Report of Examination, the Secretary should return to him the duplicate of his certificate, if it be for three or four years, that the Teacher may file it again the ensuing year with the Secretary of the District in which he may be employed. The Secretary need not endorse on back of Duplicate but must do so on back of original.



DUPLICATE

No. 7 TEACHER'S CERTIFICATE. Grade No. Cus

GOOD FOR 4 YEARS

THIS IS TO CERTIFY, That A. M. Grimes is a person of good moral character, competent to teach and govern a common school, and has passed an examination in the following branches with the annexed results:

	90	U. S. HISTORY	95	TOTAL PERCENTAGES	112.6
	98	GEOGRAPHY	100	AVERAGE PER CENT	93 1/2
	90	BOOK KEEPING	90	LOWEST PER CENT. IN ANY ONE BRANCH	80
	95	CIVIL GOVERNMENT	80
	95	THEORY AND ART OF TEACHING	100
	100
	95

Issued 28 day of Aug. 1895 H H Brantley President.
J. S. McClung
Webster County, W. Va. Board of Examiners.

Years of Charge	Professional Courage (Case Cases)	Unchastity or the Change	Bastards	Marriages-Sec.	Attorneys Colony
	190 Cases	6
1896-7-Bastards Civ	250 200		3		1835.
1898-1900-Assault "	150	15	3		1400. 91.
1900-1901-Assault "	190	6	2	3.50	2 5.24
1901-1902-Assault "	1900	6	8	4.50	6 5.24
1902-1903-Boston "	1786	7	8	17.00	5.05.24 8.03.
1903-1904-Boston "	430	2	1	5.00	21.3 5.1.65
1904-1905-Boston "	251	1	1	2.00	1.44 3.1.439.
1905-1906-Kanawha "	160	12	3	21	$47.00 5.22 32.1.295.
1906-1907-Kanawha "	909	12	3	5	16.25 4.09 21 1900.
1907-1908-Kanawha "	664	7	5	2	4.00 1.52 8 431.
1908-1909-Kanawha "	595	12	1.5	2	8.50 14.0 5 255
1909-1910-Kanawha "	500	9	1	2	5	12.00 17.8 14 836.
1910-1911-Kanawha "	374	7	3.5	5	1	5.00 11.6 2 257.
1911-1912-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	9.00 424 5 897.
1912-1913-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1913-1914-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1914-1915-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1915-1916-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1916-1917-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	9.00 424 5 897.
1917-1918-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1918-1919-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1919-1920-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1920-1921-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1921-1922-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1922-1923-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1923-1924-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1924-1925-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1925-1926-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1926-1927-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1927-1928-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1928-1929-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1929-1930-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1930-1931-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1931-1932-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1932-1933-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1933-1934-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1934-1935-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1935-1936-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1936-1937-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1937-1938-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1938-1939-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1939-1940-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1940-1941-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1941-1942-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1942-1943-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1943-1944-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1944-1945-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1945-1946-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1946-1947-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1947-1948-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1948-1949-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1949-1950-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1950-1951-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1951-1952-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1952-1953-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1953-1954-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1954-1955-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1955-1956-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1956-1957-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1957-1958-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1958-1959-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1959-1960-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1960-1961-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1961-1962-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1962-1963-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1963-1964-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1964-1965-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1965-1966-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1966-1967-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1967-1968-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1968-1969-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1969-1970-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1970-1971-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1971-1972-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1972-1973-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1973-1974-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1974-1975-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1975-1976-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1976-1977-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1977-1978-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1978-1979-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1979-1980-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1980-1981-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1981-1982-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1982-1983-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1983-1984-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1984-1985-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1985-1986-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1986-1987-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1987-1988-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1988-1989-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1989-1990-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1990-1991-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1991-1992-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1992-1993-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1993-1994-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1994-1995-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1995-1996-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1996-1997-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1997-1998-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
1998-1999-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
1999-2000-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2000-2001-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2001-2002-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2002-2003-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2003-2004-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2004-2005-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2005-2006-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2006-2007-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2007-2008-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2008-2009-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2009-2010-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2010-2011-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2011-2012-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2012-2013-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2013-2014-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2014-2015-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2015-2016-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2016-2017-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2017-2018-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2018-2019-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2019-2020-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2020-2021-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2021-2022-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2022-2023-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2023-2024-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2024-2025-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2025-2026-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2026-2027-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2027-2028-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2028-2029-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2029-2030-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2030-2031-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2031-2032-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2032-2033-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2033-2034-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2034-2035-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2035-2036-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2036-2037-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2037-2038-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2038-2039-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2039-2040-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2040-2041-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2041-2042-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2042-2043-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2043-2044-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2044-2045-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2045-2046-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2046-2047-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2047-2048-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2048-2049-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2049-2050-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2050-2051-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2051-2052-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2052-2053-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2053-2054-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2054-2055-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2055-2056-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2056-2057-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2057-2058-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2058-2059-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2059-2060-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2060-2061-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2061-2062-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2062-2063-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2063-2064-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2064-2065-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2065-2066-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2066-2067-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2067-2068-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2068-2069-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2069-2070-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2070-2071-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2071-2072-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2072-2073-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2073-2074-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2074-2075-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2075-2076-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2076-2077-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2077-2078-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2078-2079-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2079-2080-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2080-2081-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2081-2082-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2082-2083-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2083-2084-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2084-2085-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2085-2086-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2086-2087-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2087-2088-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2088-2089-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2089-2090-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2090-2091-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2091-2092-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2092-2093-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2093-2094-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2094-2095-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2095-2096-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2096-2097-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2097-2098-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2098-2099-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2099-2100-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2100-2101-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2101-2102-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2102-2103-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2103-2104-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2104-2105-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2105-2106-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2106-2107-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2107-2108-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2108-2109-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2109-2110-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2110-2111-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2111-2112-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2112-2113-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2113-2114-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2114-2115-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2115-2116-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2116-2117-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2117-2118-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2118-2119-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2119-2120-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2120-2121-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2121-2122-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2122-2123-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2123-2124-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2124-2125-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2125-2126-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2126-2127-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2127-2128-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2128-2129-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2129-2130-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2130-2131-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2131-2132-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2132-2133-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2133-2134-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2134-2135-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2135-2136-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2136-2137-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2137-2138-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2138-2139-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2139-2140-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2140-2141-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2141-2142-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2142-2143-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2143-2144-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2144-2145-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2145-2146-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2146-2147-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2147-2148-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2148-2149-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2149-2150-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2150-2151-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2151-2152-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2152-2153-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2153-2154-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2154-2155-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2155-2156-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2156-2157-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2157-2158-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2158-2159-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2159-2160-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2160-2161-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2161-2162-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2162-2163-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2163-2164-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2164-2165-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2165-2166-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2166-2167-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2167-2168-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2168-2169-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2169-2170-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2170-2171-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2171-2172-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2172-2173-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2173-2174-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2174-2175-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2175-2176-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2176-2177-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2177-2178-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2178-2179-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2179-2180-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2180-2181-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2181-2182-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2182-2183-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2183-2184-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2184-2185-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2185-2186-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2186-2187-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2187-2188-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2188-2189-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2189-2190-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2190-2191-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2191-2192-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2192-2193-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2193-2194-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2194-2195-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2195-2196-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2196-2197-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2197-2198-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2198-2199-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2199-2200-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2200-2201-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2201-2202-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2202-2203-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2203-2204-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2204-2205-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2205-2206-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2206-2207-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2207-2208-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2208-2209-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2209-2210-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2210-2211-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2211-2212-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2212-2213-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2213-2214-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2214-2215-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2215-2216-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2216-2217-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2217-2218-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2218-2219-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2219-2220-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2220-2221-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2221-2222-Mason-O-Nic	481	3	1	0	2.00 2.00 1 800.
2222-2223-Mason-O-Nic	926	14	12	0	6.00 1.00 4 502.
2223-2224-Mason-O-

humble a man throughout all eternity. Friday, October 14, 1921, Home City, Tyler County, West Virginia."

In retirement of more than 40 years, Grimes would in some capacity serve the ministry. He had not finished his course, he would not say that he had fought a good fight, but he had kept the faith. In arithmetic of religion "meager results" always had a place. When the Lord was on earth He spoke of highways and hedges, of one lost sheep, and of possible attainment when "two or three" of his followers were gathered together. Certainly, no Methodist Conference would contend that the best ministerial service is always performed in the largest churches.

The circuit rider, like the country doctor, was devoted to his horse, almost to companionship. Grimes, equipped with saddlebags and leggings, was photographed on "Mat," his favorite mount, April 17, 1903. He wrote: " 'Mat' and I starting from Fayetteville to make our appointments at Cirtsville and Bethel, a distance of 20 to 25 miles. Oh, the mud to Oak Hill." He noted "the beautiful, sunshiny morning".*

In 1911, Grimes and Miss America M. Miller were married and they became parents of children, Abraham, Sarah and Mary. Mary married Regis D. Connell, and it was with Connells in Fairmont that Grimes made his home after the death of his wife.

On June 8, 1962, the annual Methodist Conference was in session at Buckhannon. "The Informant," official publication, reported:

> A highlight of each annual conference session is the Retired Ministers Banquet and the selection of a retired minister to be honored by possession of the Conference Cane. The cane has been passed among retired ministers since 1897. It usually is awarded to the oldest living minister or the minister with the greatest number of years of service.
>
> The Rev. Addison M. Grimes, present cane-holder, is past 99 years of age. He enjoys good health and plans to go right on past the century mark. In the acceptance speech, when presented the cane, Brother Grimes spoke with vigor and enthusiasm. It was not difficult at all to see across the years and visualize circuit riders of another era as they evangelized the frontier settlements. Of such stock was Methodism born!

When Grimes became a centenarian the Fairmont press hailed him as the oldest citizen, and family and friends celebrated the occasion. He told a news reporter, "I am proud of the cane but, of course, I don't need it." He added a bit of philosophy: "Always be busy and profitably employed. Idleness is the devil's workshop. If you are unhappy or down in the dumps, just do something nice and you will feel a whole lot better."

Under date of July 4, 1963, Grimes wrote: "My 100th birthday. Preached at Diamond Street Church to a full house (252). 'Seek ye the Lord while He may be found (Isaiah 55:6).' Never had finer freedom and liberty in speech. To God be all the glory." In July, Grimes delivered four sermons.

During the centennial year of West Virginia, 1963, a special program was held at Fairview Methodist Church at which the history of the institution was reviewed. Grimes participated in the program. A. F. Gregory reported: "More than 100 people were on the ground, made up of both present and former residents of the community, and ranging in age from 100 to mere babes in arms." "The Webster Echo" on September 25, 1963, carried a photo of charter members present. They were Grimes, Mrs. Nancy H. Hamrick and Calvin H. Brady. Grimes wrote: "It was a great experience to be present at homecoming, not soon to be forgotten."

On June 8, 1964, he sent Methodist Conference a message: "I appreciate the great honor of having the cane two years and gladly return it for someone else to enjoy." He died June 15, or 19 days before his 101 birthday.

A. J. SHINABERRY
GENERAL MERCHANDISE

Campbelltown, W. Va., 11/17 1926

Mr J. H. Mayes

No. 1

Reg. No. 26 Clerk.....

	ACCOUNT FORWARDED	2	90
1	1 Oats	45
2	1 Feed	10	55
3			345
4
5
6
7
8 9 10 11 12
13
14
15	27

INTEREST CHARGED AFTER 30 DAYS

Your account stated to date. If error is found return at once.

To Our Customers

You need your money
And I need mine,
If we both get ours
It will sure be fine,
But if you get yours
And hold mine too,
What in the world
Am I going to do?

Think it over.

A. J. SHINABERRY

Blair Printing Co., Ba

In the course of events Frederick was the first to die and that too far away from his mountain home under sadly peculiar circumstances. John R. Flemmens called at John Barlow's to pass the night. Mr Barlow had heard of Frederick's death, but did not wish any one to say any thing about it before morning. But one of the boys came in before his father could repress him and said: "Mr Flemmens, do you know that Fred is dead?"

"Is it possible, Mr Barlow, have you heard that my boy is dead?"

"Yes," replied Mr Barlow, "I am sorry to say it is even so."

In an instant the bereaved father seemed to be frenzied by his grief. He caught up his three horses and started for home in the night. As he slowly ascended the mountain path his agonized cries could be heard for miles: "O Freddy, my dear son; your poor old father will never see you again. O Freddy, my son, my son!"

While on a visit to Ohio, Mr Flemmens died there.

Mrs Flemmens and her daughter Elizabeth spent their last years in the vicinity of Buckeye. They spun and wove ond industriously earned a living as long as their willing hands coald retain their cunning, and had the respectful esteem of all their neighbors.

AARON MOORE.

Aaron Moore, one of the older sons of Moses Moore the pioneer, hunter, and scout, after his marriage with

Digitized by Google

Catherine Johnson, daughter of John Johnson, first lived near Frost; but the greater part of his life he dwelt on the west bank of the Greenbrier, four miles above Marlinton, where he had settled in the woods.

John Johnson, the ancestor of the Johnson relationship, and the pioneer of West Marlinton, whose log cabin stood several hundred yards below the bridge, near a large walnut tree, heard that corn had matured in Nicholas. He set out to bring in some of the Nicholas corn for seed, and lost his way in Black Mountain and was bewildered for nine days, having nothing to eat most of the time. In his desperation he tried a morsel of garter snake, but he could not swallow it, and he concluded he would rather die than "eat such eatings as that." Upon coming to a house he was just able to move, and scarcely able to talk enough to make the mistress of the place understand what had happened. She at once proceeded to prepare a bountiful meal, thinking a man as hungry as he was would never know when to quit. In the meantime the proprietor came in and countermanded all this preparation, and directed a little thin mush to be boiled and a little skimmed milk be brought from the spring house. He prepared a saucer of mush and milk and gave the famished stranger one spoonful, and then waited for results. In a few minutes there was a violent emetic disturbance, ann it looked as if he was about to turn inside out. When this subsided, a little more of the mixture was given, with more favorable results, and in a few hours the pangs of hunger were somewhat appeased. Nourishment was carefully dosed out for some days, and he finally made the trip, bringing the corn, which planted one of the first crops ever produced in the vicinity of Marlinton.

Digitized by Google

By arduous industry and judicious economy Mr and Mrs Moore built up a prosperous home. Their sons were John, James, Samuel, Thomas, Andrew Jackson, Henry, William Daniel, and George Claiborne; and the daughters were Mary, Elizabeth, Catherine, Eliza, and Melinda—eight sons and five daughters.

John Moore married Jane, daughter of Colonel John Baxter, and settled in the woods near Marlinton. Their children were Aaron, William, Theodore, Washington, and one daughter, Catherine, now Mrs Thomas Auldridge, near Indian Draft.

James Moore married Anne McNeill daughter of the late Squire John McNeill, on Dry Branch of Swago, and settled in the woods near Marlinton, on property now owned by John R. Moore. Their children were John Register, Frances, Rachel, George, Henry, Nelson, and Naomi. John Register lives on the homestead. His wife was Mary Baxter, daughter of the late William Baxter, near Edray.

Samuel Moore married Nancy Beale, and settled on the summit of Marlin Mountain, in the unbroken forest and killed ten rattlesnakes on the first acre cleared about his cabin. Their children were Lucas, Martha, Catherine, Margaret, Jennie, William Thomas, Anise, George, Kenney, Rachel, and Melinda—eight daughters and four sons. Mrs Moore was a daughter of Thomas Beale, who came from Maryland soon after the war of 1812. He claimed to have been a sailor in early life, and was one of the defenders of Baltimore, and saw the engagement immortalized by the "Star Spangled Banner." The farm opened up by Samuel Moore is visible from so many points that a lady from Florida called it a revolving farm.

Digitized by Google

William D. Moore settled on Elk Mountain in the woods. He was married three times. His first wife was Rebecca Sharp; her children were Matthias, Charles L., Elizabeth, Mary, Jacob, and Nancy. The second wife was Mary Ann Auldridge, daughter of Thomas Auldrige, Senior. Her one child was Mary Ann Moore. The third wife was Hannah Beverage. Her children were Amanda, now Mrs S. D. Hannah, on Elk; Susan, now Mrs John Gibson, near Mary's Chapel; Effie, now Mrs A. P. Gay, near Clover Lick; Etta, Joseph, and Ellis.

Thomas Moore, a noted rail splitter and fence builder, never married. He opened up a nice farm on Back Alleghany, where he now resides.

Andrew Jackson Moore was married twice. First wife was Abigail McLaughlin, daughter of the late Major Daniel McLaughlin, near Greenbank. Her children were Ernest and Anise, now Mrs D. Hevner, on Back Alleghany. The second wife was Rachel, daughter of the late Charles Grimes, near Frost. Her children were Virginia, now Mrs Silva, on Stamping Creek, Forest, Samuel, Thomas, and Elmer.

A. J. Moore settled in the woods on Back Alleghany, and opened up a fine farm.

Henry Moore married Elizabeth Auldridge, and settled in the woods near Driftwood, and opened up two nice farms. Their only son, Andrew Moore, lives at the homestead.

Digitized by Google

George C. Moore married Rachel Duncan on Stony Creek. Her father, Henry Duncan, came from Rockbridge, and was one of the carpenters that worked on the court house at Huntersville. Mr Moore lives on the "Young Place," on Stony Creek.

Elizabeth Moore became Mrs William Auldridge. These persons settled in the woods near Indian Draft. Their children were Hanson, Melinda, and Eliza. Eliza died not long since. Hanson and Melinda are living on the nice homestead opened up by their worthy parents.

Catherine Moore was married to John Burr, and they settled in Burrs Valley, where she is now living.

Eliza Moore became Mrs Price McComb, and they settled in the woods on Cummings Creek, densely covered with white pine, and opened up virtually several nice farms. Their children were Nancy, Charles, George, Wyllis, Andrew Beckley, Henry on the homestead; and Alice, now Mrs George Wagner, at Huntersville.

Melinda Moore was the second wife of the late Captain William Cochran, on Stony Creek. Her children are William Cochran, on the homestead; and Catherine Jane, now Mrs Giles Sharp, near Verdant Valley. Her second marriage was with Joseph Barlow, who lives on the Cochran homestead.

It is instructive to reflect on the memoirs of such a relationship, so largely composed of patient, industrious people, accomplishing what they have done in developing our county. Nine members of this family settled in the woods, and by their efforts more than a thousand acres of wilderness land has been made to rejoice and blossom as the rose.

Digitized by Google

Mary died in early womanhood, regarded by her sisters as their special favorite. Two, while not settling in the woods, have shown by their industry and enterprise how to make the best of more favorable opportunities, and improved what came into their hands already opened up and improved.

It is not easy to appreciate what it cost—weary toil, wear and tear of muscle and bodily vigor—to achieve what they have. Nevertheless, the oldest people tell us that there was more real contentment and satisfaction and enjoyment in life then than now; for there was a felt community of interest, and harmonious help and truly sympathetic endeavor, that seemed to have a charm not apparent now. Then it seemed a genuine pleasure to show favors and render assistance, but now pay seems to be expected for most everything that may be done in the way of helpful service.

Like most of the persons of his time, Aaron Moore was a successful hunter and made it profitable. One of his memorable adventures occurred while on his way to search for the body of his neighbor, James Twyman who was drowned in Thorny Creek, January 17, 1834, and was not found until January 19. Mr Moore lived on the west bank of the river, while Thorny Creek is on the east side. He went up the west bank to cross at Joseph Friel's. As he was threading his way along the snow covered path, his dog came upon the trail of a panther, and treed it in a lofty pine near the summi of the river ridge, about opposite Friel's. He shot the animal, left it where it fell to be attended to later on, and then hurried away on his sorrowful duty, canoeing the river at high tide. The body of the drowned neighbor was found stranded on a large rock, that is still pointed out not very far below the mouth of the creek.

Digitized by Google

When Mr Moore died, his remains were taken to the Duffield grave yard. His faithful wife survived him a few years, and then was carried to rest by his side, where they are now sleeping the years away, in hope of a blessed resurrection. May they stand in their lot at the end of the days.

LEVI MOORE.

One hundred years ago, one of the most widely known citizens in the region now embraced by Pocahontas and Bath counties, was Levi Moore, Senior, a native of Wales. He was the pioneer of Frost, and came to there some time previous to the Revolution, and was among the first to make a permanent settlement. The lands he settled now owned by the Gibsons, Sharps and others. His wife was Susannah Crist and he first settled in Pennsylvania, where he lived until his family, two sons and two daughters were born and the older ones nearly grown.

Hannah Moore was marrried to Robert Gay, the ancester of the Gay relationship, so frequently alluded to in these papers.

Digitized by Google

THE REPUBLICAN NEWS

SUCCESSOR TO THE MARLINTON MESSENGER

A NEWSPAPER DEVOTED TO THE INTERESTS OF POCAHONTAS COUNTY.

VOLUME XII. NO 2. MARLINTON, W. VA. FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1911 $1.50 A YEAR: $1 IF PAID IN ADVANCE.

POSTAL INFORMATION

..., OUT BY MARLINTON'S ...ELIGIBLE POSTMASTER

...TEREST TO ALL PATRONS

...ging Letters to be Sure Through the Holidays in Order to Make Prompt Delivery—The Office do not Undertake Mail Positions.

...ance with order No. ...Postmaster General ...ill suspend back ...ail matter except ...y and registered ...eriod beginning ...1911, and end... 1912, in order ...very of mail ...season.

...ience of the ...ill keep on ...have several ...l denomina... ...tamps and ...ng stamp ...nd both ...d cards. ...r registered ...ly for ...

...mail ...ers ...ead ...ary ...

BURNS RAPS GOMPERS

America Labor Leader Planned His Assassination.

A very remarkable accusation against Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, was made by Detective William J. Burns at New York, when he arrived in that city on his trip across the continent following clues to the men "higher up" in the labor union whom he believes were behind the McNamaras in their dynamiting activities.

"The purpose of Gompers in his incendiary talk was to get me assassinated," said Burns in an interview at the Herald Square hotel shortly after his arrival. "When he gave out his statement after these men were arrested, in which he accused me of framing up a case and planting the dynamite, he planned to excite some crank so that he would take a shot at me. He supplied the keynote for attacks upon me from street corners and in Socialistic organs by his remarks with the same end in view. Ask Francis J. Heney in San Francisco and he will tell you that I expected they would try to get me and I told him that if they did for him to get Gompers, as I knew he would be responsible. I was warned from the inside that I was to be assassinated

HON. ABRAHAM A. LILLY

That A. A. Lilly of Beckley will be a candidate for attorney general and not for congress in the Fifth district, as has been intimated on several occasions papers of the state in the near future

Abraham A. Lilly was born March 25, 1878, in Summers county, this state. In 1881 he

GATHER EGGS OFTENER

IS ADVICE OF SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE WILSON

DIRTY EGGS COST FARMERS MILLIONS

West Virginia Shares in Great Annual Loss—Infertile Eggs Will Not Spoil So Easily as Fertile Eggs and Can Stand More Heat, Which is the Cause of One-Third of the Loss.

Five million dollars a year is the estimate of the Department of Agriculture of the amount lost by the farmers of the United States on account of dirty eggs. And, of course, West Virginia being a great egg producing State shares in that loss. This loss says secretary Wilson of the Department of Agriculture, is very largely brought about by not gathering the eggs often enough. In wet weather more dirty eggs are found than at any other time, because the mud or other filth carried into the nest on the hen's feet. Eggs deposited on the ground or around hay and straw stacks become stained and are classed as "dirties." While dirty eggs may be perfectly fresh, they invariably sell in the market as

MAY LOSE EYESIGHT

Sheriff of Wyoming County Mixed Turpentine and Sulphuric Acid.

John W. Ball, sheriff of Wyoming county, whose home is at Pineville, has gone to Cincinnati accompanied by Dr. Myers, of Pineville, to consult a specialist who will be asked to do what he can to save Sheriff Ball's eyesight. A few days ago the sheriff attempted to mix sulphuric acid with turpentine in a bottle with the intention of making a liniment for application on an animal. After the acid and turpentine had been placed in the bottle the sheriff commenced to shake the contents with the result that an excess of the acid caused an explosion threw the liniment in his face and eyes.

He was seriously burned fear that he may lose his sight is expressed. Sheriff in addition to being sheriff of Wyoming county, is one of wealthiest men in the county and is a large owner of coal and timber lands.

One on the ...

"Backward, turn backward, oh, time in your flight, give us a maiden as fair and right. With a ... of switches ...

BLICAN

THE MARLINTON MESSENGER

E INTERESTS OF POCAHONTAS COUNTY.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1911

HAM A. LILLY

Senator W. O. Peterkin, president of the Gilmore Trust & Guaranty Company, of Parkersburg, the bonding company represented by T. S. McNeel, was in town between trains Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. John Standifer, of Fayette county, were here this week visiting the latter's parents, Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Hooker.

Mort English, foreman of track for the Campbell Lumber Co., left last Saturday for Mt. Clemens, Mich., where he goes to find relief from a severe attack of rheumatism.

Martin Crummett, of Mingo, spent a couple of days here this week with his brother, G. F. Crummett.

Married, at the Valley Hotel in Marlinton, Wednesday evening at 8:30 o'clock, by Rev. A. S. Rachal, Oliver P. Fury and Miss Mabel B. Jackson, both of Seebert.

Mrs. Eliza Arbogast.

Mrs. Van Buren Arbogast died at the home of her brother B. M. Yeager, in Marlinton today (Friday) after a short illness of pneumonia, aged 78 years. She lived at Dunlevie but was visiting here when taken sick. A more extended notice will be given next week.

A. Y. Dulaney, of Williams river, reports the killing of another large bear this week, making the fifth killed by him this season.

A meeting of the creditors of G. W. Fuller, of Academy, is called to meet in Charleston on the 20th of this month, at which time a second dividend will be paid.

Remember THE REPUBLICAN NEWS will always bring good results to advertisers. 500 extra copies distributed over the county each week until after New Year by our agents.

THE REPUBLICAN NEWS wants a correspondent at every post office in the county. What we want is the news, nothing trivial, but facts.

Editors purchasing Furnishings and upholstering cannot borrow one cent. We have a large line of the best and most select fabrics in this section of the state to choose from. Prices right and terms easy.—Frame & Cobb's Marlinton W. Va.

FROST.

Mr. and Mrs. McGuffin, from Polar Springs, Va., spent several weeks here visiting the latter's father, I. B. Moore.

Born—to Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Sharp, Nov. 23—a daughter.

Born—to Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCarty, Nov. 24—a son.

Miss Ruth Sharp is visiting her sister, Mrs. Sam Harper at Hendricks.

Miss Grace Moore who has been clerking in Hamed's store at Marlinton, spent Sunday visiting relatives near here.

O. E. McKeever, who is building the new school house at this place, spent Thanksgiving and Sunday with home folks at Huntersville.

R. T. Noel, who is working on the school building, spent a few days visiting relatives at Dunmore.

Rev. Scott, preacher in charge of the M. E. Church at this place, will return with his family this week and take charge of the parsonage. He is a good preacher and we welcome him, hoping that his path may be smooth.

Mrs. Mariah Herold, who has been seriously ill at her home, is slowly improving.

Theodore Roosevelt, the foremost ex-president is spoken of for the next Republican President.

Earnest Sharp has moved into the home vacated by Mrs. Aaron Ryder.

That Dreadful Cough.

Can be relieved at once by that famous Wells' Pine Cough Syrup with tar. Distributed by S. B. Wallace & Co., wholesale druggists. It comes in a red package and is a valuable remedy for colds, coughs, bronchial catarrh, spasmodic croup, winter coughs and all diseases of the air passages. For sale and guaranteed by all dealers. Price 25 cents a bottle.

"Sweeping Sores."

At this time of year, when the weather is changeable people suffer from chapped hands. If such is your case you need a good salve something that will relieve that burning and stinging sensation. A salve like that of Dr. Bells is a manufactured by S. B. Wallace & Co., wholesale druggists. Sold by all dealers. Price 10 cents a box.

A. L. Carter and wife to O. H. Koe, lots 23 and 29 block 37 Marlinton; $3,500.00.

Andrew Price special commissioner to W. A. Armentrout, lot 1 block 9 Yeager addition to Dunlevie; $250.00.

W. A. Armentrout and wife to J. M. Dye, lot 1 block 2 Dunlevie; $350.00

S. L. Hogsett and others to Marvin C. Smith, parcel of land known as the Josiah T. Hogsett farm; Little Levels; $5.00.

Mrs. A. L. W. Griffith and husband to Frank Herbert, parcel in Cass; $200.

J. M. Watts trustee to Mabel Gorrel, lot 72 Riverside Addition to Marlinton; $1.00

Mall Gerst and wife to H. H. Weir, parcel of land near Barlow; $100.00

T. S. McNeel trustee, to G. W. Miller, 188 acres Greenbrier river; $1,525.00

Allegheny Improvement Co. to S. L. Hogsett, lot 3 block 2 Minnehaha Springs; $150.

J. B. Lockridge and wife to Mrs. Kate Gibson, lot 3 block 1 Minnehaha Springs; $125.

J. B. Lockridge and wife to Miss Bertie Gibson, lot 4 block 1 Minnehaha Springs; $125.

GUARDIANS APPOINTED:

John M. Galford was appointed guardian of May Geiger an infant over 14 years. C. I. Galford surety. Appointment was made by C. J. McCarty in vacation.

C. I. Galford was appointed guardian of Neva J. Galford. John M. Geiger as surety.

E. R. Sharp was appointed guardian of Beatrice Sharp, Lillian P. Sharp, Bettie Clay Sharp and Gay Sharp.

MARRIAGE LICENSE:

Henry H. Conrad 30, Minnie E. Snyder.

Oliver Fury 26, Mabel Jackson 21.

Archie C. Pugh 26, Myrtle Sheets 21.

THE REPUBLICAN NEWS wants ads, will start a WANT column with this issue.

Do not cringe [illegible] more sense of economy than [illegible] count—so much each month, [illegible] give her the independence she [illegible] save you money, because if [illegible] she will help you save. Do [illegible] money SHE will have it for

Let O[illegible]

Bank o[illegible]

Capital and S[illegible]

Detective Murdered.

John Van Hoose, ag[illegible] one of the best known [illegible] tives in West Virgini[illegible] Gideon Marcum, aged 2[illegible] of a prominent family, c[illegible] in a fatal duel at [illegible] Mingo county, Sunday [illegible] Van Hoose attempted t[illegible] Marcum on a charge [illegible] glary. Marcum was to[illegible] for the noted detectiv[illegible] when the latter tapped [illegible] the shoulder and asked [illegible] "come along" Marcum [illegible] flash pulled a pistol an[illegible] the bullet entering Van [illegible] abdomen, causing instan[illegible] Marcum started to run [illegible] had Crumms of Wayne [illegible] who had accompanie[illegible] Hoose on the case, and [illegible] ment la'er Marcum p[illegible] penalty for his own [illegible] when he fell dead from [illegible] let fired by the deputy [illegible] whose aim proved tru[illegible] Hoose's home was at C[illegible] burg, Ky. He was an [illegible] of the Baldwin agency [illegible] assigned to the N. & [illegible] road.

this county, was in ay.

Neel, of Millpoint, y and Monday in ith his son, T. S.

rice is in Elkins
king deposition in

Fry went to a., Saturday to ne of her nieces
t fever.

McNeel of Acaonday with her Hill.

Edgar, of the day Tuesday is son Mayor

nstricker re-evening from she has been nursing her
L. Kramer,
as much im-

Peterkin,

lar affidavit, and it was on these false affidavits that all three were finally brought before the federal court.

"Ketched a Bar,"

Columbus Riddle, better known simply as "Lum," who lives at the dam on Williams river, caught a large bear in a pen at the head of Ken's creek Monday night. Brum was unusually fat and weighed close to three hundred pounds. Pat Gay and John Moore brought several pounds of the meat to Marlinton Wednesday with which they treated some of their friends at the Warwick restaurant.

"I had been troubled with constipation for two years and tried all of the best physicians in Bristol, Tenn., and they could do nothing for me," writes Thos. E. Williams, Middleboro, Ky. "Two packages of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets cured me." For sale by all dealers.

When you have a cold get a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It will soon fix you up all right and will ward off any tendency toward pneumonia. This remedy contains no opium or other narcotic and may be given as confidently to a baby as to an adult. Sold by all dealers.

Before purchasing Pocahontas and adjoining county farms, see us. We have a large list of the best and most select farms in this section of the state to choose from. Prices right and terms easy.—Hunter & Eshelb, Marlinton W Va.

He allege first conse
of the wi worth of aside acco sale day;
not have t specifically appraised, be done y
to distri coming in count of s
by Geor settle a c timber; t said fun ascertain would b McClintic him for says tha time to such ex

DEED RE

John Monroe
Allegha

Jame wife to acres G

S. L.
H. Kee
Marlint

And

WM. H. SAWYERS.
ATTORNEY AT LAW
HINTON, WEST VIRGINIA

COPY

CONCERNING ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S ANCESTRY.

A VERY INTERESTING ARTICLE BY THE LATE HONORABLE ANDREW PRICE, PUBLISHED A FEW YEARS AGO, IN THE POCAHONTAS TIMES.

This paper is undertaken to discuss with you the identity of Lincoln's maternal grandfather. Under ordinary circumstances this might be considered a delicate question, but so much harm has been done by the number of books that have been published on the subject and the scandal thathas covered the nation that I am sure that I cannot add to the sorrow of two good women. It is my sincere desire to place them in a better light before a hundred million people, everyone of whom is deeply indebted to them for the saver of the nation, Abraham Lincoln. The women I refer to are Lucy Hanks and her daughter Nancy Hanks.

Each passing year adds new luster to the name of Abraham Lincoln. Devoted as I have been to the neglected history of West Virginia, so long at the mercy of the mercenaries among historians, I had not considered Lincoln as a study demanding my attention any further than his actions as a statesman were responsible for the formation of the State of West Virginia, and the movements of the Civil War within this State.

Every drop of blood in me is Confederate. I was born since the war but I can remember the days when Lincoln was not revered universally either in the North or in the South. When it is remembered that his Gettysburg speech, now considered the supreme voicing of thought, was ridiculed and derided by Northern editors, some idea can be obtained of what Lincoln had to endure in his lifetime before the second sober thought of his countrymen set him on the highest place in history ever known in the troubled story of the world.

The Lincolns belonged to Rockingham County, Virginia.

WM. H. SAWYERS
ATTORNEY AT LAW
HINTON, WEST VIRGINIA

COPY

That was the County filled with what we call pacifists in this day. It was the breed of Quakers, Mennonites and Dunkards. High class, level headed people who had a clear understanding of the horrors of war where the winner is also a loser. And as for the almighty dollar, they were experts in that game, and money was highly important to them. That was the country that suffered more than any other county in the United States per capita, and while Lincoln was president and commander inchief of the army. My earliest impressions then were from men who had suffered from the burning and and raiding of the Valley of Virginia and "Old Abe" was about the best name that they called him. If it had not been for my father, who was a historian and a Confederate solder and who appreciated the greatness of Lincoln long before some of the men of disappointing ambitions in the North I might have grown up in the belief that the war president had cloven hoofs.

Later on when we had moved from Rockingham county to the mountains of West Virginia, and I had the opportunity of hearing men discuss for endless hours in conversation the history of the Civil War, I began to see how the existence of the Union depended upon the unfaltering purpose of one man, just as the success of the Revolution was due to the steadfast nature and good judgment of George Washington. I have come to regard Abraham Lincoln as one of the men that the Lord provides from time to time to preserve mankind from destruction through their own mad passions and prejudices.

Perhaps the most engrossing problem ever presented to the psychologist was how Lincoln the wise man and the man without the benefit of even a most primitive school, could have been evolved from the Lincolns and the Hankses.,as the sole representative of two

WM. H. SAWYERS
ATTORNEY AT LAW
HINTON, WEST VIRGINIA

COP

prolific families that ever showed any scholastic ability or who ever reached an eminent position upon his own merit. If there ever was a case of a man who burst his birth's invidious bar, it was he.

Ever since I can remember the searchers after truth who delighted in unsavory subjects were divided in two schools, one which advanced the ~~exery~~ theory that Lincoln was the son of John C. Calhoun, and the other that Lincoln was the half brother of Jefferson Davis. Something like forty years ago I was able to combat both theories for I had found out that if there ever was a pure and virtuous woman on the face of the earth it was Nancy Hanks Lincoln, the mother of Abraham Lincoln. Therefore there couldnot be any truth in those rumors. Never was there a more undeserved case of the fell work of the livid wing of scandal.

But when it comes to the question of Lucy Hanks, the grandmother ~~of~~ who atoned for what some might consider a mistake of her girlhood by a long life of good works as a noble Christian woman the wife of a good man, and the mother of nine children, we have to accept the fact that Nancy Hanks was a base born child and we have to look to the circumstances surrounding that fact.

There can be little doubt that the Hanks family knewwho was the father of Nancy Hanks and there can be no doubt that they regarded it as a secret so profound that it could not be divulged. I believe that Abraham Lincoln knew who his grandfather was and that his lips were tightly sealed. All that he said about it, that has been preserved was that his grandfather was a Virginia planter and that he believed that whatever talent

WM. H. SAWYERS
ATTORNEY AT LAW
HINTON, WEST VIRGINIA

COPY

that he had was inherited from his unnamed grandfather. This is one of the strongest evidences to me that the gentleman that I am about to name was the grandfather of Abraham Lincoln.

One of Lincoln's great aunts, a sister of Lucy, had a child before marriage by a man by the name of Charles Friend. It did not suit to marry for some reason or other but there was no great concealment for they named the baby Dennis Friend Hanks and he was adopted along with little Nancy by Elizabeth Sparrow, aunt to both of them, and brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. This was the Dennis Hanks, a sort of fireside philosopher who was an earlier counselor of his cousin Abe. This Dennis Hanks took the view that he should perjure himself like a gentleman and prove that Nancy Hanks was named Nancy Sparrow and born in lawful wedlock after Lucy married the other Sparrow. This he failed to accomplish. I suppose that these matters had best not be discussed as a general thing, but when the fate of nations depend upon the vagaries of human beings there is nothing much we can do but reaffirm our faith and dependence in Providence, and admit that we are helpless and dependent mortals.

A woman said theother day that what was the rightest thing in the world could be the wrongest thing in the world under different circumstances.

Physically Lincoln took after the Lincolns. They were given to tall ungainly forms. One of my earliest recollections was one of the clan that was six feet, seven inches tall and thin and raw boned.

WM. H. SAWYERS
ATTORNEY AT LAW
HINTON, WEST VIRGINIA

COPY

Lincoln was a counsin of R. E. Lee, The name of Lee is one of the proudest in Virginia and China. Some of the rest of us decayed aristocrats may whisper around that the Lees are a comparatively modern family, dating back to a mere two hundred years or so, but the Lees sail grandly on nevertheless and number many great and important names on the list. They ought to agree on the spelling however for away back there a distinguished Virginia jurist, spelled his name Leigh. It looks like there may have been an ancestor phonetically inclined, like the branch that were apt to spell their name Linkhorn.

Dr. Barton of Foxboro, Massachusetts, has become the most famous of the biographers of Lincoln, though Emil Ludwig is making a pass at the subject at this time and he seems to be a man of parts, capable of felicity in expression and discernment. West Virginia at this great intellectual feast takes the place of the poor man at a frolic. We furnished a tottering democracy with the immortal Nancy and you cannot laugh that off. I have had many kind letters from Dr. Barton lately and he has accepted my help in the spirit in which it wasoffered. After the home of the Hanks had been found to be in Mineral County I was able to locate the missing title papers. In that I functioned as an attorney-at-law, rather than a historian. It is a matter of considerable satisfaction to me that the title and survey have passed the critical inspection of David C. Martin. I noticed in Dr. Barton's late book that he has the picture of the ruins of ahouse with a cellar as one of the possible sites of the Hanks homestead. This is to an antiquarian is an anachronism, as the pioneers on the headwaters did not have cellard in 1784.

ATTORNEY AT LAW
HINTON, WEST VIRGINIA

I feel that the best evidence of the identity of the mysterious grandfather is to be gathered from Lincoln's talk with his law partner, William H. Herndon, who has recorded it in his history, and his account sh uld be carefully considered. Herndon said:-

"It was about 1850 when he and I were driving in his one horse buggy to the court in Menard County, Illinois. He spoke, for the first time in my hearing, of his mother, dwelling on her characteristics and mentioningor enumerating what qualities he inherited from her. He said among other things, that she was the illegitimate daughter of Lucy Hanks and a well bred Virginia farmer or planter, and he argued that from this last source came his power of analysis, his mental activity, his ambition, and all the qualities that distinguished him from the other members and descendants of the Hanks family. The revelation, painful as it was, called up the recollection of his mother, and as the buggy jolted over the road, he added ruefully, "God, bless my Mother; all that I am or ever hope to be I owe to her."

In the Virginias the world planter is never used to describe a famer in the Valley or in the Mountaints. It is confined to the tobacco and cotton regions, and that is what was meant in this case. It is apparent that Lincoln knew who the grandfather was and that there was a powe ful reason for not disclosing the name. It would have been fatal to his political life. It would have invoked a storm of ridicule. Lincoln up to the hour of his death was subjected to abuse and adverse criticism. Kind words were few and far between.

Joseph Hanks was a native of Richmond county a county in the Northern Neck where it narrows down to the few miles that separate the tidal rivers, the Potomac and the Rappahannock. The space here is taken up largely by Richmond County and Westmoreland County, and this spot has been the birthplace of many prominen men among them being Washington, Monroe, the Lees and other prominent personages.

Hanks signed by mark. He married Ann Lee. He was in the Fairfax grant and decided to go to the extreme western part of the Fairfax lands. This was about 1782, as fixed by Barton, from certain records that he examined in Richmond county. The way at that time lay by Alexandria by Leesburg, through Snickers Gap of the Blue Ridge, and by Winchester and Romney to Patterson Creek.

Fairfax had set aside as manor lands 9000 acres of the bottoms along Patterson Creek but there was good land to be taken up outside the reservation.

When he moved he had nine children, five boys and four girls and all must have been with him as they were listed in the census of 1782 as living in Hampshire County.

Reaching back towards the Allegheny Front was Mikes Run a stream about ten miles long. In this neighborhood, Hanks saw George Terry who had settled there. He looked at a choice spot in a hollow in the hills on the head drains of Mikes Run which Peter Hartman had bought of Fairfax in 1781. Hartman had gone back to Washington County, Maryland, beyong the danger of Indian raids and had left George Terry a title bond for the tract.

It was 216 acres and just filled the little hollow. It had lime-stones to insure its fertility. There were sugar trees. Good springs, shelter from the storms. Protection from the Indians. It had even a good deer lick. Terry agreed with Hanks that the latter should have the northern end. The tract was something over a mile broad and lay parallel with the mountain ranges. Hanks built his home here. Barton says that Hanks may have come in the latter part of the year 1782. That is not at all probable. Whoever heard of a settler like Hanks who had no money coming to the mountains in the fall of the year. It would be as unnatural as for geese to fly north at that time. It was absolutely necessary to raise enough corn to see the family through the winer, And when it is proven that Hanks wintered there with nine children, we know full well that he raised a patch of corn by hand the summer of 1782.

He musthave been there two years. From the spring of 1783 to the spring of 1784. He had improved the land by clearing and building a house of one room which had no floor, no window and not much a chimney.

Hanks was a good citizen and a typical pioneer no doubt. There was a strong religious streak in the breed. I like to quote that verse about the pioneer families and how they trained their youths : "He raised them rought, but he raised them well, when their feet took hold of the paths of hell, he filled them full of the wrath of God and tanned their hides with an old ramrod."

To this household came trouble and disaster. Their fine daughter, Lucy, unmarried, was found to be pregnant. That put the household on the move. Hanks was poor. He managed to raise about a hundred dollars from a money lender by giving a lien on his land. It does not state that this was gold. Anything but that. And considering the state of the national and state currency it must have been a pitiful sum. Hardly enough to flag a bread wagon in this day and time. But onit the family turned their faces to the setting sun and their place knew them no more.

ATTORNEY AT LAW
TON, WEST VIRGINIA

It was only by real work that Barton was able to locate them from year to year from the Atlantic coast to the western part of Kentucky. And there is an hiatus in his record from 1784 to 1787. It would be well for search to be made in the records of Monongalia and Ohio counties, West Virginia, and the original counties of the Virginia part of Pennsylvania, for it is more than likely that the Hanks raised corn for a season or two on the waters of the Monongahela. The year 1784 was a specifically dangerous year for immigrants to float down the Ohio, and I hardly think it possible that they got through the Indian lines that year.

Hanks died in Kentucky nine years after leaving Miss Rum a rich and substantial farmer. He mentions every child he has in the will and leaves each something, except no mention is made of his daughter, Lucy. Conjecture is that Lucy has been well provided for in worldly goods. Conjecture is that Hanks has prospered exceedingly in the leanyears between 1784 and 1793. What is the explanation? The Virginia planter.

In Kentucky Lucy has a few more troubled years, but by 1790 she has agreed to marry Henry Sparrow and she writes a letter to the clerk saying that she is of age and for him to issue a Lisons for her and Henry Sparrow. Lucy had one error marke d against her in a way on November 24, 1790, when a grand-jury of hes returned an indictment against her for fornication. Scribes and Pharisees! Henry Sparrow comes into court and executes a marriage bond that he will marry Lucy and the fornication case is throwg out of court. Lincoln's mother died when he was a small boy but his grandmother, Lucy lived until Lincoln was a man grown, and Lincoln was a serious, deep, and discerning man. Does anyone believe that he did not know who his grandfather was?

The clue we have is that Lucy Hanks was betrayed in the year 1783, inHampshire county. The question naturally arises from the known facts whether there was any Virginia planter tunning loose in that county during the summer of 1783? It appears th t there was. That he was rich, and powerful, of an amazinh personal perfection, in the dangerous fifties, devoted to hunting and to woods life, and who had been borned and raised with Joseph Hanks. Hanks being about seven years older than th the planter. History places this planter in that Eastern Panhandle the summer of 1783. In fact he had a summer home there. Thatparticular year he was the employer of and the financial baker of a man who was trying to build a boat thatwould float upstream without sails or oars.

That is the fatal opportunity. The summer of the next year we can imagine that some planter coming back tohis summer home and finding a deserted cabin in the woods and the Hanks

WM. H. SAWYERS
ATTORNEY AT LAW
HINTON, WEST VIRGINIA

COPY

family in exile. The neighbors tell him perhaps that Lucy had been ruined and the family to hide their shame have gone to Kentucky. Then the planter gets up an expedition to Kentucky under the plea of looking after his real estate holdings on the Ohio River. History says thatafter getting to the navigable waters of the Ohio he finds the Indians are up and that it would not be safe to descent the river in a boat. He spends some weeks around the headwaters of the Monongahela River and returns. One night he sits under a tree all night in the rain.

The Joseph Hanks family in its migration traveled from the coast to near the Mississippi River. They went from the banks of the Rappahannock to the headwaters of the Potomac and from there to Rough Creek or Rough River as it is now called a branch of the Green River in Kentucky. The planter had lands in each of the regions. It is significant that the only land that he owned in Kentucky was in the pennyroyal on Rough Creek where he had seven thousand acres.

Breed is stronger than pasture. No proof has been adduced that would be accepted after a plea in bar. But still it seems to me that we know the man. We sense it as it were. Perhaps I had better not be more definite concerning a manwho was first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymant.

God moves in a mysterious way and the people of the United States should never cease to be grateful for George Washington, Nancy Hanks, and Abraham Lincoln, and the time will come when Nancy Hanks will rank in fame with Miriam and Joan Of Arc.

The writer in closing this paper would gratefully recognize the assistance of David J. Cochran, that was so helpful in collecting the particulars, and so cheerfully given by him, although suffering at the time severely from rheumatic and other troubles, that seemed to be wearing his useful life away.

ABRAM BURNER.

Abram Burner, the progenitor of the Burner relationship in our county, was from the lower Valley, probably Shenandoah Countyr Soon after his marriage with Mary Hull; of Highland County, he settled on the Upper Tract, early in the century. Their children were Mary, Elizabeth, George, Jacob, Adam, Henry, and Daniel.

Mary Burner became Mrs George Grimes and lived near Mount Zion, in the Hills.

Elizabeth Burner was married to Hon John Grimes, and lived in the Little Levels on the lands now owned by the county for an infirmary.

Jacob Burner married Keziah Stump, and settled in the western part of the State.

Adam burner married Margaret Gillespie, one of Jacob Gillespie's nine daughters at Greenbank, and settled in upper Pocahontas.

Daniel Burner married Jennie Gillespie, sister to Margaret. Daniel Burner was drowned near Peter Yeager's in a deep eddy, during harvest, and left one son, Joshua Burner.

Henry Burner met his death by drowning in the east fork of Greenbrier.

Digitized by Google

George Burner, eldest son of Abram the pioneer, after his marriage with Sally, daughter of Andrew Warwick, settled on part of the Burner homestead where the road crosses the east prong of the Greenbrier. Their children were Andrew, Enoch, Allen, Lafayette, Lee, Charles, Nancy, who became Mrs William Wooddell; and Isabella. now Mrs Lanty Slaven.

Enoch Burner married Rachel Ann Tallman, and settled in Missouri.

Lafayette Burner first married Nannie Wooddell and lived on the uppar Greenbrier. Second marriage with Caroline Gum.

Lee Burner married Rebecca Gum, daughter of William Gum and a sister to Caroline just named, and lived on the Upper Tract.

Allen Burner first married Elizabeth Price, daughter of James A. Price, of Marlins Bottom, and settled at Greenbank. George Burner, of Minneapolis, is her son. Allen Burner's second marriage was with Virginia Clark, of Parnassus, Augusta County, and he now resides at Cass. Lula and Emma Burner, well known teachers are her daughters.

Charles Burner married Elizabeth Beard of Greenbank, and lived on the Burner homestead.

Hon. George Burner was a prominent citizen from the organization of the county. As noticed elsewhere he was one of the first members of the county court. He represented the county several terms in the Virginia Legislature, and was a Jacksonian Democrat in his political proclivities, and strange to say one of the original Pocahontas secessionists. so intense his devotion to State rights had become.

Digitized by Google

His second marriage was with Margaret Poage, daughter of George W. Poage, of the Little Levels.

ANDREW WARWICK.

One of the best known names in our pionee. annais was that of the Warwicks. John Warwick; the ancestor of the Greenbank branch of the connexion, was of English descent. It is believed he came to upper Pocahontas previously to the Revolution, and opened up a settlement on Deer Creek, at the place now in the possession of Peter H. Warwick and John R. Warwick. Mrs Warwick, whose given name can not be certainly recalled, was a member of the Martin family in the Valley of Virginia.

John Warwick seems to have been a person of great enterprise, and braved the dangers of pioneer life with more than ordinary courage and devotion to duty. He had a fort raised upon his premises, to which himself and nelghbors would resort when threatened by Indian incursions or raids Being so near to Clover Lick, whose facilities for hunting and fishing were so much prized by the Indians, its erection seems to have been very exasperating to them, and were very troublesome to the settlers living in reach of the Warwick fort.

The only Indian Major Jacob Warwick was ever certain of killing was shot from a tree not far from this fort. The warrior had climbed the tree to reconoitre the fort, and it is more than probable that the

Digitized by Google

A few months after this perilous adventure John Yeager died, December, 1861, aged 48 years. When the battle of Alleghany was fought in that same month the balls seemed to fall like hail upon the roof, but none of the inmates were touched.

ABRAM DUFFIELD.

The first cottage prayer meeting the writer remembers was at the home of Abram Duffield. Early one Sabbath in May, the writer's parents with their four children came to the Duffield home to attend the meeting that had been announced. No one had yet arrived when we reached the place. Upon entering the porch voices were heard within as if persons were engaged in reading or prayer. Standing by the door and listening we found that it was the venerable Abram Duffield reading to his invalid wife the account given by Saint Mathew of our Redeemer's temptation in the wilderness. He was reading at the moment where it is written: "He shall give His angels charge concerning thee and in their hands shall they bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." Then she remarked: "Oh, that is so good; how encouraging it is for poor me." Finally the venerable man resumed and then prayed after reading. "Then the Devil leaveth him, and behold angels came and ministered unto him. Then again the same one observed: "Oh, how good to hear that our Lord gained the victory. How safe it makes one feel to have him for our Saviour who is so loved by the angels." There seemed to be mutual rejoicing over the Redeemer's victory, and if the benefits of this victory had been for these two old people alone, their satisfaction could not have been, seemingly, more real. When silence intervened we knocked at the door and were told to come in. There were the two old people, and no one else, in the room. It was not long, however, before quite a number assembled, and the cottage prayer meeting was quite a spirited one-

Digitized by Google

Abram Duffield is believed to have come from the lower Valley, during the Revolution or soon after, and at the time referred to was living on the farm now occupied by Newton Duffield. The venerable Mrs Duffield was Hannah Moore, daughter of Moses Moore, the well known pioneer.

From Mrs Catherine Kellison, on the Dry Branch of Swago, we gathered the following particulars.

Andrew Duffield was the eldest son of Abram Duffield's family. He married Jane Moore, daughter of Robert Moore, Senior. In reference to Andrew Duffield's family, we learn that Robert M. Duffield lives in Jackson County, West Virginia. William Duffield, a Union soldier, died during the war at the home of Jacob Waugh in Barbour County. Andrew Duffield, Junior, died of fever at the age of sixteen years. Rebecca Jane Duffield is now deceased. Eliza Duffield became the wife of Captain Walton Allen of Clover Creek, who was a well known scout in the late war between the States. Catherine Duffield was married to Clark Kellison, near Buckeye, a Union soldier under Sheridan. He was also on detached service on the western plains after the war in the U. S. Cavalry. He received his discharge just in time to escape the Custer massacre.

Digitized by Google

John Duffield, son of Abram, the pioneer, married Rebecca Sharp, daughter of John Sharp, Senior. Mr Duffield settled at the Mill property on Stony Creek, but his later years were spent on the farm where his father Abram had lived and died. His sons were Hamilton, Wesley, Newton—who lives on the old homestead;—Emory, and McKendree in Colorado. Andrew, a bright and beautiful little boy, the pet and pride of the household, was at play on the porch. His mother was busily sewing just inside the door, not six feet away. Wondering what was keeping Andrew so quiet, she turned to the door and found him dead—strangled by the crupper of her saddle. The shock was such that she never fully recovered from the effects, though she lived for more than fifty years afterwards.

Sarah Jane Duffield became the wife of Joseph Moore, son of the late Addison Moore.

Nancy Ellen Duffield was married to the late Marcellus Ratliff, and now lives on a portion of the old homestead near Green hill school house.

William Duffield, son of Abram and Hannah Duffield, married Hannah Brock, daughter of Thomas Brock. He settled near the Sulphur Spring. The property is at present occupied by William Gay, whose wife, Martha Gay, is a daughter of William Duffield. Mr Gay was a Union soldier, and had remarkable adventures while escaping from the army below Richmond, and making his way with five or six others through East Virginia, the Valley, the mountains of Bath and Pocahontas back to Stony Creek.

Digitized by Google

Caroline Duffield was married to George Auldridge. They are living in Iowa, having the comforts of a prosperous home.

Hannah Duffield was married to David Cochran and lives at the end of Droop Mountain.

One of William Duffield's daughters died in early youth of what was called the "cold plague," but judging from reported symptoms it would be called now "congestive chills."

This hard working man, William Duffield, finally met his death by a tree falling upon him which he was chopping for browse. The snow was quite deep, and when the family became uneasy that he did not come to dinner, Rebecca, the eldest of the family, went to see what was the reason. She found him dead under the tree, buried in the snow. She told what had happened, and other members sf the family hastened to the neighboring homes for assistance. Rebecca went back and chopped the large tree in two, and had the log rolled away before any one had time to get there, and was holding her poor dead father's head in her arms. Rebecca now resides in Kansas, and is reported to be living in very comfortable circumstances.

Mary Duffield became the wife of Alexander Moore and went to the west.

The writer cherishes very tender recollections of John Duffield, the honest and faithful miller, whom he met so frequently at mill when a mere youth. A few months before the venerable man's death we met after a separation of more than thirty years. It was at a sacramental service, and during the recess we met and conversed for some time. He feelingly expressed the pleasure it gave him to meet once more in this life. From what I can learn this was about the last time my venerable friend ever put to his lips the visible cup of salvation.

Digitized by Google

WILLIAM WANLESS.

For more than a hundred years the Wanless name has been a familiar one in our region of country. According to tradition vaguely entertained, Ralph and Stephen Wanless, natives of England, came to Virginia and settled on the Wanless place, near Mount Tabor school house, in the "Hills," five miles north of Huntersville. One of Ralph's sons was William Wanless, who married Nancy Wilson, from near Fort Defiance, Virginia. She was a sister of the wife of Isaac Moore, Senior, of Knapps Creek. They settled on Back Alleghany, and were the parents of nine daughters and seven sons. The daughters were Rachel, Jane, Eliza, Martha, Nancy Ann, Margaret who died aged 7 years, Mary died aged 15 years, Melinda who was drowned when a young woman in Leatherbark Creek, and Matilda. The sons were James, Andrew, Nelson, Ralph, Allen, and two unnamed who died in infancy.

Rachel, the eldest daughter, married the late John Logan, and settled in Randolph County, lived awhile in Barbour County, and finally located on Alleghany.

Digitized by Google

Then while scouting in the mountains toward Gauley he was thrice aroused by alarming dreams, and when the morning dawned he discovered that an Indian had tried three times to steal upon him and kill him while he was asleep.

There is also a tradition that a detachment of Indians were in ambush for several days near Mr Hill's home on Hill's Creek, for the special object of capturing or killing him, as they had come to feel there would be little or no use to raid this region while he was alive or at large- They had taken np the idea that the owner of such a nice house would dress much better than anybody else, and would not work with his own hands. They saw men at work in reach of their guns, but none of them dressed to suit their ideas as to how Mr Hill would be attired. It so turned out that Mr Hill was one of the hands, and it was his workday dress that beguiled the Indians and prevented his being shot at or captured.

Richard Hill was one of nature's noblemen, who relied more on pure, genuine character than mere superficial appearances, and therein lay the secret of his safety and success. A pure character and a genteel appearance make a lovely sight, but a genteel exterior and an impure chnracter make a nuisance that is simply unendurable to all except human John Crows or vultures.

ADAM ARBOGAST.

The Arbogast relationship is identified to a marked degree with the history of our Pocahontas people, and justly claims recognition in these short and simple annals. So far as known, the original progenitor of the Arbogasts in Pendleton and Pocahontas was Michael Arbogast, who must have been one of the original pioneers of what is now Highland County, in "Indian Times." He settled there some time previous to 1758. Fort Seybert on South Branch, about twelve miles northeast of Franklin, was the chief place of refuge for all the pioneers in that section when there was danger of being pillaged, slain, or carried into captivity by raiding parties of Indians, led for the most part by Killbuck. Captain Seybert is reported to have made the remark, when his fort was taken in 1758, that if the Arbogasts had been there he could have held the place in spite of the Indians.

Digitized by Google

Michael Arbogast had seven sons: Adam, George, Henry, John, Michael, David, and Peter,—the two last named were twins. The sons, excepting John, were all very powerful and stalwart in their physique, and were often more than two hundred pounds in weight.

Adam Arbogast married Margaret (Peggy) Hull, daughter of Adam Hull, near Hevener's Store in what is now Highland County, Va. They came to the head of the Greenbrier, near Travellers Repose, in 1796, and settled on the place now occupied by Paul McNeel Yeager. Here he built up a home in the primitive forest, and reared his family. His sons were Benjamin, William, Adam, and Jacob. The daughters were Susan, Elizabeth, Mary, Barbara, and Catherine. Barbara and Catherine died in youth. In reference to the sons, another paper was prepared, illustrating the history of Benjamin Arbogast's family, whose sons were Solomon, Henry, Adam, John, and Benjamin, Jr., the distinguished teacher and pulpit orator. In that paper there are some omissions that are supplied here:

Digitized by Google

Margaret, daughter of Benjamin Arbogast, Sr., became Mrs John Yeager, late of Alleghany Mountain, of whose family fuller particulars may be looked for in the Yeager Sketches.

Mary (Polly) married Hamilton Stalnaker and lived in Randolph.

Another daughter of Benjamin Arbogast became Mrs Henry Wade on Back Creek. In rererence to her family the following particulars are in hand:

Benjamin Wade was a physician and settled in Missouri.

John Wade was also a physician and lives at Burnsville, Braxton County, where Wilson Wade also lives.

Madora Wade, now Mrs Gawyne Hamilton, lives in Braxton.

Naomi Wade married Joseph Gillespie, and also lives in Braxton.

Harriet Wade became the second wife of William Cooper, near Green Bank.

Delilah Wade became Mrs Joseph Wooddell, near Green Bank. In reference to her children are these particulars:

Clark Wooddell lives in Renick's Valley.

Preston Wooddell, a gallant Confederate soldier, was slain in the battle of Winchester.

Digitized by Google

Warwick Wooddell was killed at the battle of Cold Harbor. Aaron Wooddell was also a Conrederate soldier.

John Arbogast, a son of Benjamin Arbogast, Sr., was killed near Glade hill by a falling tree. Joel Arbogast, his son, is a prosperous farmer in Kansas.

William Arbogast, of Adam the pioneer, married Jane Tallman and lived at Green Bank. Frequent and fuller references to him and his family appear in other papers.

Jacob Hull Arbogast, of Adam the pioneer, married Elizabeth Wiison Bright, of Highlrnd, and settled on the West Branch of the Upper Greenbrier, on the place now in possession of Colonel J. T. McGraw. His family consisted of four sons and three daughters.

Margaret became Mrs Levi H. Campbell, and lives in Elkins.

Eliza Jane is Mrs Adam Shuey' and lives at Fisherville, Augusta County.

Harriet Elizabeth is now Mrs B. M. Yeager at Marlinton. B. M. Yeager is a widely known citizen of our county as a land agent, railway promoter and manager for the Pocahontas Development Company.

Paul McNeel Arbogast married Amanda Bucher, and lives on the Greenbrier not far from the homestead

Jacob Lee Arbogast married Otey Riley, and at the time of his recent decease was a merchant at Travellers Repose.

William Barton Arbogast lives at Travellers Repore.

Jacob H. Arbogact was a man of very interesting personality. He was of untiring energy, and in his time was an extensive dealer in wild land. His name frequently appears in the court records a party to some of the most important and warmly contested land litigation that ever transpired at the Pocahontas bar. He was an ardent supporter of the Confederate cause, and saw service in the home guards. In the beginning of the war, a few days after the repulse of Pegram on Rich Mountain, in 1861 he refugeed with his family to the East and spent most of the war times in Augusta County. He carried but little with him, and so lost his household effects and live stock along with his dwelling. In 1865 he returned and began life afresh at the old Greenbrier homestead. But few places in West Virginia were more completely desolated than the head of Greenbrier by the ravages of war.

Digitized by Google

Adam Arbogast, Jr., of Adam, the pioneer, first married Rachel Gregg, or Zebulon Gregg, and settled near the homestead. There was one son by this marriage, Napoleon Bonaparte. The second marriage was with Sarah McDaniel. In reference to the children of the second marriage the following particulars are given:

Huldah married Paul McNeel Yeager, and lives at Travelers Repose.

Eliza Arbogast became Mrs Frank McElwee and lives at Elkins.

Alice Arbogast married Early Snyder and lives in Crabbottom.

Rrchel became Mrs C. C. Arbogast and lives near Arbovale.

Ella is now Mrs Benjamin Fleisher and lives in Highland.

Digitized by Google

Ada died in youth.

The son Peter D. Arbogast married Hodie Burner, lived awhile at Arbovale, was a Justice of the Peace: he lately resigned and is now studying medicine at the University of Virginia.

Adam Arbogast, the pioneer, lived to be nearly one hundred years old. e recovered his second sight and for years had no need of eye-glasses. Coming to this region early as he did, and having grown up in the period of Indian troubles, he had many thrilling adventures to relate. Upon one occaslon his dogs treed a panther in an immense hemlock tree for which the upper Greenbrier is so celebrated. He called on John Yeager, his nearest neighbor, for assistance in capturing the dangerous animal, one of the largest of its kind. John Yeager was a famous and fearless climber of forest trees. A torch was procured and he began to climb, holding it in one hand. When he had located the panther, he laid the torch on two limbs, descended the tree until ne could reach the rifle that Mr Arbogast had loaded and primed for him, He thereupon returned to his torch and by its light shot and killed his game.

Upon one occasion the pioneer had arranged for a bear hunt on Burner's Mountain. When reaching the point designated, he was disappointed in not meeting his hunter friends. He killed a bear however, and as it was growing late and there were signs of a coming storm, he went into shelter, and soon a hurricane occurred. The next morning he sound there was not a standing tree anywhere near; the dog was gone, the bear fast under fallen timber, the gun broken to pieces, and he was safe without a scratch or bruise. He had to go home for an axe to chop the tree off the bear and get help to bring it in.

Digitized by Google

What gives these stories their interest, it all occurred just as he told it. Like the Father of his Country, Adam Arbogast could not and would not tell anything but the truth as he saw it.

ROBERT GAY.

Robert Gay, Esq., the subject of this sketch, was one of the most prominent personalities of his time in the affairs of early pioneer days. He was a native of Augusta County, and was brought up to manhood on the banks of the Calf Pasture River, between Deerfield and Goshen. Just before the Revolution he came to this region and settled first on Brown's Creek.

His first wife was Hannah oore, daughter of Levi Moore, Senior, who homesteaded and settled the place near Frost now occupied by the family of the late Samuel Gibson, Esq.

Afterwards Mr Gay located on the east bank of the Greenbrier, about opposite fhe mouth of Stony Creek, near Marlinton. Subsequently he built a new house on the west bank, traces of which are yet visible at the Lumber Yard. The timbers of this house are now in the dwelling occupied by Colonel Levi Gay. These are among the oldest specimens of hewn timber in the county. The tradition is that the old house now owned by M. J. McNeel is the first building of hewn timber ever erected in the county. Here the venerable and their two sons, John and Adam, are about all of Captain Young's descendants—of his name—in the county, with whose history he was so prominently identified for so many years.

Digitized by Google

Colonel Samuel Young, whose memory was recently honored by a large outpouring of the citizens at the Sulphur Spring, Sunday, May 3, 1894,—according to an appointment made forty years before, that if alive, he would meet them there that day—was his second son. He was a local preacher, and afterwards an officer in the Union army. He did not live to meet his unique appointment, and among those who assembled forty years after, there were eleven who were present at the original meeting, which was a preaching service in the open air, a large rock serving for a pulpit.

ADAM CURRY.

A generation since, one of the best known characters in West Highland, Virginia, was Captain Adam Curry, a Revolutionary veteran. One of his grandsons, William Curry, is a well known citizen of Pocahontas County.

Captain Curry was a native of Scotland, and came to America, and resided several years near Manasses Junction. He was among the first to enlist in the war of the Revolution, ond was chosen captain of his company, and participated in all the engagements in which Virginia troops were engaged that followed Mercer and Washington.

Soon after the war he gathered up the remnants of his property and moved to Augusta County, locating in the Back Creek valley on property now owned by William Crummett in southwest Highland. He settled in the woods and raised a large family of sons and daughters. He was honest in his dealings, and was held in much esteem for his high sense of honor and patriotic impulses. It seems almost too strange to be believed that he would not accept a pension, offered him for his services as a brave and faithful officer in the Revolutionary struggle. He always declared that the service was its own reward. Instead of being a hardship, military service was the greatest pleasure of his life. He desired no better recompense than the fun he had, and the pleasure it gave him to see liberty secured for his invaded country. He was proverbially neat in dress and polished in his manners. To the close of his life, some forty or fifty years ago, he dressed in the colonial style—knee breeches, long stockings, and shoes with silver buckles.

Digitized by Google

He retained his habits of court life as to diet and sleeping as long as he lived. He died at the age of one hundred and five years, with but few signs of decrepitude visible. To the last he was erect as a young grenadier, cheerful in spirit, and mental faculties active apparently as ever. His remains are in the Matheny grave yard, near the Rehobeth Church, in the Back Valley, a few miles from his home.

A European traveler spent some time near Manasses, where Captain Curry lived before his removal to Highland. He speaks of meeting a party of gentlemen on a tavern porch: "No people could exceed these people in politeness. On my ascending the steps to the piazza every countenance seemed to say, 'This man has a double claim to our attention, for he is a stranger in the place.' In a moment there was room made for me to sit down, and every one who addressed me did it with a smile of conciliation. But no man asked me where I had come or whither I was going. A gentleman in every country is the same; and if good breeding consists in sentiment, it was found in the circle I had got into. The higher Virginians seemed to venerate themselves as men; and I am persuaded there was not one in company who would have felt embarrassed at being admitted to the presence and conversation of the greatest monarch on earth. There is a compound of virtue and vice in every human character; no man was ever yet faultless; but whatever may be advanced against Virginians, their good qualities will ever outweigh their defects, and when the effervescence of youth is abated—when reason asserts her empire—there is no man on earth who discovers more exalted sentiments, more contempt of baseness, more love of justice, more sensibility of feeling than a Virginian."

Digitized by Google

Having lived for years in such society, we are prepared to believe all that has been written and told of Captain Adam Curry.

Late in the summer of 1861, some Confederate troops, commanded by Colonel William L. Jackson, were stationed at Huntersville, and used the Clerk's office for barracks. In the place of straw they scattered the office papers pell-mell on the floor and spread their blankets. It also became apparent the Federals would soon enter the place, and so the court directed their clerk, William Curry, to look out a safe place for the county records.

Digitized by Google

In obedience to instructions, he secured the assistance of R. W. Hill, then a youth too young for military service, with a team. The clerk removed the records to Joel Hill's residence, near Hillsboro, where they remained until January, 1862. Deeming it necessary to seek a safer place, Mr Curry arranged for the transportation of the records to Covington, via Lewisburg, young R. W. Hill teamster. For a time quarters were had in the upper rooms of William Scott's store house, and afterwards for a few weeks room was furnished in the county clerk's office.

September, 1853, on General Averill's approach to Covington, Mr Curry carried the records to William T. Clark's, eight miles north of Covington, and for three weeks had them concealed in a rick of buckwheat straw. The buckwheat patch was in the midst of a forest and well hidden from view.

Matters became so threatening that arrangements were made to made to move them into the mountains, four miles east, to the residence of a Baptist minister, absent as a soldier in the Confederate army, leaving his home in the care of his wife and small girl as sole occupants. He was assisted in this removal to the lonely mountain refuge by Andy Daugherty, one of Mr Clark's colored men. Andy afterwards became a citizen of Pocahontas, and lived at Clover Lick. He deserves recognition for his fidelity, because for two years the safety of the records depended on his not telling about them.

Digitized by Google

In June, 1865, after surrender at Appomattox, Mr Curry, assisted by John B. Kinnison, with a three horse team, carried the records back to Joel Hill's and in a month later placed them in a nearby house belonging to the Rev Mitchell D. Dunlap, where they remained until September, 1865. The first court after the war was held at Hillsboro, November, 1865, in the Methodist church; and from that time the records were kept in the old Academy building until June, 1866, when they were returned to Huntersville and placed in the residence of John Garvey, near the court house, and then after a few months were replaced in the office. Something more than five years intervened between the first removal and the final return of the records, and notwithstanding the risks encountered and the vicissitudes of war times, nothing was lost but an old process book of no intrinsic importance. This loss is believed to have occurred while the office was in use as Confederate barracks.

So far as known there is no other like instance of fidelity to official duty that surpasses the preservation of the Pocahontas County records. There were ten removals in all, from first to last, and when returned six months were spent in assorting and replacing the papers.

JOHN McLAUGHLIN.

For the past seventy-five or eighty years the McLaughlin name has been a familiar one among our peo-

Digitized by Google

CAMIE WADE

WADE

SLAGLE

MARVIN

RALPH COMBS

ALDERMAN

LEWIS A.
ALDERMAN
OCT 2 1939

ALEX R ALDERMAN
PFC US ARMY
WORLD WAR II
1909
MAY 3 1987

GER
RMAN
VIRGINIA
WORLD WAR II

WILLIE H
ALDERMAN
SEPT 20 1884
APR 12 1966

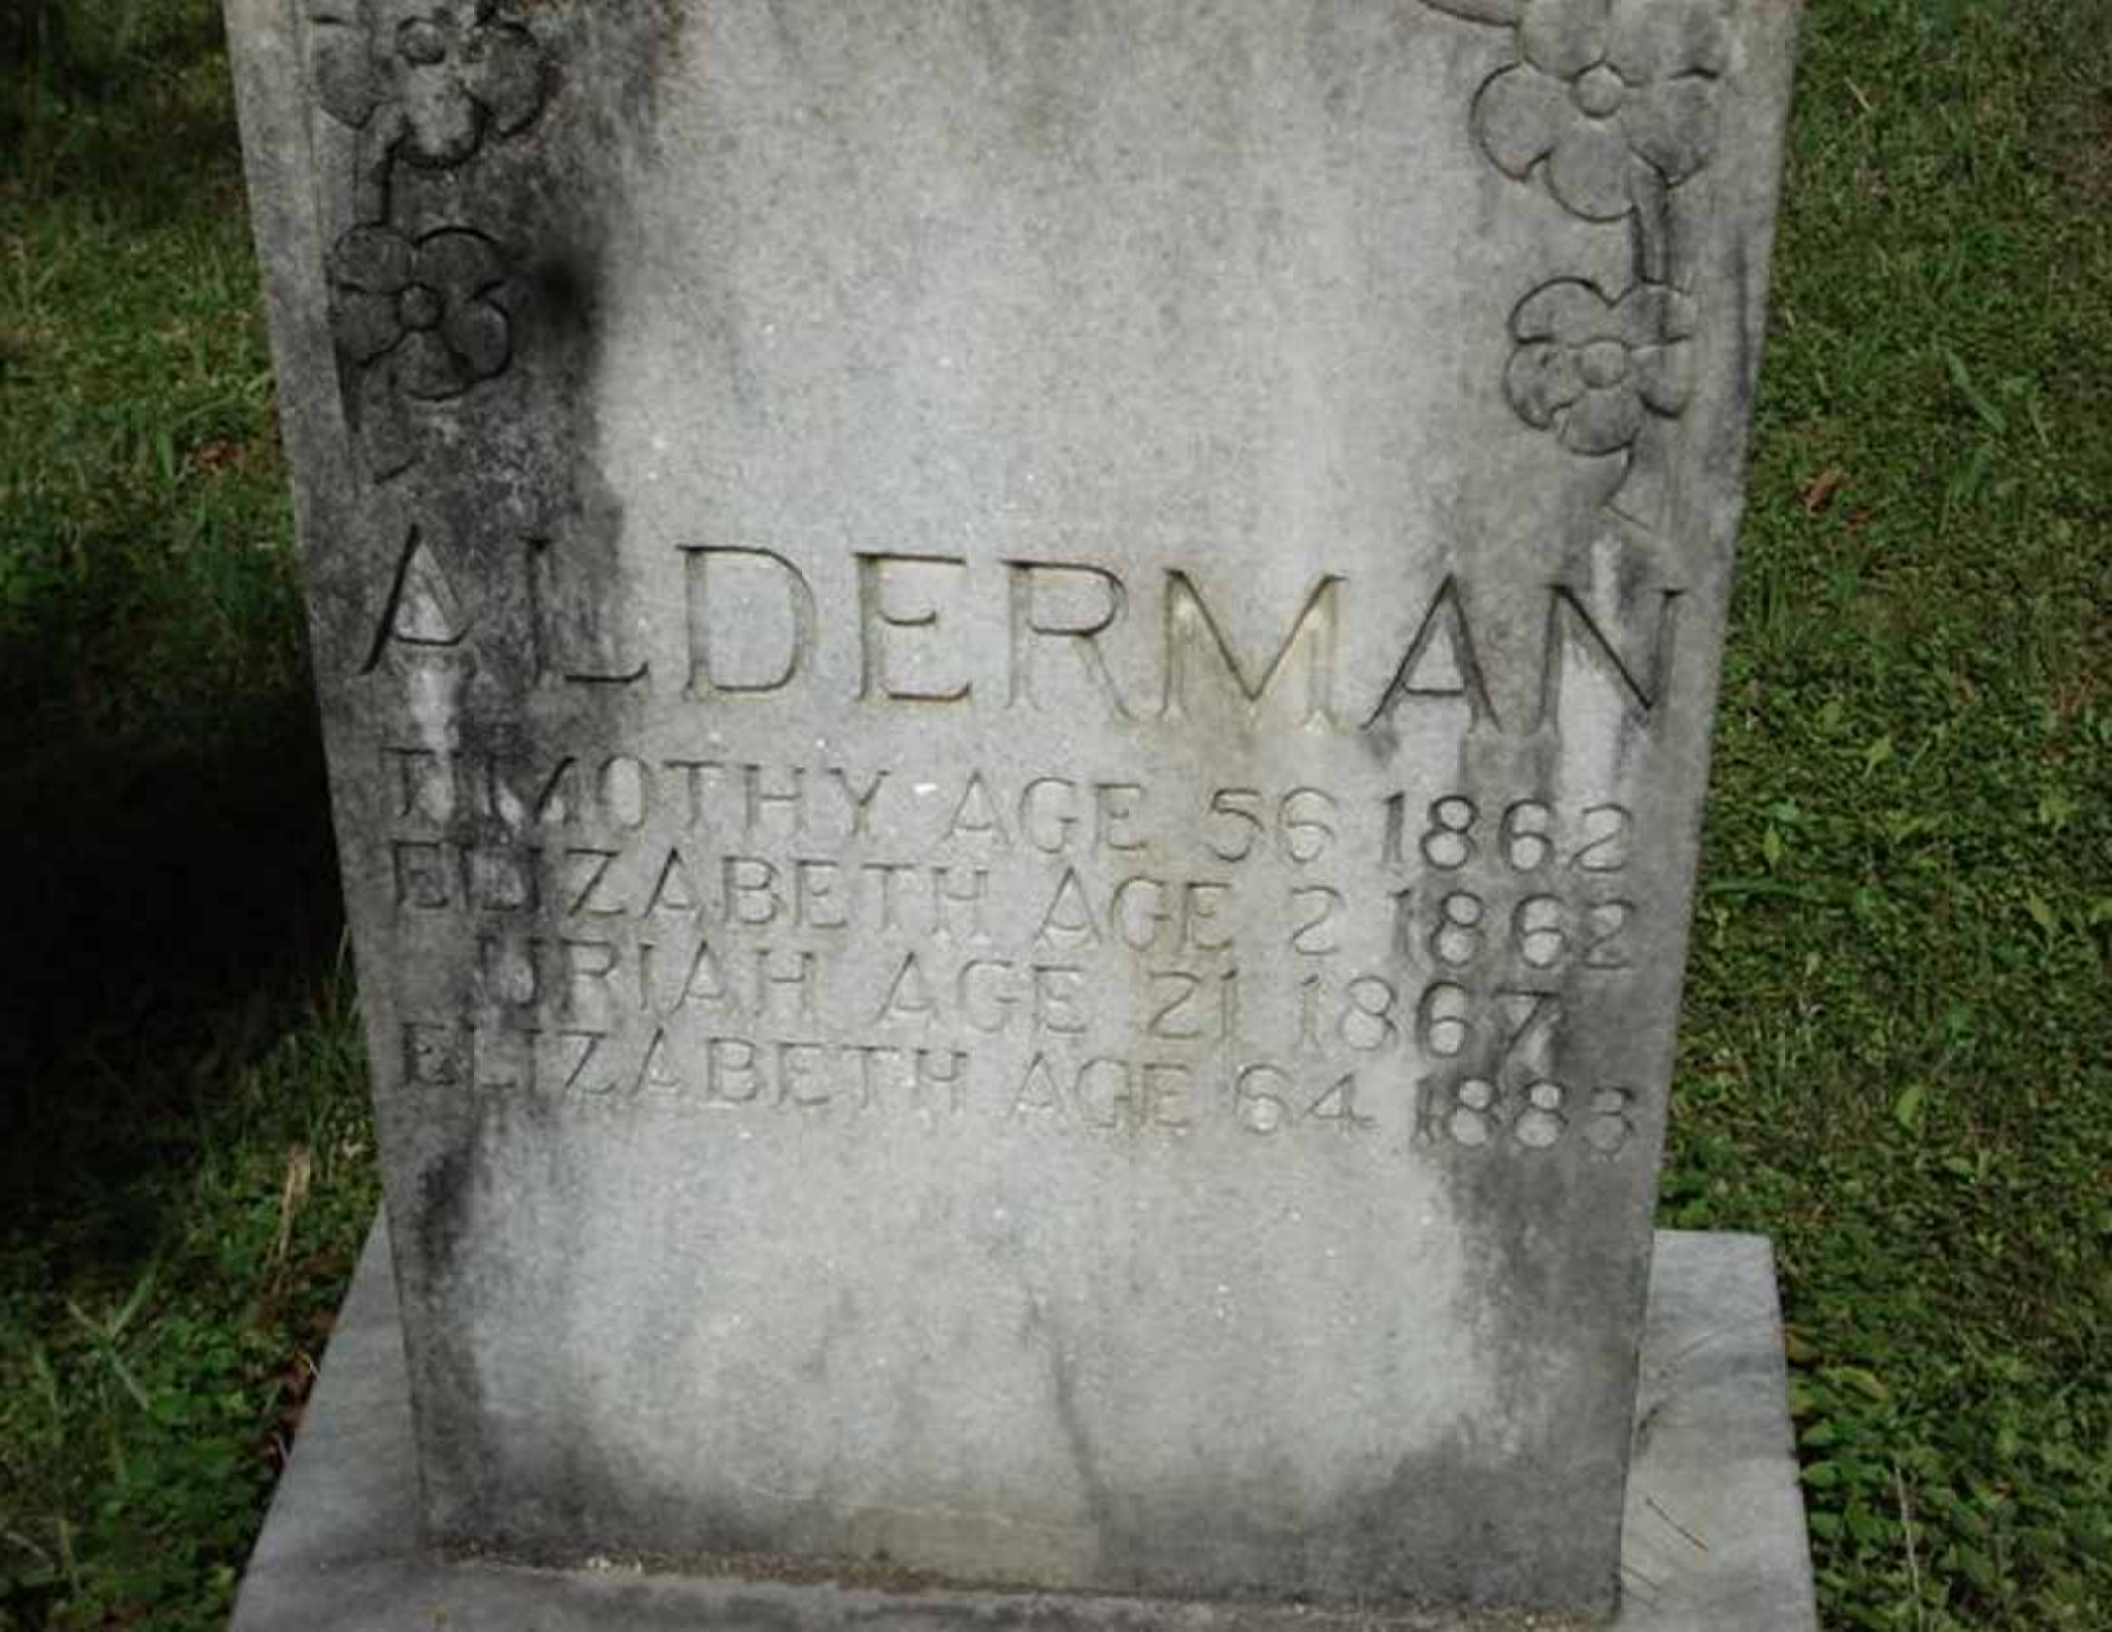
NAOMI MAY

TIMOTHY S
1964
NAOMI

TIMOTHY S.
ALDERMAN
1877
1964

ALDERMAN
FATHER
OCTAVES M.
1849 — 1901
MOTHER
NANCY
1852 — 1908

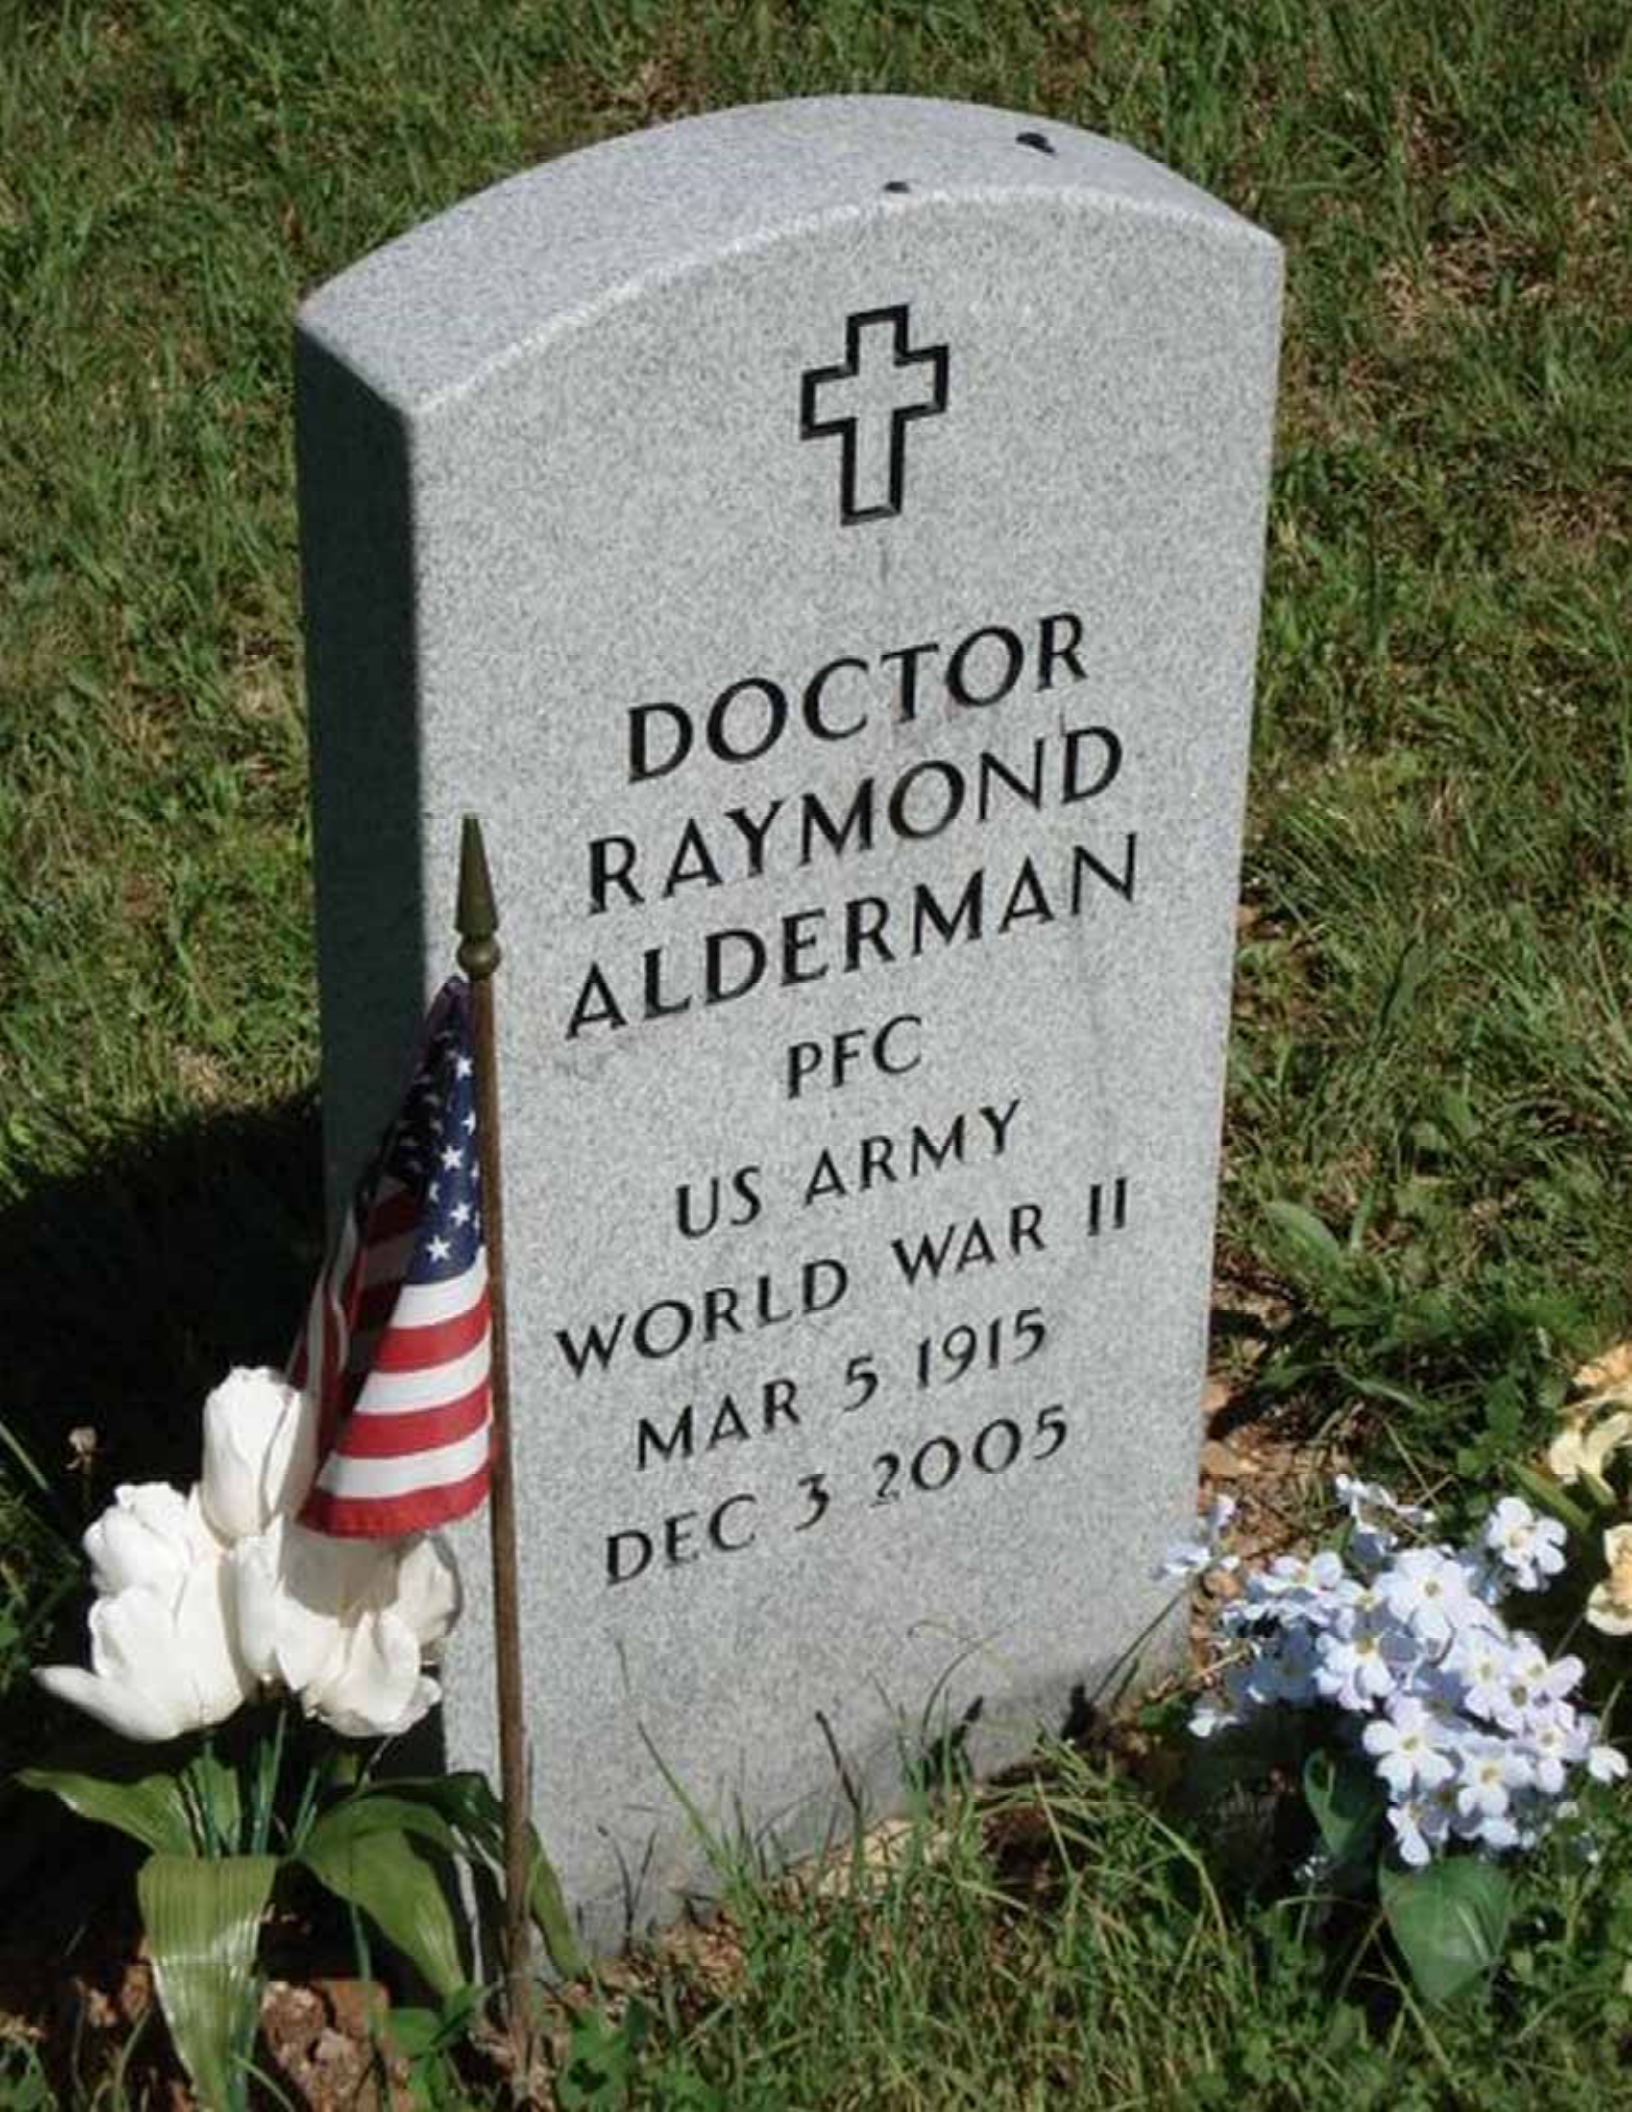
ALDERMAN
TIMOTHY AGE 56 1862
ELIZABETH AGE 2 1862
URIAH AGE 21 1867
ELIZABETH AGE 64 1883



ALDERMAN
TIMOTHY AGE 56 1862
ELIZABETH AGE 2 1862
URIAH AGE 21 1867
ELIZABETH AGE 64 1883

KINCADE
BABY

CLARK
KINCADE



DOCTOR
RAYMOND
ALDERMAN
PFC
US ARMY
WORLD WAR II
MAR 5 1915
DEC 3 2005

MARJORIE I SIEGMUND
1918

ALDERMAN
MATTIE C.
1885 — 1928
DOCTOR W.
1882 — 1944

1963
1963

JOHN A.
CLARKSTON
JUNE 6, 1851
DEC. 31, 1939
Christ is my hope
ELIZABETH J.
CLARKSTON
BORN 1854
JAN. 20, 1914
Christ is my hope

NANCY BYRD

DOCTOR RAYMOND
ALDERMAN
1915 2005

GLORY SHEA
RYDER
JULY 7, 1998
OCT. 10, 1998
FOR A LITTLE WHILE GOD LENT US OUR ANGEL

WADE

MOTHER
CLARA
1896
19

FATHE
GILME
187

1963

BAUGHMAN

McCARTY

SAMUEL H
AUG. 26.
1944
NOV. 24.
1997

FATHER
WILLIAM S
1872 1952

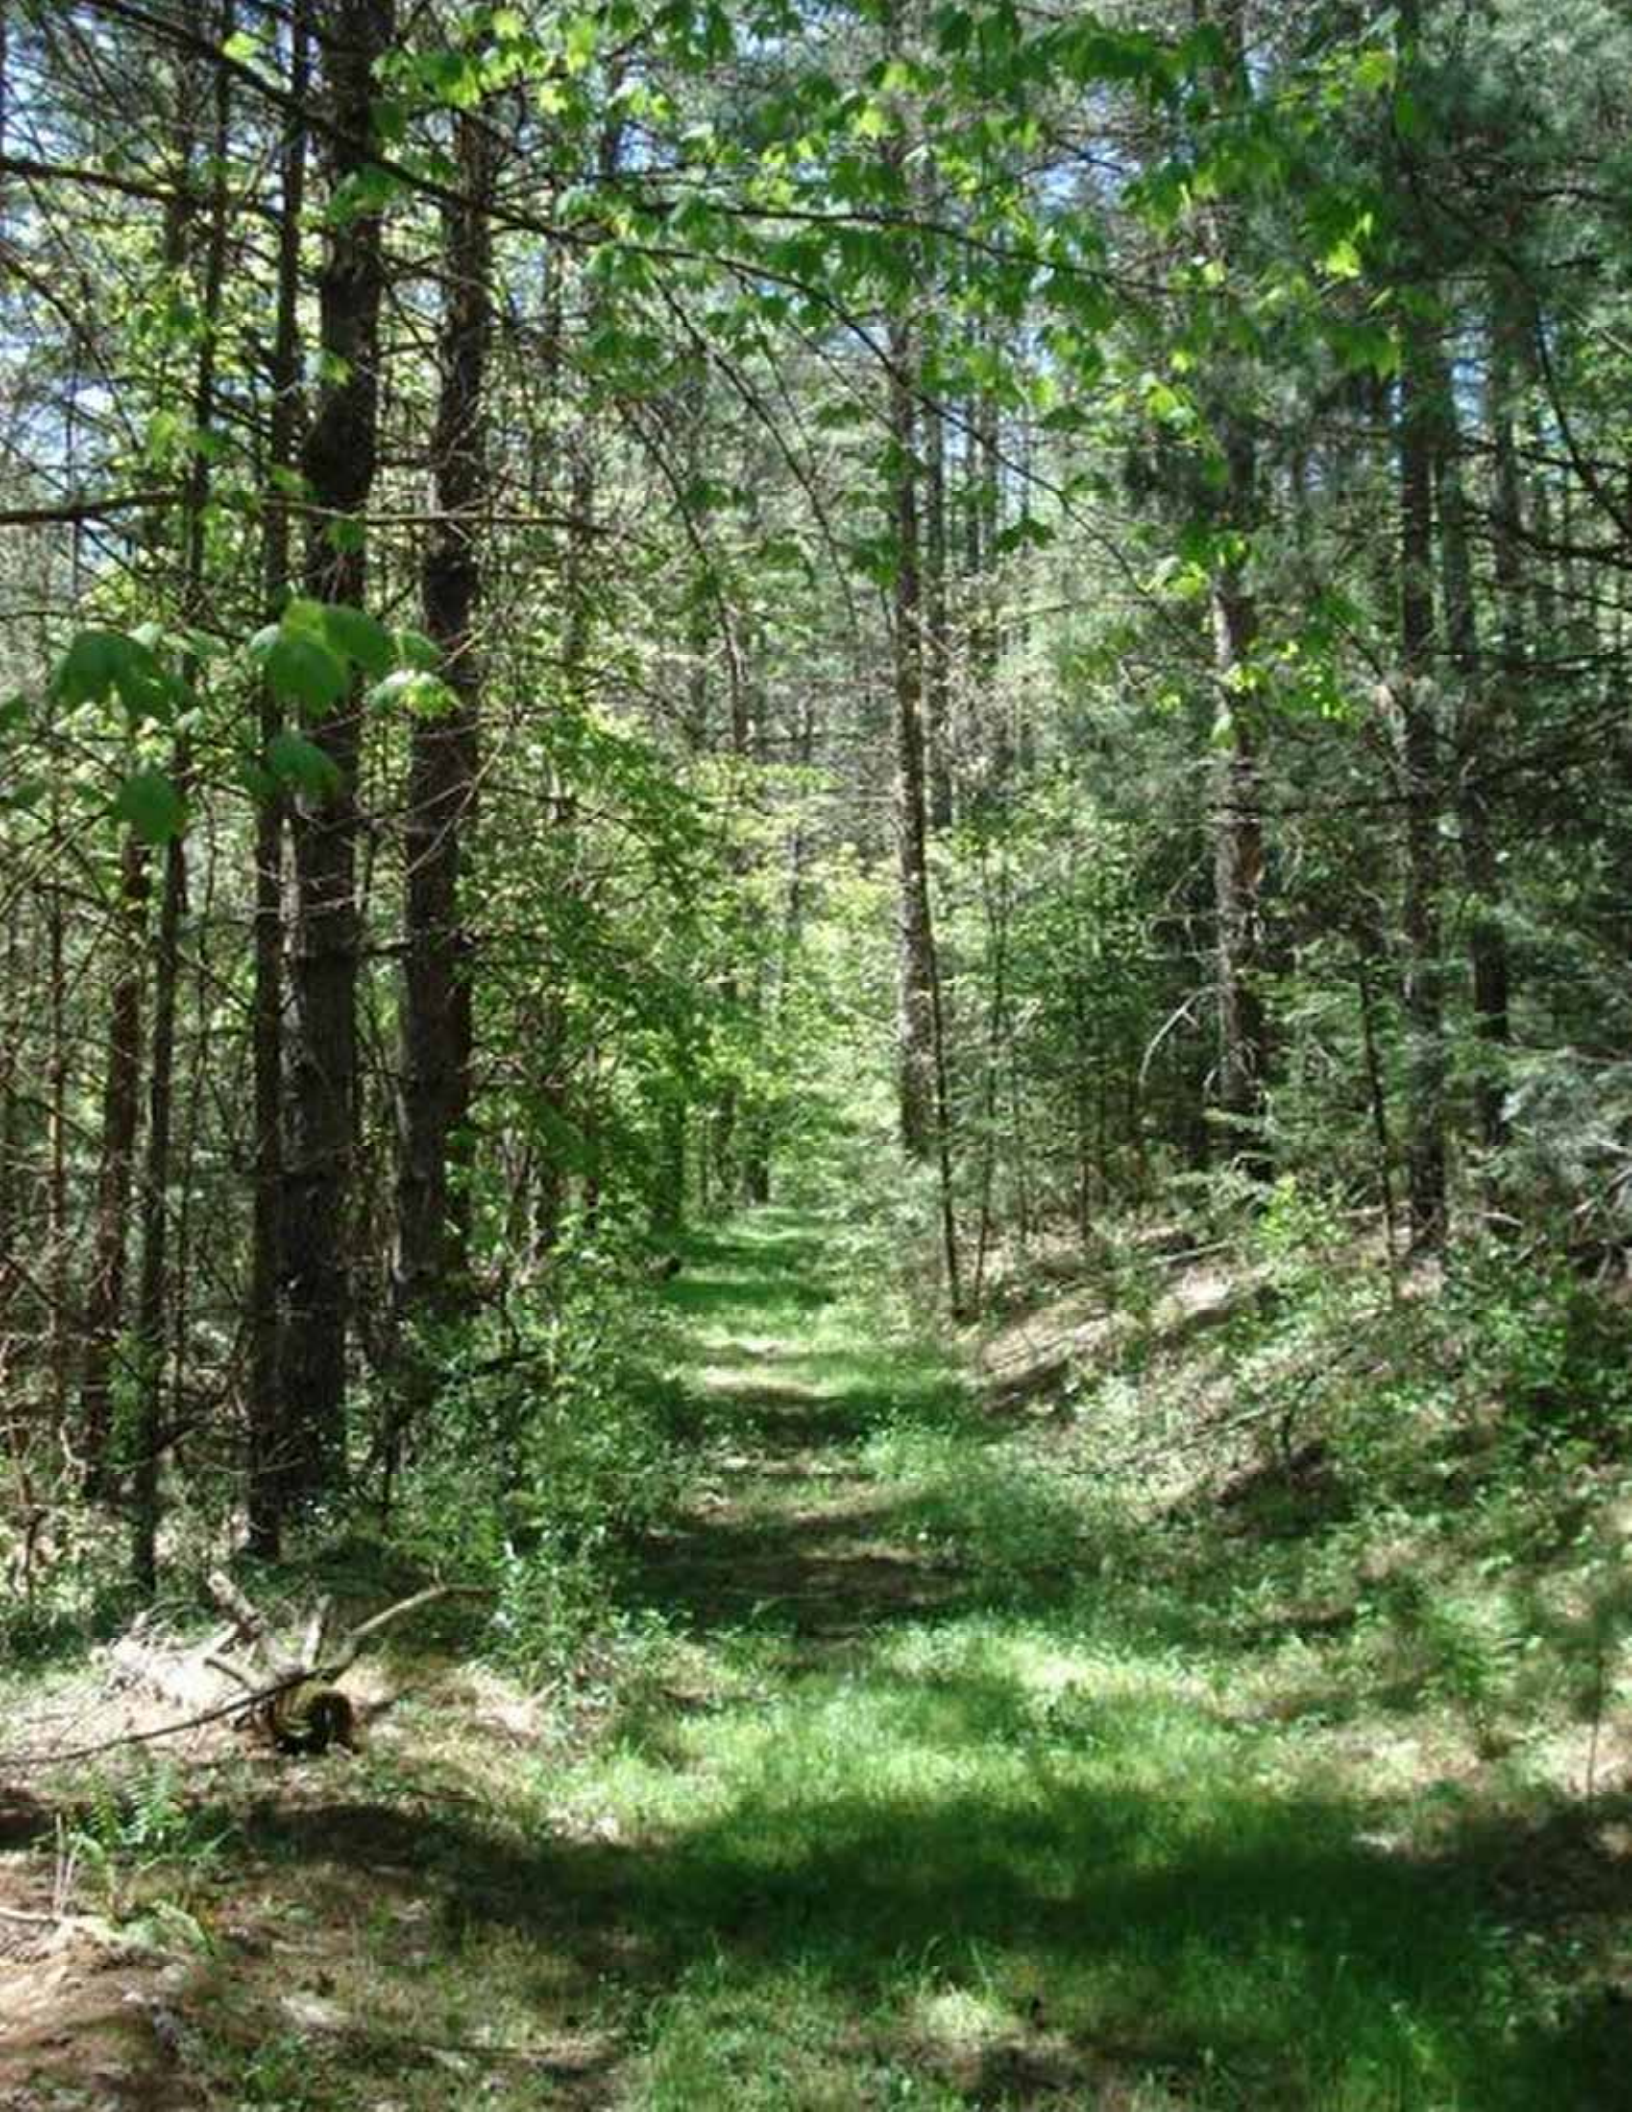
MOTHER
IDA V
1866
1962

FATHER
CHARLES P.
1903
1986

WADE
PALMER

ANNIE E.
JAN. 26, 1913
JUNE 16, 1997



CEMETERY

ALDERMAN
EST CEMETERY 1862

ALDERMAN
EST. CEMETERY 1862

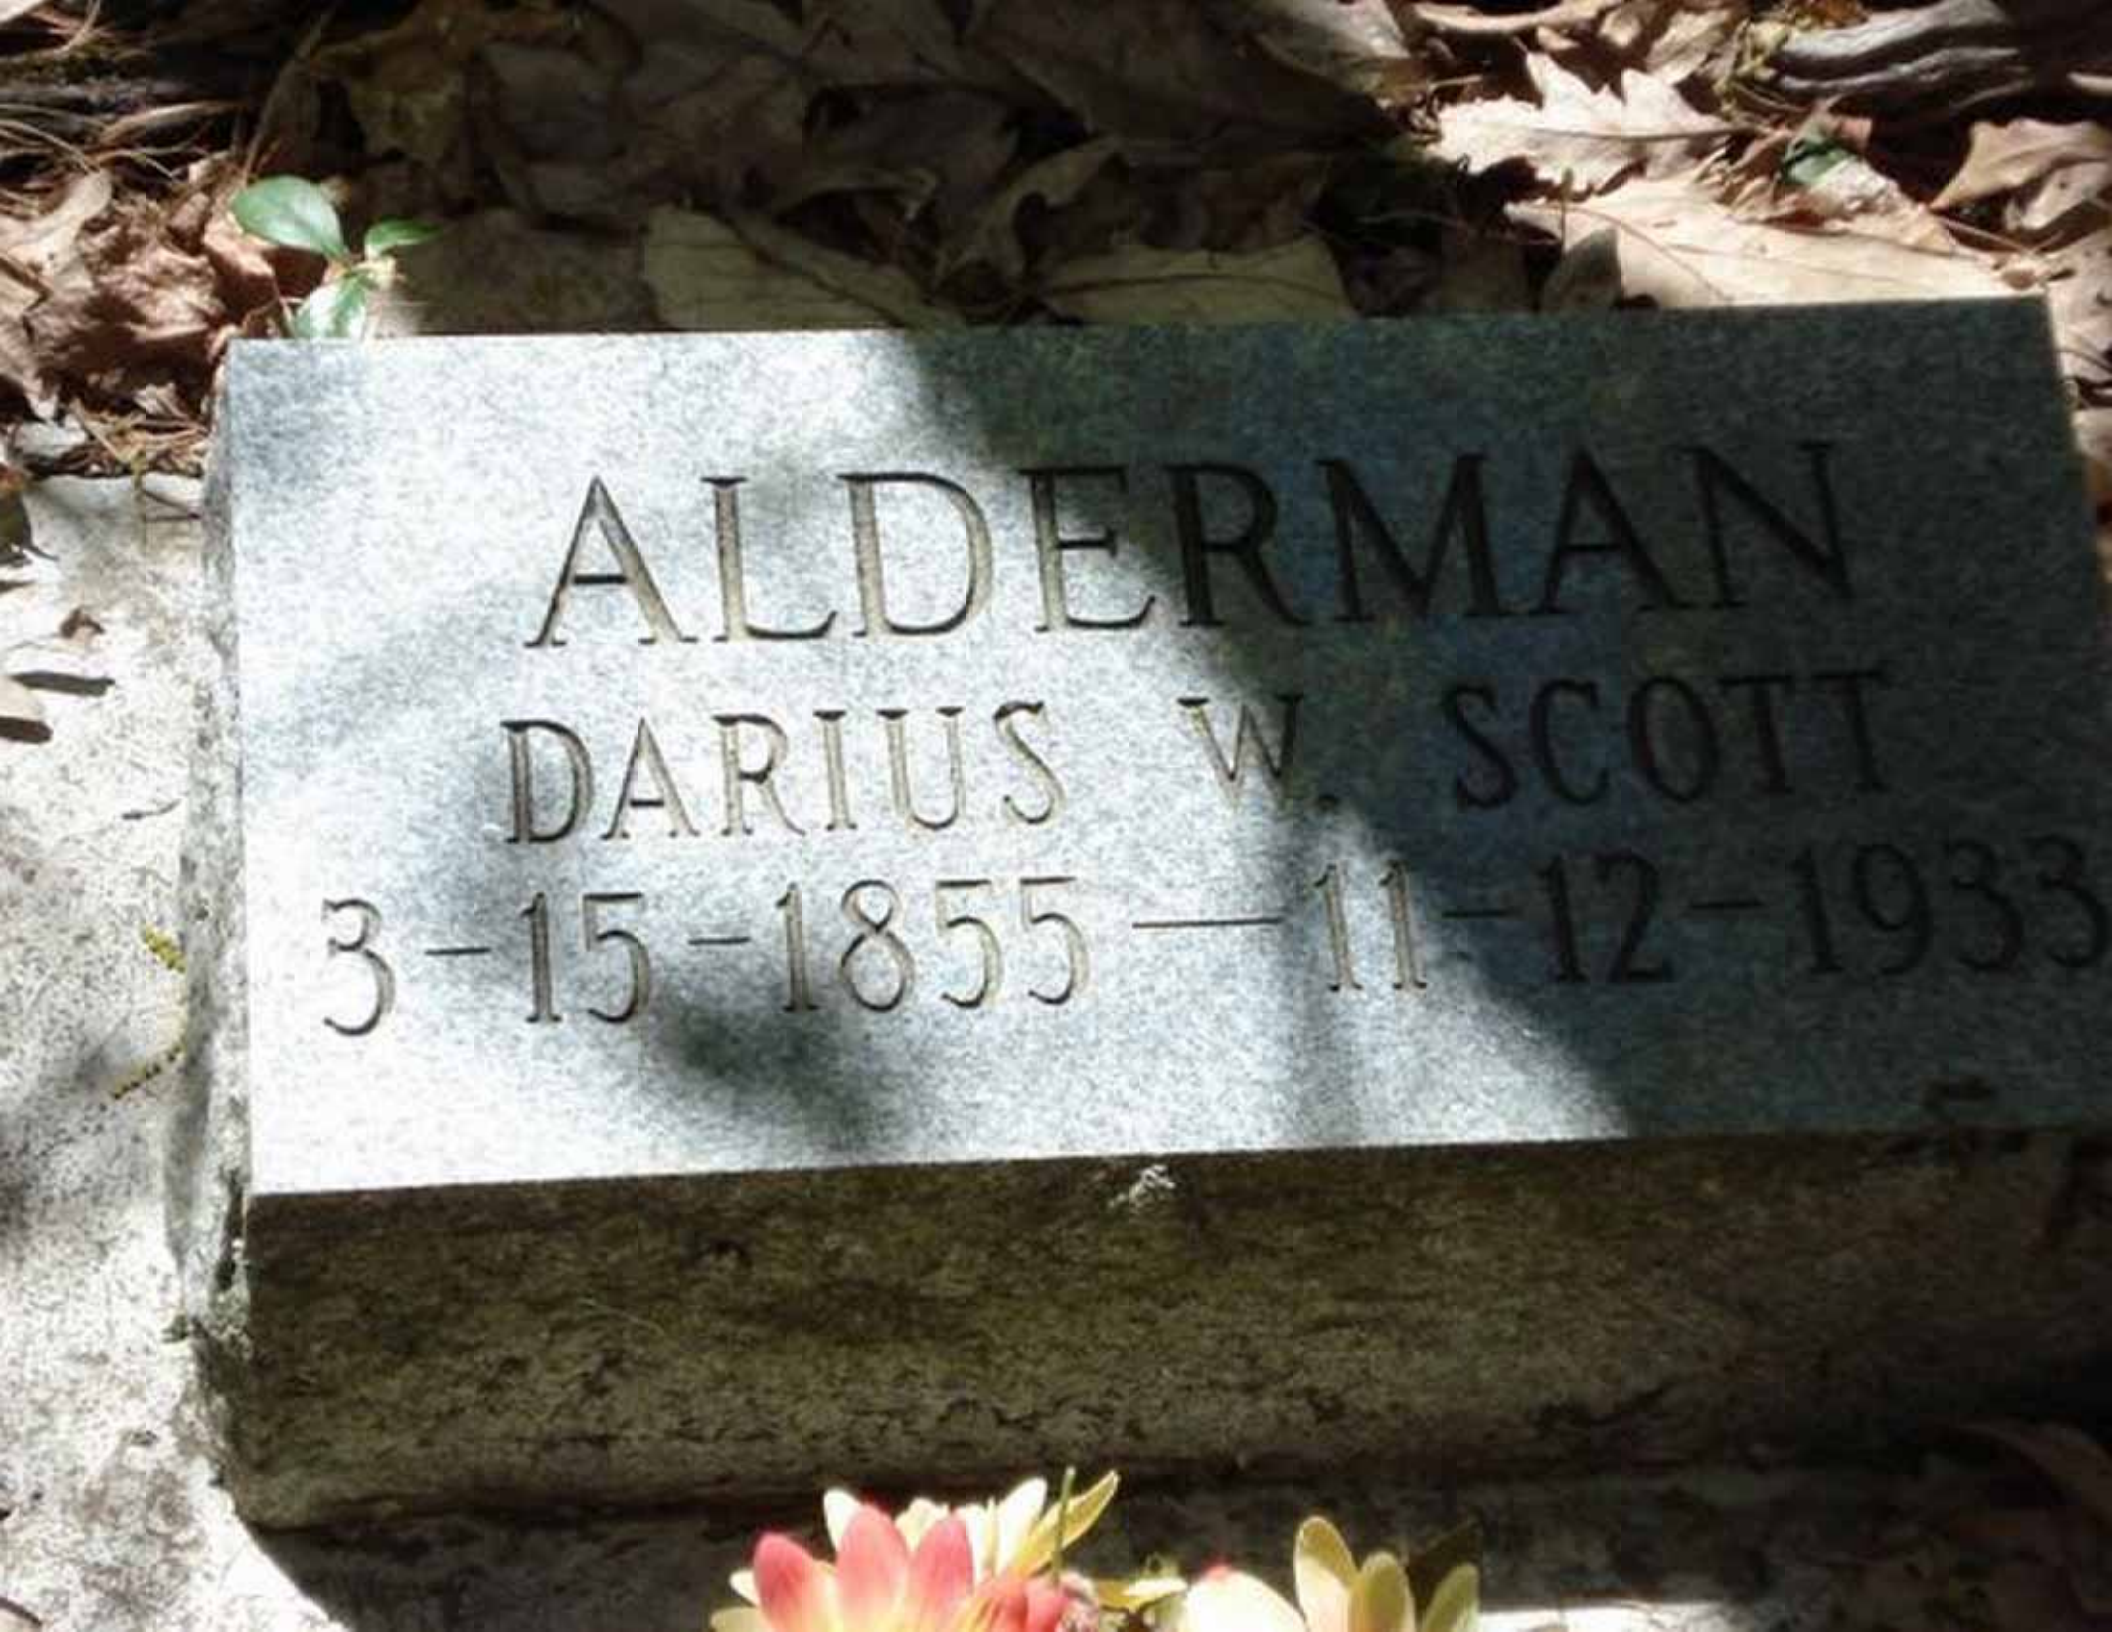
MARVIN W ALDERMAN
WEST VIRGINIA
PVT 11 AA REPL TNG BN CAC
WORLD WAR II
JULY 23 1901 MAY 16 19

RYDER
HURL G.
10-27-1912 — 3-17-1931

ALDERMAN
ELIZABETH (HOLCOMB)
1774 — C. 1863

ALDERMAN
SOLOMAN
MAY 24, 1810
1862
ELIZABETH J.
NICHOLAS
1820
1889

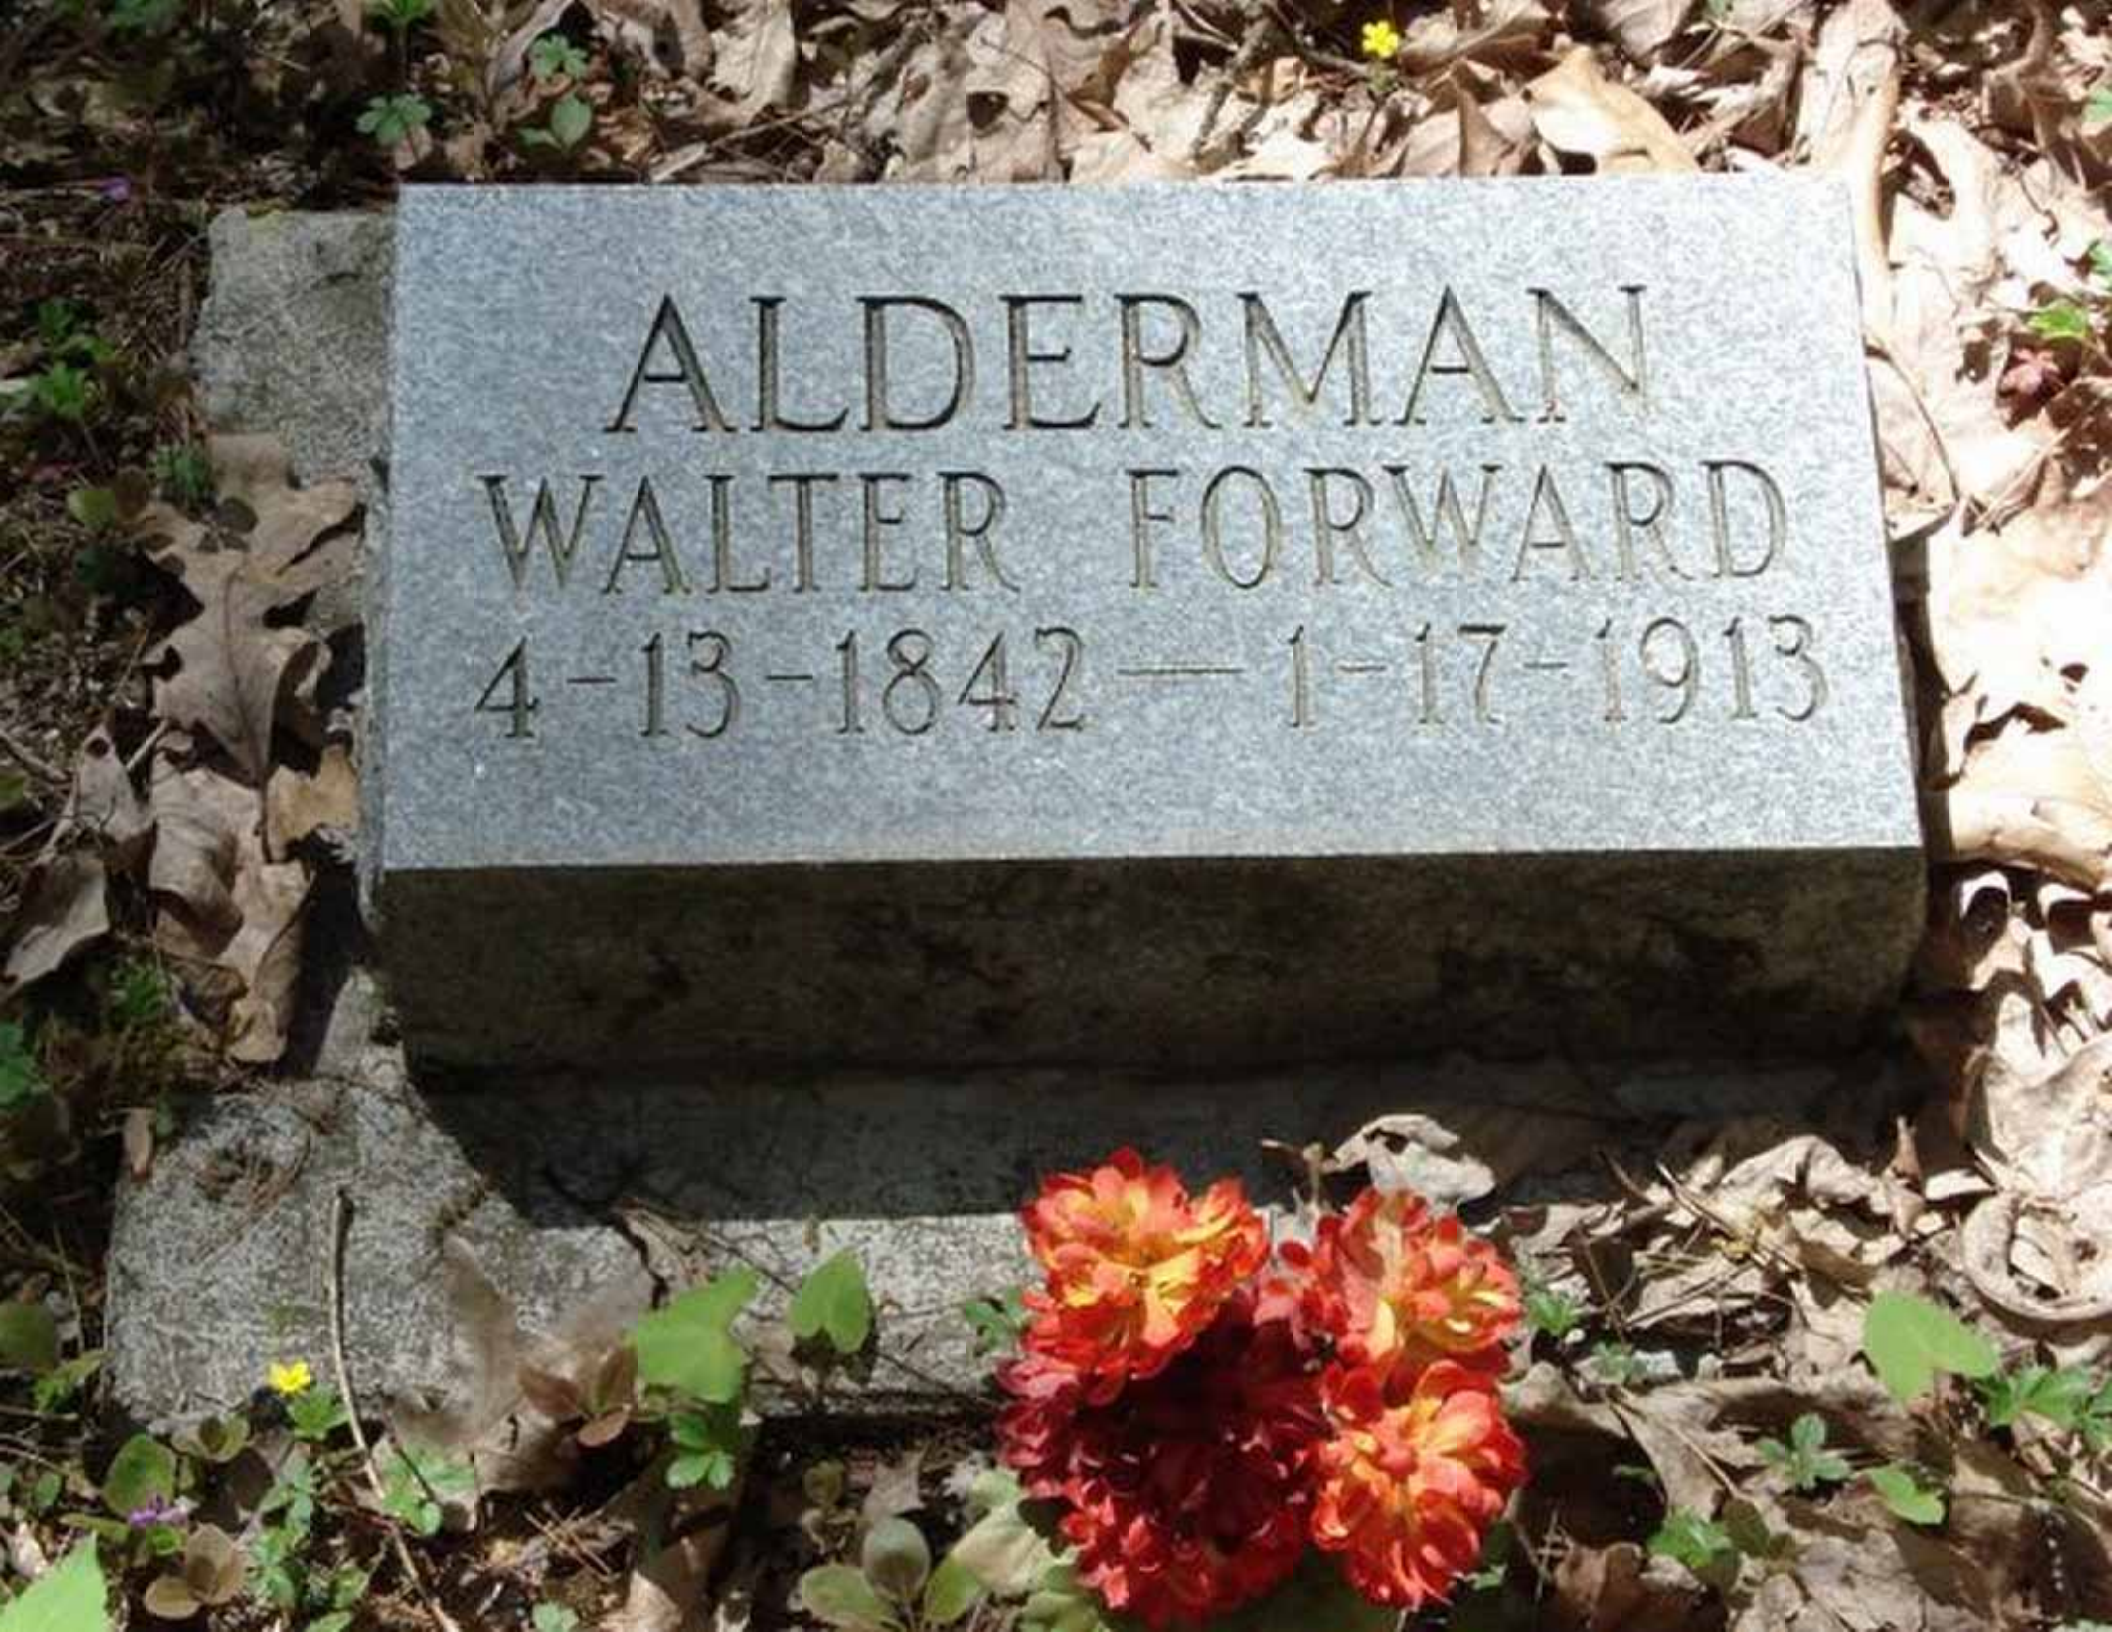
ALDERMAN
SOLOMAN
MAY 24, 1810
1862
ELIZABETH J.
NICHOLAS
JAN. 15, 1820
1889



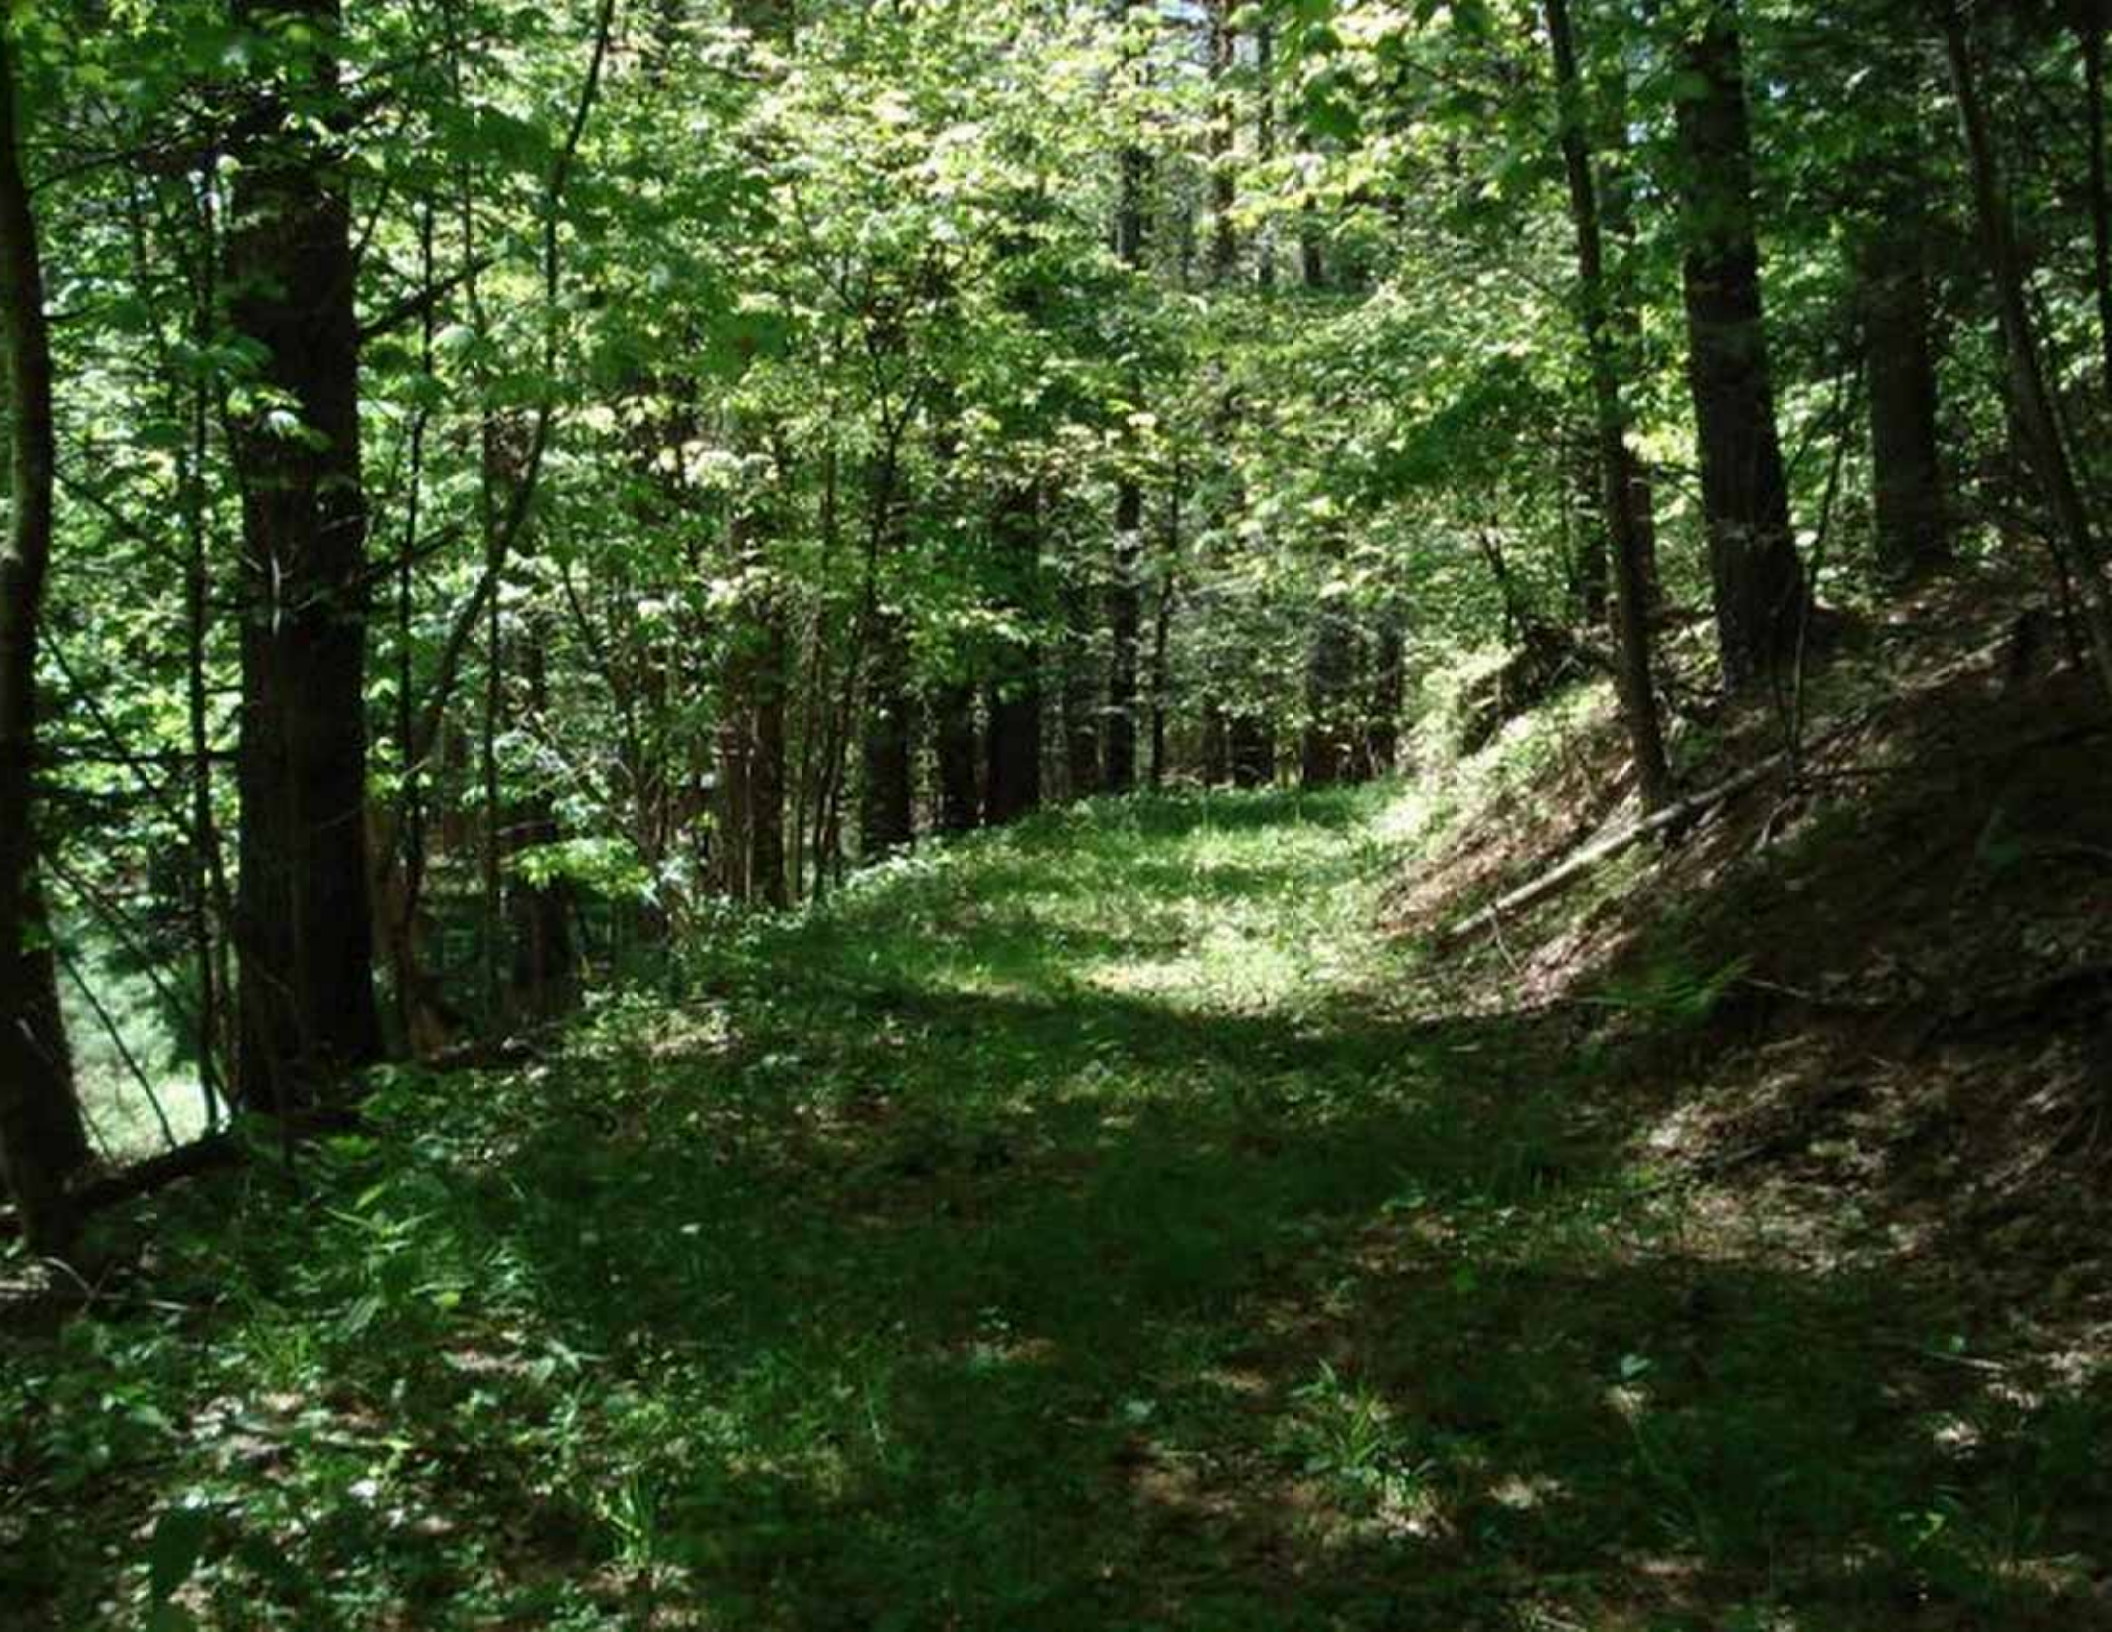
ALDERMAN
DARIUS W. SCOTT
3-15-1855 — 11-12-1933

ALDERMAN
HESTER L. (PYLES)
4-14-1863 — 3-2-1892

ALDERMAN
ALCINDA J. (KINCAID)
1-18-1864 — 11-3-1889



ALDERMAN
WALTER FORWARD
4-13-1842 — 1-17-1913

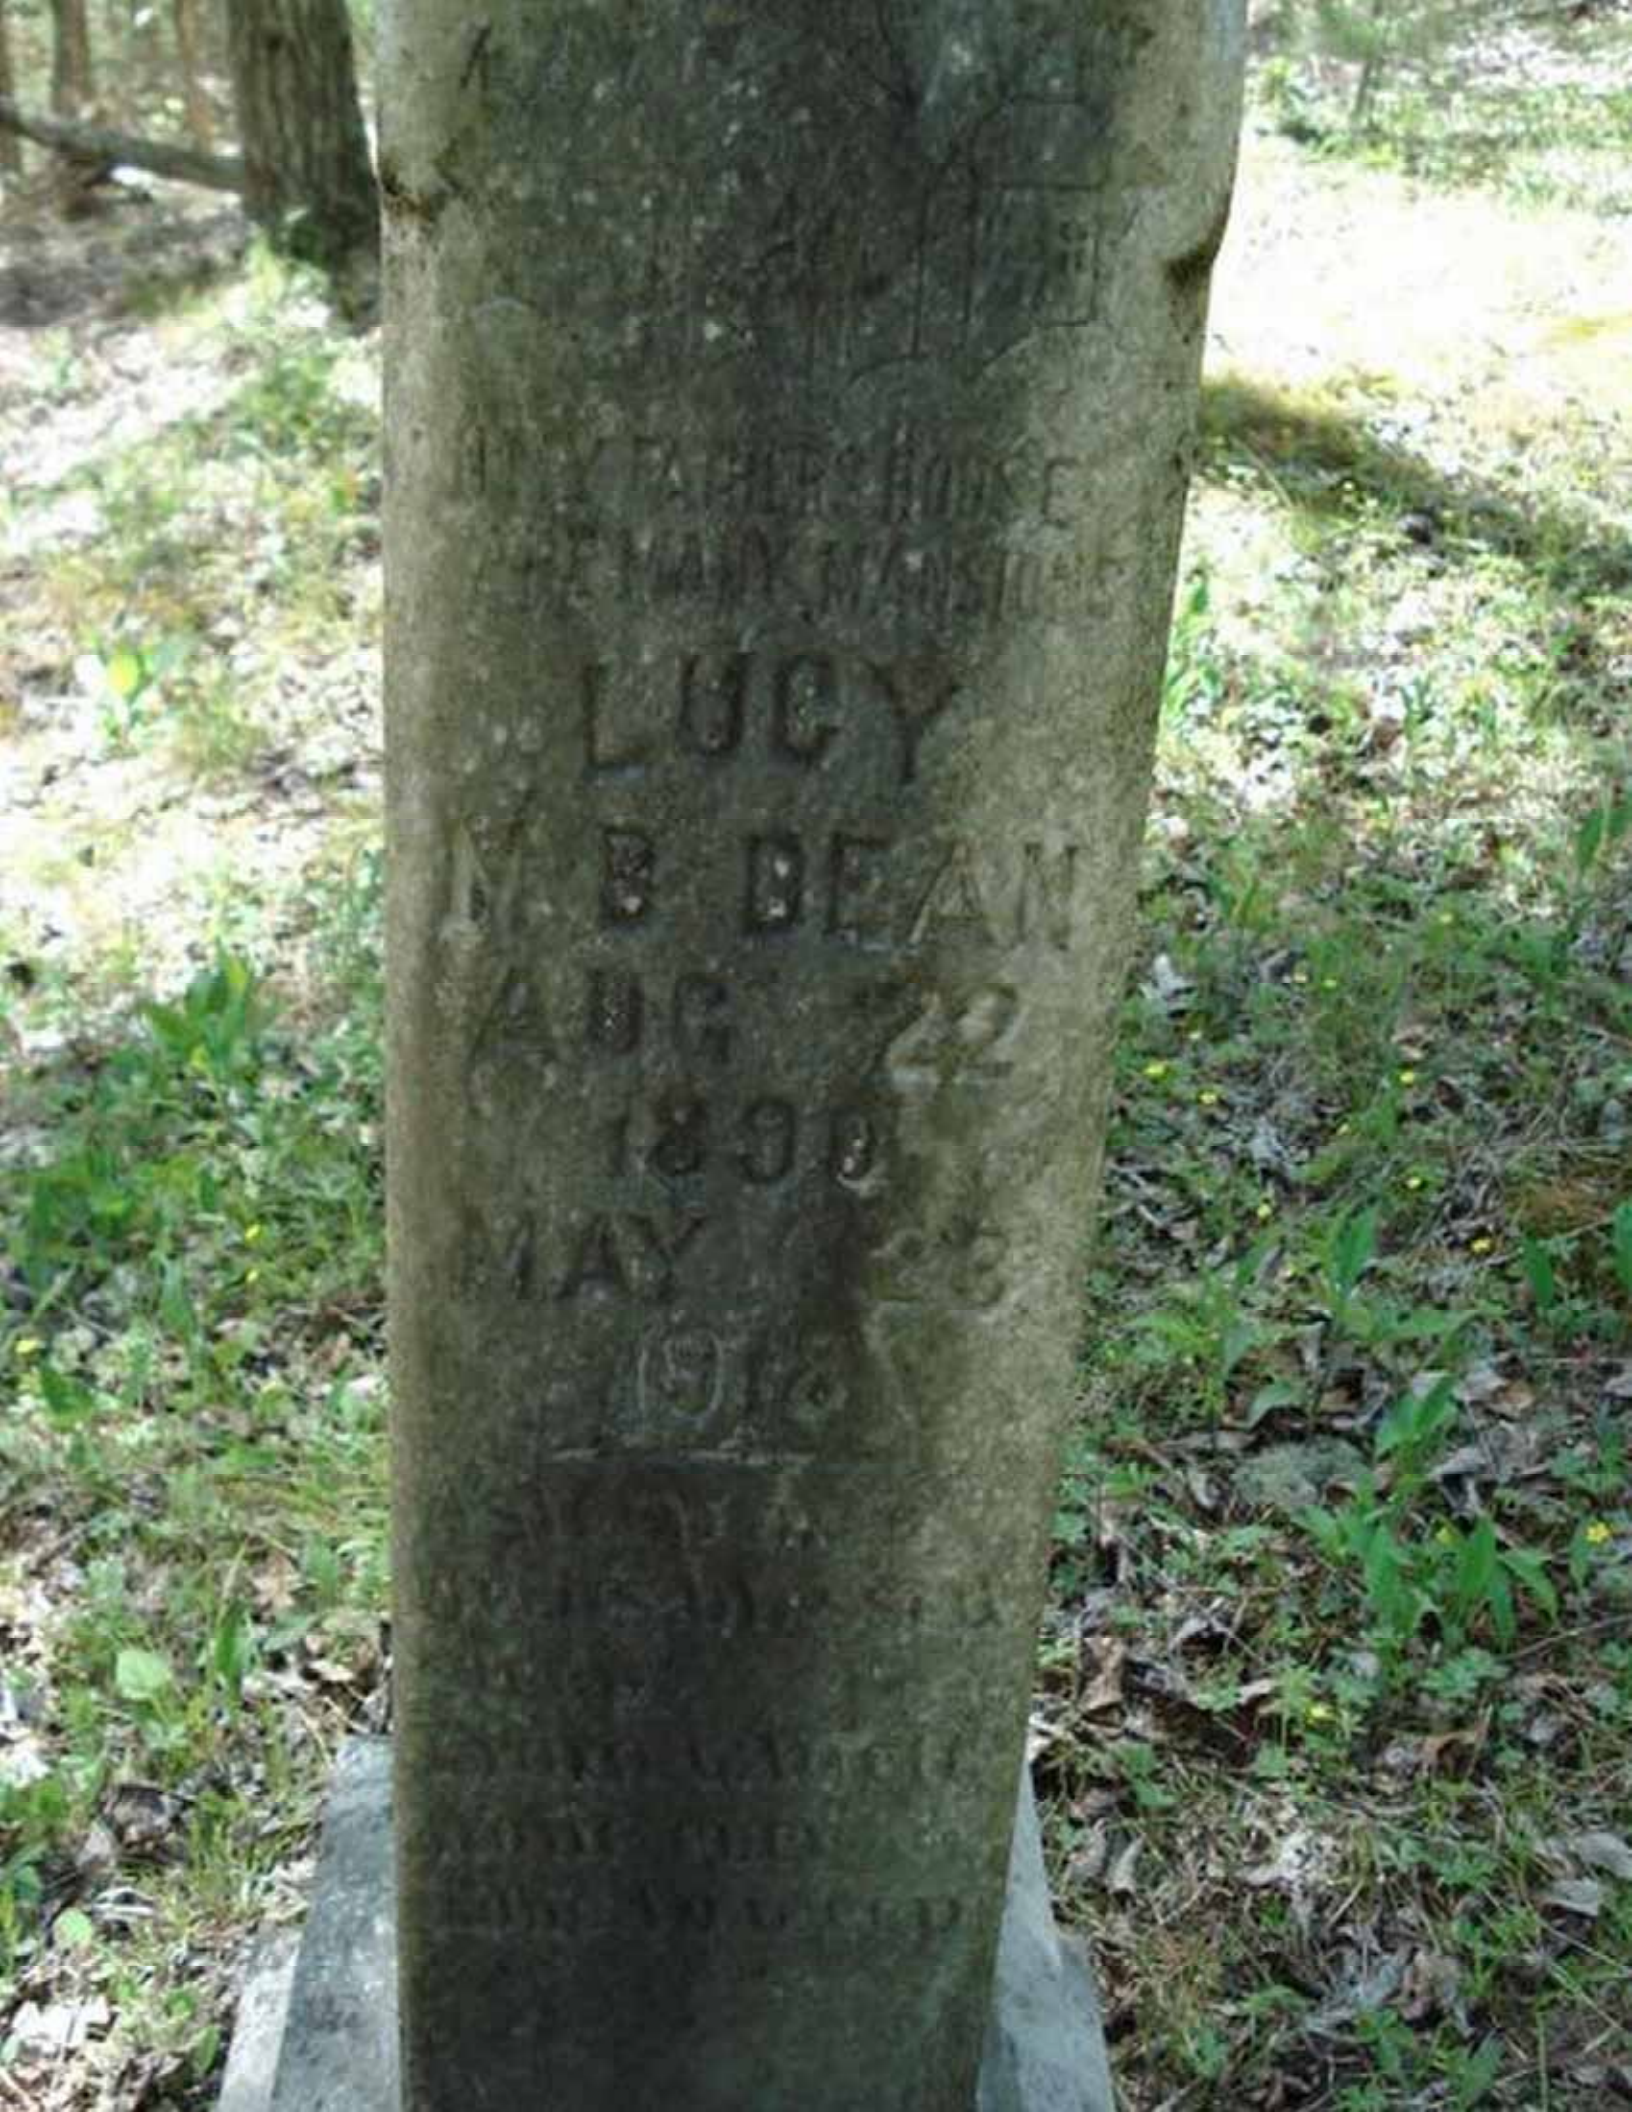


FOOT TRAVEL WELCOME

IN MEMORY OF
LEO LEONARD EDWARDS
US NAVY
WORLD WAR II
1917 † 1942
PURPLE HEART

IN MEMORY OF
LEO LEONARD EDWARDS
US NAVY
WORLD WAR II
1917 1942
PURPLE HEART

PTE BILL EDWARDS
DIED 4 NOV 1917



LUCY
W. B. BEAM
AUG 22
1808
MAY 28
1870

WILLIAM G
ALDERMAN
MAR 21 1854
JAN 26 19
PHEBE J
ALDERMAN
JUNE 30 1858
SEPT 5 19

CHARLES ALDERMAN
1924

CHARLES S ALDERMAN
1940
1988

SCHOOLCRAFT
WILLIAM JACK

Alderman
Cemetery

Adventure
Cemetery

Auldridge & Rodgers

Families

Genealogies

of the Auldridge Rodgers

and

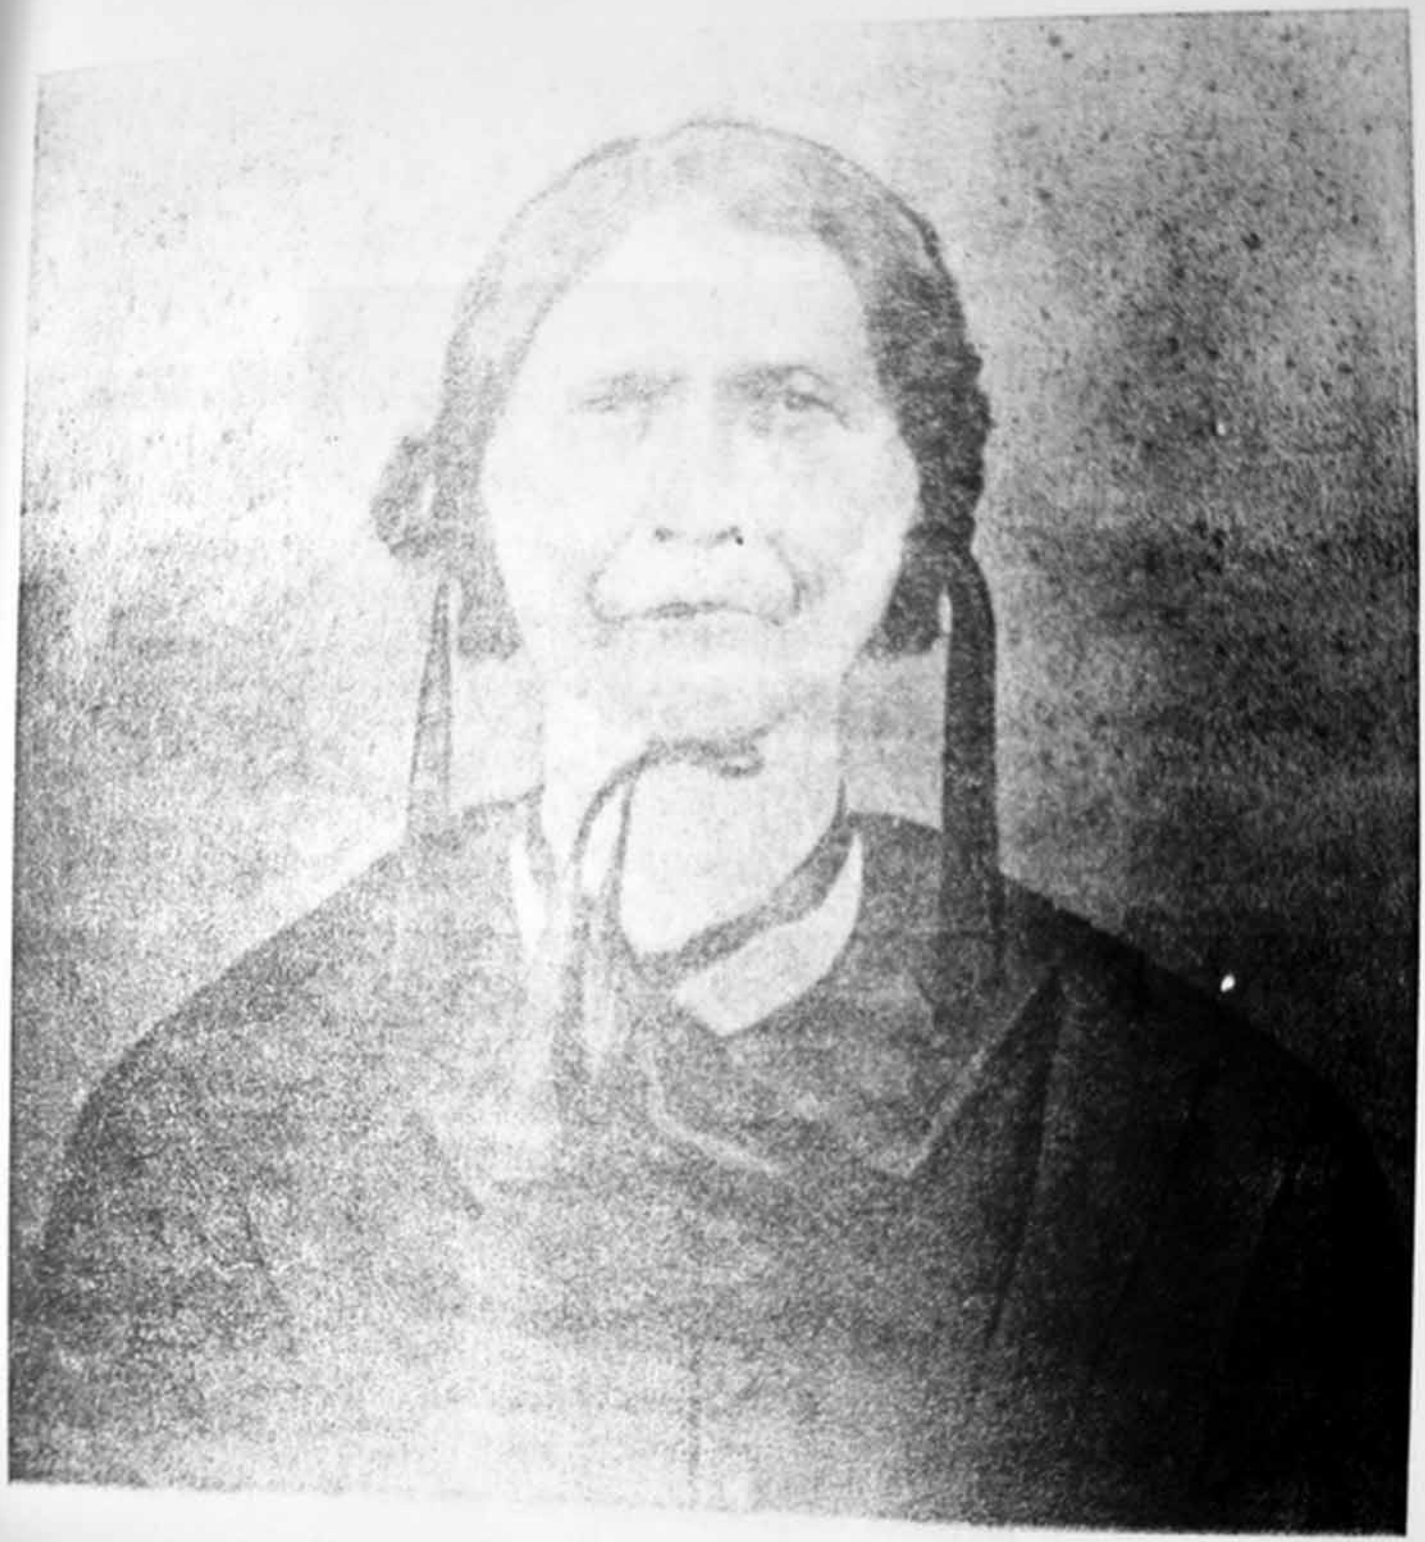
Related Families

Fitch Fitchard

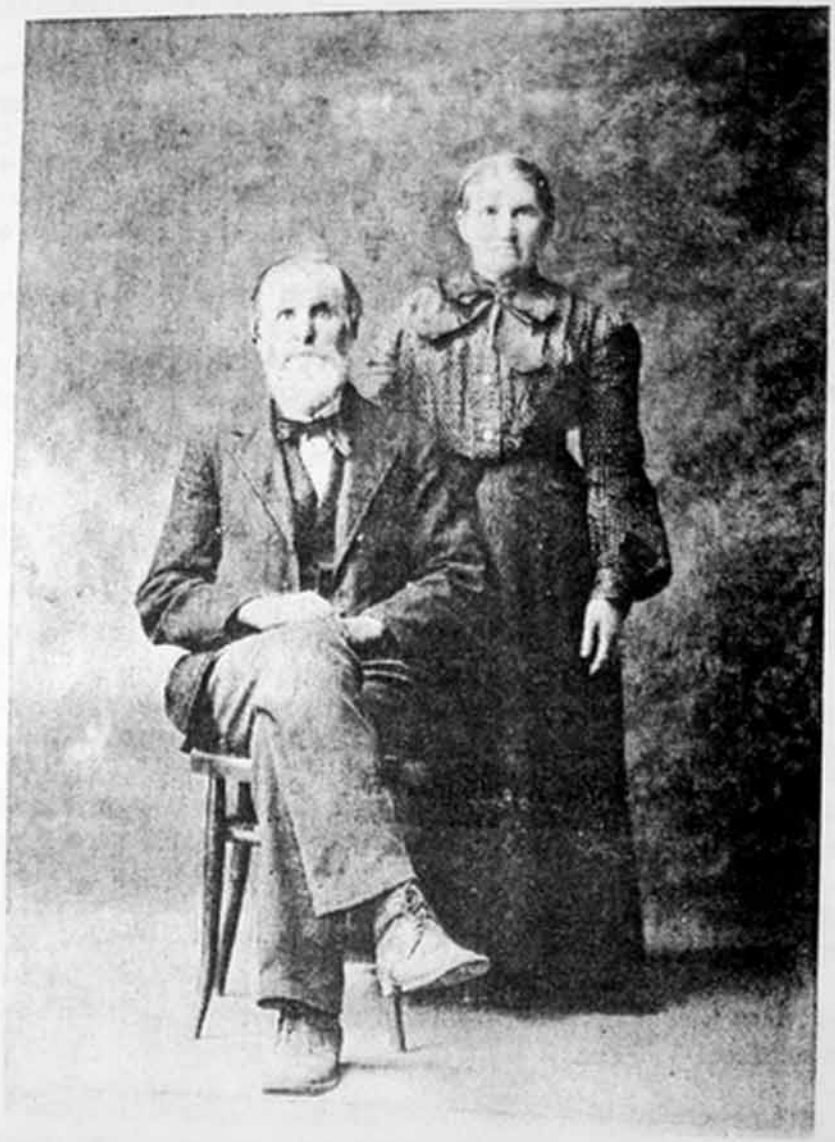
DEDICATED TO THE MEMORY OF MY FATHER AND MOTHER
GEORGE OLIVER AND MARTHA ELIZA RODGERS AULDRIDGE

Appreciation is expressed to the various members of the family who have supplied information for this genealogy and to my daughter, Jean, and her husband, Jerry, for typing and printing.--Lillie O. Auldridge Holliday.

SAMUEL AULDRIDGE



SUSAN GRIMES AULDRIDGE
(wife of Samuel Auldridge)



TILLISON and SUSANNAH BUZZARD AULDRIDGE

THE AULDRIDGE FAMILY

I, Lillie Auldridge Holliday, have for some years been interested in the genealogy of my parents, the Auldridge-Rodgers families, and have compiled what information I have been able to gather from relatives and Historical Sketches Pocahontas County West Virginia by William T. Price.

My great-great-great grandfather Auldridge was a native of England and died there, I do not know his given name but he and his wife Elizabeth had one son, William. After her husband's death, Elizabeth determined to bring her son, who was 10 or 12, to America where he could grow up in a free country. Not having money for ship passage, she came under the indentured servants statute and became a governess for John Johnson, whose wife had died previously, leaving a number of small children. John Johnson owned a plantation of 1500 acres on Jericho Road close Marlinton. He and Elizabeth Auldridge were later married. She died at the age of 114 years and lived to see two of her husband's grandsons become U. S. Senators--Senator Ewing of Ohio and Senator Farnsworth of W. Va. A Stevenson married into the Ewing family and in their line we had an Adlai Ewing Stevenson as Vice President of the United States.

William, my great-great grandfather, married Mary Cochran. Her mother was a Miss Mackenie who married Thomas Cochran a native of Ireland. Mary had two brothers and two sisters. The Cochrans lived at Mill Point. William and Mary went to housekeeping at Bridger Notch where James and John Bridger were bushwhacked by the Indians in 1784. William and Mary Auldridge had nine children: Sarah, Elizabeth, Nancy, Thomas, William, John, Samuel, James and Richard.

I. Sarah Auldridge married William McClure. They settled on Greenbrier River below Beaver Creek. There were four children: James, Rachel, Mary and Bessie. Rachel became Mrs. Jacob Pyles. Mary became Mrs. George Overholt on Swago. Bessie died in youth. James married three times--McComb, Pyles and Adkenson.

II. Elizabeth Auldridge married Jacob McNiel and settled in Floyd County, Va.

III. Nancy Auldridge married Moore McNiel and settled on Swago.

IV. Thomas, considered one of the strongest men, physically, in Pocahontas County, married Elizabeth Morrison. There were six children: James, William, Thomas, Sarah, Elizabeth and Mary.

A. James first married Ann Barlow. Their children were: Mariam, Elizabeth, Moffett and George. Ann and all the children except George died in a disease epidemic.

1. George married Hulda Cassell.

A. James second marriage was to Julia Duncan. She was the grandaughter of Colonel John Baxter.

1. One daughter to this marriage married Lee Carter.

V. William Auldridge, Jr. married Nancy Kellison.

A. Martha married George Hill, son of Abram Hill. While George Hill was in service in 1861 at Valley Mountain, he contracted measles, came home, and he and Martha died of them within a week leaving one daughter.

1. The daughter married Robert Shafer.

V. William Auldridge, Jr's. second wife was a Miss Shafer.

A. Edgar

VI. John Auldridge married Rebecca Smith whose father was John Smith, a native of Ireland. Rebecca lived over 90 years.

A. Nancy Newcomer, daughter, lived in Ronceverte, W. Va.

VII. James Auldridge was a tailor. He worked awhile at Frankford and then went to Missouri.

VIII. Richard Auldridge married Hannah Smith, daughter of John Smith and a sister of Rebecca. Richard was killed in the Civil War.

A. John served in the Confederate Army and was killed in the Battle of Gettysburg.

B. Allen served in the Confederate Army. After the war he moved to Kansas, taking his mother and sister there.

IX. Samuel Auldridge, my great grandfather, married Mariam Barlow and settled at Bridges Notch and finally on Greenbrier River near Stamping Creek. Children of this marriage were: William, John and Mary Ann, who died young. John was a Confederate soldier and was killed in action.

A. William settled at Mill Point and married Effie Penell. Their children were Ruben, S.B. (Sandy) and one daughter, Mary.

1. Ruben was born in 1882 and died in 1950. He married Belvesta Cutshall. They had two sons: William who died in infancy and Robert, who is an architect in New York.

2. Sandy was born in 1881 and died in 1963. He married Emma Smith and lived in Hillsboro. There were two children, Gail and Lucy.

a. Gail was born July 4, 1904. He graduated from W. Va. University, taught school a number of years and worked with the Southern Soil Conservation District. He married Lora Hale McGregor. They have three daughters.

(1) Carolyn Jane, a Lieutenant Colonel in the Marines at Quantico, Virginia.

(2) Elizabeth Ann, married a law student, Drew Ralston. They live in Columbus, Ohio.

(3) Sandra Lee married Major Glenn Higgins. They live in Springfield and have two sons, Michael Lee and Douglas Edwards.

b. Lucy was born August 5, 1912. She married Wilbur Duff and lives in Standardsville, Virginia.

3. Mary married Harry Harper. She was born in 1876 and died in 1969. They had five children: Edith, Wardell, Frank, Henry Lee and Julian.

a. Edith married Sam Burdette. They live in Hillsboro and have two sons. Jack lives in Moundsville and David in Florida.

b. Wardell lives in Huntington, is married, and has two children, Betty and Billy.

c. Frank married Grace Johnson. He is deceased. They had ~~two~~ 5 children. Barbara, Sue, Daniel, Dianne + Wayne.

(1) Barbara married Porter Smith and lives at Romney.

(2) Sue married Charles Richardson, Jr. ~~They have three children, Dan, Wayne and Dianne.~~

d. Henry Lee married Virginia Miller. They have two sons, Henry Lee, Jr. and Alfred, and one daughter.

e. Julian is married and has two sons. One is a minister in Arizona.

IX. Samuel Auldridge's second wife was Susan Grimes. They are both buried at McNeil Cemetery. At first they lived on the Greenbrier River close Seebert, at what is now the Colter Place. It was here my grandfather Tillison was born. They moved later to what is now the Beckley Pyles home place, sold and moved to Auldridge Mountain, close Buckeye. There were five children to this union: Tillison, Charles, Luther, Elizabeth and McKendry.

A. Tillison Morgan Auldridge was born January 28, 1846. On February 14, 1867 he married Susannah Elizabeth Buzzard. She was born October 16, 1845 and died February 7, 1941, living to be over 95 years of age. Tillison died April 28, 1910 at 64 years. They lived on a farm close Buckeye, W. Va. and had 11 children. They were: Jasper John, George Oliver, Nancy Mary Martha, Emory Eliot, Ivetta Eliza Jane, Asa Watts, Laverna Susan, Joseph Winters, Minty Mae, Bertha Anna, and Davis Tillison.

1. Jasper John was born March 6, 1868 and died July 2, 1914 at 46 years of age. He married Margaret Perry. They had charge of a lumber company hotel at Denmar, W. Va. and lived there for a number of years. There were no children. After his death she married a Mr. Garrett and died a few years later.

2. George Oliver Auldridge, my father, was born August 11, 1869 and died March 31, 1968 at 98 years and 7 months of age. He was married to Martha Eliza Rodgers October 7, 1896. They were married at the "lower" Methodist Church at Buckeye by The Reverend George Echols. The little church is still in use. A cemetery is in the churchyard. They lived for a time at the Waugh place close Hillsboro. It was here their oldest child, Leonard Clifton was born. Oliver then purchased a tract of land close and built a home where the other 3 children were born.

Oliver and Eliza worked hard on their farm for a livlihood. They were not rich in material things but they left to their children a rich spiritual heritage that was worth much more. They were charter members of the Seebert Methodist Church. Before the church was built they met in a home for services. My father was church school superintendent for about forty years. Mother was always active in church and taught a Sunday School class. We lived about 2 miles away but regardless of weather they took their "brood" to church. This little church, that stands on a knoll surrounded by trees, looks down on the town of Seebert. It will always be very dear to me. Our daughter Jean has warm memories here, too, as she stayed with her grand-parents a lot during the summer months and attended church with them.

Eliza Auldridge passed away May 20, 1945 and is buried in the Marlinton Cemetery. After mother's death, my father lived in our home most of his remaining 23 years. He never lost interest in life or his church. He is buried beside mother and my brother Lake, in the Marlinton Cemetery.

The children of Oliver and Eliza Auldridge were: Leonard Clifton, Emory Lake, Elizabeth, and Lillie Olive.

a. Leonard Clifton was born July 6, 1897 and died June 9, 1959. He is buried at The End of the Trail close Clintonville, W. Va. He was married to Myrtle Woodell, June 19, 1917. She was born May 8, 1889 and died November 9, 1952. She is buried at Marlinton Cemetery. She suffered with asthma from childhood and died of heart failure at 64 years of age. Leonard and Myrtle lived for a time on a farm close Seebert. He later worked for a lumber company at Spice Run and Spring Creek and finally as a Chesapeake and Ohio Railway agent at Prince. Their children received the heritage of a Christian home.

They had four children. The oldest, a son, died at birth in 1919. Their other children were: Leonard Clifton, Jr. born January 21, 1921; George Andrew born August 6, 1922; and Martha Frances born June 12, 1924.

(1) Leonard C., Jr. served in the Navy during World War II. Returning home, he worked for awhile in New Britain, Connecticut. where he met and married Mary Lombardo. Mary was born September 7, 1925. They moved to Huntington, where he attended Marshall University. Three of their four children were born there. Their youngest child was born in New Britain, Connecticut, where they have lived for a number of years. Their children are: Patricia Ann, born May 19, 1948; Leonard Clifton III, born December 10, 1949; Mary Frances born March 3, 1951 and Paula born May 30, 1953. The three daughters are at home. Leonard Clifton III is in the Marine Corps.

(2) Andrew, the second son of L. C. Auldridge, Sr., graduated from Frankford High School and entered the Navy during World War II. On returning he was employed for a time in New Britain, Connecticut and is now in the signal maintenance force of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway. He is single and lives in New Buffalo, Michigan.

(3) Martha Frances received an R.N. degree from Laird Memorial Hospital, Montgomery, W. Va., entered the Army Nurse Corps and was later stationed in Germany. Here she met Billy Wayne Frye, who was also in service and stationed there. They were married after returning to the United States. They live in Oak Hill and have one daughter, Janet, born March 2, 1953. Billy teaches at W. Va. Institute of Technology and Janet is now attending school there.

a. Leonard Clifton Sr's. second marriage was to Mrs. Dottie Holliday Richmond in October 1953. She was born at Smoot, W. Va., October 23, 1906 and died April 9, 1970. She had two daughters by a previous marriage: Barbara who married Harold Knuckles; and Anna, married to Bascomb Rodgers. The Knuckles live in Hyattsville, Md. and have four children--Gary, Beverley, Allen and Mark. The Rodgers have two sons--Greg and Terry.

b. Lake was born May 3, 1899 and died of a coronary attact February 23, 1957. As a young man he worked on the farm and later for the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company. Following this he had a mail route. Lake never married. He was a friend to every one and faithful to his church.

c. Elizabeth (Lizzy) was born in June 1901. She died of meningitis in 1902 at the age of 9 months.

d. I, Lillie Olive, was born close Hillsboro, November 5, 1903 and was married to Charles Roscoe Holliday July 6, 1923. We started housekeeping at Spring Creek, W. Va. where Charles was station agent for the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway. It was here that our daughter, Vinita Jean was born, April 14, 1924. We received D. O. degrees from the Kansas City College of Osteopathy and Surgery in June 1939 and retired from practice in 1962. We are now living at Lewisburg, W. Va. died 11-17-89

(1) Vinita Jean received a B. S. degree from West Virginia Institute of Technology and later graduated from Bluefield Business College. On May 30, 1946 she and Oscar Jerrell Bailes from Richwood were married in the Montgomery Baptist Church by the Reverend Brown McDonald. Jerry was born at Richwood, W. Va. November 21, 1923. He attended West Virginia Institute of Technology, Marshall University and Concord College and received his D. O. degree from the Kansas City College of Osteopathy and Surgery in 1952. They live in Princeton where he is in practice. They have three children: Cheryl Ann, Debora Sue and Charles Jerrell.

(a) Cheryl Ann was born in Princeton, February 18, 1948, in the home of her grandparents, who made the delivery. She was married February 14, 1970 to Dennie Leon Landreth, Jr., by the Reverend Jimmy Jones, in the Johnston Memorial Baptist Church at Princeton. Leon was born January 23, 1949. They are both 1970 graduates from Concord College. Cheryl teaches kindergarten at Beaver Elementary School and Leon is the band director at Shady Springs Junior High School. They live in Beaver, W. Va.

(b) Debora Sue was born April 1, 1949 in Kansas City, Missouri. She graduated cum laude from Marshall University in 1971 and is the band director at Dawson Bryant High School, Coal Grove, Ohio.

(c) Charles Jerrell was born September 28, 1951, in Kansas City, Missouri. He was married August 22, 1968 to Deborah Ann Wilson. She was born July 10, 1951 and plans to be a laboratory technician. Jerry is majoring in Theatre and Music at Marshall University.

3. Nancy Mary Martha (Nannie) Auldridge was born February 10, 1871 and died February 22, 1963 at 92 years of age. She was married in 1900 to George Washington Bentzel who died September 1, 1933. They have two sons, Winters Harry and George Washington, Jr., both born in Marlinton, W. Va.

a. Winters Harry was born April 20, 1906 and died September 27, 1971. He was married August 1 to Ruby Hutsenpillar, who was born September 13, 1905. He was an IBM engineer and they lived at Dawson, W. Va. The children are: Marien Elizabeth, Barbara Ann, Linda Carol and Nancy Eileen.

(1) Marien was born February 10, 1927 and married Herbert Clark Herring April 5, 1947. They have five children: Rosemary Ester, born June 7, 1949, who is in the fifth year of Pharmacy in W. Va. University; Alison Elizabeth, born March 22, 1952, attending college in New Jersey; David Clark born December 20, 1954; Carolyn Leigh born April 4, 1959 and Jennifer Lynn born October 11, 1961.

(2) Barbara Ann was born January 20, 1938 and was married May 27, 1956 to Louis Hartley Loudermilk. There are three children: Dale Hartley, born February 1958; Elizabeth Ann, born October 1959; and Lisa Michelle born April 1961.

(3) Linda Carol, born October 12, 1940, married David Sylvestor Pitts April 1962. They have a daughter, Kimberly Beth, born December 27, 1962.

(4) Nancy Eileen, born January 3, 1947, married William Haney English, December 29, 1966. They have two sons: William Haney, Jr. born September 22, 1969 and David Sayles, born June 24, 1971.

b. George Washington Bentzel, Jr. was married December 14, 1940 to Dorothy Alice Miller. They have three children: Mary Louise; Frank Lewis; and Judy Ann. They live in Pinedale, Wyoming.

4. Emory Eliot Auldridge was born April 18, 1873 and died September 16, 1874.

5. Ivetta Auldridge was born August 12, 1874 and died August 22, 1911.

6. Asa Watts Auldridge was born November 20, 1875. He married Katherine Simmons (Kate) in the Methodist Church in Monterey, Va. He died December 17, 1906 and she on July 19, 1970. They had two children: Robert Lee; and Susan Pearl. Katherine's second marriage was to Sterling Yeager.

a. Robert Lee was born August 12, 1904 and was married to Glema Frances Long, January 9, 1931. She is a retired school teacher. They live in Lewisburg, W. Va.

b. Susan Pearl was born September 11, 1906 and married Joseph William Sullivan, May 4, 1930. He was a dentist, now deceased. She lives in College Park, Md. They had five children: Michael Joseph, Helen Katharine, Margaret Louise, Mary Jo and Susan.

(1) Michael Joseph, born January 17, 1931, married Ruth Ann Talliaferro. They have six children: Michael Joseph, Jr., Linda Susan, Katharine Ellen, Patricia Ruth, Jerry Brooke and Jon Eric.

(2) Helen Katharine was born February 13, 1932 and is single. She teaches at Gallaudet College for the Deaf, the only college of its kind in the world.

(3) Margaret Louise, born March 9, 1933, married Sidney Floyd Hoffman. They have three children: Donna Gray, Susan Gayle and Stephen Floyd.

(4) Mary Jo born October 30, 1937, married Robert Michael Haskey. They have one son, Matthew Robert.

(5) Susan was born December 27, 1942 and died 5 days later.

7. Laverna Susan (Lula) Auldridge married Howard Briscoe, October 10, 1899. They had three daughters. When the youngest was quite small he was drowned in the Greenbrier River near Stony Bottom. She taught school much of her life. Their children were Aileen, Grace and Lula Gay.

a. Aileen was born May 23, 1901 in Highland County, Va. She was married July 3, 1919 to Jesse Harmon Meeks. He was born August 29, 1882 and died September 23, 1945. She now lives in Hurricane, W. Va. They had eight children: Lucille Gay, Jesse H., Jr., Eugene Briscoe, William Gerald, Arthur, Jack O'Brien, David Alan, and Joseph Andrew.

(1) Lucille Gay was born April 11, 1920. During World War II she spent 28 months in England as an army nurse, 1st Lieutenant. She and Ernest Patterson were married June 6, 1945. They had a military wedding in England. They have three children: Cathy Gay, born June 2, 1950; Sue Ann, born November 21, 1952; and Steven, born April 10, 1954. They live in Tampa, Florida.

(2) Jesse H., Jr., was born August 24, 1921 and served in the Marines in the second World War. He married Hazel Dillon.

(3) Eugene Briscoe was born May 18, 1923. He was killed in action in World War II, February 3, 1945, in C. B. I. theatre of action.

(4) William Gerald was born December 14, 1926, served in the army two years and married Joan Dent. They had five children: W. Gerald, Jr., born May 14, 1949, died by electrocution of a live wire 1959; Michael David, born September 22, 1951, now in military service; Linda, born August 18, 1955; Gregory Allen born November 22, 1956; and Christopher Gay, born May 18, 1958.

(5) Arthur was born February 12, 1930. He was in military service, married Lola Mae Thornton and they have two children: Timothy Robert, born February 24, 1958; and Tamara Gail, born June 5, 1959.

(6) Jack O'Brien was born November 18, 1932 and died of a heart attack October 31, 1969. He married Fay Tucker. There were three children: Jacqueline Fay, born April 3, 1970; Debora, born August 16, 1962; and David Michael, born August 28, 1964.

(7) David Alan was born October 31, 1934 and died May 23, 1937 from complications of scarlet fever.

(8) Joseph Andrew was born April 23, 1939. He married Betty Smith and they have two children: Traci, born March 5, 1966; and Joseph Andrew, Jr., born August 13, 1968.

b. Grace was born at Dunmore, W. Va., June 10, 1903. She and Edgar Goodall, from Ronceverte, were married September 7, 1923. Edgar was born May 23, 1903. There were two daughters: Elizabeth O'Neil and Joan. Grace and Edgar live at Hurricane, W. Va.

(1) Elizabeth was born June 17, 1924. She married Delbert Moore and they live in Cleveland, Ohio. There are five children: Eddie, Ellis Gay, Susan Elizabeth, Cheryl, and Parker.

(a) Eddie was born October 30, 1942, and married Lillian Profant, June 15, 1963. They have two sons: John, born July 15, 1964; and Douglas, born April 20, 1967. They live in Westerville, Ohio.

(b) Ellis Gay was born October 10, 1946. He is married and has one daughter, Lisa Gay, born July 31, 1971. They live in Cleveland.

(c) Susan Elizabeth was born August 27, 1947. She married John Reidger. They live in Cleveland, Ohio, and have two daughters: Kimberly Sue, born July 12, 1967 and Mary Elizabeth, born May 9, 1971.

(d) Cheryl was born October 10, 1948.

(e) Parker was born May 17, 1950 and was married July 10, 1971 to Irene Basco.

(2) Joan was born July 18, 1926 and died October 17, 1927.

c. Lula Gay was born at Stony Bottom, June 22, 1905. She married Harland Cline, September 15, 1924. He is deceased. They had three children: Betty Jane; William Gay; and James Lynn.

(1) Betty Jane was born November 10, 1925. She married Alonzo (Hoagy) Dent. They have two children: Robert, who married a Miss Dunn; and Cheryl Kay.

(2) William Gay was born August 21, 1930. He is in California.

(3) James Lynn was born April 21, 1933. He married Betty Davis and they have four children: Stephen; Connie; Tammy and a baby 20 months.

Lula Gay's second husband is Walton E. Grove. They were married May 10, 1941, and live at Barboursville, W. Va.

Laverna Briscoe's (Lula) second marriage was to Woods Dilley of Cloverlick. He died a few years later of a heart attack. She married Lem Walker who died about a year afterward of cancer. Her last marriage was to W. H. Withrow, a school teacher. They both taught school for a number of years. He died in 1942 at 80 years of age.

8. Joseph Winters Auldridge was born July 11, 1879 and died May 7, 1916. He married Minnie Thornton and lived in Charleston, W. Va. until his death. There were no children. She died in Greenbrier Valley Hospital in Ronceverte, in 1969.

9. Minty Mae Auldridge was born October 6, 1880 and died October 16, 1881.

10. Bertha Anna Auldridge was born March 1, 1882 and died April 12, 1907. She married Clayburn Morrison in 1898 and they lived in Buckeye. There were five children: Violet; Theodore R; Frank; Taylor; and Anna.

a. Violet was born May 16, 1899 and died December 21, 1963. She married Will Bowers. There were six children: Helen, Bobby, Nell, Kathleen, Virginia, and Bertha Jo.

(1) Helen married Gilbert Famston. There were four children: Dexter, Margail, Michael and another daughter.

(2) Bobby died at 14 years of age.

(3) Nell married Darrell McClure. They have two children.

(4) Kathleen married Rex King and they have five children.

(5) Virginia married Eugene Gauslin and they have four children.

(6) Bertha Jo married Joe Smith. There are no children.

b. Theodore R. was born January 17, 1901. He worked for the Spring Creek Lumber Co., and while there married Sarah Jane Millard. They moved to Pickens and then to Manning, S. C. where Sarah Jane died September 13, 1965. There were three children: Georgia; Theodore, Jr. and Betty.

(1) Georgia was born January 25, 1926. She married Cliford Durham. They live in Las Vegas. They have no children.

(2) Theodore R., Jr., was born April 16, 1928. He married Avanelle Turner and they have three children: Paula, Jefferson, and Van. They live in Richwood, W. Va.

(3) Betty was born February 1, 1930. She married Jack Lesley. They have three children: Michael; Patrick; and Theodore. They live in Ft. Knox, Ky.

Theodore R. Sr., married Florence Roper, February 20, 1970.

c. Frank was born December 24, 1903, now deceased. He married Carrie Brown and lived on a farm near Hillsboro. Carrie teaches school. They had three children: Joan; Reta; and Bruce, who died at three years from being kicked by a horse.

(1) Joan married Richard Cuskey. They have five children: Cheryl Kaye; Craig Morrison; Carrie Ellen; Catherine Mae; and Constance Marie.

(2) Rita married Lanty Rose and they have two sons: Kreg and Bruce.

d. Taylor was born in 1905, married Anna Mary Moss and lived at Buckeye until his death, August 5, 1965. There were five children: Fred, Fay, Mescle, Keith, and Jack.

(1) Fred is single and lives with his mother at Buckeye.
(2) Fay married Norman Gaylor and they have two children: Timothy, and Todd.
(3) Keith married Joyce Crawford. They have one daughter, Terri.
(4) Jack married Rosalie Rider. They have four children: Douglas, Arleen, David, and Kenneth.

e. Anna was born in 1907. She married Rush McNeil, who died January 27, 1964. They livednear Buckeye. There were six children: Dempsey, Walter, Helen, Nancy, Vera, and Sherlin.
(1) Dempsey married Mary Arnold and they have five children: Bobby, Tommy, Georgana, Barbara and Darrell.
(2) Walter is single.
(3) Helen married Curtis Carr. They have two children: Bruce and Chawna.
(4) Nancy married Pete Taylor and they have one son, Johnnie.
(5) Sherlin married John Ledford. They have two children: Johnnie and Randa Lee.
(6) Vera married Marion Hudson.

11. Davis Tillison Auldridge was born April 11, 1887. He married Lillie Jane Meeks June 12, 1912. She was the daughter of James and Isabell Doyle Meeks. Her birth date was December 19, 1879. They lived in Pocahontas County much of their life but in later years moved to Burkettsville, Md. where both died--he, on August 2, 1962 and she, April 4, 1969. There were four children: James Woodford; Isabell; Dexter; and David Tillison, Jr.

a. James Woodford was born July 13, 1913 and was married October 3, 1941 to Elizabeth Gertrude Long. She was born May 20, 1918, is an R.N. and director of nurses in the local Health Department. There were two children: Douglas Eugene and Dianne Elizabeth.
(1) Douglas Eugene was born July 19, 1942 and married Sandra Sue Collier July 14, 1967. They have one son, Charles Douglas, born September 26, 1969. They live in California.
(2) Dianne Elizabeth Auldridge was born December 11, 1943, and was married July 6, 1963 to John Robert Hall. There were two children: Keith Michael and Kevin Matthew, who was born February 20, 1965 and died April 13, 1965. Keith Michael was born December 23, 1963. Dianne and Robert were divorced in 1966. She married Patrick Michael Schurman September 10, 1967. He was born October 13, 1940. They have two children: Brian Patrick born October 3, 1968 and Sheryl Elizabeth, born July 20, 1970. Keith was legally adopted by Patrick Schurman in 1969.

b. Isabell was born January 17, 1915. She was married to Clebert Edwin Patton August 11, 1936. They live at St. Albans, W. Va. There were three children: Van M., David Edwin, and Susan Jane.
(1) Van M. was born May 13, 1937. He married Judy Craddock who was born January 23, 1944. There were two children: Pammy Ranae, born August 24, 1964; and Timothy Van born August 23, 1965.
(2) David Edwin was born August 16, 1941. He married Sheron Mayne born November 4, 1944. They have two sons: David Brian, born April 3, 1965 and Britt Anthony, born April 17, 1968.
(3) Susan Jane was born October 18, 1946 and married James Kevin Barthlow. He was born May 4, 1947. They have one child, Jonathan Korey, born January 1, 1971.

c. Dexter was born April 16, 1916. He was married June 16, 1943 to Madge Carden. They have one son born June 26, 1953. They live in Charleston. Their son is in college.

d. Davis T., Jr., was born August 28, 1920. He was married September 23, 1941 to Frankie E. Little, who was born September 1, 1921. She added to this information which I received from her (born again 1956).

How wonderful she thought to do this. Wouldn't it be marvelous and interesting to have a record of all our born-again dates. Three children were born to them: Davis Michael, Susan Elaine, and Mark Andrew. They live in Burkettsville, Md.

(1) Davis Michael was married June 26, 1964 to Glenda Jean Biddinger. Her birthdate was December 1, 1946. They have four children: Marcia Jo, born July 7, 1965; Davis Michael, Jr., born May 31, 1966; Melinda Sue, born November 11, 1967; and Michelle Lee, born July 24, 1969.

(2) Susan Elaine was born September 17, 1946. She was married June 12, 1964 to Frank DeSales Wilson, born January 10, 1944. They have a daughter, Tracy Leigh, born October 27, 1966.

(3) Mark Andrew was born April 9, 1953.

B. Charles Auldridge, the second son of Samuel and Susan Grimes Auldridge, married Rebecca Claypool. They had one daughter, Maud, who married a Lemon. They had a daughter, Bernice, and a son, Jack. They live in Charleston, W. Va.

C. George Luther Auldridge, was born February 8, 1861 and died May ~~14~~ 19, 1941. He married Martha Elizabeth Smith, July 29, 1885. She was born April 29, 1861, and died September 8, 1942. She was the daughter of Dr. Pleasant Smith, (born March 26 and died February 25, 1887) and Margaret Duncan Smith (born May 16, 1832 and died May 28, 1861). She had one sister, Eliza Jane Smith. George Luther and Martha Elizabeth Auldridge lived on a farm close Marvin Chapel. They had three children: Clyde; Nina M; and Glenna Susan.

1. Clyde was born May 21, 1887 and died in 1961. He married Molly Hogsette who died August 30, 1970. They had twin children: Elizabeth and Richard, born April 7, 1912. They lived at Marvin Chapel.

a. Elizabeth married Quade Arbogast, a Methodist minister. They have two children: Dottie and Donald. died May 11, 1989

(1) Dottie was born in 1941 and married Donald Lasley. They live in Nashville, Tenn.

(2) Donald was born in 1947 and married Elaine Barker in 1970. He is in the air force at San Angelo, Texas.

b. Richard married Ruth Sayler, September 18, 1947. They live in Denver, Colorado and have one daughter Kay Laynette, born April 7, 1953.

2. Nina M. was born July 7, 1890. She was married to James McCarty, August 20, 1912. Both were school teachers. They lived on a farm near Hillsboro for a time and then moved to East Calis, Vt. They had one daughter, Hazel. James is deceased. Hazel is a nurse and lives with her mother.

Died June 27, 1982

Died June 20, 1984

3. Glenna Susan was born March 11, 1898. She married Fred James Waugh, June 28, 1923. He died September 9, 1947 and Glenna Susan, September 9, 1949. They had four children: Dwight Fredric, Nina Ruth, Gladys Marie, and Robert Archie.

birthday Dec. 6, 1982

Died - Nov. 3, 1987 age 63 yrs

a. Dwight Fredric was born May 23, 1924. He was married to Alice M. Landis June 22, 1954. She was born September 4, 1934. They have one son, Alan Gene, born March 1, 1957. They live in Harrison, Ohio.

b. Nina Ruth was born September 14, 1926. She was married to Cornelius P. Prichard, June 27, 1950. His birthdate was March 13, 1894. There was one daughter, Anita Jane, born August 1,1960. Cornelius died April 26, 1968. Nina Ruth lives near Buckeye. MARRIED Rev. Willis Cornelius Nov 27, 1979. He died June 24, 1991 AGE 73 yrs 15 days

c. Gladys Marie was born March 20, 1929. She married Winters H. Dean July 11, 1947. He was born March 31, 1927. They have two children: Linda Karen, born August 16, 1948; and Gary Wayne born February 17, 1951. They live at Leivasy, W. Va.

d. Robert Archie was born June 27, 1932. He married Ruth A. Johnston June 20, 1956. She was born June 13, 1938. They have three sons: Albert Duaine born September 29, 1957; Gary Lynn born June 12, 1960; and Robert Earl born February 10, 1970. They live at Battle Ground, Ind.

D. Martha Elizabeth Auldridge was born near Seebert, W. Va. on what is now known as the Beckley Pyles place, on December 10, 1855 and died July 10, 1918. She married William Clark Clendenen, Jr. the son of William and Jane Cochran Clendenen, who first lived at Locust Creek and moved to what was then the Clendenen Fort above Seebert at the mouth of Stamping Creek William Clendenen, Jr. was born May 31, 1848 and died August 16, 1921. They lived on a farm about one mile from Seebert. Their children were: Ida M., Mary Anna, Lillie Rachel, Ira V., Susie Leverne, George Wanless, Samuel and Charles Coe.

1. Ida M. was born October 1, 1873 and died September 1, 1875.
2. Mary Anna was born October 21, 1874 and died September 15, 1966. She married Thomas McCoy who died in April 1952. They had no children. They lived in Richwood, W. Va.
3. Lillie Rachel was born June 11, 1878 and died April 5, 1889.
4. Ira V. was born May 8, 1880 and died August 25, 1945. He married Lillie Pyles, daughter of J. B. and Sally Buzzard Pyles. She died April 8, 1930. The lived near Hillsboro, W. Va. and had no children. Ira's second marriage was to Beulah Zimmerman.
5. Susie Leverne Clendenen was born February 12, 1883. She married Moody Asbury Pyles, son of J. B. and Sally Buzzard Pyles, December 30, 1903. They were married at Hillsboro by the Reverend Charles Lynch and settled on a farm on the Greenbrier River, about a mile north of Seebert, where they lived until after Moody's death, March 14, 1936. There were seven children: Gyle Bliss; Laura Grace; Gay; Beulah Jane; Marie Agnes; Martha Elizabeth; Garland Clendenen; and Phyllis Juanita.

a. Gyle was born July 17, 1905. He received a degree in Electrical Engineering from W. Va. University and is employed by a mining company in Duluth, Minn. He married Irene Gardiepy, November 2, 1935. They have one daughter, Joanne Elizabeth, born July 31, 1938.

(1) Joanne Elizabeth married Robert A. Pavich, June 16, 1962. They have three daughters: Michelle Marie, born June 17, 1963; Mary Beth born September 9, 1964 and Melanie Ann born December 15, 1970.

b. Laura was born February 10, 1907. She received a Masters degree from Marshall University and teaches in Hillsboro. She and her mother live in Seebert.

c. Gay was born April 17, 1909. He was married October 3, 1931 to Helen Hebb. They have a farm near Hillsboro and Gay works for the board of education. They have four children: Bonnie Corynne born January 9, 1933; William Moody born July 17, 1936; Wylantha Jane born January 13, 1942; and Timothy Gay born February 13, 1945.

(1) Bonnie married John A. Harrison, July 11, 1953 and lives in Andover, Mass. They have two children: Vicki Dawne born September 19, 1954 and Craig Brent born April 3, 1960

(2) Billy married Diane Flewelling, April 18, 1959 They live in Bedford, Mass and have four children: Debora born May 26, 1960; Brenda born May 18, 1962; Suzanne born June 20, 1963; and William, Jr. born September 14, 1965.

(3) Wylantha Jane was married July 5, 1959 to Kenneth May. They have three children: Nicholas born June 13, 1960; Douglas born March 1962 and Bryan born November 16, 1965.

(4) Timothy was married August 3, 1966 to Sharan Wright. They have one daughter, Gaylene Marie, born June 3, 1967.

d. Beulah Jane was born April 27, 1911 and was married January 16, 1942 to James Wyatt Jones, born March 4, 1912. Jane is a beautician and Wyatt works for the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad They live in Fayetteville, W. Va. They have one son, James Wyatt Jones, Jr., born March 17, 1945

(1) James Wyatt Jr., married Karen Wilson, August 9, 1969. He is a graduate of W. Va. University and is the high school band director at Fayetteville. Karen teaches there also

e. Marie Agnes was born December 8, 1914. She was married December 31 1939 to Franklin Nutter. He is in insurance and she is a beautician. They live in St. Albans and have one son, Franklin Winston.

(1) Franklin Winston is a college graduate now in the U. S. Navy.

f. Martha Elizabeth was born September 30, 1918. She was married December 30, 1939 to John McKenna. He was born August 24, 1906 and was a chemical engineer, now retired. They live in Paducah, Ky. and have three children: Johnny Vincent; Joseph Patrick; and Elizabeth Ann.

(1) Johnny Vincent was born August 18, 1941 and was married October 1, 1966 to Vicky Covington. She was born January 12, 1946. They have a daughter, Kelly Ann, born July 18, 1969.

(2) Joseph Patrick was born June 3, 1945 and married Susan Wilson January 23, 1965. She was born June 17, 1946. They have two daughters: Cindy, born July 31, 1965; and Charlott, born September 3, 1968.

(3) Elizabeth Ann was born September 19, 1957.

g. Garland was born March 17, 1922 and died December 31, 1923.

h. Phyllis Jaunita was born October 27, 1924. She attended business college in Charleston and was married May 30, 1942 to Verle Hambrick. Verle was born October 1, 1923. He is a retired navy officer and they live in Lewisburg, W. Va. There were three children: Susan Elizabeth; Virginia Adair; and Ann Harper.

(1) Susan Elizabeth was born June 1, 1945, married Jerry Lee Banton, and they live on a farm near Lewisburg. They have a son, Jerry Harper, born December 27, 1965. Susan has a business education and now works in the First National Bank of Ronceverte.

(2) Virginia Adair was born March 21, 1947 and attended Marshall University. She is at home and works in her father's office.

(3) Ann Harper was born November 7, 1949 and died January 7, 1964.

6. George Wanless Clendenen was born August 30, 1885 near Seebert, W. Va. He and Iva Bruffey were married February 24, 1909 at her parents home at Lobelia, W. Va. by the Reverend C. M. Anderson. Iva was born October 15, 1891 and is the daughter of the late William Allen and Martha Jane Corron Bruffey. Iva and George lived in Hillsboro until after his death, July 18, 1963. She now lives with her daughter, Ida, in Ronceverte. They had four children: Esther Martha; Ida Pearl; William Darrell; and George Wardell.

a. Esther was born November 12, 1910. She received an R. N. degree from the Davis Memorial Hospital in Elkins, W. Va. and has continued active in her profession. She married Beltron Wilmoth, February 2, 1945. They lived in Los Alamos, N. M., where she has continued to live since his death September 4, 1967. There were no children.

b. Ida Pearl was born January 26, 1913, married John LaRue March 12, 1934 and they had one daughter, Janice, born March 30, 1937. He died September 9, 1947. Ida has an R. N. from Davis Memorial Hospital in Elkins and is nursing in the Greenbrier Valley Hospital in Ronceverte.

(1) Janice married Jerrell Lee Brown and had three children: John Cameron, born May 13, 1956; George Robert, born October 27, 1957; and Lesa Ann, born October 23, 1962. Her second marriage was to Donald Gumm.

c. William Darrell was born September 6, 1915. He spent 22 years in the U. S. Navy. He married Edna Gladwell who died September 9, 1964. Darrell died September 29, 1966. There were no children.

d. George Wardell was born October 11, 1918 and served in the Army during World War II. He married Ruth Cutlip November 25, 1942. They live in Pennsylvania and have a daughter, Carolyn Sue, born August 3, 1943.

(1) Carolyn Sue received an R.N. degree from West Penn Hospital, Pittsburg. She married Richard Scrabaki and they have a daughter, Christine Lynn, born June 2, 1971.

7. Samuel Clendenen was born March 24, 1888 and died August 6, 1889.
8. Charles Coe Clendenen was born February 3, 1892 and died February 13, 1956. He married Ginger Carter. They had three daughters: Patricia, who married Hugh McClements, and had no children; Sharon (who is single); and Charlott, who married Edward Secker. They had two children: Charles Dawn and Patrick, and they live in Florida.

E. Jasper McKendry Auldridge, the youngest son of Samuel Auldridge, married Lena McCoy. He died in 1952 and she in 1947. There were three children: Harry, who was born in 1902 and died in 1930; Enoch was born March 23 and remains single; and Trudy, who was born August 26, 1904.

1. Trudy was married March 29, 1929 to John Fuller. He was born October 14, 1892. They live near Frankford and have four children: Seldon, Thelma, Mary and Alice.
   a. Seldon was born December 30, 1929. He married Annie Legg and lives at Maxwelton. They have two children, George and Cynthia.
   b. Thelma was born July 7, 1933. She married Carl Kincaid. They have six children: Patricia; Kyla; Constance; Ellen; Koren; Cheryl and Kevin.
   c. Mary was born December 5, 1939. Her first marriage was to Charles Blankenship. There were four children: Judy; Charles; Roger; and Pamela. Mary's second marriage was to Verlin Dean. There were no children.
   d. Alice was born September 24, 1942. Alice married Alton Massie. They have two children: John Edwin and Margaret Ellen.

I regret that the information given on the Auldrige's is more complete for some families than others. I am sure there are interesting facts that could have been added but it has been most difficult to get all the information. My suggestion is that each family head add to this, the information that will be of interest to your children and future generations.

OLIVER and ELIZA AULDRIDGE
(my parents)

THE BAILES FAMILY (1962)
My daughter, Jean (upper right) and her husband, Jerry (upper left). Bottom row from left to right, their children, Suzy Jerry and Cheryl.

GEORGE OLIVER and MARTHA ELIZA RODGERS AULDRIDGE
and children left to right: Lake, Lillie, and Leonard

Left to right: Jean Holliday Barlow, Dr's. Charles and Lillie Aultridge Holliday

Family of Jacob Beckley and Sara Jane Buzzard Pyles
Left to right: Elburn, Lillie, Moody, Ernest, Jacob Beckley, Docia, Sara Jane, Peyton, Auburn, Louversia and Sherman.

From Historical Sketches of Pocahontas County, W. Va., by William T. Price. "Ruben Buzzard, the progenitor of the Buzzards, was the son of an emigrant from Germany, who settled near Lancaster, Pa. Upon his marriage with a Miss Sicafoose, in Pendleton County, he settled on lands now in posession of his descendants between Glade and Frost. An apple tree found near his frontier home may have been the largest in the state. It measured three feet and six inches in diameter. The branches were about forty feet long. Seventy-five bushels have been gathered from this tree at one time". William T. Price further states, "From what we can gather from Ruben Buzzard's personality, he seems to have been a man that pondered Agur's prayer to good purpose: 'Two things have I required of Thee, deny me them not before I die. Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny Thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.'" Proverbs 30: 7-9.

These early settlers (my great-great grandparents) were the parents of four daughters: Susan; Fannie; Hester ; and Martha and five sons: Eli; Solomon, Henry; Ruben; and Sampson.

I. Fannie Buzzard was married to Benjamin Buzzard and lived in Greenbrier County.

II. Hester Buzzard became Mrs. Henry Grimes and lived in the Hills.

III. Martha Buzzard was married to Charles Grimes and lived in the Hills near Mt. Zion.

IV. Eli Buzzard married Margaret Moore. They had four sons: Arminius; Morgan; Peter; and Perry. Two girls were Laura and Phoebe. Arminius was a Union soldier, a member of Co. D. 10th W. Va. Infantry. Perry belonged to Co. 1, 3rd W. Va. Cavalry and died in a Maryland Hospital in 1864.

V. Solomon Buzzard married Rachel Grimes. Their children were Wesley, Jessee, Susan and Mary.

VI. Sampson Buzzard married Eleanor Knapp. Their children were Cornelias, Cronin, Mildred and Jerusha.

A. Mildred married Abram Shinneberry and settled near Cloverlick

B. Jerusha became Mrs. Isaac Shinneberry and settled near Glade Hill.

VII. Henry Buzzard (my great-grandfather) married Mary Hannah, daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth Burnsides Hannah, and lived on Cummings Creek near Huntersville. Their daughter, Sara Jane (Sally), became the wife of J. Beckley Pyles and another daughter, Susan (my grandmother) married Tillison Auldridge. (Joseph Hannah was the son of David Hannah).

A. Sara Jane (Sally) was born February 14, 1848 and died March 12, 1932. She married Jacob Beckley Pyles born December 4, 1848,died March 3, 1924. They settled on a farm on the Greenbrier River, near Seebert. This was once the Samuel Auldridge property. Their children were: Sherman; Louversia; Auburn; Moody; Lillie; Elburn; Peyton; Docia and Ernest.

1. Sherman was born June 2, 1874. He was married to Ettie Smith and they had two children: Emma and Hubert. He died in 1967 at 93 years and is buried at Smith Cemetery.

a. Emma married Guy McComb and there were four children: Earl; Jean; Sherman and Paul

b. Hubert married Jewel Turner. They had four children: Thelma; Emma; Mary and Nellie.

2. Louversa was born January 1, 1876. She was married to William Killeen. There were three children: Margaret; Myrhl; and Timmy, who died in infancy.

a. Margaret married Frank Moore, deceased. Three children were born to them: William; Stanley; and Daniel. The three sons are married. Daniel is a physician and lives in New Orleans, La. Margaret lives with them.

b. Myrhl married Ralph Burns. She is deceased. They had two children: Richard and Patricia Lee.

(1) Patricia married Eugene Brown and they have two sons.
(2) Richard married Carolyn Hodge. They live at Hillsboro and he is an associate with his father in the trucking business. They have one child.

5. Auburn O. Pyles was born December 10, 1879 and died October 6, 1963. He was married August 15, 1906 to Grace Mabel Wade, who died March 24, 1968. They had one daughter born February 1, 1916, who died at birth. They settled at Seebert where they had a general store.

4. Moody A. was born November 14, 1880 and died March 14, 1936. He was married December 30, 1903 to Susie Leverne Clendenen, daughter of William and Elizabeth Auldridge Clendenen. There were seven children: Gyle; Laura; Gay; Beulah Jane; Marie; Martha; Garland; and Phyllis. This is more complete in the Auldridge history.

5. Lillie was born April 28, 1882 and died April 8, 1930. She was married to Ira Clendenen. They lived near Hillsboro. Ira died August 25, 1945. He was the son of William C. and Elizabeth Auldridge Clendenen. They had no children.

6. Elburn G. was born July 19, 1885 at Huntersville, W. Va. He died November 27, 1969 at the Greenbrier Manor Nursing Home, Lewisburg, W. Va. He had lived with his daughter, Dortha and son-in-law Clyde Bennett since the death of his wife. He was married November 24, 1909 to Bessie Susan Wade. She died March 5, 1967. They had four daughters: Margie; Dortha; Ruth; and Lucille. This is more complete in the Rodgers history.

7. Peyton was born October 18, 1887. He married Gerusia Evans. There were no children.

8. Docia was born March 14, 1891. She married Luke Cook and had nine children: Verl born 1909, married to Hally Kershner; Arnold born 1912; Lola born 1914, married an Oscar; Earl born 1916; Thurmond born 1918; Jesse born 1920; Berlin, works at the Greenbrier Valley Hospital, is married and has no children; Raymond; and Glenna Pearl, who married a Lane.

9. Ernest was born February 7, 1895. He lives on the home place on the Greenbrier River near Seebert. His first marriage was to Anna Cook, November 20, 1914. There were three children: James; Richard and Virginia.

a. James was born in 1915 and married a Miss Brag. There were four children: Dan; Eugene; Ernie; and Janice. Dan is married and has one child.

b. Richard was born in 1917. He married Glenna Starcher. They have one son, Richard, Jr., who is married and has one son, William

c. Virginia was born in 1918 and married Hunter Stull. They have two children: Jean and Billy Hunter, Jr.

Ernest's second marriage was April 20, 1925 to Mrs. Stella Grimes Kane. She had one daughter, Dolly Kane, to her previous marriage. Five children were born to this union: Roy; Basil; Charles; Wanda and Curtis.

a. Roy was born in 1931 and married Deloras Stepp. There are three children: Carla Jean; Carol Lee; and Harland.

b. Basil was born in 1934 and married Velma Morrison. They have one son Robert.

c. Charles was born in 1935. He married Judy Knight. He has one stepdaughter, Jane. They live in Seebert.

d. Curtis was born in 1943 and married Irene Roberts. There are three children: Glenda, Kelly and Ernest Dorwood.

8. Susan Buzzard, (my grandmother), daughter of Henry and Mary Hanna Buzzard was born October 16, 1845 and died February 7, 1941. She was married February 14, 1867 to Tillison Morgan Auldridge. Eleven children were born to them: Jasper; George Oliver; Nancy (Nannie), Emory, Ivetta, Asa, Laverna (Lula), Winters, Minty, Bertha, and Davis T. This is more complete in the Auldrige family history.

y Buzzard's second wife was a Perkins. There were two sons, Moses, who died at nd George who married a Smith. He was a carpenter and is deceased.

James Rodgers, my great-grandfather, was a native of Madison County, born February 15, 1789. His first marriage was with a Miss Jackson, also of Madison County. He moved to Pocahontas County in 1824 and settled on Lewis Ridge, overlooking Buckeye Cove. Thus he and his family became identified with Pocahontas County almost from its organization.

Quoting from Historical Sketches Pocahontas County, W. Va., by William T. Price:
"James Rodgers was an industrious person whose arduous toils and severe privations helped to make our county what it is.

In his time, James Rodgers had the reputation of being one of the most industrious of working men. He tried to train his sons and daughters to habits of industry and strict economy. Soon as they became old enough for service they went from home and found ready employment as field hands and housekeepers. This venerable man was a zealous and devoted adherent of the Methodist Protestant church. He was one of the first members in the Buckeye society and probably one of the first in the county. His prayers and experience talks were in good language, interspersed with allusions to the parables and quotations of the promises. All this indicated that in early, impressible youth he must have been familiar with persons of more than ordinary culture, such as Madison County was distinguished for. In his speech he had the tone and style that characterized the old Virginia gentry, as the writer learned to know in subsequent years from actual acquaintance with east Virginians.

The writer cherishes the memory of this old citizen with feelings of much respect, as the two often toiled in the meadows and harvest fields side by side in his boyhood. He remembers being often impressed by the pathos and fervency of the old man's occasional prayers in the morning worship. This was something which was never omitted in the old Marlinton home.

The belief of the older people was that 'prayer and provender hinder no man', and no time was always found for prayer, as well as for breakfast and supper.

Some of his expressions still linger in memory after more than fifty years. (The first edition of this book was published July, 19, 1901.) One was an allusion to the grapes of Eschol as typical of the richness of the promised land. His idea was that God would give his humble praying people here while on the pilgrimage, a cluster now and then from the heavenly vine so as to refresh and encourage them to put forth their earnest, faithful efforts to go up and receive possession of the heavenly land. This allusion was utilized as suggestive of a sermon prepared and preached by the writer thirty years ago. May we meet and see for ourselves the blessed land in all its richness and glorious beauty, and especially the vine from which the clusters were gathered that cheered and encouraged him."

Seven children were born to James Rodgers and his first wife: Robert, Joseph, Henry, Sarah, Elizabeth, Mary, and Tabitha. I have no information on six of them. Robert married Sally Smith, daughter of John Smith and Sally Moore Smith. They lived near Buckeye and later moved to Nicholas County.

James Rodgers second marriage was to Nellie Lewis (my great grandmother) of the Little Levels, (near Hillsboro). She was a grandaughter of Alexander Woddell of Scotch-Irish descent, and was one of the earliest settlers in the neighborhood of Marvin Chapel. Six children were born to James and Nellie Rodgers: Margaret Rebecca, William Chesley, John and James, Jr.

I. Margaret became Mrs. Henry Adkison
II. Rebecca became Mrs. Fillren
III. William married Polly Flemming and settled near Buckeye
IV. Chesley married Sally Morrison and settled near Jacox.
V. John married a Miss Harter
VI. James L. Rodgers, Jr. (my grandfather) was born at Buckeye, W. Va., January 1, 1831 and died January 1895. He was buried at Buckeye on the old home place. He married Sarah E. Burgess November 10, 1852. She was born at Buckeye October 18, 1825 and died October 17, 1878. She was buried at Buckeye. They live on a farm near Buckeye and had ten children: Newton C; Hannah E; George W; Davis A; John H; Margaret A; Adam; Martha Eliza (mother); Mary Frances; and Alvin W.

A. Newton Rodgers was born May 30, 1845 and died January 17, 1932. He was married December 5, 1878 to Fredrecca J. Kellison. She was born August 7, 1860 and died November 16, 1937. They lived at Buckeye and both were buried there. They had six children: Roxie E; Lemaster B; Mary Elizabeth; Morgan; Willie H; and John T.

1. Roxie was born June 21, 1880 and died June 6, 1949. She was married April 12, 1898 to Edgar J. Ray. There were eight children: Floyd; Frankie; Ricky; Elizabeth; Sarah; Tom; Amon; and Ethel. Floyd and Ethel are deceased.

2. Lemaster was born May 9, 1882. He was married May 16, 1906 to Savanah Beverage. Both are deceased. There were six children: Anna; Lenna; Clyde; Clinton; John; and James.

3. Mary Elizabeth was born August 28, 1884 and died May 27, 1936. She was married October 15, 1908 to Darley W. Williams. They lived in Marlinton and had two children, Elizabeth and Marguerite.

a. Elizabeth married E. W. Rexrode. They live in Marlinton and have three children: Sally; Jane; and Sue.

(1) Sally married Bill Hiner. They have three children: Libby; Sue; and Billy.

(2) Jane married Albert Sawyer and they have four children.

(3) Marguerite married William Doig. They have one daughter, Sandy.

4. Morgan was born December 28, 1897 and died September 25, 1953. He was married August 10, 1925 to Evelyn Totton. She is also deceased. There were no children.

5. Willie was born March 22, 1902 and died October 10, 1961. He was married January 21, 1924 to Suzy Kellison. She was born January 4, 1903. They lived at the home place at Buckeye. There were eight children: Gladys; Betty; Grace; Dorthy; Donald; Helen; Phyllis; and Barbara.

a. Gladys was born January 4, 1925. She married Dempsy Carpenter and they have three children: Barbara; Jaquelin; and Joyce.

(1) Barbara married D. H. Stockton. They have a daughter Michelle and a son, D. H. Jr. who died at 3 months.

b. Betty was born October 9, 1926. She married Claud Carpenter and has two children: Linda Carol, who married Floyd Burgess; and Sammy K.

c. Grace was born February 27, 1929. She married William Workman. They live at Hillsboro and have five children: Soloman; Tommy; Kevin; Charles Parker; and Suzy Lynn.

(1) Soloman was married to Eileen Sharp. They have a son Jason Thomas.

d. Dortha Lee was born October 5, 1930. She married Dennis Jackson and they have four sons: Danny; Douglas; David; and Donald.

e. William Donald was born October 18, 1932. He married Winona Sparks. They have two sons: Mark and Mike.

f. Helen Joyce was born November 9, 1934. She married Wade Sharp. They have three sons: Roger; Gary; and Ronald.

g. Phyllis Jean was born June 3, 1937. She married Dempsy Barnett. They have three children: Billy; Steve; and Pamela.

h. Barbara Ellen was born July 18, 1939 and died July 31, 1942.

6. John T. was born September 9, 1904 and died July 25, 1921.

B. Hannah E. was born January 24, 1856 and died April 25, 1893. On August 13, 1888 she was married to Kenny Otto Wade. He was born October 2, 1848, and died May 9, 1930. He had been previously married to Alice M. Waugh. On March 3, 1886, she passed away leaving five children: William Henry; Minnie Florence; Fred Gray; Lena Alice; and Grace Mabel.

1. William Henry was born March 31, 1869 and died January 11, 1931. He is buried at the Smith Cemetery. He was married December 27, 1893 to Mintie Smith who died November 9, 1958. They had three children: Zella: Pearl and Neal.

a. Zella married Edward Bowden, who is deceased. She lives at Elkins W. Va.

b. Pearl married Elmer Sims. Both are deceased.

c. Neal did not marry, is also deceased.

2. Minnie Florence was born May 5, 1875 and died March 30, 1945. She married Henry Hill and lived in Nebraska. They had one daughter, Pauline.

3. Fred Gray was born December 28, 1877 and died July 19, 1963. He was married December 18, 1907 to Mabel Stone, born May 26, 1882, died December 19, 1950. She was from Ronceverte and they lived on a farm near Seebert. There were five children: Kenny; Garnet; Leo; Fred, Jr; and Robert.

a. Kenny was born May 15, 1910 and died September 22, 1971. He and Mrs. Hazel Samms Hall were married July 4, 1941. She was born August 17, 1914. Hazel had two children by a previous marriage: Stanley and Jean Hall.

(1) Stanley was born July 4, 1936 and married Addie Bell Eades. They have two children: Shannon; and Sharon.

(2) Jean was born November 19, 1933 and married Harold Smith. They live in Spanishburg and have one son, Kevin.

b. Garnet was born October 27, 1911. She went into nurses training and was killed in an automobile accident, August 9, 1931.

c. Leo was born November 29, 1915. He served in the U. S. Navy. On June 7, 1945 he and Drexall McMillion were married. Drexal was born October 24, 1913 and taught school in Hillsboro. They live at San Mateo, California and have two daughters: Carol and Linda.

(1) Carol Ann was born December 14, 1948.

(2) Linda was born September 15, 1950. She was married February 15, 1971 to Mark Reden.

d. Fred, Jr. was born June 15, 1919. He served in the U.S. Army and was married October 22, 1946 to Nina Boblet. They live in Charleston and have a son Franklin Eugene, born September 9, 1947. There was a daughter, Kathy Sue, born 1952. She died and is buried at the Brick Church Cemetery in Hillsboro.

e. George Robert was born May 5, 1921. He was married March 27, 1950 to Betty Jean Scott. They live in Hillsboro. There were four children: George Gray, who was born in 1952 and died in 1959; James Robert, born November 26, 1953; Barbara Jean, born February 25, 1955; and Cherlynn born January 14, 1957.

4. Lena was born December 19, 1879 and married Joseph Dean, October 26, 1898. She died September 13, 1969. They lived in Iowa and had four daughters: Mrs. Elva Roberts; Mrs. Eva Barger; Mrs. Laura Moisiman; Mrs. Emma Krutsinger; and one son Ralph.

5. Grace Mabel was born May 12, 1882 and died March 24, 1968. She was married to Auburn O. Phyles, August 15, 1906. The lived at Seebert and had one daughter who died at birth.

Hannah E. Rodgers and Kenny Otto Wade lived on a farm near Seebert. Two children were born to them: Bessie Susan and James Franklin

1. Bessie Susan was born July 11, 1890 and died March 5, 1967. She was married November 24, 1909 to Elburn G. Pyles, who died November 27, 1969. Their last residence was at Caldwell where they had a general store for many years. Their four daughters, born at Seebert, W. Va. were: Margie Ellen; Dorthy Jane; Grace Ruth; and Frankie Lucille.

a. Margie was born August 19, 1910. She graduated from Dunsmore Business School in Staunton, Va., where she met Henry Hardy. They were married April 22, 1930. Henry is a mechanic and Margie is a school librarian. They have two children: Nancy Sue; and John Henry.

(1) Nancy Sue was born November 20, 1933. She was married September 17, 1952 to Patrick Dudley. He is an electrician. They live in Staunton and have three children: Patrick, born August 13, 1958; Michael Wayne, born April 1, 1961; and Susan Patricia, born December 29, 1962. Since her children are now in school, Nancy is finishing college at Madison College, Harrisonburg, Va.

(2) John Henry was born August 22, 1944. He and Mary Jane Phillips were married November 14, 1964. John served in the Navy three years. They have one son, Steven, born November 7, 1968.

b. Dorthy Jane was born November 4, 1912. She was married November 24, 1931 to Clyde Bennett. He was born at Caldwell, W. Va. January 1, 1907 and is employed by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. They live at Lewisburg, W. Va. and have two daughters, Betsy Jane and Patsy Jean.

(1) Betsy Jane was born at Caldwell, July 31, 1933. She and Reginald Donald Hudgins were married November 24, 1951. His birthdate is January 29, 1926. Reggie works for the Smith Transfer Co. They live in Lewisburg and have one son, Donald Elburn, born October 11, 1952.

(2) Patsy Jean was born July 8, 1939. She received an A.B. degree from Marshall University and taught for several years. She and Thomas Buckley were married June 10, 1962. He received a degree from Ohio State University in Veterinary Medicine and has a practice in Cincinnati, Ohio. They have one daughter, Amelia Sue, born February 24, 1969.

c. Ruth was born September 30, 1914 and was married to Frank G. Loudermilk, July 18, 1938. Frank was born April 8, 1911, attended Berea College and is employed by the Culligan Water Softener Co. They live in Roanoke, Va., and have one daughter, Shirley Ruth.

(1) Shirley Ruth was born March 18, 1942. She received a business education at the National Business College, Roanoke, Va. On August 12, 1967, she married Ronald Benjamin Smith. They live in Roanoke, Va. and have one daughter, Tracy Lynn, born December 17, 1970. Ronald graduated from Danville Technical Institute and works at WBRA T.V. station. He was born May 8, 1940. Shirley was employed at WSLS T. V. for 10 years.

d. Frankie Lucille was born September 30, 1916. She was married to Curtis Moore of Marlinton, W. Va. on July 19, 1940. They live at Durbin and he is employed by the State Forestry Division. They have two children, Robert Elburn, and Sara Ann.

(1) Robert was born December 25, 1942. He attended the University of Pittsburg and is getting a degree in Inhalation Therapy from the University of Buffalo. He teaches Inhalation Therapy in the Erie Community Hospital. He married Martha Lynn Palmer, a nurse, on October 21, 1967. They have one daughter, Laura Elizabeth, born February 3, 1971. They live in Marilla, N. Y.

(2) Sara Ann was born March 17, 1946. She received an A.B. degree in Home Economics from Glenville State College. She and Richard Raines were married July 27, 1969. He served in the U. S. Navy for four years, then attended Pittsburg Institute of Aeronautics. He is

1. Bessie Susan was born July 11, 1890 and died March 5, 1967. She was married November 24, 1909 to Elburn G. Pyles, who died November 27, 1969. Their last residence was at Caldwell where they had a general store for many years. Their four daughters, born at Seebert, W. Va. were: Margie Ellen; Dorthy Jane; Grace Ruth; and Frankie Lucille.

a. Margie was born August 19, 1910. She graduated from Dunsmore Business School in Staunton, Va., where she met Henry Hardy. They were married April 22, 1930. Henry is a mechanic and Margie is a school librarian. They have two children: Nancy Sue; and John Henry.

(1) Nancy Sue was born November 20, 1933. She was married September 17, 1952 to Patrick Dudley. He is an electrician. They live in Staunton and have three children: Patrick, born August 13, 1958; Michael Wayne, born April 1, 1961; and Susan Patricia, born December 29, 1962. Since her children are now in school, Nancy is finishing college at Madison College, Harrisonburg, Va.

(2) John Henry was born August 22, 1944. He and Mary Jane Phillips were married November 14, 1964. John served in the Navy three years. They have one son, Steven, born November 7, 1968.

b. Dorthy Jane was born November 4, 1912. She was married November 24, 1931 to Clyde Bennett. He was born at Caldwell, W. Va. January 1, 1907 and is employed by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. They live at Lewisburg, W. Va. and have two daughters, Betsy Jane and Patsy Jean.

(1) Betsy Jane was born at Caldwell, July 31, 1933. She and Reginald Donald Hudgins were married November 24, 1951. His birthdate is January 29, 1926. Reggie works for the Smith Transfer Co. They live in Lewisburg and have one son, Donald Elburn, born October 11, 1952.

(2) Patsy Jean was born July 8, 1939. She received an A.B. degree from Marshall University and taught for several years. She and Thomas Buckley were married June 10, 1962. He received a degree from Ohio State University in Veterinary Medicine and has a practice in Cincinnati, Ohio. They have one daughter, Amelia Sue, born February 24, 1969.

c. Ruth was born September 30, 1914 and was married to Frank G. Loudermilk, July 18, 1938. Frank was born April 8, 1911, attended Berea College and is employed by the Culligan Water Softener Co. They live in Roanoke, Va., and have one daughter, Shirley Ruth.

(1) Shirley Ruth was born March 18, 1942. She received a business education at the National Business College, Roanoke, Va. On August 12, 1967, she married Ronald Benjamin Smith. They live in Roanoke, Va. and have one daughter, Tracy Lynn, born December 17, 1970. Ronald graduated from Danville Technical Institute and works at WBRA T.V. station. He was born May 8, 1940. Shirley was employed at WSLS T. V. for 10 years.

d. Frankie Lucille was born September 30, 1916. She was married to Curtis Moore of Marlinton, W. Va. on July 19, 1940. They live at Durbin and he is employed by the State Forestry Division. They have two children, Robert Elburn, and Sara Ann.

(1) Robert was born December 25, 1942. He attended the University of Pittsburg and is getting a degree in Inhalation Therapy from the University of Buffalo. He teaches Inhalation Therapy in the Erie Community Hospital. He married Martha Lynn Palmer, a nurse, on October 21, 1967. They have one daughter, Laura Elizabeth, born February 3, 1971. They live in Marilla, N. Y.

(2) Sara Ann was born March 17, 1946. She received an A.B. degree in Home Economics from Glenville State College. She and Richard Raines were married July 27, 1969. He served in the U. S. Navy for four years, then attended Pittsburg Institute of Aeronautics. He is a mechanic for the Delta Airlines at the O'Hara Airport, Chicago.

2. Frank James Wade, son of Kenny O. and Hannah Wade, was born December 24, 1892. He died of pneumonia January 21, 1919. He is buried at the McNiel Cemetery at Hillsboro.

After the death of Hannah Rodgers Wade, Kenny Wade married Agnes Nottingham on December 25, 1895. There was one daughter, Idella Zinelda, born June 24, 1898. Her first marriage was to George Steel, December 3, 1918. Her second marriage to Hadley Withrow. She died July 15, 1955.

Kenny Wade later married Mrs. Sallie Sims, December 5, 1917. She died, April 18, 1931.

C. George W. Rodgers was born March 30, 1854. He was married to Susan Beverage April 17, 1881. He died July 26, 1923. She was born August 26, 1865 and died November 19, 1933. There were nine children: Felia; Alice; Pearl; Grace; Henry; Minta; William Lee; Iva; and George Emory.

1. Felia was born September 30, 1882 and married Lanty Cole, December 29, 1905. There were three children: Glenna, Annas, and Lee.
   a. Glenna was born August 8, 1907.
   b. Annas was born February 10, 1910. She married Dr. Annon Row and lives in Tucson, Arizona.
   c. Lee married Lucy Hansford
2. Alice was born July 28, 1884. She was married December 19, 1906 to Remus Beverage. He was born December 6, 1887 and died July 28, 1908. They had one daughter, Eva.
   a. Eva was born October 24, 1907 and married Burlyn McCarty November 8, 1938. He died July 2, 1958. There were no children.

Alice's second marriage was to Jacob L. Jackson. She died January 1, 1950.

3. Pearl was born November 24, 1886 and died December 14, 1902.
4. Grace was born October 26, 1889 and married D. W. Taylor, July 1, 1921. He died March 26, 1965. She is living in California.
5. Minta was born March 15, 1894. She was married to Lloyd Olding in April 1932. She died June 28, 1947.
6. William Lee was born November 24, 1896 and died young.
7. Iva was born October 21, 1889 and married Harry Cochran June 1910. She died November 5, 1918. One child was born December 12, 1916.
8. George Emory was born August 1, 1904 and died February 15, 1913.
9. Henry was dead at birth.

D. Davis A. Rodgers was born January 3, 1859 and died young.

E. John H. Rodgers was born June 3, 1861 and died while young.

F. Margaret Ann Rodgers was born August 9, 1863 and died June 18, 1949. She was married to William M. Adkison who was born March 31, 1855 at Swago, and died January 2, 1930. They lived near Buckeye and had seven children: Dallas Coe; Elsie Jane; Winona Vura; Fred Elmer; Nelson Clifford; George Rockford; and Okey Neel.

1. Dallas Coe was born September 16, 1888 and died September 12, 1955. He served in the U. S. Army in World War I and taught school for a number of years. He was also Clerk of the Circuit Court of Pocahontas County for several years. He and Ethel Correll were married June 20, 1923. She died in 1959. They had one child, Betsy Jane, who died at three years of age.
2. Elsie Jane was born March 16, 1890. She taught school for 44 years, is now retired and lives near Marlinton, at Riverside.
3. Winona Vura was born September 3, 1891. In 1914 she married Henry Miller who died July 8, 1971 Winona died February 10, 1961. They had eleven children: Bernice; Ross; May; Ruby; Frances; Kathleen; Glenn; Margaret; Ralph; Dorthy; and Doris Jean.
   a. Bernice was born January 9, 1915. She married Wilford Bailey and they had four children: Wilford, Jr., born April 16, 1937; Edward Neel, born November 18, 1938; Alford Wayne, born March 6, 1941; Barbara Elaine, born February 6, 1960.

b. Ross was born September 26, 1916. He and Helen Dye were married and have two daughters: Linda Virginia, who married Franklin Miller; and Brenda Kay.

c. May was born May 10, 1918 and died May 31, 1947.

d. Ruby was born October 8, 1919 and married Wilmer McCarty. They have two sons: Robert, born February 2, 1941; and Jerry, born July 8, 1950.

e. Frances was born May 1, 1921. She was married to Moffit Williams, now deceased. There were two sons: John Richard, born July 2, 1945; and Roger Francis, born July 5, 1948.

f. Kathleen Ethyl was born February 21, 1923. She married Harvey Young and they have one son, Gregory, born October 18, 1948.

g. Glenn was born October 20, 1924 He married Avonell Estep. There were two children: Marsha, born August 1950; and Katie, born July 10, 1954. Glen died November 18, 1961.

h. Margaret was born August 23, 1926. She and Paul Rhodes were married. There were no children.

i. Ralph was born June 12, 1929. He married Mary Rhodes. They have no children.

j. Dorothy Jane was born May 16, 1930. She and Doris Jean are twins.

k. Doris Jean was married to Stewart Groves. They have two sons: Stewart Gene, Jr. and Gary Wayne.

4. Fred Elmer Adkison was born March 27, 1893 and died November 10, 1960. He married Mabel Barry. There were no children. Fred was a veteran of World War I and died in the Veteran's Hospital in St. Petersburg, Florida.

5. Nelson Clifford Adkison was born September 5, 1895. He served in the U. S. Army in World War I, lived at Riverside and died November 29, 1962.

6. George Rockford Adkison was born March 9, 1898 and died January 7, 1971. His first marriage was to Ethel Scott. There were two children: Hilda, who married Ray Bobbett; and Lucille, who married a Kershner. George's second marriage was to Lucille Woods. There were three children: William H., Carole J., and Edward N., who drowned when he was nine, February 21, 1953.

7. Okey Neel Adkison was born October 16, 1901. He died while serving in the Army in a hospital in Denver Colorado, September 25, 1931.

G. Adam Rodgers was born March 6, 1865. His death is not recorded.

H. Martha Eliza Rodgers (mother) was born near Buckeye, August 11, 1867 and died May 20, 1945. She and George Oliver Auldridge were married October 7, 1896 by the Rev. George Echols in the Lower Church at Buckeye. George Oliver was born August 11, 1869 and died March 31, 1968. Four children were born to them: Leonard Clifton; Emory Lake; Elizabeth (Lizzie); and Lillie Olive. The family record is complete in the Auldridge record.

I. Mary Frances Rodgers was born March 17, 1869. She married John Van Buren. They lived on Anthony's Creek and are both buried there. She died April 1937.

J. Alvin Rodgers was born December 3, 1871 and died February 22, 1902. He never married.

James L. Rodgers' second marriage was to Mrs. Mary E. Kellison, who was born August 10, 1839 and died May 13, 1907. There were two children: Lewis, who died young; and Laura Cordelia, born September 26, 1883 and died March 31, 1964.

A. Laura Cordelia was married April 9, 1902 to Hassel Andrew Walton, who was born March 15, 1873 and died July 18, 1911. There were four children: Gradie Carlisle; Dainty Ilean; Okey Ward; and Eula Madeline.

1. Gradie was born March 10, 1903 and married Hattie Perry, November 1926. They had one daughter, Madeline, who married Hubert Dillon. They have four daughters and one son living. Two children are dead. Gradie's second marriage was to Lucy Gilberts and the third to Bessie Murphy. His last marriage was to Ida Reeves in October 1956. They live in Salisbury, N. C.

2. Dainty Ilean was born October 17, 1904, and lives at Buckeye.

3. Okey Ward was born July 24, 1906 and died August 7, 1949. He was not married.

4. Eula Madeline was born August 30, 1908. She and Leslie Lee Walls were married June 6, 1931. They were both school teachers, now retired, and live in Roanoke, Va. There were three children: Robert Carrol; Elizabeth Ann; and Sherlyn Leah.

a. Robert Carroll was born March 28, 1923. He married Sherly Ann Brooks in 1948. They have three sons: Mike; Mark; and Jeffrey; and they live in Augusta, Ga.

b. Elizabeth Ann was born September 17, 1933. She married Woody England and lives at Pineville, W. Va.

c. Sherlyn Leah was born March 7, 1937. She and Charles Corman were married in August 1955. She died December 16, 1956, in her junior year at West Virginia University. Charles Corman remarried and is a teacher at Morgantown.

Laura Cordelia Rodgers' second marriage was to John Daniel Miller, July 31, 1914. He was born April 24, 1872 and died September 9, 1959. They lived near Buckeye and had three children: James Aralan, William Paul, and Mary Elizabeth.

1. James Arlan was born August 20, 1915 and died August 27, 1971. He and Marie Scott were married December 15, 1948. They had one daughter, Mary Ellen, born January 19, 1950.

a. Mary Ellen married Roger Watson and they have a son Roger Araln born April 24, 1968. They live in Lancaster, Pa.

2. William Paul was born October 1, 1918. He was married to Lena Moore September 13, 1941. There were no children. He died December 23, 1947.

3. Mary Elizabeth Miller was born September 22, 1922 and married Gary Morgan, September 3, 1949. There were no children. Her second marriage was to Warren K. Reed, September 22, 1956. They have two children: Laura Grace, born July 25, 1957; and Barbara Ann, born October 12, 1958. They live in Baltimore, Maryland.

POCAHONTAS TIMES

Entered at the Postoffice at Marlinton, W. Va., at second class matter.

SUBSCRIPTION CHARGES

In Pocahontas County, $1 a year
Elsewhere, $1.50 a year

CALVIN W. PRICE, EDITOR

THURSDAY, SEPT. 3, 1953

The Auldridges

The other day Mrs Mary Auldridge Harper, of Hillsboro, came in for to inquire what all I remember of what I had been told of her father's family, the Auldridges. I was honest enough to confess that my knowledge along most any line was scattering, few in the hill, far apart and thin in places.

Any way, here is the line of descent of the lady. William Auldridge was a native of England. His widowed mother, Elizabeth, brought him to America, prior to the year 1800. The tradition is he was ten or twelve years old. He grew up on the Johnson Place, Jerico Road, near Marlinton.

William married Mary Cochran She was a daughter of Thomas Cochran, a native of the north of Ireland. Her mother was named Mackenzie, from Augusta County The Cochrans lived at the Fred Ruckman place, near Mill Point. The Auldridges went to housekeeping at Bridger Notch, near where the Bridgers Brothers, John and James, were bushwhacked by the Indians, 1784. The homestead is still held by an Auldridge, Dr Sandy, great grandson of Pioneer William Auldridge.

One of the six sons of William and Mary Cochran Auldridge was Samuel. He married Miriam Barlow, daughter of John and Martha Waddell Barlow.

Their son was William, who married Ellie Pennell. Their daughter is Mrs Mary Auldridge Harper, who visited me the other day. She is the widow of the late Harry Harper.

I do not remember ever hearing the maiden name of Elizabeth mother of William Auldridge. I do recall stories about her. She died in her home on Jerico Farm in the year 1874, aged 114 years. I was told she was a lady of slight build; small hands; "fingers like birds' feet."

The tradition is that the name for presuming to marry above and beyond his station in life.

In the course of a few years, marked by unemployment, privation and discouragement, the husband sickened and died. He left a young widow and their son, William.

Mrs Auldridge made strong resolve that her son should grow up in the free land of America, where men are on equal footing before the Lord and before the Law.

But, the passage money for the six weeks' of a sea voyage!

However, there was the indentured servant statute. Under it, the ship master took a paper, setting out the amount of the passage money, and providing for sale of the services of the signor at public auction; the bid for the shortest period of servitude to be accepted.

John Johnson was a Revolutionary soldier. As a boy, he was at Braddock's Defeat, 1756 An item he brought back was an auger. This is owned by a great-great-grandson, Ed C Moore

John Johnson owned a plantation, Jericho, of 1,000 acres, on Jerico Road. I have recently examined his will It was signed in April 1825 and probated, March Court, 1826.

John Johnson's wife died in the late 1790's He needed a governess with an education for a house full of children. Such a treasure was to be found occasionally at the auctions of indentured servants in Richmond. So, John Johnson took a string of young horses, packed with products of plantation and country side, and hied away on the 200 mile journey to Richmond, on a trading trip. At the auction of indentured servants he bid in the widow Auldridge and her son, William. He brought her and the boy back to Jericho Farms. Later, he married her.

Mrs Johnson lived to see two of her husband's grandsons elected to the United States Senate—Senator Ewing, of Ohio, and Senator Farnsworth, of West Virginia. Both were born on Jericho Farms.

It could well be added here that a Stevenson married into this Ewing family connection. So, in their line, we have had an Adlai Ewing Stevenson as Vice President of the United States, and the chance is good that another Adlai Ewing Stevenson will be elected President of the United States. And so mote it be.

Here in the Endless Mountains

THE AULDRIDGES

William Auldridge married Mary Cochran who was a daughter of Thomas Cochran, a native of the north of Ireland. Her mother was named Mackemie, from Augusta County. The Cochrans lived at the Fred Ruckman place, near Mill Point.

William Auldridge was a native of England. His widowed mother, Elizabeth, brought him to America prior to the year 1800. He was probably ten or twelve years old. He grew up on the John son Place, Jerico Road, near Marlinton.

William and Mary Cochran Auldridge went to housekeeping at Bridger Notch, near where the Bridgers Brothers, John and James were bushwhacked by the Indians, 1784. Dr. Sandy Auldridge, a great grandson of Pioneer William Auldridge owned the homestead for years, it is now owned by . The Auldridges had six sons. One of these sons was Samuel. He married Miriam Barlow, daughter of John and Martha Waddell Barlow. Their son was William, who married Effie Pennell. Their daughter, Mrs. Mary Auldridge Harper, who was married to Harry Harper

Mrs. Mary Auldridge Harper related the following story about the Auldridge family to Mr. Cal Price who published it in the Pocahontas Times, Sppt. 3, 1953:

Mrs. Harper said she did not remember ever hearing the maiden name of Elizabeth, mother of William Auldridge. She did recall stories about her. She said Elizabeth died in her home on Jerico Farm in the year 1874, aged 114 years. Mrs. Harper said she had been told that she was a lady of slight build; small hands; "fingers like birds' feet."

The tradition is that the name in England was Aldrich. Before her marriage to a commoner, Elizabeth was a lady in waiting on Queen Charlotte, at the court of George III, King of England. Mrs. Harper supposed that this would imply she was a high born lady.

A visitor on occasions to Queen Charlotte was Catherine II, Empress of Russia. Onm one of these visits the lady in waiting received the salesman with an engagement to show the Empress ware of a maker of fine pottery. The young tradesman showing the ware to the royal customer was named Aldrich. At a guess, his name might have been William. When Elizabeth and William saw each other, it was love at first sight.

And what a tempest it all did raise. Mrs. Harper said, "We of this generation remember how a king of England got himself dethroned for hooking up with a commoner. A century and a half ago, the divine rights of kings and courtiers was not the silly pretense and sham George Washington and Company, Unlimited showed it to be.

Anyway, William and Elizabeth were married. Elizabeth was dropped from the queen's list of ladies in waiting. She was disowned by her family. They seemed to feel their name was dishonored when she would marry her true love.

Auldridge was fired off the job. In the course of a few years, marked by unemployment, privation and discouragement, the husband sickened and died. He left a young widow and their son, William.

Mrs. Auldridge made strong resolve that her son should grow up in the free land of America, where men are on equal footing before the Lord and before the law.

But, the passage money for the six weeks' of sea voyage was something she didn't have. However, there was the indentured servant statuate. Under it, the ship master took a paper, setting out the amount of the passage money and providing for sale of the services of the signor at public auction; the bid for the shorest period of servitude to be accepted.

John Johnson was a Revolutionary soldier. As a boy, he was at Braddock's Defeat, 1756 An item he brought back was an adz. This owned by a great-great-grandson, Ed C. Moore, and is now owned by -- John Johnson owned a plantation, Jericho, of 1500 acres, on Jerico Road. (His will was signed in April, 1825 and probated, March Court, 1826.

John Johnson's wife died in the late 1790's. He needed a governess with an education for a house full of children. Such a treasure was to be found occasionally at the auctions of indentured servants in Richmond. So, John Johnson took a string of young horses, packed with products of plantation and country side, and hied away on the 200 mile journey to Richmond, on a trading trip. At the auction of indentured servants he bid in the widow Auldridge and her son, William. He brought her and the boy back to Jericho Farms, later he married her.

Mrs. Johnson lived to see two of her husband's grandsons elected to the United States Senate - Senator Ewing, of Ohio, and Senator Farnsworth of West Virginia. Both were born on Jericho Farms.

It could well be added here that a Stevenson married into this Ewing family connection. So, in their line, we have had an Adlai Ewing Stevenson as Vice President of the United

Henry Barlow. - An Appreciation.

By Wm. T. Price, D. D.

With pathetic frequency the past few years prominent and influential citizens of Pocahontas county, West Virginia, have passed away. One of these was Henry Barlow, near Edray, West Virginia, the subject of this appreciation prepared as a tribute to his memory, which is fondly cherished by numerous friends and near relatives throughout his native county, and by very many persons in various localities in West Virginia. His ancestry both paternal and maternal is of pioneer derivation. His father was the venerable John Barlow, Sen., near Edray, West Virginia. John Barlow, Sen., was the only son of Alexander Barlow of Bath county, Virginia, an English emigrant, and his wife Barbara was an English young person whose family name was Rowse.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Barlow were living in Bath county when the Revolutionary War was in progress. He went into service and was never heard of after the battle of Brandywine. The prevailing opinion has been that he died in that famous engagement.

In 1806 John Barlow married Martha Waddell. Not long afterward he bought a piece of land from Thomas Brock on Red Lick Mountain, which was paid for in venison at fifty-cents a saddle. Here the pioneer built his home, reared his family and passed the most of his married life. This property was finally owned by his son Henry, and is a part of the ample legacy bequeathed to his heirs. His family consisted of ten sons and five daughters. The sons were William, Alexander, James, John, Nathan, Josiah, Henry, Amos, George and Andrew. The pioneer's daughters were Elizabeth, who became the wife of the late William Baxter, Esq. Miriam, who became Mrs. Samuel Auldridge; Mary Ann married James Auldridge; Ellen who died at the age of four years; and an unnamed daughter dying in infancy, a few weeks old. Mr. and Mrs. John Barlow being conscientiously honest themselves they believed everybody else to be likewise honest, and thus were Israelites indeed in whom there was no guile. On them and their children rest the blessing promised the meek and pure in heart; provided they cherish purity, good deeds and humility as their venerated pioneer ancestors have the reputation of doing. Henry Barlow Esq. was the seventh son of the pioneer, and was born at the Red Lick Mountain home, February 21, 1827.

Mr. Barlow was married twice. The first marriage, January 30, 1855, was with Rachel Cameron Hickman, daughter of Elliot Hickman, a native of Bath county, Virginia. She was born June 2, 1836, and died in 1861, aged twenty-five years. The children of this marriage were Rachel and Evaline, both of whom died in childhood; Alice who became Mrs. George K. Gay, of Buckhannon, West Virginia; John Elliot now a merchant at Edray, West Virginia. Mrs. Nancy Jane Matilda Barlow, the second wife, was born August 19, 1841, and was married to Mr. Barlow September 22, 1862, was a daughter of William Cassell and Mrs. Matilda Cassell, on Back Alleghany. The sons and daughters of the second family were Cammie, Amos Neal, William Anderson, Regina Ruth, who became Mrs. James N. White, West Union vicinity; Davis Levi, Page Dameron, Asa Clark, Effie Florence, who became Mrs. Joel E. Peck, near Lewisburg, West Virginia; Albert Wickline who died aged five years, and an unnamed daughter dying in infancy. All of the surviving children are residents of Pocahontas county, excepting Mrs. Peck and Page Damerom, who is a popular physician, in McMechen city near Wheeling West Virginia.

It may be pertinent moreover to mention that Mrs. Barlow's father William Cassell, was twice married and she and her brother George were of the first marriage. George Cassell was a Confederate soldier and died of eight wounds received a few days before his death. Such was his sister's affection she took a journey of more than a hundred miles on horseback to be with him in his dying sufferings.

In reference to Mrs. Barlow's father's second family there were seven children born. Their mother's maiden name was Nancy Collins, daughter of Charles Collins of John Collins, the ancestral immigrant. Mary Catharine became Mrs. Thomas Beverage; Martha Ellen was married to Robert Sutton, a prominent teacher of schools; Louise became Mrs. Cassell; William Cassell, Jr. married India Sutton and lives upon the old homestead; Sarah Ann died at the age of thirteen years; Charles migrated to the far west; George went to Texas and after numerous adventures on cattle ranches, was drowned in the Yellowstone river while in charge of a Texas herd. So she had a brother and a half brother George, one named after the other.

Mrs Barlow's much lamented death occurred June 20, 1906 in her sixty-fifth year. In his two marriages Mr. Henry Barlow was highly favored. His wives conscientiously and efficiently "did him good and not evil" all the days of their lives respectively and they were gratefully appreciated by him and the children.

Henry Barlow's career as a business man was of a character to demonstrate the fact that Pocahontas county has in her gift all that a reasonable person should aspire to, whose assets may be only two hands and a mind to be diligent in business, yet fervent in spirit serving the Lord. For forty years he was a member of the firm of Barlow & Moore, at Edray, and in the meanwhile operated largely as a farmer and grazier, ably and industriously assisted by his sons. He virtually performed the service of a Banker years before a bank was thought of as feasable for Pocahontas county. When banks came to be organized he was among the first directors. It should be remembered to Mr. Barlow's credit that he was an enthusiast in favor of public schools, though himself among the prominent taxpayers. He served for years on the Edray Board of Education. He had the privilege of seeing his son, Davis L. serving with marked credit terms as County superintendent of schools and as a member of the West Virginia Legislature 1906-7, whose educational qualifications from first to last were due to the West Virginia public school system. For many years he was an interested visitor of the Teachers Institutes for Pocahontas county, and would make humorously characteristic addresses when speaking of his exploits and services as a "Member of the Board of Ignorance."

Having thus briefly mentioned the foregoing particulars, it remains now to consider Mr. Barlow's christian life that was such a marked feature of his personal character for sixty-five years. August 1843, Rev. T. J. Dyerly in charge of the Pocahontas circuit, conducted a protracted meeting at Mrs. Phobe McNeill's barn on Swago. This building one of the more commodious of its kind, stood in the meadow about half way between the Swago fording and the mill race. It was during this meeting he professed conversion, August 29th and in a few weeks afterwards was received at Hamline Chapel, as a member of the M. E. Church. At experience meetings while speaking of his conversion he was frequently heard to say, "that the hay and the old barn logs looked as bright as the noonday sun."

Robert Moore, the class leader and a steward of the church, asked the young member whether he would like to give some thing for the use of the church. His reply was, "I would, but have nothing to pay." Mr. Moore said, "I will pay for you and you can pay me back in work." Mr. Moore placed 50 cents to the credit of the young member, which was soon worked out in one of the Edray fields. In reference to this occurrence, Mr. Barlow often observed "he never saw the time since that he could not pay something toward the support of the church." Mr. Moore's son, Rev. George Preston Moore, became in course of time Mr. Barlow's busiiness associate in the mercantile firm of Barlow & Moore, elsewhere referred to. Those knowing Mr. Barlow intimately say that during his whole religious life he was never known to refuse contributing something in aid of any christian church in his vicinity. From a letter written me by one who knew and understood Mr. Barlow's character better than any living person, some extracts are given illustrative of the attractive phases of his character. "He was a man who always desired peace, and because he many times aided in making peace between others, he was often called a peace maker."

"You might speak of him as a genial, gracious, kindly man, who treated all who came in the circle of his acquaintance, rich or poor, with the same rare and exact courtesy. He had a pleasant word for every one. His jovial disposition will be remembered by all his friends. His mirth of him as a christian. I well remember how faithfully he attended all the services of his church, and how he regretted so much when bad health kept him from the house of the Lord. On a Sunday morning just after I had entered the pulpit, some one handed me a message from him in which he stated that that was his seventieth birthday, and would apologize for his absence from the services, giving sickness as a reason.

We have a picture in our home which we prize very highly. It is of the interior of the Edray Methodist Episcopal church and the Sunday school, with brother Barlow, Bible under his arm in the midst as Superintendent. He must have left his impress on many minds and hearts as he labored in this capacity. I well remember hearing him publicly exhort his sons by name to become christians, and beg their forgiveness if he had ever done or said anything that was calculated to keep them from becoming followers of their savior.

At the first of our association, brother Barlow would sometimes remark: "Death seems to be a leap in the dark." But later on the gloom seemed to be less dense, occasional rifts were in the clouds and light came through, and he came to see more clearly that it is the heaven given privilege of the child of God to know at least something of what is in the beyond, and to have a good degree of certainty as to what that beyond had in store for him.

I trust that those who were his intimate friends at the last, heard from his lips language like this, "Brighter and brighter unto the perfect day." He has gone on before us a little while and we expect to greet him in the great beyond in the morning of a better day.

Upon which of his sons has his mantle fallen?

W. A. Sharp.

Guyandott, W. Va. March 29, 1909.

I had the honor of being the pastor of this devoted "father in Israel" for nearly five years and knew him to be a faithful and consecrated man. While too feeble to attend the church services regularly as in former years, he was still quite frequently found there and his very presence was an encouragement to all.

I often visited him in his home and also had the privilege of his company in my own home, and always found him a wise counselor, retaining his interest in the work of the church up to the last few days of his earthly pilgrimage.

Father Barlow was a very spiritual man and thoroughly loyal to his church, in which he was a very prominent member for a long period of years, being continued to the last as an honorary Class-Leader, although too feeble to officiate except at rare intervals.

I talked and prayed with him the day before he passed away and found him trusting in the Savior, saying if God called him "it was all right." When asked if he wanted prayer, he replied, "all the time," and during the prayer was heard to make frequent responses.

He is greatly missed, not only by his immediate friends, but by the church and by the community. But while ours is the loss, his is the eternal gain and "we do not sorrow as those who have no hope," but trust to meet him at last in the better, brighter world.

G. W. MARSTON,
Pastor Edray Circuit, Methodist Episcopal Church.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

I esteem it a great privilege to bring my tribute of respect to the memory of a brother in Jesus and dear friend personally. For five years 1894-1899 I was intimately associated with him as his pastor, and the more I knew of him the stronger were the bonds that bound me to him.

His sunshiny disposition coupled with his witticisms made him a companion with whom it was a pleasure to while away the hours of an otherwise unpleasant journey. His geniality and whole hearted hospitality made it a great pleasure to be a guest in his home. But I would especially speak been an inspiration to me and many are the individuals whose life has been brightened, whose faith in God strengthened and whose religious experience sweetened by having fellowship with this saintly man of God.

Surely it can be said of him that "many will rise up and call him blessed."

J. B. GRIMES.

Lobelia, W. Va., April 12, 1909.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

In reviewing the life and character of the pioneers of of our country, we find there are many noble men whose names are linked with character building, and who will be held up to the children of the rising generations as beacon lights in laying the foundation of civil and religious training. Many, we say, whose names stand high upon the roll of honor, men who have done a noble work, and whose fame will live on for generations to come; but the subject of this memoir—Mr. Henry Barlow—stands out prominently among these all.

Born and reared of humble parentage, he did much toward the development of his native county and state; and in the training of his large family of children he left an impress upon their lives which can never be obliterated. A man of sterling worth and character, generous to a fault, ready to forgive, ready to testify for his Lord and Master, ready to lend a helping hand to those in distress, he went about doing good. The writer of this sketch never had a better friend.

By reason of strength, his life was prolonged beyond the "four score years" but this long and busy life is only a moment when compared with the life upon which he has now entered. But he is gone. We miss his stately steppings; we miss his counsels; we miss his prayers, but it is ours to meet him.

"There in that bright world above,
In Heaven that happy place,
Where we shall tell of a Savior's love,
And sing we are saved by grace."

E. H. MOORE.

My father, John Barlow was among the first pioneers to emigrate from Pocahontas county, West Virginia, to what was then called the West. He died in Schuyler county, Missouri, September 9, 1858, leaving me a child but six years of age. It was not my privilege to meet any of my near relatives until May, 1892. I at this time visited my Uncle Henry Barlow, my father's young brother. When I went to his home I was informed that he had driven his cattle to the mountain range and would be "back" in a day or two. It is needless for me to say that I was made to feel at home and the time did not appear long until my uncle's return. I remained a guest in his home for one month. Now in a word let me say just how he impressed me. I considered him as one of the most delightful and attractive men that it had been my privilege to meet. "To know him was to love him."

He was a man of deep intellect, good judgment, a wise counselor and devotedly religious. He loved the church of his choice and loved to talk of his hopes and prospects of Heaven. At the time of my visit his dear wife was living. She was a devoted christian mother and both father and mother were deeply interested in the welfare and salvation of their children. I never met this mother again, but it was my pleasure to have my uncle visit me in October, 1901. I hope to meet these good relatives in the "sweet bye and bye."

HENRY AMOS BARLOW.
Pastor in Charge of Charleston Circuit,
W. Va. Conference.

March 25, 1909.

✡ ✡ ✡ ✡

I am bewildered as to where to begin, and what to say first in my tribute, but I go back to the days of my boyhood and remember Henry Barlow as being my big associate and well remember the occurrence of fifty-six years ago, when in my mischief, I plagued him almost beyond endurance, and to give me a "settler" he caught me up by the heels and proposed to immerse me in a barrel of water head first. I remember that I succumbed and promised him to be a good boy and mind "mama."

In November 1867, I entered into a contract with him and his younger brother, Amos Barlow, in the mercantile business at Edray, West Virginia. After a few years he bought his brother out, and he and I have been, and were continuously associated together in this business until 1902, in which year A. R. Gay bought him out, and thus closed our business partnership of something over thirty-five years, and these years comprehended an annual settlement in which hundreds of dollars were in the balance and had to adjusted and arranged. In all these settlements we were able to adjust our money matters without a single jar or word of dispute over any question that arose.

In morals and religion he was a church member as early as I can recollect anything about him, and in all the intervening years from that time until now, I have known him as staunch and reliable christian gentleman, always ready to help the fallen and cheer the faint, and in sustaining financially and spiritually the interests of the church of his choice he could always be relied upon.

Socially he was always a cheer to any company anywhere, and the memory of his life and character will be his monument. "If a man die he shall live again." Yes, he lives.

GEORGE P. MOORE.

My pleasant acquaintance with Mr. Henry Barlow was limited to one meeting, but our social and fraternal enjoyment at that time was unusually sweet and I shall not forget it. He was then visiting in Lewisburg and we dined together at the home of the Misses Lipps. I found him genial in conversation, with a warm and broad interest in God's work, a lover of christians of every name. He seemed eager to know good men and loved to be with them just for the pure enjoyment of the association. Old age in him was green and fruitful. Loving to be with God's people here, what must now be the bliss of his association with them in Heaven! What joy for him to see Christ.

EUGENE DANIEL.
Pastor Presbyterian Church, Lewisburg, W. Va.

I first met him in the spring of 1896 and well do I remember my first impression of him. His snow white hair and beard enclosing a face of such benevolence, and kindness that I was reminded of the fathers of old. In memory I see him now ringing the old dinner bell--welcoming a stranger to his home and heart, and for the entire 14 years which I knew him the bell of welcome never ceased to ring.

His life was an open book for all to read. His life was pure. He spoke no evil word of any one: always gentle, unobtrusive, kind and gracious—a gentleman without a blemish. He is gone and is at rest, yet how lonely we feel when we stop to think that we will never again see him on the shores of time. We must hope and strive for the goal that he has reached, happy with his Lord and Savior in the realm above, where I sincerely hope we shall all meet "to part no more."

I regret that circumstances prevented my attending his funeral, but I was there in spirit.

HELEN G. DUANE BARLOW.

McMechen, W. Va., February 22, 1909.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

(Miss White taught two terms of public school at Onoto. Mr. Barlow was at special pains to make her stay pleasant. Her tribute shows how she appreciates such kindness and friendship, and it also represents the sentiments of numerous other young friends.)

I was shocked and grieved to hear of Mr. Barlow's death. I had not heard of his illness.

It is hard to give up our loved ones but one can not help thinking of the "dear departed" as an aged pilgrim on life's road who has fought a good fight and been called to his reward. What an inspiration such lives are to us and how consoling their last words of love and trust. Yet in our weaker human nature we can not help grieving and feeling that we would like to call them back.

I valued Mr. Barlow's friendship very highly, and feel that in his death I have lost a highly honored and esteemed friend.

With kindest sympathy to all the relatives, I am,

ANNIE L. WHITE.

Lewisburg, W. Va., February 22, 1909.

faculty was well developed and was quite noticeable in his last sickness." "Notice may be taken of the fact he seldom failed to hold family prayer. He often labored in the fields until he was so nearly worn out that it was a burden for him to walk to his home in the evenings, yet he would seldom retire to rest without first asking God's protection on his home.

"Some years ago he bought a tract of land on Cranberry Mountain. He was very fond of this mountain land and scenery, and would accompany his boys and work-hands when the stock would be moved to the range in the spring. Sometimes when the fences needed repairing and other work done, all would camp for a few nights under a cliff of rocks which would, be made dry and warm by burning logs. Here when the days work was finished, supper over, and after a short time spent in pleasant conversation, Mr. Barlow would repeat a hymn and ask all to assist in singing after which he would kneel in earnest prayer. The following is one of his favorite hymns which he often used in this mountain camp:

"Could we but stand where Moses stood
And view the landscape o'er;
Not Jordan's wave nor death's cold flood,
Could fright us from the shore."

"In his home Mr. Barlow was always kind and pleasant. Never complained of his surroundings. In fact his home life was stainless. To his family he was faithful in every detail of duty. He did nothing that his children would wish to change, amend or recall; nothing to cause them to blush or apologize. His children's welfare seemed to be constantly upon his mind, and during his last sickness he often inquired if they were present. One great purpose of his life was to assist them. This is evidenced by a remark which he made just before his death, when he said in substance: "I am going away now. I leave something for my children. I have done the best I could for them, share and share alike."

The last two or three years of his life were spent largely in visits to the homes of his children from McMechen to Lewisburg, and intervening localities in West Virginia. It must have been a precious solace to our departed friend and christian brother to have known that he leaves a group of sons and daughters for whom any father might be congratulated. All are giving promise of being worthy sons and daughters of a worthy father and the two revered mothers who have gone before.

The writer of this memorial tribute feels that in the decease of Mr. Barlow he parts with a friend from early youth, and one too who has been especially "lovely and pleasant" to him for the past twenty-four years, in ways too numerous to especially mention.

It seems to have been Mr. Barlow's intention to have a family reunion and ample preparations were being made for the deeply interesting occasion. His eighty-third birth-day was fixed upon as the date, February 21, 1909. As the sequel shows it pleased the All-wise One in whom we live and move and have our being to will it otherwise under very different auspices, thus illustrating in a very touching manner that though a man's heart may devise his way the Lord directeth his steps.

When it became apparent that he could not survive much longer, Mr. Barlow's children all gathered at the old home to be with their dying father at the supreme moment, except Mrs. Ruth Regina White, who was prevented by sickness. All of the son's wives were present excepting Mrs. John E. Barlow and Mrs. Page D. Barlow, who were providentially hindered. He was heard repeating his favorite hymn at intervals.

"There is a land of pure delight
Where saints immortal reign,
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain."

His latest remembered words were to this effect. When asked, "Do you feel ready to go?" He exclaimed "Yes Hallelujah, Hallelujah."

Friday, February 19, 1909, he passed away serenely as a little child falls asleep in its mother's arms. Two days more he would have been eighty-two years of age, and the anticipated eighty-third birthday, with the reunion as arranged. The funeral services were performed by Revs. G. W. Marston and George P. Moore. As the 23rd Psalm was known to have been a special favorite with the deceased, it was selected and commented upon.

The remains were borne to the Edray graveyard by six of his sons as the Pall Bearers and there at the open grave, in the presence of an immense concourse of relatives, friends and neighbors, the burial rites were performed. The scene was impressively suggestive of these words, expressive of the thoughts and feelings the assembled hundreds must have realized.

"How many to their eternal home,
This solemn moment fly;
And we are to the margin come,
And soon expect to die.

"Dear Savior be our constant guide,
And when the word is given,
Bid the cold waves of death divide,
And land us safe in heaven."

In Memory

of

Rachel C. Hickman Barlow.

The dates of birth and death of this much esteemed personage are given in the biographical sketch of Henry Barlow to whom she was married in the year 1855. Her married life was short and at the age of twenty-five she answered to the roll call of the skies.

She was a faithful wife, a tender, self-sacrificing mother and a kind hearted neighbor. She possessed a gentle, sweet tempered disposition. She made her home happy and when I think of her death occurring as it did at such an early age I am reminded of the following lines from Whittier:

"The light of her young life went down,
As sinks behind the hills
The glory of a setting star Clear, suddenly, and still."

"As pure and sweet, her fair brow seemed Eternal as the sky;
And like the brook's low song, her voice,
A song that could not die."

"And half we deemed she needed not,
The changing of her sphere
To give to heaven a Shining One
Who walked an angel here."

A Friend.

It was with profound sorrow that I read the notice of the death of Brother Henry Barlow, which occurred February 19, 1909. I have known him for about thirty-nine years, and to know him was to love him. His life was a Christian life from its responsible beginning to its cheerful close. His home was a Christian home, whose altar fires burned for quite a number of years. Here the weary Methodist Preacher always found a hearty welcome. He was loyal to his church and contributed largely of his means to the support of the gospel and the benevolent enterprises of the church. I esteem him as one of the best men I ever knew. The church will miss him as a Brother, the children will miss him as a father, the community will miss him as a neighbor, the county will miss him as a citizen. But he is not lost, but gone on before. And while he cannot return to us, we have the exalted privilege of going to him where we will never say good bye.

C. M. NEFF.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

It is with sorrow that I note the fact of the removal of one more Land-Mark, your Father and my Friend, from our midst, but such is the way of all the earth, he had served his generation nobly and our Heavenly Father called him home to his reward.

In intellect, I regard Mr. Barlow above an average. In morals and religion, I regard him a model. We believe he leaves the world better on account of his having lived in it.

I congratulated myself for being able to call him my friend. We extend our sympathy to all his bereaved children and friends, and may we all meet him in the Sun-Bright Clime.

T. A. BRUFFEY.

Lobelia, W. Va., March 29, 1909.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

I would like to contribute one flower to this memorial wreath, but feel that my ability is inadequate to the occasion.

I have known Bro. Henry Barlow, but to love him. Since I first met him years ago, his presence and counsel has

To the Memory of Mrs. Nancy J. M. Barlow

It was my pleasure to pay many visits to the home of Mrs. Barlow. I began to make these visits in my childhood days and continued to repeat them to the day of her death which occured June 20, 1906. Her boys and I were playmates and we spent many happy hours together at the old Barlow home which stands in the sugar-tree grove near Onoto. It is needless for me to say that early in life I learned to respect and love my childhood neighbor, Mrs. Barlow.

She was a loving wife and mother, a kind neighbor, and scores of people can testify that she treated her visitors and guests with generous kindness and liberality. The door of her home was open to all and the stranger received the same kind treatment as the friend.

Mrs. Barlow's love for her family was never exhausted, it never changed; it never tired. It might be truly said that she was an angelic spirit in her home, and to her children the memory of this sainted mother is a paradise out of which they can not be driven away. As an evidence that such a mother will not be forgetten, let me quote from a public talk given by one of her sons some time ago. Among other things he said: "I cannot close without paying a tribute to the memory of mother. On that beautiful summer evening June 20, 1906, as the sun began to sink behind the western hills, as the shadows of the evening began to darken and as the flowers planted and tended by mother's hand began to close their petals for the night, mother cast aside the labors, trials, disappointments and hardships of this life and went into the eternal world.

"'Mother is gone!' is the saddest sentence that ever rang through my childhood home, and I tell you today that a boy cannot sustain a greater loss than to lose his mother. My mother was a most tender comforter and a wise counselor. I shall never forget mother. What a hallowed name! That name touches every fiber of my soul and strikes every chord of my heart with its angelic fingers. What tender associations are linked with mother. Her name calls up the fondest memories of life and opens in my mind the deepest and richest gushes of consecrated thought and feeling."

Mrs. Barlow made a profession of religion at the old McLaughlin church when she was fourteen years of ago. She was a faithful member of the Methodist church for a half century and in her death the church sustained the loss of one whose place will not be easy to fill; but she has "entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God."

"Another hand is beckoning us,
Another call is given;
And glows once more with angels steps
The path that reaches Heaven.

P. L. Carter.

To the Memory of Henry Barlow.

He was in my estimation more than an ordinary man; in power of mind; quickness to dissent from what was wrong, and approve the right.

In business correct and honorable; having an eye to see the right thing, and the will to do it.

In religion conscientious, always interested in the advancement of the church, a friend to the faithful minister, giving moral support and influence, also material support; ready to help the man who would try to help himself.

The writer was appointed to Pocahontas circuit, March 1876 and the first man who occupied the present Edray parsonage, he found much to do to put it in condition; for comfort and support. It was necessary that a part of the four acres including garden, should be plowed with a two horse plow. Bro. Barlow voluuteered to furnish the team and feed free, the pastor doing the work. This resulted in a good crop of oats, and the next year a fine crop of hay.

We always found a friend in him, willing to help and counsel, giving good advice. He was genuinely fraternal with all Christian people, quick to feel any thing that might create trouble in any way or by any one. He was a steward for many years, and was always put in the lead with reference to the finances of the church.

With open heart and house, ready to receive and entertain the ministers whom he regarded as helping the cause; giving his disapproval openly to whatever he thought was not right, out spoken against all manner of evil, and having very little use for the man who tried to make his way by unfair dealing.

By industry, economy, good judgment, and judicious management, he acquired a competency and brought up a large family, some of whom have reached honorable positions. Being blessed with good wives he had much help in the home. We pray that his mantle may fall on his sons, and though he has passed over, they may imitate his Godly life and be as useful in the church and neighborhood as their venerated father. We shall meet soon in the glorious heavens above.

In memory of a beloved friend,

JOSEPH S. WICKLINE.

It was with profound sorrow that I read the notice of the death of Brother Henry Barlow, which occurred February 19, 1909. I have known him for about thirty-nine years, and to know him was to love him. His life was a Christian life from its responsible beginning to its cheerful close. His home was a Christian home, whose altar fires burned for quite a number of years. Here the weary Methodist Preacher always found a hearty welcome. He was loyal to his church and contributed largely of his means to the support of the gospel and the benevolent enterprises of the church. I esteem him as one of the best men I ever knew. The church will miss him as a Brother, the children will miss him as a father, the community will miss him as a neighbor, the county will miss him as a citizen. But he is not lost, but gone on before. And while he cannot return to us, we have the exalted privilege of going to him where we will never say good bye.

C. M. NEFF.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

It is with sorrow that I note the fact of the removal of one more Land-Mark, your Father and my Friend, from our midst, but such is the way of all the earth, he had served his generation nobly and our Heavenly Father called him home to his reward.

In intellect, I regard Mr. Barlow above an average. In morals and religion, I regard him a model. We believe he leaves the world better on account of his having lived in it.

I congratulated myself for being able to call him my friend. We extend our sympathy to all his bereaved children and friends, and may we all meet him in the Sun-Bright Clime.

T. A. BRUFFEY.

Lobelia, W. Va., March 29, 1909.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

I would like to contribute one flower to this memorial wreath, but feel that my ability is inadequate to the occasion.

I have known Bro. Henry Barlow, but to love him. Since I first met him years ago, his presence and counsel has

The Barlow Family

Alexandrew Barlow - 1778
m Barbara (Rowse) Barlow
John Barlow 11/12/1781 - 01/23/1866
m Martha (Waddell) Barlow 01/12/1790 - 10/07/1872 (1806)
William Barlow
Miriam Barlow
Alex Barlow
James Barlow
Mary Ann (Barlow) Aldridge
m Jim Aldridge
Nathan Barlow
Ellen (Barlow)
Josiah Barlow
Henry Barlow
m Rachael (Hickman) Barlow
m Nancy Jane Matilda (Cassell) Barlow
Sam Brown Barlow
Infant Girl
Amos Barlow 01/11/1831 - 11/01/1908
m Mary Ann (Moore) Barlow 03/19/1856 (11/06/1850)
Julia (Barlow) Frances 02/12/1852 - 09/05/1861
Melvina "Aggie" Agnes (Barlow) Loury 06/20/1855 - 08/31/1875
m Samuel B. Loury (03/31/1874)
Lilly May Agnes Loury 11/20/1875
m Mary Susan Poage Barlow 05/08/1843 - 01/16/1916 (02/22/1859)
Letcher Davis Barlow 06/20/1860 - 11/20/1885
m Bertie Arbogast (12/20/1882)
Lucy Bell (Barlow) Moore 05/06/1868 - 09/06/1904
m C. N. Moore (03/06/1890)
Clarence Moore
Howard Moore
m Helen Moore
William Howard Barlow 03/17/1875 - 09/11/1957
m Anna Mary (Patterson) Barlow (06/25/1903)
Helen Barlow - 1987
Samuel Isaac Barlow 04/07/1877 - 02/07/1960
m Lula Myrtle (Moore) Barlow 02/17/1906 (11/29/1899)
Madeline (Barlow) Mccomb 09/25/1901 - 04/12/1979
m Harry McComb
Myrtle Lula (Barlow) Atkins 02/07/1906 - 12/02/1974
m Melvin Atkins 06/12/1901 - ~~1977~~ 8/1/81
Raymond Melvin Atkins 01/21/1928
m Julia Anne Todd Lacey 06/23/19
Julia Anne Todd (Atkins) Haciski 07/04/1952
m Dr. Rafael Christopher Haciski (06/23/1974) (DOB 11/21/52)

04/21/1889 - 03/09/1933 (06/11/1907)

The Barlow Family

Alexandrew Barlow - 1778
m Barbara (Rowse) Barlow
John Barlow 11/12/1781 - 01/23/1866
m Martha (Waddell) Barlow 01/12/1790 - 10/07/1872 (1806)
William Barlow
Miriam Barlow
Alex Barlow
James Barlow
Mary Ann (Barlow) Aldridge
m Jim Aldridge
Nathan Barlow
Ellen (Barlow)
Josiah Barlow
Henry Barlow
m Rachael (Hickman) Barlow
m Nancy Jane Matilda (Cassell) Barlow
Sam Brown Barlow
Infant Girl
Amos Barlow 01/11/1831 - 11/01/1908
m Mary Ann (Moore) Barlow 03/19/1856 (11/06/1850)
Julia (Barlow) Frances 02/12/1852 - 09/05/1861
Melvina "Aggie" Agnes (Barlow) Loury 06/20/1855 - 08/31/1875
m Samuel B. Loury (03/31/1874)
Lilly May Agnes Loury 11/20/1875
m Mary Susan Poage Barlow 05/08/1843 - 01/16/1916 (02/22/1859)
Letcher Davis Barlow 06/20/1860 - 11/20/1885
m Bertie Arbogast (12/20/1882)
Lucy Bell (Barlow) Moore 05/06/1868 - 09/06/1904
m C. N. Moore (03/06/1890)
Clarence Moore
Howard Moore
m Helen Moore
William Howard Barlow 03/17/1875 - 09/11/1957
m Anna Mary (Patterson) Barlow (06/25/1903)
Helen Barlow - 1987
Samuel Isaac Barlow 04/07/1877 - 02/07/1960
m Lula Myrtle (Moore) Barlow 02/17/1906 (11/29/1899)
Madeline (Barlow) Mccomb 09/25/1901 - 04/12/1979
m Harry McComb
Myrtle Lula (Barlow) Atkins 02/07/1906 - 12/02/1974
m Melvin Atkins 06/12/1901 - ~~1977~~ 8/1/81
Raymond Melvin Atkins 01/21/1928
m Julia Anne Todd Lacey 06/23/19
Julia Anne Todd (Atkins) Haciski 07/04/1952
m Dr. Rafael Christopher Haciski (06/23/1974) (DOB 4/21/52)
Rafael Christopher Haciski, Jr. 04/12/1976
Julianne Todd Tarasiewicz Haciski 05/16/1978
Leigh Anne ~~Leighanne~~ Atkins Haciski 10/31/1979
Stanislaw Conrad Casimir Haciski 06/05/1981
Sabina Insley Haciski 04/16/1983
Lacey Elizabeth Wailes Haciski 08/11/1985
Thomas Barlow Atkins 03/05/1954 - 11/30/1977
Raymond Melvin Atkins, Jr. 03/26/1956
m Janet Marie Chadbourne 11/21/1956
Raymond Melvin Atkins III 05/31/1985
Katharine Elizabeth Atkins 06/29/1987
Carolyn Ashton Atkins 06/06/1991
William Paul Atkins 03/17/1962
m Lesley Moira (Brand) Atkins 04/08/1967 (01/22/1994)
Elizabeth Woodcock (Atkins) Schroeder 01/23/1964
m John Schroeder (11/28/92)
Alexandrew Woodcock Schroeder 2/5/95

Elizabeth Barlow Atkins 2/5/93

updated by Hayley Haciski 7-7-95

Mary Susan (Barlow) Patterson

9/09/1883 - 01/20/1959

Married Harry Preyn Patterson

Richard Preyn

B. 04/20/1904

D. 07/23/1958

Margaret

B. 01/14/1907

D. 08/07/1975

Virginia Barlow

Patterson

B. 08/27/1908

D. 11/19/1996

Mary Janet Patterson

B 06/18/1900 D. 5/16/1912

(over)

Burns Jr.
m Carolyn Burns
Thomas Burt
m
La
m
Lind Juanita (B m Robert
m Jack Co
Jackie
Richard
Donald Gu
Jeannie
Patterson
lyn (Barlow
hn Hunter
John Hunte
Edie Byrn
ildred Cath
Bruce N. P
Andrew H
Julie Cath
3 at 7 mos.)

Howard Patterson

B. 05/02/1914 D. 05/10/1914

m Mabel (Wagner) Barlow 04/21/1889 - 03/09/1933 (06/11/1907)
Nellie (Barlow) Shrader 11/13/1908
m Blake Shrader 02/08/1907 - 05/03/1979 (07/03/1930)
Alice Louise (Barlow) McNeel 12/16/1913
m Harry Franklin Beard[1] 10/28/1933 - 10/27/1933 (07/01/1929)
m Alfred Edgar "Buzz" McNeel[2] 02/07/1907 - 02/06/1986 (07/18/1943) George Cameron Edgar McNeel 01/29/1944 - 12/17/1982
m Nickada
Anne Malory McNeel 09/29/1945
m Marvin Alderman Jr. (06/10/1973)
Jim Eric Alderman 12/26/1974
Andrew Paul Alderman 11/13/1977
Eleszabeth Edgar McNeel 03/17/1948
m John Edward Philip Syka (06/18/1987)
Rachel Winters 05/19/1989
Frank Maynard Barlow 04/30/1915
m Maude (Trainor) Barlow
Samuel Barlow
Douglas Barlow
Lucille (Barlow) Burns
m Fred Burns
Fred Burns Jr.
m Carolyn Burns
Thomas Burns
m Dreama Burns
Larry Burns
m Sheila Burns
Linda (Burns)
Juanita (Barlow) 10/07/1919
m Robert Baxter
m Jack Collins
Jackie Collins
Richard Collins
m Donald Gunter
Jeannie Gunter
m Patterson
Evelyn (Barlow) Williams 3/10/1923
m John Hunter Williams 03/08/1931 (04/20/1946)
John Hunter Williams, Jr. 12/08/1949
m Edie Byrne (05/27/1978)
Mildred Catherine (Williams) Petersen 12/09/1951
m Bruce N. Petersen 07/01/1948 (06/17/1978)
Andrew Hunter Petersen 03/16/1985
Julie Catherine Petersen 12/13/1986
m Mabel Gum[3]
Son (died at 7 mos.)
m Richard
Frank Pryne Barlow 07/14/1895
Mary Susan (Barlow) Patterson 07/09/1883 - 01/20/1959
m H.P. Patterson (10/11/1899)
Girl
Girl
Dick /1930 or 35
George Barlow
Andrew barlow
Betsy (Barlow) Baxter
m William Baxter

This information was put together by:
William Paul Atkins
3601 Connecticut Avenue, N.W.
Apt. 307
Washington, D.C. 20008
(202) 966-9399

Wednesday - April 20,

Dear Betsy & All the Family:

Since I received your nice letter written in March I have been thinking I would get it answered but as you can see - here it is the 20th of April but maybe I can get this in the mail yet before the day is over. I'm like you - I seem to stay busy all the time and find very little time for writing letters. However, I think of all of you often and it is always my intention to get started on a letter but the days get by entirely too fast. Then too - I write so many letters and notes at Christmas that I let down entirely for weeks and months. We enjoyed so much hearing from you and how all of you spent Christmas etc. Am glad you had a lovely time.

We are as usual here at the present time and getting ready for a busy spring and summer. The grass is about ready to be cut in the lawns and when that starts it is a steady job for Bud. We had one of the very unusual winters here. Hardly any snow but we did have several days with cold temperatures. One morning in January it was 17 below and quite a few other mornings we had 10 or 12 below zero. Not having snow on the ground we didn't seem to notice how cold it was. I can't understand it, for all the states around us had deep snow and even the western part of this state but Lincoln and Omaha seemed to be in a dry area all winter long. March was nice and dry all but one day and night. I believe that was about the 17th of March when we had a regular little blizzard. Blew down electric wires and kicked up the "devil while it lasted. We were fortunate right here where we live but all over the city folks were without heat, especially where they had gas furnaces - no electricity to run them.

I want to thank you for sending me the clippings with your last letter. We both have enjoyed the pictures of you and "Marty" very much and I'm glad to have them. You are getting to be quit an author and in that respect you remind me so much of my sister Lou. She always wanted to write books but never got it accomplished, so maybe you are to fulfill her most cherished desire, WHO KNOWS? You mantion in your letter that you are doing some research on the old homes, churches, schools etc. I think that will be wonderful if you can rake up enough information on these older people who were so important in making Pocahontas County what it is today.

You ask me if I might remember something of interest concerning Edwin L. Beard and his family. Well, I'm not too good at remembering a lot of things that I should be able to write you. However, I'm enclosing an old clipping from the Culpeper paper of his death notice and I'm in hopes you might be able to glean a few things from it. Just destroy it when you are through with it. I have another clipping. He was the youngest son of Josiah Beard and was born at Locust Creek, fell heir to the home place after seeing both of his parents through - then he came to Hillsboro and started the mercantile business. I don't know if anyone owned the store before him. All of Josiah Beard's family were grand people. Edwin Beard's brother Charles give the land for the Cemetary there in Hillsboro. Edwin L. Beard was an elder in the Presbyterian church in Hillsboro while he lived there. He was the same in the Culpeper church too. One little thing that stands out with me and I have always treasured in my heart was that we never had breakfast without having chapel. He always read a passage of scripture and said a prayer. The breakfast could wait but God's word came first. He thought that was the right way to start the day and I think he was right. I don't know if anyone occupied the house there in Hillsboro where we lived or not before the Beard, but I do know the Beards owned it all along. It was part of Josiah Beard's estate. I think he owned the largest part of Hillsboro at one time. He gave all his sons a big slap of land when they left her by her father Thomas Beard, November 21, 1786. The arbitrators [illegible] On August [illegible]

got married. Now, this is not much important information I'm giving you for your book but maybe I can think of something else as I go along and if I do - you will get it.

Bud is about the same as he has been for a long time. Hard for him to walk and he still shakes from the Parkinson in one arm, but he feels very good in other ways, so we feel very grateful that he is no worse than he is. He goes to his doctors at certain times and he gets a very good report each time. His eyes are doing very good, altho he has to have drops put in them four times a day. His arm (Right one) shakes toomuch for him to put the drops in, so that job falls to me. I don't mind it tho. Is a small thing to do if it keeps him from going blind, which the doctor says it will.

We are not having very nice weather today. For about four days we have had misty weather, just enough to make it dark and dreary. We need rain. Had a very nice Easter Sunday here. Bud just recently read the little book you sent us, title "I Plucked the Horsefeathers". He said to tell you he thinks it is a wonderful book and very interesting. I read it as soon as it came and I think the same thing. This man writes in such a real natural way one can't help but liking it.

I had a card from Irene while she was in Florida at Easter time. It is nice that they could all get away for this nice little vacation. I have not heard from any of the other relatives since shortly after Christmas. I presume we all write ourselves out during the Christmas holidays and then clam up for awhile. Mildred don't have much time after she gets through with the school work she does and then try to keep house besides. I never hear from Estelle but it is just as well.

We are having some trouble here in Omaha with "home-made bombs" being planted around in Grocery Stores and other places of business. There has been eleven of them up to this time and while no one has been killed - they have caused a lot of damage. It must be "pranksters" doing this but it is a very dangerous thing to do. There is quite a large reward out for them, but even so, they have not been caught. I don't think small kids could make these bombs, so it must be older youngsters or adults. If they keep it up someone is bound to be hurt or killed. I just heard on TV a few minutes ago that the Service Stations had been ordered to keep their "rest rooms" locked for safety. That seems to be one of their favorite places to plant these bombs. Can you imagine anyone having such an evil mind? I hope they are caught very soon and punished.

Well, I believe I have told you all for this time. Not such a good letter but I want you to hear from us. I hope not to be so long in writing next time. Please remember me to your Mother when you see her. I hope she keeps well this summer and enjoys herself like she always does. Love to all the family from us.

Julia Duffy

Sabina, Mary & Betsy to each $100.00 worth of property (in Greenbrier Co., W. Va. near Rycecks Valley)

Item: I bequeath to my son Josiah when he comes of age 'The Locust Plantation' & the mills thereon (This is 7 miles south of Hillsboro W. Va. in Pocahontas Co., W. Va.)

Item: I bequeath the rents from Locust plantation & mills till Josiah comes of age the moneys arising from the sale of the place on Dry Creek also my part of the Knob place to be equally divided among my daughters.

I also hereby constitute & appoint Samuel Beard & Thomas Beard Jr., Thomas Beard Sr. my brother executors of this my last will & testament.

Seal. John Beard

Signed, sealed & delivered by John Beard as his last will & testament in presence of

Robert Stevens, David Parks - Adam Stumbaugh

left her by her father Thomas Beard, November 21, 1786. The arbitrators found James Mitchel[illegible]

On August 18, 1761. James Mc[illegible] Christ[illegible]

CALVIN W. PRICE, EDITOR

John Beard's will

John Beard's will - Dated May 11, 1808 -
(Will bk #1 - P 239 - Greenbrier Co (W.) Va.) Lewisburg.

In the name of God amen. I John Beard being sick in body but of sound mind & memory, etc, my last will & testament in the following manner:

First I commit my soul to God, my Saviour & Redeemer. My body to be buried at the discretion of my executors here in after named:

My temporal estate with all my lawful debts to be first discharged.

The legacies left to my daughters, Agnes Sabina & Betsy by their Aunt Elizabeth be also discharged.

Item to my beloved wife Jarrett my negro man Jingo, two working horses, two cows, to be at her disposal during her widowhood - the third of our plantation we now live on. the wagons & farming tools for her use on the farm.

Item. I bequeath to my son Wm Renick the plantation we now live on.

Item. I bequeath to my daughter Jane.

left her by her father Thomas Beard, November 21, 1786. The arbitrators found James Mitchell

On August 18, 1761, James Mc

CALVIN W. PRICE, EDITOR

and taught from these until he could

Sabina, Mary & Betsy to each $100.00 worth of property (in Greenbrier Co., W. Va. near Renick's Valley)

Item: I bequeath to my son Josiah when he comes of age "The Locust Plantation" & the mills thereon (This is 7 miles south of Hillsboro W. Va. in Pocahontas Co., W. Va.)

Item: I bequeath the rents from Locust plantation & mills till Josiah comes of age the moneys arising from the sale of the place on Dry Creek also my part of the Knob place to be equally divided among my daughters.

I also hereby constitute & appoint Samuel Beard & Thomas Beard Jr., Thomas Beard Sr. my brother executors of this my last will & testament.

Seal. John Beard

Signed, sealed & delivered by John Beard as his last will & testament in presence of

Robert Stevens, David Parks - Adam Stumbaugh

John Beard's Will

John Beard's Will - Dated May 11, 1808 - (Will Bk #1 - P 239 - Greenbrier Co (W.) Va - Lewisburg -

In the name of God Amen - I John Beard being sick in body but of Sound mind & memory, etc. My last will & testament in the following manner:

First I commit my soul to God, my Saviour & Redeemer - My body to be buried at the discretion of my executors here in after named -

My temporal estate with all my lawful debts to be first discharged -

The legacies left to my daughters, Agnes Sabina & Betsy by their Aunt Elizabeth be also discharged.

Item to my beloved wife Janett my negro man Jingo, two working horses, two cows, to be at her disposal during her widowhood - the third of our plantation we now live on - the wagons & farming tools for her use on the farm -

Item - I bequeath to my son Wm Ryneck the plantation we now live on .

Item - I bequeath to my daughter Jane, Sabina, Mary & Betsy to each $100.00 worth of property (in Greenbrier Co., W. Va. near Ryneck's Valley)

Item - I bequeath to my son Josiah when he comes of age "The Locust Plantation" & the mills thereon (This is 7 miles south of Hillsboro, W. Va. in Pocahontas Co.,W.Va.)

Item - I bequeath the rents from Locust plantation & Mills till Josiah comes of age the moneys arising from the sale of the place on Dry Creek also my part of the Knob place to be equally divided among my daughters.

I also hereby constitute & appoint Samuel Beard & Thomas Beard Jr., Thomas Beard Sr. my brother executors of this my last will & testament.

Seal. John Beard

Signed, sealed & delivered by John Beard as his last will & testament in presence of

Robert Stevens, David Parks, Adam Stumbaugh

John Beard's Will

John Beard's Will - Dated May 11, 1808 - (Will Bk #1 - P 239 - Greenbrier Co (W.) Va - Lewisburg -

In the name of God Amen - I John Beard being sick in body but of Sound mind & memory, etc. My last will & testament in the following manner:

First I commit my soul to God, my Saviour & Redeemer - My body to be buried at the discretion of my executors here in after named -

My temporal estate with all my lawful debts to be first discharged -

The legacies left to my daughters, Agnes Sabina & Betsy by their Aunt Elizabeth be also discharged.

Item to my beloved wife Janett my negro man Jingo, two working horses, two cows, to be at her disposal during her widowhood - the third of our plantation we now live on - the wagons & farming tools for her use on the farm -

Item - I bequeath to my son Wm Ryneck the plantation we now live on .

Item - I bequeath to my daughter Jane, Sabina, Mary & Betsy to each $100.00 worth of property (in Greenbrier Co., W. Va. near Ryneck's Valley)

Item - I bequeath to my son Josiah when he comes of age "The Locust Plantation" & the mills thereon (This is 7 miles south of Hillsboro, W. Va. in Pocahontas Co.,W.Va.)

Item - I bequeath the rents from Locust plantation & Mills till Josiah comes of age the moneys arising from the sale of the place on Dry Creek also my part of the Knob place to be equally divided among my daughters.

I also hereby constitute & appoint Samuel Beard & Thomas Beard Jr., Thomas Beard Sr. my brother executors of this my last will & testament.

Seal. John Beard

Signed, sealed & delivered by John Beard as his last will & testament in presence of

Robert Stevens, David Parks, Adam Stumbaugh

John Beard's Will

John Beard's Will - Dated May 11, 1808 - (Will Bk #1 - P 239 - Greenbrier Co (W.) Va - Lewisburg -

In the name of God Amen - I John Beard being sick in body but of Sound mind & memory, etc. My last will & testament in the following manner:

First I commit my soul to God, my Saviour & Redeemer - My body to be buried at the discretion of my executors here in after named -

My temporal estate with all my lawful debts to be first discharged -

The legacies left to my daughters, Agnes Sabina & Betsy by their Aunt Elizabeth be also discharged.

Item to my beloved wife Janett my negro man Jingo, two working horses, two cows, to be at her disposal during her widowhood - the third of our plantation we now live on - the wagons & farming tools for her use on the farm -

Item - I bequeath to my son Wm Ryneck the plantation we now live on .

Item - I bequeath to my daughter Jane, Sabina, Mary & Betsy to each $100.00 worth of property (in Greenbrier Co., W. Va. near Ryneck's Valley)

Item - I bequeath to my son Josiah when he comes of age "The Locust Plantation" & the mills thereon (This is 7 miles south of Hillsboro, W. Va. in Pocahontas Co.,W.Va.)

Item - I bequeath the rents from Locust plantation & Mills till Josiah comes of age the moneys arising from the sale of the place on Dry Creek also my part of the Knob place to be equally divided among my daughters.

I also hereby constitute & appoint Samuel Beard & Thomas Beard Jr., Thomas Beard Sr. my brother executors of this my last will & testament.

Seal. John Beard

Signed, sealed & delivered by John Beard as his last will & testament in presence of

Robert Stevens, David Parks, Adam Stumbaugh

John Beard's Will

John Beard's Will - Dated May 11, 1808 - (Will Bk #1 - P 239 - Greenbrier Co (W.) Va - Lewisburg -

In the name of God Amen - I John Beard being sick in body but of Sound mind & memory, etc. My last will & testament in the following manner:

First I commit my soul to God, my Saviour & Redeemer - My body to be buried at the discretion of my executors here in after named -

My temporal estate with all my lawful debts to be first discharged -

The legacies left to my daughters, Agnes Sabina & Betsy by their Aunt Elizabeth be also discharged.

Item to my beloved wife Janett my negro man Jingo, two working horses, two cows, to be at her disposal during her widowhood - the third of our plantation we now live on - the wagons & farming tools for her use on the farm -

Item - I bequeath to my son Wm Ryneck the plantation we now live on .

Item - I bequeath to my daughter Jane, Sabina, Mary & Betsy to each $100.00 worth of property (in Greenbrier Co., W. Va. near Ryneck's Valley)

Item - I bequeath to my son Josiah when he comes of age "The Locust Plantation" & the mills thereon (This is 7 miles south of Hillsboro, W. Va. in Pocahontas Co.,W.Va.)

Item - I bequeath the rents from Locust plantation & Mills till Josiah comes of age the moneys arising from the sale of the place on Dry Creek also my part of the Knob place to be equally divided among my daughters.

I also hereby constitute & appoint Samuel Beard & Thomas Beard Jr., Thomas Beard Sr. my brother executors of this my last will & testament.

Seal. John Beard

Signed, sealed & delivered by John Beard as his last will & testament in presence of

Robert Stevens, David Parks, Adam Stumbaugh

John Beard's Will

John Beard's Will - Dated May 11, 1808 - (Will Bk #1 - P 239 - Greenbrier Co (W.) Va - Lewisburg -

In the name of God Amen - I John Beard being sick in body but of Sound mind & memory, etc. My last will & testament in the following manner:

First I commit my soul to God, my Saviour & Redeemer - My body to be buried at the discretion of my executors here in after named -

My temporal estate with all my lawful debts to be first discharged -

The legacies left to my daughters, Agnes Sabina & Betsy by their Aunt Elizabeth be also discharged.

Item to my beloved wife Janett my negro man Jingo, two working horses, two cows, to be at her disposal during her widowhood - the third of our plantation we now live on - the wagons & farming tools for her use on the farm -

Item - I bequeath to my son Wm Nyneck the plantation we now live on .

Item - I bequeath to my daughter Jane, Sabina, Mary & Betsy to each $100.00 worth of property (in Greenbrier Co., W. Va. near Nyneck's Valley)

Item - I bequeath to my son Josiah when he comes of age "The Locust Plantation" & the mills thereon (This is 7 miles south of Hillsboro, W. Va. in Pocahontas Co.,W.Va.)

Item - I bequeath the rents from Locust plantation & Mills till Josiah comes of age the moneys arising from the sale of the place on Dry Creek also my part of the Knob place to be equally divided among my daughters.

I also hereby constitute & appoint Samuel Beard & Thomas Beard Jr., Thomas Beard Sr. my brother executors of this my last will & testament.

Seal. John Beard

Signed, sealed & delivered by John Beard as his last will & testament in presence of

Robert Stevens, David Parks, Adam Stumbaugh

left her by her father Thomas Beard, November 21, 1786. The arbitrators found James Mitchel had

On August 18, 1761, James Mezz

CALVIN W. PRICE, EDITOR

THURSDAY, JUNE 4, 1931

For President
OWEN D. YOUNG
of New York

The Beard relationship of Pocahont as county all descend from Thomas Beard one of the members of the Rev. John Craig's congregation of Augusta county, Virginia. Rev. Craig was pastor of old Stone Meeting House. Back in that colonial time when the pioneers were so busy making history they had no time to record it. These old records were carefully taken down made readable by Chalkley. They are the offiicial, accepted references of the D. A. R.

Thomas Beard left a quaint old will giving his several children certain house hold furniture, etc: and his wife Jean is remembered substantially, there in. But to go back to an earlier day in the 1740 ties and 50ties In Rockbridge county there is a record that Thomas Beard administered Alexander Smiley's estate in 1749. We do not know whether he was a relative or just a trusted friend. There is another record though that to me indicates who Jean Beard was: On August 15, 1753, we find Thomas Beard administrator of another estate. This time it is James McNutt and in this document it says James McNutt paid for land bought by Thomas Beard's wife. He paid quit rents for Thomas Beard ten years in advance in 1744.

He had paid David Hays debts before his marriage.

He paid Robert Alexander's tuition for schooling James Jr. and Robert McNutt one year. In advance 1748.

He paid James Dobbin's same for Alexander McNutt 1748.

In Price's History Cousin William knew there were some daughters, and he says: "They went to Kentucky." A good many of this relationship did go to Tennessee and Kentucky. But at least two of these daughters of Thomas Beard remained in Rockbridge and I think four, viz: Esther who married Robert Alexander in Pennsylvania. Martha who married Robert Ramsey. Mary who married Dunlap. Jane or Jean who married George Weir.

Esther and her husband, Robert Alexander lived at Beverly Manor, Augusta county Virginia. Robert Alexander was a graduate of the Universitys of Dublin and Edinburgh. He was born at 'Manor Cunningham' Londonderry, Ireland in 1719, a direct descendant of Robert Bruce through nineteen generations. He came to Virginia in 1736, and married Esther Beard about 1739. They had eleven well known children.

Robert Alexander was made vestry man in 1748. This office constituted all local authority in the early colonies. It was considered a place of honor.

While coming to America a great storm arose at sea and he was obliged to throw his library overboard. This necessitated some shift to replace the classics. It is said he wrote many of these out in long hand from memory and taught from these until he could obtain others. He started a private school of higher education at what is now Lexington, Va., in 1749. It was afterwards called Liberty Hall and is now Washington and Lee University.

Robert Alexander was compelled to resign from the Vestry on March 17, 1760. He says "I have been unable to go abroad for some time on account of a lingering illness." Sampson Mathews was elected in his stead but he was made vice vestryman. Sampson Archer and John Mathews were the church wardens.

Robert Alexander and his wife Esther Beard had eleven children. William was the oldest. He testified at a court on June 13, 1806, that he was then 65 years old. He died in 1829 in Virginia. Nothing more known.

Robert Jr. first clerk of Campbell county, Virginia, which office was held by him, his son and grandson for almost 100 years. The office was in his house "Rock Castle." He married Nancy Anne daughter of Captain William Austin and left many distinguished descendants both in Virginia and other states.

Archibald was a physician in New Castle, Del, he married Mary. I saw a write up only recently in "Who is Who" in America. Rear Admiral Eustace B. Rogers of the U. S. Navy was the subject of this sdetch. He traced his ancestry through Dr. Archibald Alexander to Robert and Esther Beard Alexander. Thomas Beard Alexander moved to Galen county, Ohio, married and reared six children. Nothing further known.

Peter Alexander moved to Woodford county, Kentucky. He was living in 1822. He married and left a number of eminent descendants in that State some of whom were noted Divines. One Peter Alex Mactinny Steele, 1787.

Esther Alexander married Captain William Austin, his second wife, and thus became stepmother to her sister-in-law Nancy Anne Austin, wife of Robert Alexander of Campbell county Captain Austin held a commission from the British Crown as Captain until the Revolution. He then threw his lot with The American Patriots. They left many prominent descendants.

Sarah Alexander wasn't married until she was over twenty-one. She then married Col. John Wilson of Bath County, April 5, 1786. Her brother Peter, witnessed the ceremony. "She gave her own consent, being of age."

Eleanor Alexander married Samuel Wilson, June 27, 1790. Hugh Alexander her brother was surety.

Hugh nothing further.

Anne Alexander married Ballars or Ballow, nothing further.

James born 1766, married April 7, 1801, Margaret, daughter of James Lyle and his wife Hannah Alexander a daughter of Captain Archibald Alexander, brother of Robert Sr.

The Stephenson and Bollars of Bath and Highland counties, Va., are from the daughters of Robert and Esther Beard Alexander's family.

James and Margaret Lyle Alexander are my great grandparents thru their daughter Martha Pauline who married Charles Alexander Dunlap of the Calf Pasture near Deerfield, Va. This old Beard ancestor came down to me through a double line my grand mother Sabina Janett Beard McNeel born Feb 8, 1844 and yet living at Ponca City, Oklahoma. is a great granddaughter of Thomas and Jean Beard through their son John who married January 16, 1769. Janett, daughter of Peter and Martha Woods Wallace and in turn thru their son, Josiah Beard who lived at Locust Creek on the plantation given him by his father, in his will in 1808 and called it "Locust Plantation". Josiah Beard married Rachel Cameron, daughter of Major William and Nancy (Agnes Dunlap, grandmother Sabina McNeel says, was her real name) Warwick Gatewood widow of William Gatewood and daughter of Captain Jacob Warwick.

Esther Beard Alexander died in 1769. The Rockbridge County History says and Robert Alexander died in 1787.

Jane or Jean Beard, the two first names seem to be used interchangeably—married George Weir and we find him deceased by August 8, 1781, probably he lost his life at Guilford Oourt House or some other battle of that terrible year of the Revolution. He lived in Rockbridge and it was from that vicinity so many went and did lose their lives.

A son Thomas Weir survived and it seems others though no names are given.

It seems one James Young had bought a piece of land from the Eakins heirs, before one of them was of age. In this suit this heir is trying to recover his rights in this property from George Weir's heirs viz: Jane, the widow and Thomas her son. The Eakins Andrew and James who originally sold the property are dead; George Weir lives on the French Broad in Tenn.

In this suit William Alexander, son of Robert testifies: "I heard my Grandfather Thomas Beard say in 1759," unfortunately Chalkley does' n't tell what it was, William's grand father said.

In a suit in Dec. 1806, William Beard testifies he had married Mary or Polly Steele, daughter of Samuel Steele. The Steeles were then living in West Tennessee and in Kentucky. I suspect Peter Alexander was a brother-in-law to William Beard—as Peter had married Jenny Steele back in 1787. The Steele family were all in Kentucky and Tennessee. William Beard deposes in a suit in June 1806 that he was 74 or 75 years old.

James Houston was a neighbor of the Weirs as he appears often in legal affairs of theirs and he appears with Cornelius Alexander as guardian for George Weir's orphans vs James Mitchel executor of Thomas Beard's will in 1769. This suit was brought to determine if Jean Beard Weir and her children had received the legacy left her by her father Thomas Beard, November 21, 1786. The arbitrators found James Mitchel had not fulfilled his duty in settling the estate and that Mitchel must pay 22 pounds on or before Jean's eldest child came of age.

BEARD

In Augusta county record one Jean Weir became the wife of Cornelius Alexander on March 17, 1785. What more logical in 1786 for Cornelius to be demanding an accouting of James Mitchel.

Martha Beard, or was it. One reference says it ways Elizabeth married James Mitchel before 1769. For Thomas and Martha Mitchel are given a part of Thomas Beard's estate and again he refers to Thomas Mitchel's mother. At the time Thomas Beard died it looks as if his daughter Jean was single. James Mitchel was the administrator of the estate. From this we take it James must have been quite a business man Men of this type nearly always know how to look out for their own interests. Here is Jean married and a mother, then a widow and her part of the estate still at Mitchels hands.

In less than a year after this marriage of Jean to Cornelius Alexander, we find him inquiring through the courts about the estate, and a settlement being agreed upon. James Houston was guardian for Jean and her children. Thomas Beard Sr. had a neighbor adjoining him in Rockbridge named John Houston in 1742. Probably the Houstons and Beards were close friends of old times. The Alexander children inter married with the Houstons and Paxtons from which family Sam Houston sprang.

Hugh Beard, son of Thomas married Sarah . He died in 1807 and Sarah died in 1801; their children were: Robert who married and had Nancy and Sally by 1806. Ann. Jane Alexander, Sarah. Sarah married Andrew Kenedy 1797; Esther, who married Mr. Hoffman and Thomas Beard, who was mentioned in his grandfather's will, 1769, married Sarah Jameson in 1785.

In the old deeds we find some of Thomas Beard's neighbors and his holdings in Rockbridge county, Va.

Back in 1750 Samuel Dunlap sold to David Dunlap 170 acres of land for 23 pounds, and to Thomas Beard 399 1-2 for 140 pounds. This was one tract.

In 1753 Thomas Beard is buying land again. This time it is 605 acres 33 p 5s on Moffetts Creek near John Bowman. In 1760 the same tract is sold by Thomas to William Beard for 500 pounds (Note that 1753 is the year James McNutt died).

William Pollock's farm adjoined Thomas Beard's in 1765 and John Montgomery's and Thomas Hill's cornered with him. We find Thomas Beard present for Pat Hays at a meeting of the vestry. Pat Hays' farm cornered Robert Alexander's. Hays was probably a son of the David Hays mentioned in 1753 in James McNutts will.

On August 18, 1761. James McClure's will proved two of the witnesses had died, William Beard and William McClure. This must have been a relative of Thomas Beard. This McClure family inter married with the Alexanders. Old Captain Archibald Alexander's second wife was Jane McClure, 1757.

Thomas Beard was exempted tax levy in 1764. "Very aged".

In the will 1769, Thomas Beard speaks of his daughter, wife of Robert Ramsey as if she had died. One Robert Ramsey was killed by the Shawnees in 1759. His will was probated November 21. 1759, Robert Hall, administrator. Later on there is a note Isabelle Hall, wife of Robert, qualifies as administratrix of her late husband Robert Ramsey. This name Isabella doesn't sound familiar

On May 15. 1769. Thomas Beard's will was probated, a lengthy preamble as was customary then the bequests.

He gave to his beloved wife Jean, all the cleared land where the house stood to the cleared land for turnips, where they last grew.

Then a daughter Fane and a daughter Jane were mentioned.

Again his mind goes back to the faithful old wife he wants her to have his elbow chair and a certain negro boy.

He left cleared land to his son Hugh, and Hugh's son Thomas was left 170 acres lying next to John Montgomery and Thomas Hill. Then he left 10 pounds each to the grandsons named Thomas—Thomas Alexander and Thomas Dunlap. To Robert Ramsey's children, testator's grandchildren, 12 pounds and 12 shillings each. A legacy to son William and to daughter Esther Alexander and Martha Mitchell; frequent provision for such issue in case daughter Jane have no issue.

Executors James Mitchell and Thomas Hill. Witnesses, John, Andrew and James Eakin. Proved October 18, 1769. Executors qualify with William Alexander, William Kenedy and Hugh Beard. The appraisers were John Montgomery, William Moore, Thomas Wilson.

The settlement showed the payment of Wm. Berkley, Jas. Eakin, Wm. Perrins, Thomas Alexander, Thomas Beard, Esther Alexander, Thomas Mitchel and his mother, Thomas Dunlap and his mother, Robert Ramsey's children, Martha Mitchel.

Thomas and Jean Beard deeded to their son "John 183 acres of land on Cathey's Creek, some times called Jennings Branch," on May 20, 1765. It cornered with David McNairs. This was delivered to John Beard in January, 1769. I just wonder if May 20, 1765, could have been John Beard's twenty-first birthday, as he didn't accept this gift until his marriage, January 10, 1769.

In 1762-3, John Beard and William McClanahan were partners, making a crop on Locust Creek, "on the Spring Lick or Spring Creek plantation." This might have been in Greenbrier at the old Beard homestead.

The Preston and Virginia Papers, compiled by the University of Wisconsin say that John Beard was a captain under Col. Christian at Point Pleasant. Greenbrier was then embraced in Botetourte County. From the same source, I learn that Samuel Beard furnished beeves for the Cherokee expedition in 1776.

John Beard married Janett Wallace daughter of Peter Wallace, Jr., and Martha Woods Wallace. She was a neice of the distinguished statesman James Woods of Virginia. In hunting out the Wallace kin, I came on the name of George Seldon Wallace as author of "Peter Wallace's Genealogy." I coveted the book. If it was about my own family, but the catalog did not say what place these Wallaces were from. By a strange coincidence, I came upon the name of the author in The Times as a friend of that friendly, beloved man. Andrew Price. I wrote Major Wallace at Huntington and asked him if he had written this book, and if he had, did he know that Andrew Price was a descendant of one Jan Wallace? He wrote, thanking me for the information. He sent a book to Cousin Andrew. Shortly afterwards those fine articles on the Wallace kith and kin appeared in the Times. And then only a few short months and our beloved cousin was with us no more. He has left something of himself in those printed pages and in memory we treasure.

The will book of Rockbridge County record something of these old Wallaces. Andrew Wallace's will was filed July 3, 1781; he was the ancestor of General Lew Wallace. He left bequests to his sisters Janett and Susannah; his grandson Andrew; mother Martha; brother Adam and brother-in-law, John Gilmer.

Dr. Archibald Alexander, President of Princeton Theological Seminary, recounts in a diary he kept in early life some interesting happenings of his childhood. He was born on the South Branch in Rockbridge in 1772. His father was William Alexander, eldest son of Captain Archibald Alexander, brother of Robert, of Timber Ridge. He tells of the school room of Revolutionary days. He says his father had erected a cabin down near the creek about a half mile from the house, and the sound of the students studying out loud could be easily heard to the house. This was the custom of that day. If a student was caught in silence he was threashed with a hickory switch well laid on. This method encouraged each student to shout his lesson out loud while studying so that the teacher could see his diligence.

When Dr Alexander was three, hi

father went to Baltimore and bought the time of three indentured servants. One of these was an educated Irishman named Reardon, whom the Alexanders trusted and liked. He carried little Archibald, aged three, on his back to the school. The boy wore his hair in a queue down his back. As his hair was extremely fine and thin, the other children teased him. For this Reardon used his whip vigorously, but he never touched little Archibald.

"Most of the English servants who had or had not served their time were released to fight in the Revolutionary war. My father's servants, James Malone, an Irish papist, Joe Lyon, a thievish Jew, and John Reardon, born in Ireland, and brought up and educated in London. Malone and the Jew went first. Malone was killed in battle in Carolina. Lyon, a very bad man, deserted to the British Soon after Captain Adam Wallace's company reached the scene of warfare Col. Beaufort was attacked by Tarleton's corps. The Colonel, seeing his men in confusion, fled at the beginning of the battle, and almost the whole of his command was cut to pieces by the British dragoons.

"The brave Wallace disdained to fly and, being entirely surrounded by the British horse, sold his life dearly, having first killed some three or four men with his spontoon.

"Reardon, our servant, was in Captain Wallace's company, and being a small man, he was soon cut down—severely wounded but still conscious. After the battle he lay helpless and bleeding among the dead. When night came, the moon shone and Reardon saw a man passing near him, like some arch fiend, dispatching with his bayonet all who showed signs of life. Presently the fiend came toward Reardon, raised his musket, pointed the bayonet [illegible] kill. Then Rear-

Died at his home in Hillsboro, Pocahontas Co. W. Va., on the 14th day of Feb. 1889, Joseph Beard, in the 79th year of his age. Born in Greenbrier Co., W. Va., on 20th day of September 1810 + removed to Pocahontas in 1857. Married Mattie Jordan, daughter of John Jordan. Three children: one son, John J. Beard, and two daughters, Mrs. Isaac McNeil, and Mrs. Wm L. McNeel, now deceased.

Lieut. John Jordan Beard.

It becomes our mournful duty to record the death of a widely-known and much esteemed citizen, John Jordan Beard, Huntersville, West Virginia. This event occurred rather unexpectedly, Monday, 11½ a. m., April 11th, 1898.

Lieut. Beard was the only son of the late Joseph Beard [illegible] and Mrs Mattie Beard, near Hillsboro. He was born in Greenbrier County, April 21st, 1835, and was married to Minerva, daughter of James Edmiston, Esq., September 1866. At the time of his death he was within ten days of being 63 years of age. By this event his attached family is bereaved of a kind tender husband and a very affectionate and indulgent father. The community at large honors his memory as that of a good man whose influence has been for intelligence and good morals.

In the war between the States he served in the Bath Squadron, and made a record as a gallant and distinguished soldier. Late in the war he received a frightful wound that came near ending his life at the time. He survived to the surprise of every person familiar with its nature. For more than thirty years this wound has been a great [illegible] affliction, and it is believed hastened the termination of his useful life. He has been a resident of Huntersville about 21 years. During this time he served the county two terms as clerk of both courts.

Early in life he professed piety, and maintained a consistent character as such in the pale of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was loyal and faithful to his communion and greatly attached to her doctrines and usages.

He is survived by his wife and two sons, Harry and Fred. Beard.

Being as Lieut. Beard was, a person of ardent social and domestic impulses, as a matter of course [illegible] ful for him to think of the sundering of sweet home ties, yet in his sincere way he assured his loved ones that they should not grieve too much about him, for all was and would be well with him.

A month or so since we had a pleasant interchange of views concerning the 23d Psalm. In this Psalm it appears that nothing but the shadow would touch those following the Lord our Shepherd when it comes to passing through the Valley. Having been a soldier and familiar with scenes in the presence of the my, that at such a time down at a prepared fe one of the last thin battle would be lif

BEARD

Alexander Campbell's Thoughts On Slavery and Abolition

by Earl Eugene Eminhizer

Probably one of the most overlooked, but important and influential persons in the ante-bellum West, was Alexander Campbell. Although this neglect by the general historian is understandable, his being overlooked by the church historians is not. Campbell was not only one of the founders of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), but one of the earliest religious leaders in America to be concerned with church union. In addition, he was also a successful publisher, educator and farmer; and he was reported to be one of the wealthiest men in Western Virginia. This paper seeks to examine his views on one of the most pressing social and political problems of his times—slavery.

Campbell's views on slavery are easily misunderstood unless one keeps in mind the distinction that his father, Thomas Campbell, had made between matters of religious faith and private judgment in The Declaration and Address, a document he wrote for the Christian Church Association of Washington, Pennsylvania, in 1809. These views were accepted by Alexander and became the premise upon which he built his own interpretation. In The Declaration and Address, Thomas Campbell held that those things which were not specifically commanded in the Bible could not be made matters of faith.[1] They were matters for private judgment. Those which were commanded in the Bible were matters of faith and must be followed. The Campbells were of the opinion that division in the church was caused by failure to follow the Bible alone in matters of religion.

Accepting this premise as a basis for determining what could be considered matters of religion and what could not, Alexander Campbell rejected the slavery controversy as being a subject which was religious in character. Failure to understand his position on what was religious and what was political (or a matter of private judgment) led many of his contemporaries to criticize unjustly his views on the matter.

It has been suggested that Alexander Campbell's views on slavery can be divided into two periods: that before 1830, and that

---

[1] Propositions 5 through 7 of The Declaration and Address. (See H. Shelton Smith et al., American Christianity [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1960] Vol. 1, 579-86.)

following 1830.[2] It has also been suggested that he changed his position in order to save the Disciple movement from division during the second period. Upon closer examination of Campbell's position, one finds that he did not change his views, but rather the emphasis that he placed on them.[3]

That Campbell opposed slavery cannot be denied, but he was not an abolitionist of the radical type. He opposed both slavery and abolition. Campbell's personal action in freeing slaves inherited from his father-in-law, and purchased from a Methodist minister, indicates his feelings on the matter.[4] He did not oppose slavery for religious reason, but rather on political, social and economic grounds.

One of Campbell's earliest expressions of his feelings toward slavery appeared in the Christian Baptist in August, 1823, where he said:

> If any thing is wanting to finish a picture of the most glaring inconsistencies, add to this those Christians who are daily extolling the blessing of civil and religious liberty, and, at the same time, by a system of the most cruel oppression, separating the wife from the embraces of her husband, and the mother from her tender offspring; violating every principle, and rendering every tie that endears life and reconciles man to his lot, and that, forsooth, because "might gives right," and a man is held guilty because his skin is a shade darker than the standard color of the times.[5]

Because he thought he saw an opportunity for the political elimination of slavery, Campbell entered the race for representative of his district to the Virginia Constitutional Convention in 1829. He was not alone in his views at the convention, but some were concerned that a move in the convention might make slavery a part of the constitution should the slaveholders win. For this reason, his views did not prevail and it was decided to keep slavery out of the constitution, thereby leaving it open to ordinary legislative action.[6]

Campbell recognized that any action which would end slavery would require political action. He was willing to support political action whenever he thought it would do some good. The Kentucky Constitutional Convention of 1850 presented such an opportunity.

---

[2] Alfred Thomas De Groot, The Grounds of Division Among the Disciples, (Chicago: privately printed), 75.

[3] See Robert Frederick West, Alexander Campbell and Natural Religion, (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1948), 103; Harold L. Lunger, The Political Ethics of Alexander Campbell, (St. Louis: Bethany Press, 1954), 64; Winfred Ernest Garrison, Religion Follows the Frontier: A History of the Disciples of Christ, (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1931), 174-86.

[4] D. Ray Lindley, Apostle of Freedom, (St. Louis: Bethany Press, 1957), 100-102.

[5] Alexander Campbell, "The Christian Religion," Christian Baptist, (August, 1823), 18.

[6] Alexander Campbell, "The Crisis," The Millennial Harbinger [hereafter referred to as MH] (February, 1832), 86; Robert Richardson, The Memoirs of Alexander Campbell, (Nashville: Gospel Advocate, 1956), II, 505.

Anticipating this, Campbell published in the Millennial Harbinger "A Tract for the People of Kentucky."[7]

In the "Tract" he presented arguments for positive action on the part of Christians in Kentucky to rid themselves of slavery at this time. Campbell's arguments favoring action by Christians in Kentucky were economic and moral, rather than Biblical.

Although Campbell had always opposed the mixing of religion and politics, we now find him telling the Kentucky Christians to "vote like Christians at the polls and demonstrate [their] love of liberty and right"[8] by eliminating slavery from the state. He hoped that such a move would influence similar action in other states.[9]

Campbell found himself opposed to many of the political actions taken concerning slaves. Many states were passing laws forbidding the education of slaves, and Campbell's opposition to this was based on the belief that knowledge and slavery were incompatible.[10] Thus, he reasoned that education of Negroes was proper, that it would prepare them for freedom, and that it would lead toward ending slavery.

Campbell noted that the relation of master and servant was a relationship going back to the beginning of time. He thought that "even in the Millennium . . . there will be master and servants."[11] But such a relationship did not mean that all servants were slaves, or that all masters were free. He even thought that masters ought to be emancipated from their slaves. They were themselves slaves to fear, since most were more afraid of their slaves than their slaves were of them. That such was the case was made plain to him in a bill presented to the Virginia legislature to prevent the education of Negroes. Such a law, he thought, was "the most effectual destruction of the liberty of the press which [he could] imagine."[12]

Although some readers (in the early days of the Millennial Harbinger) cautioned Campbell against saying anything about slavery, feeling that the less said the better,[13] Campbell was not, at that time, to be silent on the matter. The Nat Turner insurrection, which occurred about this time, caused Campbell to hope that it would inspire the state of Virginia to do something about slavery.

---

[7] "A Tract for the People of Kentucky," MH, (May, 1848).
[8] Ibid., 250.
[9] Ibid.
[10] Roy Lindley, Apostle of Freedom, (St. Louis: Bethany Press, 1957), 102.
[11] Alexander Campbell, "Emancipation of White Slaves," MH, (March, 1830), 128-29.
[12] Ibid., 129.
[13] "[ ]" to Alexander Campbell, Essex, Virginia, April 6, 1830, in the MH, (April, 1830), 168-90.

In commenting on this event, he pointed out that slavery was the most expensive labor system as well as the most wasteful of the real estate. The continued use of this system would, in his opinion, make Virginia a wilderness. He hoped that Virginia would, at this time, use her power to extricate herself from it, but he thought, this might be like saying that a drunkard has the power to become sober.[14]

In attempting to stimulate action in the early 1830's, Campbell described slavery,

> . . . That largest and blackest blot upon our national escutcheon, that many-headed monster, that Pandora's box, that bitter root, . . . is now evoking the attention of the ancient and venerable commonwealth in a manner as unexpected as it is irresistible and cheering to every philanthropist. . . . We have thought that if the abolition of slavery was legitimately to be laid before the people of this commonwealth as it now is, there would be found even among slaveholders a majority to concur in a national system of emancipation.[15]

After Nat Turner's revolt in Virginia, Campbell presented a plan for the emancipation of slaves, and the resolution of the race problem. The nation was no longer in debt after 1832, leaving the government about ten million dollars which was no longer needed for payment on the debt. The use of this money had been discussed in Congress where Henry Clay had proposed that it be given to the states. Campbell opposed this use of the surplus but proposed instead that the money be used for the colonization of colored people, free and slave, in Africa. His suggested program would start in 1834, and continue until all the colored population had been removed.[16] The free Negroes could be colonized at once; those that masters would emancipate could follow; and finally he proposed that female slaves of a given age would be bought from masters unwilling to emancipate. Such a program would, he believed, eliminate slavery in about twenty years.[17] Most Disciple leaders, including those who opposed slavery, favored the colonization idea and supported the American Colonization Society, as did Campbell. Such a plan offered a solution to the race problem—a problem which was ignored by the abolitionists.

Campbell modified his proposal to eliminate slavery by suggesting that in addition to the surplus monies in the treasury that could be used, the Navy's ships, which were rotting in the harbors, could transport freed slaves to Liberia. He suggested that people petition Congress to that end.[18]

---

[14] Alexander Campbell, "Slavery in Virginia," MH, (January, 1832), 15.
[15] Richardson, op. cit., 567-68.
[16] Campbell, "The Crisis," 87.
[17] Ibid., 88.
[18] Alexander Campbell, "Slavery and Anti-Slavery," MH, (December, 1835), 588.

Between the time that Campbell presented his plan and the publication of his next statement on slavery in 1835, changes took place in the attitude of the abolitionists. With the advent of the radical abolitionism in the 1830's, the methods of abolition changed as did the attitudes people held toward it. Campbell saw a great danger in the new approach, especially as it took on the overtones of a religious revival. The division which occurred among the Baptists and the Methodists in the 1840's seemed to demonstrate the wisdom of his view that the matter was not a religious one and could only lead to division if admitted into the church. To prevent division within the Disciple brotherhood, he changed his emphasis.

In 1834 Theodore D. Weld and the Lane Rebels[19] were touring Ohio in behalf of abolition.[20] Campbell was at the same time on a tour of the South where he met with the reaction to the new program of abolitionism. Continuing to oppose slavery, he also began to oppose the radical abolitionists as well. This created difficulties since most were unwilling to allow any alternative besides proslavery or immediate abolition.

Since slavery was recognized by national law, the slaveholder was, in Campbell's mind, entitled to have his property protected. Just compensation would be necessary if the slaves were removed by a change in the law. He pointed out that the argument that slaves had not originally been slaves but had been forced or sold into slavery did not alter the circumstances at that time. He noted that neither the right of the South to slaves, nor the right of the North to the land it held was "at first obtained in the temple of Justice."[21] Campbell was opposed to any group which interfered with the basic right to property.[22]

As the abolitionist movement progressed in the 1830's, Campbell received more and more communications about slavery. Because of the emotions involved in the discussion of the issue, he did not think that a cool and dispassionate debate of it could be entered into during the latter part of the 1830's and early 1840's.[23] Also, Campbell's Millennial Harbinger was primarily a religious publication and political issues should be excluded.

Campbell had little to say in public print on the matter of slavery between 1835 and 1845. It was at this point that the Baptist

---

[19] The Lane Rebels were the radical abolitionist students who left Lane Seminary because of the slavery question and moved to the newly founded Oberlin Seminary.
[20] Campbell, op. cit., 367.
[21] Ibid., 368.
[22] Ibid.
[23] Ibid., 367.

and the Methodist churches split over the issue. Beginning a new series of articles entitled "Our Position to American Slavery," he made clear his belief that the beliefs of the Disciples were such that they were the only religious body whose principles (if adhered to) could save them from division. Campbell probably intended that the series should be the "official" position of the brotherhood. The reason he gave for the articles was to "do homage to his Majesty FREE DISCUSSION."[24]

By 1845, the Abolitionist Crusade had established its argument against slavery. Campbell saw two groups developing: the "Liberty Men" or abolitionists, and the "Non-Liberty Men."[25] He also saw that the main issues of the debate were the moral and political evils of the system. It was to the moral evils that he was going to turn his attention, since this was the area which affected Christians.[26]

In Campbell's opinion, Christians were limited in their discussion of slavery to what the Bible had to say about the issue. The discussion between Francis Wayland and Richard Fuller, both Baptists, had been based on the Bible.[27] As Christians, the Disciples could use no other authority. The abolitionists' position was that slavery was "not authorized by God," and was, for this reason, immoral. On the other hand, the proslavery group held that it was given divine authority and thus not immoral. Campbell did not deny that the abuse of the system and the unjust laws which controlled slavery were immoral, but he did not believe that this altered the basic issue of whether or not God approved or disapproved of slavery since the central question at this point for Campbell was "What does the Bible teach on this subject?"[28] Campbell was of the opinion that this was the only area of the discussion that Disciples could enter as Disciples.

Campbell's position on the Bible and slavery was developed in this series. It was stated in such a way that one could easily get the impression that he was proslavery. Campbell had the ability to keep separate various phases of a discussion. However, many who attacked him did so without keeping these divisions separate from each other. Campbell was, at this time, limiting the discussion to what the Bible had to say on the matter. His method of Biblical interpretation did not allow him to read into the text that which was not

---

[24] Alexander Campbell, "Our Position to American Slavery," MH, (February, 1845), 49.
[25] Ibid., 51.
[26] Ibid.
[27] Ibid.
[28] Ibid.

there. Following this policy to the letter, Campbell's interpretation of the Bible on slavery was clear.

> [In the] Church at the beginning, there were masters and slaves — sometimes Christian masters possessing Christian slaves — sometimes believing slaves owned by unbelieving masters out of his church. . . . We, therefore, take the position—that, AS CHRISTIANS WE CAN LAWFULLY, UNDER CHRIST, GO NO FURTHER THAN TO EXACT FROM CHRISTIAN MASTERS AND CHRISTIAN SERVANTS ALL THAT IS COMPREHENDED IN THOSE PRECEPTS. We have no authority, as Christians, to go farther. We have no warrant to annihilate the relation; but we warrant, and are under obligation to enforce the precepts, and to see that the relative duties of both parties are faithfully performed.[29]

Slavery fell into that area which Campbell considered opinion, and was not in that class of things which were dogma. For example, the Bible commanded baptism, thus, Christians had to be baptized; but since the Bible did not command missionary societies, Christians did not have to participate in them. Such activities could not be grounded in the Bible and were human institutions. Although everyone had to be baptized to be a member of the church, one did not have to support the mission cause to be a member. So Campbell reasoned the same was true of slavery-abolition. Being a slaveholder did not in itself violate the laws of God, and a Christian could hold slaves and still be a member of the church. This could also be said of the abolitionist. But Campbell did not think that either of these two points of view could be forced on the members of the church, nor could those holding to either of these views be excluded from membership. The church could take action against a slave or slaveholder, only if either failed to meet the obligations of the relationship between them as set down in the Bible.

Whatever side a Christian took in the issue was a personal matter. But Campbell was of the opinion that Christians were required to obey the laws of the state (Render unto Caesar. . .). For this reason, he felt that even though a law might be wrong or a person might not agree with it, a Christian was obligated to obey it. Thus, since slavery was the law of the land, right or wrong, Christians could not interfere with the enforcement of the law. Christians could take political action to change the law, but no more. Since many of the abolitionists were openly advocating the violation of the law, Campbell came into conflict with them.[30]

Campbell also addressed himself to the question, was slavery a sin? This issue had been raised in 1841 by a group of Disciples

---

[29] Ibid., (March, 1845), 108.
[30] Ibid., 109.

on the Western Reserve in Ohio, when they published a document called An Address to the Disciples on the Sin of Slavery by the Churches in Trumbull County, Ohio, and Vicinity.[31] This Address held that slavery was a sin. "The great cardinal question is," it said, "—Is it right for man to hold property in man?"[32] The argument of the address rested on interpretation of what God intended for man. Such interpretation was a personal matter, but Campbell was fearful that this would be made a test of faith or dogma.[33]

Since the relationship between master and slave was regulated in the Bible, Campbell did not think that it could be considered as immoral. The relationship was, in itself, not a sin.[34] Since there were regulations for every detail of this relationship, masters who failed to follow would be punished by God. It was the obligation of the church to see that the regulations were enforced between Christian masters and their slaves. The same was also true of slaves who were Christians. Both masters and slaves were to be removed from the church if they failed to follow the regulations.[35]

Campbell found the regulations of slavery in I Timothy 6:1-4.[36]

> Let all who are under the yoke of slavery regard their masters as worthy of all honor, so that the name of God and the teachings may not be defamed. Those who have believing masters must not be disrespectful on the grounds that they are brethren; rather they must serve all the better since those who benefit by their service are believers and beloved. Teach and urge these duties.

Although Campbell opposed abolitionism as such, at the same time he thought that the church should take whatever action was necessary to protect Christian slaves from non-Christian masters who failed to follow the commands of God. It could also endeavor to have statutes modified or annulled if they were too rigorous. He even suggested that Christians should attempt to get fair trial for slaves and laws to prevent their sale for debt, which could result in the separation of families.[37]

Since the Abolitionist Disciples considered slavery a sin, problems connected with this point of view were bound to come. Campbell had always allowed for individual interpretation of the Bible and did not have a creed to give direction to that interpretation. The Abolitionist Disciples such as Jonas Hartzel, John Boggs, and

---

[31] The Address was published in Cincinnati by W. L. Mendenhall, 1841.
[32] An Address to the Disciples on the Sin of Slavery, 3.
[33] Campbell, "Our Position to American Slavery," (April, 1845), 145-46.
[34] Ibid., (May, 1845), 185.
[35] Ibid.
[36] Ibid., 220.
[37] Ibid., 185.

Nathaniel Field,[38] interpreted the Bible in such a way that made slavery a sin. They thought Christians must give up their slaves to get rid of the sin. Campbell refused to recognize that their views might be right. He attempted to show that interference with slavery, the requiring of emancipation by a Christian master, and the making of antislavery or emancipation a test of fellowship, was to oppose the law of Christ and require more than the New Testament called for.[39]

Biblical regulation of slavery was an area where Christians as such were more directly involved. Although he did not reverse his stand that the Bible did not oppose, but rather sanctioned slavery, he did use the Bible to indicate that slavery was not to be retained except under the safeguards of the Scriptures. He pointed out that Paul had said that slaves should be free when the opportunity presented itself (I Corinthians 7:21). This did not mean they could walk away at their pleasure, but could be free only by a mutual understanding between the slave and the master. Masters were required to educate the slaves if they were to give the slaves that which was "just and equal"[40] (Colossians 4:1). However, there were civil laws which prevented this.

Interestingly, Campbell's argument did not emphasize the requirements of the Bible between the master and the slave which were not being followed. He emphasized, however, the damage being done to the master's family. The children of slaveholders were exposed to the influence of the slaves, who were morally inferior. Since children imitate those who influence them or with whom they come in contact, they were being influenced along lines which were morally wrong. Campbell noted that the hired servants could also suffer from moral defects, but they, unlike the slaves, could be discharged. He was of the opinion that the children imitated the actions of the Negroes more than that of the hired whites.[41]

Campbell summarized his position as follows: (1) "That the relation of master and slave is not, in itself, sinful or immoral." (2) That as practiced in some parts of the world, it was inexpedient, since it was out of harmony with the advance and moral view of society, nor did it contribute to the economic well-being of the country. It also placed on Christian masters difficult burdens. (3) [38] James Blanton was a minister in the Western Reserve of Ohio, who was a leader in the organization of Disciples Abolitionists to support Pardee Butler. John Boggs was another leader of the Disciples Abolitionists who edited the Disciple Abolitionist papers. Nathaniel Field, M.D., was an early vocal Disciple Abolitionist in Indiana.

---

[39] Campbell, op. cit., 135, 256.

[40] Campbell, "A Word for the People of Kentucky," MH, op. cit., 248.

[41] Ibid., 256.

That, in accordance with the New Testament, the churches could not make slavery a test of fellowship.[42]

Campbell also had a basic distrust of the abolitionists. He felt that they desired to divide and dismember the churches.[43] Because of this, he indicated in 1845 that he was not going to allow further discussion of the issue in the Millennial Harbinger. Campbell also was convinced that his position was that taken by the Bible and that thus, there was no need for further discussion along the Biblical line.[44]

Campbell's attempt to suppress the issue did not last long. A. B. Green, a Disciple abolitionist of Wadsworth, Ohio, offered criticism of Campbell's position to which Campbell felt a response necessary. Green pointed out differences between American slavery and that of Biblical times. He noted that Biblical slavery did not make a distinction as to color or race. American slavery did. He also thought that it was wrong to steal a man and sell him, and he noted that American slaves had originally been stolen.[45]

Campbell responded with a discussion of the origins of slavery which he believed could be found in war, the loser being enslaved by the victor. He rejected the idea that American slaves had been stolen and maintained that they have been born into slavery. Campbell did not, at that time,[46] think that what had happened to their ancestors altered the case.

By this time, the editor of the Liberty Herald, an abolitionist paper published at Warren, Ohio, on the Western Reserve, had accused Campbell of being two-faced. One face said what the South wished to hear, that slavery was not a sin; and the other what the North wished to hear, that slavery was out of step with the modern age.[47]

By 1845, it was clear that Campbell was not emphasizing those things he had emphasized in 1830, a fact pointed out to him by S. York of Illinois in 1846. York reminded Campbell that in 1832 he had considered slavery the blackest blot on the nation and a blighting curse, but in 1845, it was sanctioned by the Bible. The "Blighting Curse" was now something which was "right."[48] The discussion

---

[42] Campbell, "Our Position to American Slavery," MH, (June, 1845), 262-63.
[43] See Gilbert Hobbs Barnes, The Anti-Slavery Impulse, 1830-1844, (New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1964), 92-93, for Garrison's attack on the churches.
[44] Alexander Campbell, "American Slavery," MH, (August, 1845), 355-58.
[45] A. B. Green to Alexander Campbell, Wadsworth, Ohio, July, 1845, in MH (September, 1845), 414-19.
[46] Ibid., 419.
[47] Liberty Herald, (August 13, 1845).
[48] S. York to Alexander Campbell, Eagar County, Illinois, July 14, 1846, in MH, (October, 1846), 593.

of Campbell's views in the Liberty Herald indicated that he had an audience beyond the Disciple Press. His change of emphasis was known in Europe before his trip to the British Isles in 1847.

During a trip to Scotland and England in 1847, Campbell was attacked by a group of abolitionists. However, it appears that slavery was not the only issue in the controversy. Involved also was the fact that two prominent members of a Congregational Church at Leith had joined Campbell's followers, resulting in jealousy among the clergy. This resulted in a conscious attempt on the part of those opposed to the Disciples to discredit Campbell before the people.[49] Campbell, being from a slave state, made possible an attack on the issue of slavery. Caught off guard by James Robertson, S. M. Kennedy, and a Mr. Hunter of the Scotch Anti-Slavery Society, Campbell spoke freely about his feelings on the issue as well as on his reasons for opposing abolitionism. He felt that foreign interference in American slavery would only make the matter worse. Campbell did not, it appears, defend slavery as such, but his remarks were made to indicate that he had defended the institution.[50] Placards soon appeared opposing Campbell saying:

> Citizens of Edinburgh—Beware! The Rev. Alexander Campbell of Virginia, United States of America, has been a slaveholder himself and is still a defender of man-stealers![51]

Although he did not want to be involved in the slavery controversy, Campbell was now forced to make a public statement on his position.[52]

Early in Campbell's tour of Britain, James Robertson had challenged him to debate the issue of slavery and Campbell had agreed to do so in writing. Robertson declined this form of debate.[53] On finding the placards at his next appointment, Campbell sent a letter to the Edinburgh Journal saying that he would debate anyone on the subject of slavery, except "the Reverend James Robertson who was publicly censored and excluded from the Baptist Church for violating the fifth commandment in reference to his mother. . . ."[54] This placed the controversy on a level of personal vindictive. Campbell was now arrested and sued for slander. In order to dramatize the issue, Campbell refused to post bond and was kept in jail. This [49] Richardson, op. cit., 552.

---

[50] Ibid., 552-53.
[51] Ibid., 553; Anti-Slavery Bugle, (October 8, 1847).
[52] Richardson, op. cit., 552.
[53] Ibid., 554.
[54] Ibid., 555.

afforded him publicity at home as well as in Scotland. The trial went in his favor.[55]

Campbell seems to have had the same problem in Scotland, as he had in America, of getting people to make a distinction between what they could do based on the Bible and what they could do as citizens. In a public discussion of the matter, Campbell pointed out to the people of Scotland that abolition could be carried out only on a state-by-state basis. This his audience did not seem to understand.[56] The Anti-Slavery Bugle summed up Campbell's position very well when it said,

> So far as we understand Mr. Campbell's argument, it is that slavery is an evil, moral, political and social; and he would be very glad that slavery could be abolished, but believes also that the justice of slavery is established by the Bible. . . .[57]

The economic argument was one that Campbell felt most important. He noted that economists judge institutions in terms of their effect on wealth and development of a state. He thought the best economists were at that time opposed to slavery because of its adverse effect on these two areas.[58] As evidence for slavery's effect, Campbell referred to the last three United States censuses. Those states not having slavery were growing economically. He compared the value of the harvest of Kentucky with that of Ohio in 1848, and found that Ohio had a harvest worth $49,455,000 while Kentucky had a harvest worth only $23,174,000. The harvest in Ohio was worth $26,281,000 more. In addition, Campbell noted that Kentucky was larger and had better soil. Also Kentucky had been developed before Ohio and had five times the population of Ohio when Ohio was admitted to the Union. The obvious question was—Why was Kentucky behind? The answer—slave labor![59]

Campbell further expressed himself on the issue in answering a response to the "Tract."[60] He said that it was necessary that men come to see that "slavery in Kentucky or America is . . . contrary to the general moral sense, the moral taste, and the spirit of the present civilized world."[61] He also stated that "slavery, as established by

---

[55] Ibid., 564.

[56] "American Slavery Defended," Edinburgh Weekly Express in the Anti-Slavery Bugle, (October 8, 1847).

[57] "Alexander Campbell," Anti-Slavery Bugle, (November 19, 1847).

[58] "A Tract for the People of Kentucky," MH, (May, 1848).

[59] Ibid., 266-67.

[60] Abraham Smith to Alexander Campbell, Smithland (Kentucky) in MH, (July, 1849), 413.

[61] Alexander Campbell to Abraham Smith, MH, (July, 1849), 414.

our laws."[62] was not in harmony with the Bible, since the laws prevented the masters from doing that which was "just and equal."[63]

At about this same time, the national government passed a new law concerning fugitive slaves which led to a great deal of discussion in the North. The abolitionists were opposed to obeying it. Campbell felt called on to express his views on this new crisis.

Campbell's position was based on governmental authority. He did not believe that Christians should resist laws for any reason. Since government received its authority from God, it was, therefore, to be obeyed.[64] There were orderly methods of recourse for those who did not like the law. They could bring it before the Supreme Court which would rule on its constitutionality; and, should that fail, then they could elect representatives who would repeal it.

That Christians were to return runaway slaves was seen in the example set by Paul in his return of Onesimus. An objection to the return of slaves was the treatment they would receive upon returning home. Campbell did not consider the treatment the runaway might receive on his return as a factor to be considered in whether or not he was to be returned. The slave's treatment was not the moral concern of the person returning him. His only concern was his obligation to obey the law.

Campbell was concerned with an abstract moral idea that the motive determined the morality of the act. Thus, when one was motivated to obey the civil law, one was motivated properly; the results of this action was beyond the morality of the act, and something over which one had no control. The abolitionists, on the other hand, felt that slavery was itself wrong, thus to be avoided, and that the treatment of the individual slave was the determining factor in the morality of the issue. If they were wrongly held, or might be mistreated if returned, then the moral obligation was to not return them, and civil law made no difference.[65]

Campbell found himself in conflict with the Bible when he used Deuteronomy 5:21 and Exodus 20:17 (where the command not to covet the neighbor's property appears) as a source of authority for his stand. He failed to answer satisfactorily the command in Deuteronomy 23:15-16 not to return an escaped slave to his master. He suggested that this was for special cases and not the general law, since Paul had not followed it.[66]

---

[62] Ibid.
[63] Ibid.
[64] Alexander Campbell, "Our Position on American Slavery," MH, (January, 1851), 30-31; Alexander Campbell, "The Fugitive Slave Law," MH, (January, 1851), 28.
[65] Alexander Campbell, "The Fugitive Slave Law," op. cit., 31.
[66] Ibid.

Most of the criticism which was aimed at his position centered on his failure to consider Mark 12:31, "Love your neighbor as yourself." In contrast to his statement of the Christian ethic, Campbell held that the slave was no more than property and what happened to the return slave was the responsibility of the owner. He thought that, should the owner kill the slave, he would be punished by the loss of the money which he had invested in the slave.[67]

Campbell's attitude is difficult to understand here, when placed against the background of his attempts to get slavery removed from Virginia in 1830 and Kentucky in 1849, and his treatment of his own slaves. He seemed to have recognized the inconsistency of his position for by the middle of 1851, he began to modify his views. He again emphasized that the Bible supported the ownership of slaves, but it also regulated it. The relationship between master and slave was for him summed up in one statement, "Be just and kind to your servants" (Colossians 4:1). He did not reject the application of the Golden Rule to the relationship, but he did not apply it to the basic relationship; that is, Campbell did not believe that one could ask if he would like to be a slave, but rather, how he would like to be treated if he were. The relationship itself was assumed to be just.[68]

Onesimus provided Campbell with an example of Christian treatment of slaves. What Paul did in this case was what was to be done in all cases. He returned Onesimus to Philemon because of the latter's prior right to Onesimus.[69]

Although inhuman action against slaves was practiced in some cases, this was not considered as a valid reason for overthrowing the institution. Campbell pointed out that husbands had abused their wives, and parents their children, but such action was not used as an argument against the institution of marriage and parenthood.[70]

Campbell considered that as long as the Fugitive Slave Law was on the books, all law-abiding citizens are obligated to obey it. However, at the same time, he pointed out that this did not require citizens of the North to refuse to act kindly toward the Negro. He also noted that the law required that one not conceal a fugitive so that he could not be discovered; and this was effective only after legal notice and evidence that the person involved was a runaway. He said, "You may feed, clothe, and lodge him, provided you so not

---

[67] Alexander Campbell, "Slavery and the Fugitive Slave Law," MH, (May, 1851), 252.
[68] Ibid., (June, 1851), 314-15.
[69] Ibid., 316.
[70] Ibid., (July, 1851), 367.

'harbor or conceal him, so as to prevent discovery and arrest, after notice of knowledge that he is a fugitive.' "[71] This raises some questions about Campbell's sincerity concerning the enforcement of the law. Such an interpretation would allow the abolitionists to aid an escaping slave over the underground railroad, and stay within the law. It would appear at this point that he was interested only in the letter of the law, not the spirit of the Bible, particularly the New Testament.

Although Campbell seems to have taken the side of the abolitionists in his interpretation and application of the slave law, he did continue to think that they were the source of much trouble and their activities had slowed emancipation in the South. Prior to the rise of abolitionism, he thought the South would probably have adopted some system of colonization.[72] This interest decreased in inverse ratio with northern interference, he thought.[73]

The solution to the problem was to be found, he believed, in the program of the American Colonization Society. Campbell did not think that the abolitionists could ever eliminate slavery in the New World.[74] Since slavery was supported by law, the repeal of the law was necessary in order to stop it.

That Campbell was hostile to slavery throughout his life is unquestioned. That he consistently retained the same emphasis on the subject is not the case. He seems to have placed his emphasis on those things where he thought the changing times indicated the best interest could be served. Following the rise of the abolitionists he seems to have leaned more toward the slaveholder, but he was not in agreement with either. He saw the rights of the slaveholder being violated by the abolitionists and this he considered important. But most important was the prevention of division of the church over the issue. He was successful for a time as the Disciples did not divide until 1859. In the church and its action on slavery, he insisted on the historic Disciple position that where the Bible spoke, the church could speak; where the Bible was silent, it was to be silent.

---

[71] Ibid., 398.

[72] Allan Nevins, a modern interpreter of this period, says that "Garrison's vituperative [words against slavery] . . . had some responsibility for the fact that . . . early in the century anti-slavery societies had been numerous in the South, but by 1837 not one was left." Allan Nevins, Ordeal of the Union (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1947), I, 181.

Pocahontas Co.

ALEXANDER MEMORIAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH - Stony Bottom

Organized 1894 --- Built 1894.

Sept. 27, 1940

Nelle Y. McLaughlin
Marlinton, W. Va.
Pocahontas County

Chapter 6 - Section 2

Alexander Memorial Presbyterian Church -

Stony Bottom.

As there was no Presbyterian organization west of the Greenbrier River and as there were twelve or fifteen members close around Driftwood or Stony Bottom as it was later called, it was deemed advisable to organize these members into a separate organization or church. Their membership was held at Liberty Church at Greenbank, Baxter Church at Dunmore, and Marlinton Church at Marlinton, from which points they were separated by such obstacles as to prevent almost wholly their attendance at the services of these churches.

Therefore the Presbytery of Greenbrier at its spring session which was held in Elk City, May 9-12, 1894 ordered its evangelist Rev. J. M. Sloan to visit the field during the summer with the view of organizing a church should the way be clear. Accordingly, he began a series of services in the school house on the night of August 6, 1894 and continued to preach with much power until the night of August 18, 1894.

On Friday night August 17, 1894 Driftwood Church was organized by Rev. J. M. Sloan assisted by Rev. L. F. Alexander with sixteen members enrolled. The following members were received by certificate from Baxter Church, Dunmore:

Mr. A. K. Dysard

Mrs. E. E. Dysard

Miss Bessie Dysard

Miss Claudia Dysard

Mrs. E. M. Meeks

Mrs. Cora Ray

Mrs. Hannah McLaughlin

Mrs. Nancy McCloud

Mrs. Mary Tallman

Mrs. Parthenia McLaughlin

The following persons were received from Liberty Church at Greenbank by certificate:

Mr. Allen Galford

Mrs. Nancy Galford

Mr. John H. Doyle was received from the Marlinton Presbyterian Church and Mrs. Mary Elisa Galford from the M. E. Church South. Mr. P. H. Meeks and Miss Blanche McLaughlin were received on profession of their faith in Christ.

These persons having entered into a covenant to walk together as an organized church on the principles and orders of the Presbyterian Church, then proceeded to elect officers. Mr. A. K. Dysard who was a ruling elder in the Dunmore church was unanimously chosen as elder and duly installed. Mr. J. H. Doyle was elected a deacon but his ordination and installation were postponed to a future date that he might have opportunity to acquaint himself with the requirements and duties of the office and the Confession of Faith.

should be Driftwood.

Judge James Marwick gave the church a choice of two locations for a church building. One location was on the hill where Mr. I. B. Bumgardner's house now stands, the other was up the road on Elk Lick Run where the present church stands. The church building was started about a year after the organization. Several years elapsed before the building was completed. The church records do not show in what year the building was dedicated but it was thought to be about August, 1901.

Rev. E. F. Alexander who was stated supply at the time of the organization died May 6, 1895 before the church was built. He is buried at Greenbank in the church yard at Liberty Church.

The dedicatory sermon was preached by the Rev. J. M. Sloan. Rev. Henry W. McLaughlin was then a seminary student supplying the church during the summer months.

On July 14, 1901 at a meeting of the session a motion was made to call a gongregational meeting for the fourth Sunday of August to ascertain the sentiment of the congregation as to changing the name of Driftwood Church to Alexander Memorial Church in memory of Rev. E. F. Alexander who was so active in promoting the organization and building of the church. The records do not show that the name was changed although in one instance it was spoken of as Alexander Memorial Chapel, after which it was called Driftwood.

In May 1931, the pastor Rev. J. T. Pharr called another congregational meeting and it was decided by a large vote to change the name to Alexander Memorial Church.

In May 1905 a congregational meeting was held for the purpose of electing a ruling elder and deacon, the elder Mr. A. K. Dysard having moved from the vicinity. Mr. John H. Doyle was elected elder and Mr. K. W. Meeks was elected deacon. Both officers were duly ordained and installed.

When Alexander Memorial Church was organized, it was grouped with the Presbyterian Churches at Dunmore and Greenbank. Several years later it was changed and grouped with Linwood and Mingo and in 1930 it was again changed and grouped with Cass.

For a number of years until 1930 mission points of the church were Clover Lick, Poage Lane and Thomas Spring school house on Clover Creek.

In August, 1929 Rev. O. N. Miles assisted by Rev. Fred W. Gray held a series of revival meetings. As a result of these services eighteen new members were added to the church. Three of these were adults and the rest were young people.

In April 1930, Rev. O. N. Miles who had been pastor for about twelve years moved to Marlinton to take over some new work. Alexander Memorial Church which had been grouped with the Linwood-Mingo field was now grouped with Cass, and the pastor from that church, Rev. James T. Pharr took over this work. Rev. Pharr has held a revival each year with the exception of one. The ministers assisting him have been:

Rev. J. D. Wilson of Scarbro, W. Va.

Rev. G. O. Yount of Huttonsville, W. Va.

Rev. A. N. Brown of Ronceverte, W. Va.

Rev. Marlin Curry of Lewisburg, W. Va.

Officers of the church:

Ministers and students:

Rev. E. F. Alexamder 1894 - 1895

Rev. H. W. McLaughlin, D.D. Student 1896 - 1.00

" " " " pastor 1900 - 1904

Rev. R. E. Fultz - 1904 - 1906

Rev. W. W. Bain - 1907 - 1909

Rev. S. B. Hannah (student) date unknown

Rev. H. H. Leach " " "

Rev. W. P. Gibbs " until about 1916

Rev. W. P. Gibbs - pastor

W. J. Flint (student) 1917

Rev. O. N. Miles - pastor - 1918 - 1930

Rev. J. T. Pharr 1930 - to present

Ministers fron the Marlinton Presbyterian Church who preached at Alexander Memorial when that church was without a pastor were:

Rev. Wm. T. Price

Rev. G. W. Nickell

Rev. J. M. Walker

Elders:

Mr. A. K. Dysard 1894 - 1905

Mr. John Doyle	1905 - 1938
Mr. John H. Hevener	1905 - present

Deacons:

Mr. John Doyle	1894 - 1905
Mr. K. W. Meeks	1905 - present
Mr. Fred McLaughlin	Present
Mr. Paul Hevener	"
Mr. Otho Shields	"

Trustees:

Mr. John R. Hevener

Mr. John Doyle

Mr. Guy Tallman

History of the church for the year 1936-1937

Pastor - Rev. James Timothy Pharr

The first important event in the history of this church during the year 1936 was the spring meeting of Presbytery which was held in the Huttonsville Church in April. Alexander Memorial was represented by Mr. John H. Doyle. At this meeting Presbytery was invited to meet at Stony Bottom for the fall meeting on Sept. 29. The members of the congregation soon began to plan as to what repairs should be made on the church building and lawn. The pastor presented the church with a check for fifty dollars to be used as the session desired for repairing and painting. It was decided that a part of the money should be used to buy paint and that the men of the congregation would apply it to the exterior. Lumber was purchased and the building underpinned. On several different days the men hauled rocks and dirt and leveled off the lawn.

The Woman's Auxiliary had some money in the treasury to be used for the church. The amount was small so the ladies decided a new pulpit chair was needed most of all. After looking at catalogs of church furniture, it was discovered that there was not enough money to buy a chair. One of the members donated some nice oak and a carpenter in the community made a chair and communion table. Other minor repairs were made.

The last day of July the pastor commenced a ten day revival meeting. Several children were baptised and three joined the church.

During the month of May, the community had the pleasure of having with them Miss Margaret Pritchard, a medical missionary to Korea who gave a very interesting lecture about her work. On another occasion Rev. Ed Currie a missionary to China told of his work.

On the second Sunday in September, the Rev. Henry K. McLaughlin, D.D. preached at this church. On Sept. 29, Presbytery convened at 1:30 P.M. This was the first time such a meeting had ever been held at Stony Bottom. There was a good attendance of delegates and several guests. Rev. J. M. Sydenstricker, a missionary home on furlough from Brazil, was elected Moderator. Other guest speakers were: Dr. Blakely pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Staunton, Virginia and Rev. Currie from China. At this meeting Mr. J. H. Doyle was nominated as a delegate to General Assembly which meets at Montreat, North Carolina.

History of the church 1937 - 1938

One of the ruling elders, Mr. J. M. Doyle, had the privilege of being one of the representatives of Greenbrier Presbytery, to the General Assembly which met at Montreat, North Carolina in May. On June 13, while the congregation was assembled for divine worship, Mr. Doyle gave a report of his attendance to the assembly.

On June 20, Mr. H. C. Erwin, an elder of the Salem Church, West Organ Cave, Virginia, who is chairman of the Presbytery's Committee on the Ministers' Annuity Fund, addressed the congregation upon this subject. The Session discussed the churche's quota of one hundred eighty-nine dollars and decided that it would be impossible to raise that large amount, so the quota was lowered to one hundred forty dollars. The Session appointed a committee to canvass the members and see how much money could be obtained. Members of the committee were: Mr. Doyle, Mr. Paul Nevener, Miss Mary Nevener. The result of the canvass was one hundred twenty-six dollars, obtained in pledges and cash. Seventy dollars and fifty cents being paid in cash.

At this session meeting the time for the revival meeting was discussed, and it was decided to begin this meeting on July 28, with Rev. O. C. Brown of Renick, West Virginia assisting the pastor, Rev. James T. Pharr. This meeting resulted in seventeen persons making a profession of faith.

On Oct. 28, 1938 the church and community sustained a real loss in the death of Mr. John Doyle, who was the last charter member of the church.

During January, 1939 Dr. T. Th. Stixrud, a medical missionary to Africa spoke in the church to the school children, and to the adults of the community. He told of some of his many interesting experiences in Africa as a physician. The foreign mission offering during January was ten dollars and five cents.

In 1938 there were eighty-one quarts of fruit canned and sent to the Davis Stuart School. Nearly every family took part in helping with this. The home mission offering was sixteen dollars.

Women's Auxiliary.

In February 1931, Mrs. J. T. Pharr and Mrs. D. M. Monroe, Presbyterial president, met with the ladies of the church for the purpose of organizing a women's Auxiliary. Miss Cornelia Pritchard was elected president, Mrs. I. B. Bumgardner, Vice-pres. Miss Mary Hevener, Secretary, and Mrs. D. L. Beverage, Treas. This was the first group of women ever to be organized at Stony Bottom for church work of any kind although in previous years the women had been active in their interest for the welfare of the church. They helped raise money to paint the church both inside and out. They collected money to buy a new Bible and new hymn books.

In 1934 the ladies of the church saved their Sunday eggs and bought hymn books for the church.

At this time there were twenty members in the Auxiliary, but only eight could be called active members of the Auxiliary. They were very generous in all of their benevolent girts.

More interest was taken by the ladies during the year 1937-38. They filled one hundred quart jars with fruit, honey and vegetables for the Davis Stuart School. Ten dollars was given to the Ministers' Annuity Fund. The women saved their eggs on the Sunday preceeding Easter and gave the money for church repairs.

In Feb. 1939 the Auxiliary met at the home of Mrs. Shields for the purpose of electing officers. The following were elected:

President - Virginia Hevener

Sec. & Treas. - Mrs. Fred McLaughlin

There is no record to show when the Sunday School was organized but there has been a Sunday School at Stony Bottom since before 1879. The first Sunday School was held in an old log school house which stood near where the road crosses Elk Lick Run right near the town of Stony Bottom. Mr. B. R. Doyle was the first Superintendent that anyone now living can remember. Mr. B. H. Barnett was Superintendent for about twenty years. Other Superintendents have been: W. R. Moore, J. R. Hevener, J. H. Doyle and Fred McLaughlin, the present superintendent. Teachers were: Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Dysard, W. R. Moore, and J. H. Doyle.

The teachers for 1935-36 were as follows:

John R. Hevener - Bible Class

Miss Mary Hevener - Senior girls

Paul Hevener - Senior boys

Miss Cornelia Pritchard - Intermediate

Miss Virginia Hevener - Juniors

Mrs. Fred McLaughlin - Primary

Owing to distance and bad roads the Sunday School was not continued through the winter months until about the year of 1915 when it became an "evergreen" Sunday School and has continued so until the present time.

In January, 1938 the members of the Sunday School voted to have Sunday School at two o'clock P. M. during the winter months, as this hour was more convenient for those who lived at a distance.

Information:

Historical Foundation of the Presbyterian Churches,
Montreat, North Carolina

History of the Alexander Memorial Church -
by Miss Virginia Hevener

The Church on the Western Waters - Courtney

Scotts 5.00

McMillions 2.00

James Cooper's name appears in the organization of the county as one of the constables appointed. He served the public as magistrate, assessor, and teacher of schools. He was regarded with high esteem for his honest and elevated character in social and business relations. He was a prominent member of the Liberty Church in the early history of that historic congregation, and his influence was ever for good morals, intelligence, and refinement of manners, himself being a fine specimen of what is termed "a gentleman of the old school," and was noted for his polite and gracious manners, correct and entertaining conversational powers.

ALEXANDER WADDELL.

One of the pioneers of our county from whom quite a number of our people trace their descent was Alexander Waddell. He was of Scotch-Irish descent and was among the earliest settlers in the neighborhood of Marvin Chapel. His wife was a Miss Rouss. He came from Augusta County before the Revolution, but in what year is not certainly known. He came out to examine the country, and looked over the Levels and the lands beyond Buckeye and around Sewall's Cave, and selected the place so long known as the Waddell Place, where the public road reaches the highest point on the mountain in passing from Buckeye to Millpoint. When he first explored the Levels all was mainly vacant or unclaimed, and he might have entered the greater part of it. He concluded it was too level and glady, and so he preferred the lands north of Millpoint where he could be high enough to keep in the dry.

Digitized by Google

Their daughter, Martha, married the late John Barlow, of Edray, mentioned elsewhere.

Elizabeth Waddell married William Sharp, near Edray.

Ann Waddell married Squire James Sharp of Beaver Creek. Each of these sons-in-law of the early pioneer are specially mentioned in this book as men of prominence in the affairs of the county.

Mary Waddell married Squire John Gillilan, near Millpoint. This large family moved to Missouri, where their numerous descendants have their prosperous homes.

Jennie Waddell married Josiah Brown, near Edray.

Miriam Waddell was married to John Thompson and moved to Ohio.

The Waddell sons were John, William, and Alexander. To give his sons a chance to have their homes near him, the venerable pioneer concluded to move to Ohio and settled near Gallipolis. These sons all died in Ohio, and their history is not much known to their friends in West Virginia.

Mr Waddell seems to have been a fervently pious person. It was his intense desire to live one hundred years, and he made this desire for longevity a matter of special prayer. He died in Ohio at the age of one hundred and two years, thus receiving a full measure and more of borrowed time. With long life God satisfied him, and showed him his salvation.

The history of his life shows he had paid good attention to Bible reading where it is written in the thirty-fourth Psalm: "What man is he that desireth life and loveth many days that he may see good? Keep thy tongue from evil and thy lips from speaking guile; depart from evil and do good; seek peace and pursue it."

Digitized by Google

This Psalm was a great favorite with our pious pioneer people, to give them consolation in their times of danger and distress.

RICHARD HUDSON.

The Hudson family trace their ancestry to Richard Hudson, whose wife was Elizabeth Redden. They came from Augusta County early in the century, and settled in the woods on the head waters of Sitlingtons Creek, on lands now held by their grandsons, Warwick B. and John L. Hudson. This land was purchased from a Mr Armstrong. A small opening had been made by one Posten previously. Mr and Mrs Hudson were the parents of seven daughters and three sons.

Sally and Polly Hudson went to Ohio and married and settled in that State.

Keziah Hudson, of whom the writer has no definite information, more than that she was named after one of Job's daughters.

Rachel Hudson married Dysard and lived in Barbour County.

Matilda married Thomas Humphries and lived in Barbour County.

Naomi became Mrs Samuel Mathews, and lived in Randolph County. M. G. Mathews, deceased, a

Digitized by Google

Memories of Alice Moore were written by Rex.

Oyez, Oyez, Oyez!

One of my favorite amusements, as a child, was attending court. Court was held three times a year in our county, and the sessions drew an adudience that comprised most of the able bodied people for miles around. Farmers came to town in the morning, bringing their wives and children with them, and spent the day. Their buying, and selling, and trading were all a part of the incidental activities of court week. I can remember our noon dinner table during court, surrounded by countless and casual cousins from Greenbank and the Levels.

A bell in the tower of the Courthouse summoned the devotees. Everyone came. Even the dogs made a point of being present. A water spaniel, belonging to a friend of mine, answered every tolling of that bell, whether his family went or not. Whenever the Courthouse bell rang, he hurried to the Courtroom. He even attended Teacher's Institute until those meetings were moved to the High School. He finally came to be looked upon as an honored member of the Bar.

No wonder Court was an integral part of my life, and the life of my friends: Our fathers were lawyers; our uncles, clerks; and our sisters, stenographers. Our houses were grouped around the CourtHouse. We were so close to that building and the adjacent jail that our voices carried easily from one to the other Sometimes they carried too easily. An old man who had worked for us was frequently incarcerated because of his fondness for corn liquor. His cries from the jail window were audible, and usually efficacious. "Oh Lord, Oh Lock " He would wail." Come and get me out of this place." My father and the Lord were both omniscient in Bill's mind. - only my father was a more present

Sometimes they carried too easily. An old man who had worked for us was frequently incarcerated because of his fondness for corn liquor. His cries from the jail window were audible, and usually efficacious. "Oh Lord, Oh Lord" He would wail." Come and get me out of this place." My father and the Lord were both omniscient in Bill's mind, - only my father was a more present help, since he invariably bailed Bill out, and the Lord, seemingly, never paid much attention to him.

We used to bet on the outcome of thetrials, and argue over our fathers' p owers. Each believed her father to be more eloquent and more persuasive than the others. Since they were often opposed, defending and prosecuting, we were at war, too. One of my good friends and I battled over a murder case for years. And this day I don't care whether the man was acquited or not, I still believe he killed his wife!

When we went to court we did not sit back in the benches provided for the on lookers. No sir, we sat up front with the lawyers. We were a part of the Court Women, Children and dogs, all cluttered up the bar. We were pretty well behaved, on the whole, quiet and attentive; but not so the dogs. Our Tackel, and Mr. Hill's Rowdy did not care for each other. They were both Airedales, somewhat elderly and set in their ways. In the midst of an important point in a case they were likely to start growling and stalk, stiff - legged, around each other. Sometimes the fight could be averted, but occassionally there was an added attraction in the Court Room - an honest to goodness dog fight. It was unfortunate, of course, when these little disturbances broke the continuity of a trial. It was after one such fracas that the judge threatened to fine my father and Mr. Hill for contempt of court if they brought those damn dogs into the Courtroom again. Poor Tackel! he had to be tied upon court days, thereafter. It nearly broke his heart.

Arson, larceny, and manslaughter were a part of my vocabulary when I was still a baby. We followed the procedure of the courtroom and tried cases ourselves. They were never very successful, however, because we could not find, in our number, an impartial judge.

We were all secretly desirous of being called as witnesses. Once my hopes were almost realized. A man broke into our house one night and was about to set our house on fire when my sister surprised him. When he was tried I felt certain I would at last receive the coveted summons. I was the envy of my friends. But the trial was carried on, and a conviction secured, without my assistance. I was insulted; and besides my chinchilla coat, a variety of clothe, don't misunderstand me, which had been soaked with kerosene by the defendant, was kept in that condition as exhibit A, to be shown to the jury; and the kerosene smell never did come out.

Since our town had no movies and few plays, the courtroom took the place of the theatre with us. When the curtain rose on an exciting trial we would be in our box seats, the chairs to the right of the Judge. Those were our usual places, although during one June term I sat on the open window right beside the jury box. What a week that was; I was almost on the Jury! We remained in our seats straight trhough the performance until noon recess. Then we went home to dinnr r and heard our fathers' comments on the mornings events. When the afternoon session convened we aired our fathers' opinions with the aplomb of veteran jurists. We weighed the evidence presented with infinite care and patience; and we decided the cases long before the foreman of the Jury had handed his lettle slip of paper to the clerk. The outcome of a trial held for us the same fascination that a football score holds for a modern child. These tense hours of waiting for the verdict are as real to us, even yet, as the hole in my stocking today.

Of course, it might be supposed that our constant attendance in a courtroom would result in some damage to our character. Not so, the judge and the court, no doubt flattered by our frank admiration and regular attendance, kept a strict watch upon our morals. Whenever there was anything of a questionable nature to be introducted into the evidence the judge would make his announcement. "All ladies and children must leave the courtroom." And Annie Lange, the town hussy, was always the first to depart!

Arson, larceny, and manslaughter were a part of my vocabulary when I was still a baby. We followed the procedure of the courtroom and tried cases ourselves. They were never very successful, however, because we could not find, in our number, an impartial judge.

We were all secretly desirous of being called as witnesses. Once my hopes were almost realized. A man broke into our house one night and was about to set our house on fire when my sister surprised him. When he was tried I felt certain I would at last receive the coveted summons. I was the envy of my friends. But the trial was carried on, and a conviction secured, without my assistance. I was insulted; and besides my chinchilla coat, a variety of clothe, don't misunderstand me, which had been soaked with kerosene by the defendant, was kept in that condition as exhibit A, to be shown to the jury; and the kerosene smell never did come out.

Since our town had no movies and few plays, the courtroom took the place of the theatre with us. When the curtain rose on an exciting trial we would be in our box seats, the chairs to the right of the Judge. Those were our usual places, although during one June term I sat on the open window right beside the jury box. What a week that was; I was almost on the Jury! We remained in our seats straight trhough the performance until noon recess. Then we went home to dinnr r and heard our fathers' comments on the mornings events. When the afternoon session convened we aired our fathers' opinions with the aplomb of veteran jurists. We weighed the evidence presented with infinite care and patience; and we decided the cases long before the foreman of the Jury had kerosene by the defendant, was kept in that condition as Exhibit A, to be shown to the jury; and the kerosene smell never did come out.

Since our town had no movies and few plays, the courtroom took the place of the theatre with us. When the curtain rose on an exciting trial we would be in our box seats, the chairs to the right of the Judge. Those were our usual places, although during one June term I sat on the open window right beside the jury box. What a week that was; I was almost on the Jury! We ran in our seats straight trhough the performance until noon recess. Then we went home to dinnr r and heard our fathers' comments on the mornings events. When the afternoon session convened we aired our fathers' opinions with the aplomb of veteran jurists. We weighed the evidence presented with infinite care and patience; and we decided the cases long before the foreman of the Jury handed his lettle slip of paper to the clerk. The outcome of a trial held for us the same fascination that a football score holds for a modern child. The tense hours of waiting for the verdict are as real to us, even yet, as the hose in my stocking today.

Of course, it might be supposed that our constant attendance in a court room result in some damage to our character. Not so, the judge and the court, no doubt flattered by our frank admiration and regular attendance, kept a strict watch upon our morals. Whenever there was anything of a questionable nature to be introducted into the evidence the judge would make his announcement. "All ladies and children must leave the courtroom." And Annie Lange, the town hussy, was always the first to depart!

Music - and the Child

I spent my childhood and grew up in a small town. That phrase, grew up, is literally true, for when I grew I didn't fool around with inches, I grew by the yard, and finally attained a mature height which is still regarded as phenomenal; and which is not altogether unrelated to my m sical life, especially the recitals.

In that age and town no female of the species was regarded as a lady unless she had taken, or was taking, music lessons. By music lessons we meant piano lessons. The other musical instruments were sublimely disregarded. My mother, of course, was determined that my social attainments should compare favorably with my friends'. She was even ambitious for me. Once she told me that her joy would know no bounds if someday I could take cousin Grace's place at the Presbyterian Church and play for services!

The question of ability, or talent, or inclination did not enter into consideration. To the society of the town music lessons were in the same category with spelling lessons. They were a necessary part of every young girls training. To me, they were in the same class with calomel. Only, instead of taking them twice a year, I had a dose twice a week. The only time I laid a finger on the piano was during my half hour lessons. I did not practice; when my mother mentioned the piano, I took to the tree tops.

As the years go past I grow more and more certain that there is no music in my soul. My Aunt Ethel once told me of a relative of hers who said that he knew two tunes, one was Yankee Doodle and one wasn't. I'm not quite in that class. I do know the "Star Spangled Banner" when I hear it, and usually, if the melody is not too obscure I can recognize some of the current popular music. If I hear a piece of music about fifty times I can sing it. Of course, I provide variations not included in the original score, and I don't even know what "key"

a year, I had a dear [illegible] was during my half hour lessons. I did not practice; when my [illegible] the piano, I took to the tree tops.

As the years go past I grow more and more certain that there is no music in my soul. My Aunt Ethel once told me of a relative of hers who said that he knew two tunes, one was Yankee Doodle and one wasn't. I'm not quite in that class. I do know the "Star Spangled Banner" when I hear it, and usually, if the melody is not too obscure I can recognize some of the current popular music. If I hear a piece of music about fifty times I can sing it. Of course, I provide variations not included in the original score, and I don't even know what "key" means; but I can entertain myself when I am sure I am alone.

Nevertheless, I took music lessons for six years. Every Tuesday and every Friday I dragged my music roll and my reluctant feet to Miss Shugro's studio, and endured a half hour of torture. Miss Shugro counted time while I played. I never played more than a few bars until I would make a mistake and have to start over again. As a result, I usually achieved a mechanical knowledge of the first part of the exercises, but I never knew anything about the ending. I would carry a sheet of music about with me until it finally wore out and went to pieces, but I never knew the last lines.

Miss Shugro once called her entire music class together and told us she had decided to give prizes at the end of the year for excellence in our work. She was sure that each of us could win a prize if she only tried. We were all talented, and with our natural gifts all we needed was a little practice. This special dispensation did not bother me at all. I went my usual way and finally spring, and the end of the musical year, arrived. One of my friends told me that each of us was going to receive a prize. To say that I was surprised is not adequate. My curiosity knew no bounds. To save my soul I could not think of any musical excellence of mine that would merit a prize. I gave it up, if Miss Shugro could think of a prize for me, she was an exceedingly smart lady.

Prize day came, and I received a prize for always being on time for my lessons!

The part of my musical education I hated most, the function that, to me, was an agony almost beyond endurance, was the yearly recital. On this superb occassion the town came to the Opera House en masse to hear us play.

An Opera House in a town of less than two thousand inhabitants is a distinct anachronism. The title, however, is not in any way, related to fact, but, since the gentleman who built the edifice thus fancifully dubbed it, it was always the "Opera House" to us. Now it houses some several chevrolets and serves as a garage, but it is still the Opera House. At different stages in its career it served in varied capacities. Originally stock companies performed there, and amateur theatricals were prodeced upon its stage. It was in the course of a rehearsal for the "Pied Piper of Hamelin," to which I was lending my incomparable histrionic ability in the part of a big grey rat, that I saw in the shadow of the wings, a gentleman kiss a young lady. For years I waited for their surely forth coming marriage. I am still waiting! Basketball games were played there; the Amusu Theatre presented "The Diamond From the Sky" and "The Iron Claw," those worthy serials of an earlier day, within its portals. For a season it became a skating rink. When the Presbyterian Church was being rebuilt our services were held there and unfortunately, during the church era the sigus of it forwer occuptations still decorated the building. A cousin of mine from New York, accompanied my mother to church there one Sunday morning. Being possessed of a mad and devilish sense of humor he had to be led, choking, from the "church" upon whose walls he had read, "Don't spit on the Floor." "No reversing," Twenty Cents an Hours," "No skidding on the corners." "No Drunks Allowed"! My mother was so embarrassed I doubt if she has ever forgiven him.

Our recital, the musical event of the year, became a part of the entertainment provided at the Opera House. We, dressed in our best and scared to death, shivered in the wings while our [illegible] services were held there and unfortunately, during the church era the signs of its former occupations still decorated the building. A cousin of mine from New York, accompanied my mother to church there one Sunday morning. Being possessed of a mad and devilish sense of humor he had to be led, choking, from the "church" upon whose walls he had read, "Don't spit on the Floor." "No reversing," Twenty Cents an Hours," "No skidding on the corners." "No Drunks Allowed"! My mother was so embarrassed I doubt if she has ever forgiven him.

Our recital, the musical event of the year, became a part of the entertainment provided at the Opera House. We, dressed in our best and scared to death, shivered in the wings while our fond and doting parents waited out front for their prodigies to perform. The yearly program was arranged according to ability the beginners appearing first and the more skilled players coming, by way of climax at the end. Needless to say, I was always one of the first performers of the evening. Even when my contemporaries were presenting the grand finale, I, overgrown, awkward, suffering an agony of shyness, stumbled across the stage and played my little "Tra la la la." As the second on the program in a class of twenty odd. Those recitals did something to my soul. I find I cannot speak of them with levity; they left a permanent scar.

Finally, after six long years, and several fruitless rebellious at home, I took matters into my own hands. When I was excused from the school room to go to the studio, I left the schoolroom but, I never did reach my destination. I would hide for half an hour and read. When I was finally discovered, and the music in my life came to an abrupt but timely end, I was found behind the Episcopal Church reading "The Call of the Wild!"

Pasteurized

For the last twenty years a battle has been raging in Marlinton. I don't mean that we inhabitants have been in a state of siege all that time. We have enjoyed periods of comparative quiet, usually during the winter months, when the skirmishing died down; but we have always known that permanent peace could never be ours. The question involved is of great magnitude and the issue is vital; the citizens are partisan and intolerant; neither side has shown any disposition to mellow with age. Perennially, the fighting breaks out, now at a bridge party, now at the Ladies Aid, now in the jury room. Laides grow insulting, gentlemen angry, children belligerent. Every year a vote is never be ours. The question involved is [illegible]

the issue is vital; the citizens are partisan and intolerant;
neither side has shown any disposition to mellow with age. Perennially, the fighting breaks out, now at a bridge party, now at the Ladies Aid, now in the jury room. Laides grow insulting, gentlemen angry, children belligerent. Every year a vote is taken, an official vote, in a regular election, and the outcome is always the same; -Cows are allowed to walk the streets of Marlinton unaccompanied. The county paper carries the headline,
"Cows Win Again!"

The town is divided; religion, politics and scandal take a back seat when the cow question comes up. Mrs. Martin is the leader of the anti-cow party, and Mr. Snow heads the pro-cow faction. These commanders are unforgiving, and uncompromising.
Mrs. Martin and Mr. Snow haven't spoken for years. That is, they haven't spoken to each other; their loquaciousness on the burning question, in other circles, increases daily. And their methods of proselyting are not always above reproach. Mrs. Alton, an Anti-dow of several years standing, was heard voicing decidedly pro-cow sentiments, recently. Her surprised neighbors investigated and the awful truth was revealed. Mrs. Alton had been the recipient of several gifts of cream from Mr. Snow!

The Pros, of course, are the cow owners. Naturally, they want their animals to eat grass, and the only grazing land in the valley is along the side-walks and on the vacant lots of the town. The Antis, however, complain that therein lies the point of the whole situation. The cows not only graze on the vacant lots, but also in the gardens and yards and shrubbery of the citizens; and this, in spite of the fact that high picket fences want their animals to eat grass, and the only grazing land in the valley is along the side-walks and on the vacant lots of the town. The Antis, however, complain that therein lies the point of the whole situation. The cows not only graze on the vacant lots, but also in the gardens and yards and shrubbery of the citizens; and this, in spite of the fact that high picket fences surround their property. Gates are sometimes left open by careless people, and the indictment has been made, too, that several cows have opened gates themselves. Each time a resident arises in the morning and finds his spinach devoured, the Antis gain a convert, and the fighting breaks out afresh.

A relative of ours from the city came to visit us one summer. One night he played bridge until past midnight with some friends down the street. When he started home the town was dark. Our town light company, assuming that all good citizens were at home and safe in their beds by midnight, cut off all the street lights at twelve o'clock. Any people who might be abroad after that late hour, should be ashamed of themselves, and glad to return home, unseen under cover of darkness. At any rate the young man started home, feeling his way along the fences. As he crept along the courthouse walk he stumbled and fell over a formidable and lively object, a suddenly awakened cow. His screams aroused the town.

I, myself, have never been a zealous supporter of either party. I have tried to remain neutral. I am one of those horrid, spineless, creatures who prefer peace at any price. But if I am anything, I guess I am a pro. Although we haven't owned a party. I have tried to remain neutral. I am one of those horrid, spineless, creatures who prefer peace at any price. But if I am anything, I guess I am a pro. Although we haven't owned a cow for many years I recollect a delightful parade of my youth. My father led the procession, carrying the milk bucket; I followed, close upon his heels; Tackle, our lame Airedale dog, came next; and my two cats brought up the rear. We marched, morning and evening from our house to the barn. We all superintended the milking, and upon our return to the house assisted in the consumption of the milk. Our ritual never varied. The three bowls on the back porch and one in the kitchen were filled and emptied twice a day.

One summer, after I had been absent for the better part of a year, I casually remarked that the island in the bend of the creek was a picturesque spot; the cows grazing there lent an atmosphere of rural peace rarely found in a town the size of Marlinton. I realized my mistake before the words were out of my mouth. The two Antis, who were in the car with me, close friends of mine from childhood, have been noticeably cool ever since. The situation, already tense, was not lightened when I had to stop the car at the next corner and wait while a cow took her leisurely way across the street.

Even when I am absent I am kept informed as to developments. The latest bulletin from the front carries surprising news. The cows themselves have taken up the issue now. Heretofore they have shown little interest in the affair, remaining calm and placid and unconcerned. But the constant bickering is beginning to tell. The cows are finally realizing that their far-famed contentment is threatened. They have taken steps. Mr. Barnell's Daisy, wilfully and with malice aforethought, on Tuesday last, had a calf in Mrs. Martin's front yard!

Memories of Alice Moore's were written by her.

Oyez, Oyez, Oyez!

One of my favorite amusements, as a child, was attending court. Court was held three times a year in our county, and the sessions drew an adudience that comprised most of the able bodied people for miles around. Farmers came to town in the morning, bringing their wives and children with them, and spent the day. Their buying, and selling, and trading were all a part of the incidental activities of court week. I can remember our noon dinner table during court, surrounded by countless and casual cousins from Greenbank and the Levels.

A bell in the tower of the Courthouse summoned the devotees. Everyone came. Even the dogs made a point of being present. A water spaniel, belonging to a friend of mine, answered every tolling of that bell, whether his family went or not. Whenever the Courthouse bell rang, he hurried to the Courtroom. He even attended Teacher's Institute until those meetings were moved to the High School. He finally came to be looked upon as an honored member of the Bar.

No wonder Court was an integral part of my life, and the life of my friends: Our fathers were lawyers; our uncles, clerks; and our sisters, stenographers. Our houses were grouped around the CourtHouse. We were so close to that building and the adjacent jail that our voices carried easily from one to the other Sometimes they carried too easily. An old man who had worked for us was frequently incarcerated because of his fondness for corn liquor. His cries from the jail window were audible, and usually efficacious. "Oh Lord, Oh Lock " He would wail." Come and get me out of this place." My father and the Lord were both omniscient in Bill's mind. - only my father was a more present

Sometimes they carried too easily. An old man who had worked for us was frequently incarcerated because of his fondness for corn liquor. His cries from the jail window were audible, and usually efficacious. "Oh Lord, Oh Lord" He would wail." Come and get me out of this place." My father and the Lord were both omniscient in Bill's mind, - only my father was a more present help, since he invariably bailed Bill out, and the Lord, seemingly, never paid much attention to him.

We used to bet on the outcome of thetrials, and argue over our fathers' p owers. Each believed her father to be more eloquent and more persuasive than the others. Since they were often opposed, defending and prosecuting, we were at war, too. One of my good friends and I battled over a murder case for years. And this day I don't care whether the man was acquited or not, I still believe he killed his wife!

When we went to court we did not sit back in the benches provided for the on lookers. No sir, we sat up front with the lawyers. We were a part of the Court Women, Children and dogs, all cluttered up the bar. We were pretty well behaved, on the whole, quiet and attentive; but not so the dogs. Our Tackel, and Mr. Hill's Rowdy did not care for each other. They were both Airedales, somewhat elderly and set in their ways. In the midst of an important point in a case they were likely to start growling and stalk, stiff - legged, around each other. Sometimes the fight could be averted, but occassionally there was an added attraction in the Court Room - an honest to goodness dog fight. It was unfortunate, of course, when these little disturbances broke the continuity of a trial. It was after one such fracas that the judge threatened to fine my father and Mr. Hill for contempt of court if they brought those damn dogs into the Courtroom again. Poor Tackel! he had to be tied upon court days, thereafter. It nearly broke his heart.

Arson, larceny, and manslaughter were a part of my vocabulary when I was still a baby. We followed the procedure of the courtroom and tried cases ourselves. They were never very successful, however, because we could not find, in our number, an impartial judge.

We were all secretly desirous of being called as witnesses. Once my hopes were almost realized. A man broke into our house one night and was about to set our house on fire when my sister surprised him. When he was tried I felt certain I would at last receive the coveted summons. I was the envy of my friends. But the trial was carried on, and a conviction secured, without my assistance. I was insulted; and besides my chinchilla coat, a variety of clothe, don't misunderstand me, which had been soaked with kerosene by the defendant, was kept in that condition as exhibit A, to be shown to the jury; and the kerosene smell never did come out.

Since our town had no movies and few plays, the courtroom took the place of the theatre with us. When the curtain rose on an exciting trial we would be in our box seats, the chairs to the right of the Judge. Those were our usual places, although during one June term I sat on the open window right beside the jury box. What a week that was; I was almost on the Jury! We remained in our seats straight trhough the performance until noon recess. Then we went home to dinnr r and heard our fathers' comments on the mornings events. When the afternoon session convened we aired our fathers' opinions with the aplomb of veteran jurists. We weighed the evidence presented with infinite care and patience; and we decided the cases long before the foreman of the Jury had handed his lettle slip of paper to the clerk. The outcome of a trial held for us the same fascination that a football score holds for a modern child. Those tense hours of waiting for the verdict are as real to us, even yet, as the holly in my stocking today.

Of course, it might be supposed that our constant attendance in a courtroom would result in some damage to our character. Not so, the judge and the court, no doubt flattered by our frank admiration and regular attendance, kept a strict watch upon our morals. Whenever there was anything of a questionable nature to be introducted into the evidence the judge would make his announcement. "All ladies and children must leave the courtroom." And Annie Lange, the town hussy, was always the first to depart!

Arson, larceny, and manslaughter were a part of my vocabulary when I was still a baby. We followed the procedure of the courtroom and tried cases ourselves. They were never very successful, however, because we could not find, in our number, an impartial judge.

We were all secretly desirous of being called as witnesses. Once my hopes were almost realized. A man broke into our house one night and was about to set our house on fire when my sister surprised him. When he was tried I felt certain I would at last receive the coveted summons. I was the envy of my friends. But the trial was carried on, and a conviction secured, without my assistance. I was insulted; and besides my chinchilla coat, a variety of clothe, don't misunderstand me, which had been soaked with kerosene by the defendant, was kept in that condition as exhibit A, to be shown to the jury; and the kerosene smell never did come out.

Since our town had no movies and few plays, the courtroom took the place of the theatre with us. When the curtain rose on an exciting trial we would be in our box seats, the chairs to the right of the Judge. Those were our usual places, although during one June term I sat on the open window right beside the jury box. What a week that was; I was almost on the Jury! We remained in our seats straight trhough the performance until noon recess. Then we went home to dinnr r and heard our fathers' comments on the mornings events. When the afternoon session convened we aired our fathers' opinions with the aplomb of veteran jurists. We weighed the evidence presented with infinite care and patience; and we decided the cases long before the foreman of the Jury had kerosene by the defendant, was kept in that condition as Exhibit A, to be shown to the jury; and the kerosene smell never did come out.

Since our town had no movies and few plays, the courtroom took the place of the theatre with us. When the curtain rose on an exciting trial we would be in our box seats, the chairs to the right of the Judge. Those were our usual places, although during one June term I sat on the open window right beside the jury box. What a week that was; I was almost on the Jury! We r[illegible] in our seats straight trhough the performance until noon recess. Then we w[illegible] home to dinnr r and heard our fathers' comments on the mornings events. Wh[illegible] the afternoon session convened we aired our fathers' opinions with the aplomb of veteran jurists. We weighed the evidence presented with infinite c[illegible] and patience; and we decided the cases long before the foreman of the Jury ha[illegible] hand ed his lettle slip of paper to the clerk. The outcome of a trial held for us the same fascination that a football score holds for a modern child. T[illegible] tense hours of waiting for the verdict are as real to us, even yet, as the ho[illegible] in my stocking today.

Of course, it might be supposed that our constant attendance in a court ro[illegible] result in some damage to our character. Not so, the judge and the court, no doubt flattered by our frank admiration and regular attendance, kept a strict watch upon our morals. Whenever there was anything of a questionable nature to be introducted into the evidence the judge would make his announcement. "All ladies and children must leave the courtroom." And Annie Lange, the to[illegible] hussy, was always the first to depart!

Music - and the Child

I spent my childhood and grew up in a small town. That phrase, grew up, is literally true, for when I grew I didn't fool around with inches, I grew by the yard, and finally attained a mature height which is still regarded as phenomenal; and which is not altogether unrelated to my m sical life, especially the recitals.

In that age and town no female of the species was regarded as a lady unless she had taken, or was taking, music lessons. By music lessons we meant piano lessons. The other musical instruments were sublimely disregarded. My mother, of course, was determined that my social attainments should compare favorably with my friends'. She was even ambitious for me. Once she told me that her joy would know no bounds if someday I could take cousin Grace's place at the Presbyterian Church and play for services!

The question of ability, or talent, or inclination did not enter into consideration. To the society of the town music lessons were in the same category with spelling lessons. They were a necessary part of every young girls training. To me, they were in the same class with calomel. Only, instead of taking them twice a year, I had a dose twice a week. The only time I laid a finger on the piano was during my half hour lessons. I did not practice; when my mother mentioned the piano, I took to the tree tops.

As the years go past I grow more and more certain that there is no music in my soul. My Aunt Ethel once told me of a relative of hers who said that he knew two tunes, one was Yankee Doodle and one wasn't. I'm not quite in that class. I do know the "Star Spangled Banner" when I hear it, and usually, if the melody is not too obscure I can recognize some of the current popular music. If I hear a piece of music about fifty times I can sing it. Of course, I provide variations not included in the original score, and I don't even know what "key"

a year, I had a dog [illegible] was during my half hour lessons. I did not practice; when my [illegible] the piano, I took to the tree tops.

As the years go past I grow more and more certain that there is no music in my soul. My Aunt Ethel once told me of a relative of hers who said that he knew two tunes, one was Yankee Doodle and one wasn't. I'm not quite in that class. I do know the "Star Spangled Banner" when I hear it, and usually, if the melody is not too obscure I can recognize some of the current popular music. If I hear a piece of music about fifty times I can sing it. Of course, I provide variations not included in the original score, and I don't even know what "key" means; but I can entertain myself when I am sure I am alone.

Nevertheless, I took music lessons for six years. Every Tuesday and every Friday I dragged my music roll and my reluctant feet to Miss Shugro's studio, and endured a half hour of torture. Miss Shugro counted time while I played. I never played more than a few bars until I would make a mistake and have to start over again. As a result, I usually achieved a mechanical knowledge of the first part of the exercises, but I never knew anything about the ending. I would carry a sheet of music about with me until it finally wore out and went to pieces, but I never knew the last lines.

Miss Shugro once called her entire music class together and told us she had decided to give prizes at the end of the year for excellence in oru work. She was sure that each of us could win a prize if she only tried. We were all talented, and with our natural gifts all we needed was a little practice. This special dispensation did not bother me at all. I went my usual way and finally spring, and the end of the musical year, arrived. One of my friends told me that each of us was going to receive a prize. To say that I was surprised is not adequate. My curiosity knew no bounds. To save my soul I could not think of any musical excellence of mine that would merit a prize. I gave it up, if Miss Shugro could think of a prize for me, she was an exceedingly smart lady.

Prize day came, and I received a prize for always being on time for my lessons!

The part of my musical education I hated most, the function that, to me, was an agony almost beyond endurance, was the yearly recital. On this superb occassion the town came to the Opera House en masse to hear us play.

An Opera House in a town of less than two thousand inhabitants is a distinct anachronism. The title, however, is not in any way, related to fact, but, since the gentleman who built the edifice thus fancifully dubbed it, it was always the "Opera House" to us. Now it houses some several chevrolets and serves as a garage, but it is still the Opera House. At different stages in its career it served in varied capacities. Originally stock companies performed there, and amateur theatricals were prodeced upon its stage. It was in the course of a rehearsal for the "Pied Piper of Hamelin," to which I was lending my incomparable histrionic ability in the part of a big grey rat, that I saw in the shadow of the wings, a gentleman kiss a young lady. For years I waited for their surely forth coming marriage. I am still waiting! Basketball games were played there; the Amusu Theatre presented "The Diamond From the Sky" and "The Iron Claw," those worthy serials of an earlier day, within its portals. For a season it became a skating rink. When the Presbyterian Church was being rebuilt our services were held there and unfortunately, during the church era the sigus of it forwer occuptations still decorated the building. A cousin of mine from New York, accompanied my mother to church there one Sunday morning. Being possessed of a mad and devilish sense of humor he had to be led, choking, from the "church" upon whose walls he had read, "Don't spit on the Floor." "No reversing," Twenty Cents an Hours," "No skidding on the corners." "No Drunks Allowed"! My mother was so embarrassed I doubt if she has ever forgiven him.

Our recital, the musical event of the year, became a part of the entertainment provided at the Opera House. We, dressed in our best and scared to death, shivered in the wings while our [illegible]

services were held there and unfortunately, during the church era the signs of its former occupations still decorated the building. A cousin of mine from New York, accompanied my mother to church there one Sunday morning. Being possessed of a mad and devilish sense of humor he had to be led, choking, from the "church" upon whose walls he had read, "Don't spit on the Floor." "No reversing," Twenty Cents an Hours," "No skidding on the corners." "No Drunks Allowed"! My mother was so embarrassed I doubt if she has ever forgiven him.

Our recital, the musical event of the year, became a part of the entertainment provided at the Opera House. We, dressed in our best and scared to death, shivered in the wings while our fond and doting parents waited out front for their prodigies to perform. The yearly program was arranged according to ability the beginners appearing first and the more skilled players coming, by way of climax at the end. Needless to say, I was always one of the first performers of the evening. Even when my contemporaries were presenting the grand finale, I, overgrown, awkward, suffering an agony of shyness, stumbled across the stage and played my little "Tra la la la." As the second on the program in a class of twenty odd. Those recitals did something to my soul. I find I cannot speak of them with levity; they left a permanent scar.

Finally, after six long years, and several fruitless rebellious at home, I took matters into my own hands. When I was excused from the school room to go to the studio, I left the schoolroom but, I never did reach my destination. I would hide for half an hour and read. When I was finally discovered, and the music in my life came to an abrupt but timely end, I was found behind the Episcopal Church reading "The Call of the Wild!"

Pasteurized

For the last twenty years a battle has been raging in Marlinton. I don't mean that we inhabitants have been in a state of siege all that time. We have enjoyed periods of comparative quiet, usually during the winter months, when the skirmishing died down; but we have always known that permanent peace could never be ours. The question involved is of great magnitude and the issue is vital; the citizens are partisan and intolerant; neither side has shown any disposition to mellow with age. Perennially, the fighting breaks out, now at a bridge party, now at the Ladies Aid, now in the jury room. Laides grow insulting, gentlemen angry, children belligerent. Every year a vote is never be ours. The question involved is [illegible]

the issue is vital; the citizens are partisan and intolerant;
neither side has shown any disposition to mellow with age. Perennially, the fighting breaks out, now at a bridge party, now at the Ladies Aid, now in the jury room. Laides grow insulting, gentlemen angry, children belligerent. Every year a vote is taken, an official vote, in a regular election, and the outcome is always the same; -Cows are allowed to walk the streets of Marlinton unaccompanied. The county paper carries the headline, "Cows Win Again!"

The town is divided; religion, politics and scandal take a back seat when the cow question comes up. Mrs. Martin is the leader of the anti-cow party, and Mr. Snow heads the pro-cow faction. These commanders are unforgiving, and uncompromising. Mrs. Martin and Mr. Snow haven't spoken for years. That is, they haven't spoken to each other; their loquaciousness on the burning question, in other circles, increases daily. And their methods of proselyting are not always above reproach. Mrs. Alton, an Anti-dow of several years standing, was heard voicing dedidedly pro-cow sentiments, recently. Her surprised neighbors investigated and the awful truth was revealed. Mrs. Alton had been the recipient of several gifts of cream from Mr. Snow!

The Pros, of course, are the cow owners. Naturally, they want their animals to eat grass, and the only grazing land in the valley is along the side-walks and on the vacant lots of the town. The Antis, however, complain that therein lies the point of the whole situation. The cows not only graze on the vacant lots, but also in the gardens and yards and shrubbery of the citizens; and this, in spite of the fact that high picket fences want their animals to eat grass, and the only grazing land in the valley is along the side-walks and on the vacant lots of the town. The Antis, however, complain that therein lies the point of the whole situation. The cows not only graze on the vacant lots, but also in the gardens and yards and shrubbery of the citizens; and this, in spite of the fact that high picket fences surround their property. Gates are sometimes left open by careless people, and the indictment has been made, too, that several cows have opened gates themselves. Each time a resident arises in the morning and finds his spinach devoured, the Antis gain a convert, and the fighting breaks out afresh.

A relative of ours from the city came to visit us one summer. One night he played bridge until past midnight with some friends down the street. When he started home the town was dark. Our town light company, assuming that all good citizens were at home and safe in their beds by midnight, cut off all the street lights at twelve o'clock. Any people who might be abroad after that late hour, should be ashamed of themselves, and glad to return home, unseen under cover of darkness. At any rate the young man started home, feeling his way along the fences. As he crept along the courthouse walk he stumbled and fell over a formidable and lively object, a suddenly awakened cow. His screams aroused the town.

I, myself, have never been a zealous supporter of either party. I have tried to remain neutral. I am one of those horrid, spineless, creatures who prefer peace at any price. But if I am anything, I guess I am a pro. Although we haven't owned a party. I have tried to remain neutral. I am one of those horrid, spineless, creatures who prefer peace at any price. But if I am anything, I guess I am a pro. Although we haven't owned a cow for many years I recollect a delightful parade of my youth. My father led the procession, carrying the milk bucket; I followed, close upon his heels; Tackle, our lame Airedale dog, came next; and my two cats brought up the rear. We marched, morning and evening from our house to the barn. We all superintended the milking, and upon our return to the house assisted in the consumption of the milk. Our ritual never varied. The three bowls on the back porch and one in the kitchen were filled and emptied twice a day.

One summer, after I had been absent for the better part of a year, I casually remarked that the island in the bend of the creek was a picturesque spot; the cows grazing there lent an atmosphere of rural peace rarely found in a town the size of Marlinton. I realized my mistake before the words were out of my mouth. The two Antis, who were in the car with me, close friends of mine from childhood, have been noticeably cool ever since. The situation, already tense, was not lightened when I had to stop the car at the next corner and wait while a cow took her leisurely way across the street.

Even when I am absent I am kept informed as to developments. The latest bulletin from the front carries surprising news. The cows themselves have taken up the issue now. Heretofore they have shown little interest in the affair, remaining calm and placid and unconcerned. But the constant bickering is beginning to tell. The cows are finally realizing that their far-famed contentment is threatened. They have taken steps. Mr. Barnell's Daisy, wilfully and with malice aforethought, on Tuesday last, had a calf in Mrs. Martin's front yard!

PART V

HISTORICAL DIVISION

PLAIN TALES OF MOUNTAIN TRAILS

I. The Midland Trail

II. The Seneca Trail

By ANDREW PRICE

President West Virginia Historical Society

Published under the auspices of the West Virginia Historical Society, through the courtesy of the Editor and Compiler of the Blue Book

1928

THE WEST VIRGINIA HISTORICAL SOCIETY

At the session of 1925, the Legislature passed a bill forming the "West Virginia Historical Society," making it a corporation and body politic. The bill was known as Senate Bill No. 376. It was introduced by Hon. Dennis M. Willis, a Senator from the Eeleventh District, and was enacted into law the 24th of April, going into effect ninety days from its passage.

The act as it appears in the Acts of 1925, beginning on page 254, is as follows:

AN ACT to incorporate the trustees of scenic and historic places and objects in West Virginia; preserve and publish history of West Virginia; and to provide for and keep certain property of the state.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of West Virginia:

That there be created an organization to preserve and keep the natural scenery and historic places and objects of the state, and to preserve and publish the history of West Virginia.

Section 1. The governor shall appoint a body of fifty-five persons, each one of whom shall have been identified in some manner in the preservation of history in this state, to be selected for an indefinite term, and so that each county of the state shall have one member, to constitute a body politic and corporate under the name of the West Virginia Historical Society, which shall have the power to purchase out of money in any manner coming into its hands, receive, and hold by grant, devise, bequest, or otherwise in trust or in perpetuity, real and personal estate for the use of said corporation of a value not to exceed one million dollars. It shall also have the power to publish and preserve the written history of the state.

Section 2. Said society shall in its discretion make recommendations to counties and other municipalities as to the preservation and control of scenic and historic spots, especially as to marking such spots along the highways of the state.

Section 3. Such society shall have the power to purchase out of money in any manner coming into its hands, receive, or in any lawful manner acquire historic objects, memorable, or picturesque places in fee, or in trust, and to preserve and improve the same; provided, however, that admission to the public shall always be free unless otherwise expressly provided for by some subsequent act of the legislature.

Section 4. No member of such society shall have any interest in any contract in which money is to be expended by said society. Such society shall have no capital stock. It shall have no power to sell, mortgage, give away, or encumber its property.

Section 5. The officers shall consist of a president, a vice-president, six directors, and a secretary-treasurer, who shall be elected annually and hold office until their successors are chosen. No salary shall be paid to any officer or member except to the secretary-treasurer, and to him only when specifically appropriated by the legislature.

Section 6. Such society shall make reports from time to time to the legislature.

Section 7. Nothing in this act shall in anywise affect the department or bureau of archives and history or the property under its supervision and control.

Section 8. Vacancies occurring in the list of said society by death, resignation, removal from the state or otherwise, shall be filled by the governor.

THE WEST VIRGINIA HISTORICAL SOCIETY

At the session of 1925, the Legislature passed a bill forming the "West Virginia Historical Society," making it a corporation and body politic. The bill was known as Senate Bill No. 376. It was introduced by Hon. Dennis M. Willis, a Senator from the Eeleventh District, and was enacted into law the 24th of April, going into effect ninety days from its passage.

The act as it appears in the Acts of 1925, beginning on page 254, is as follows:

AN ACT to incorporate the trustees of scenic and historic places and objects in West Virginia; preserve and publish history of West Virginia; and to provide for and keep certain property of the state.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of West Virginia:

That there be created an organization to preserve and keep the natural scenery and historic places and objects of the state, and to preserve and publish the history of West Virginia.

Section 1. The governor shall appoint a body of fifty-five persons, each one of whom shall have been identified in some manner in the preservation of history in this state, to be selected for an indefinite term, and so that each county of the state shall have one member, to constitute a body politic and corporate under the name of the West Virginia Historical Society, which shall have the power to purchase out of money in any manner coming into its hands, receive, and hold by grant, devise, bequest, or otherwise in trust or in perpetuity, real and personal estate for the use of said corporation of a value not to exceed one million dollars. It shall also have the power to publish and preserve the written history of the state.

Section 2. Said society shall in its discretion make recommendations to counties and other municipalities as to the preservation and control of scenic and historic spots, especially as to marking such spots along the highways of the state.

Section 3. Such society shall have the power to purchase out of money in any manner coming into its hands, receive, or in any lawful manner acquire historic objects, memorable, or picturesque places in fee, or in trust, and to preserve and improve the same; provided, however, that admission to the public shall always be free unless otherwise expressly provided for by some subsequent act of the legislature.

Section 4. No member of such society shall have any interest in any contract in which money is to be expended by said society. Such society shall have no capital stock. It shall have no power to sell, mortgage, give away, or encumber its property.

Section 5. The officers shall consist of a president, a vice-president, six directors, and a secretary-treasurer, who shall be elected annually and hold office until their successors are chosen. No salary shall be paid to any officer or member except to the secretary-treasurer, and to him only when specifically appropriated by the legislature.

Section 6. Such society shall make reports from time to time to the legislature.

Section 7. Nothing in this act shall in anywise affect the department or bureau of archives and history or the property under its supervision and control.

Section 8. Vacancies occurring in the list of said society by death, resignation, removal from the state or otherwise, shall be filled by the governor.

WEST VIRGINIA HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Roll of Members Appointed by Governor Gore under Authority of an Act of the Legislature passed April 24, 1925

BARBOUR—Richard E. Talbott, Philippi.
BERKELEY—C. J. Faulkner, Martinsburg.
BOONE—H. H. Andrews, Whitesville.
BRAXTON—John D. Sutton, Sutton.
BROOKE—Dr. Cloyd Goodnight, Bethany.
CABELL—Boyd Jarrell, Huntington.
CALHOUN—A. G. Mathews, Grantsville.
CLAY—E. G. Pierson, Clay.
DODDRIDGE—Hugh L. Hammond, West Union.
FAYETTE—Hon. J. Alfred Taylor, Fayetteville.
GRANT—Arch J. Welton, Petersburg.
GILMER—Dr. E. G. Rohrbough, Glenville.
GREENBRIER—Miss Io Boone, Ronceverte.
HAMPSHIRE—Robert White, Romney.
HANCOCK—R. M. Brown, New Cumberland.
HARDY—Miss Virginia Hopewell Wood, Moorefield.
HARRISON—Hon. Haymond Maxwell, Clarksburg.
JEFFERSON—Miss Ella May Turner, Shepherdstown.
JACKSON—Sattis Simmons, Ripley.
KANAWHA—William B. Mathews, Charleston.
LEWIS—C. B. McWhorter, Weston.
LINCOLN—Hon. Jacob D. Smith, Hamlin.
LOGAN—Walter R. Thurmond, Logan.
MARION—Mrs. Samuel Leeper, Fairmont.
MASON—Dean Chas. E. Hogg, Point Pleasant.
MARSHALL—James M. Rine, Glen Easton.
MERCER—H. W. Straley, Princeton.
MINERAL—C. N. Finnell, Keyser.
MINGO—Mrs. M. Z. White, Williamson.
MONONGALIA—Thos. Ray Dille, Morgantown.
MONROE—Miss Nettie Campbell, Union.
MORGAN—S. S. Buzzerd, Berkeley Springs.
MCDOWELL—Mrs. Luther Anderson, Welch.
NICHOLAS—Miss Gertrude Dotson, Richwood.
OHIO—Mrs. Julian G. Hearne, Wheeling.
PENDLETON—H. M. Calhoun, Franklin.
PLEASANTS—Ross Wells, St. Marys.
POCAHONTAS—Andrew Price, Marlinton.
PRESTON—J. C. Gibson, Kingwood.
PUTNAM—C. A. Forth, Hurricane.
RALEIGH—Mrs. W. H. Rardin, Beckley.
RANDOLPH—Claude W. Maxwell, Elkins.
RITCHIE—J. A. Wooddell, Pennsboro.
ROANE—W. H. Bishop, Spencer.
SUMMERS—Mrs. Princess Turner King, 805 N. Boulevard, Richmond, Va.
TAYLOR—Harry Kunst, Grafton.
TUCKER—Mrs. W. F. Lipscomb, Parsons.
TYLER—Mrs. Harrison W. Smith, Middlebourne.
UPSHUR—Hon. H. Roy Waugh, Buckhannon.
WAYNE—Miss Jenny Crum, West Moreland.
WEBSTER—William Waggy, Wainville.
WETZEL—Hon. L. S. Hall, New Martinsville.
WIRT—George W. Roberts, Elizabeth.
WOOD—Hon. John T. Harris, Parkersburg.
WYOMING—Mrs. Thomas Garner, Pineville.

WEST VIRGINIA HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Roll of Members Appointed by Governor Gore under Authority of an Act of the Legislature passed April 24, 1925

BARBOUR—Richard E. Talbott, Philippi.
BERKELEY—C. J. Faulkner, Martinsburg.
BOONE—H. H. Andrews, Whitesville.
BRAXTON—John D. Sutton, Sutton.
BROOKE—Dr. Cloyd Goodnight, Bethany.
CABELL—Boyd Jarrell, Huntington.
CALHOUN—A. G. Mathews, Grantsville.
CLAY—E. G. Pierson, Clay.
DODDRIDGE—Hugh L. Hammond, West Union.
FAYETTE—Hon. J. Alfred Taylor, Fayetteville.
GRANT—Arch J. Welton, Petersburg.
GILMER—Dr. E. G. Rohrbough, Glenville.
GREENBRIER—Miss Io Boone, Ronceverte.
HAMPSHIRE—Robert White, Romney.
HANCOCK—R. M. Brown, New Cumberland.
HARDY—Miss Virginia Hopewell Wood, Moorefield.
HARRISON—Hon. Haymond Maxwell, Clarksburg.
JEFFERSON—Miss Ella May Turner, Shepherdstown.
JACKSON—Sattis Simmons, Ripley.
KANAWHA—William B. Mathews, Charleston.
LEWIS—C. B. McWhorter, Weston.
LINCOLN—Hon. Jacob D. Smith, Hamlin.
LOGAN—Walter R. Thurmond, Logan.
MARION—Mrs. Samuel Leeper, Fairmont.
MASON—Dean Chas. E. Hogg, Point Pleasant.
MARSHALL—James M. Rine, Glen Easton.
MERCER—H. W. Straley, Princeton.
MINERAL—C. N. Finnell, Keyser.
MINGO—Mrs. M. Z. White, Williamson.
MONONGALIA—Thos. Ray Dille, Morgantown.
MONROE—Miss Nettie Campbell, Union.
MORGAN—S. S. Buzzerd, Berkeley Springs.
MCDOWELL—Mrs. Luther Anderson, Welch.
NICHOLAS—Miss Gertrude Dotson, Richwood.
OHIO—Mrs. Julian G. Hearne, Wheeling.
PENDLETON—H. M. Calhoun, Franklin.
PLEASANTS—Ross Wells, St. Marys.
POCAHONTAS—Andrew Price, Marlinton.
PRESTON—J. C. Gibson, Kingwood.
PUTNAM—C. A. Forth, Hurricane.
RALEIGH—Mrs. W. H. Rardin, Beckley.
RANDOLPH—Claude W. Maxwell, Elkins.
RITCHIE—J. A. Wooddell, Pennsboro.
ROANE—W. H. Bishop, Spencer.
SUMMERS—Mrs. Princess Turner King, 805 N. Boulevard, Richmond, Va.
TAYLOR—Harry Kunst, Grafton.
TUCKER—Mrs. W. F. Lipscomb, Parsons.
TYLER—Mrs. Harrison W. Smith, Middlebourne.
UPSHUR—Hon. H. Roy Waugh, Buckhannon.
WAYNE—Miss Jenny Crum, West Moreland.
WEBSTER—William Waggy, Wainville.
WETZEL—Hon. L. S. Hall, New Martinsville.
WIRT—George W. Roberts, Elizabeth.
WOOD—Hon. John T. Harris, Parkersburg.
WYOMING—Mrs. Thomas Garner, Pineville.

PART I

THE MIDLAND TRAIL

The Midland trail runs east and west, from the paw-paw to the pine,
The skyblue track on hill and dale—look at it loop and twine.
It follows the path of the minute men of the deadly flintlock gun,
The march that took them thirty days, you can make it in less than one.
They found it a howling wilderness, you whirl through a smiling land,
Where Crook fed his horses the standing crop, they greet you with waving hand.
Towns, woods, and field, by day and night, at dusk or in the dawn,
The eager car reels off the miles with the speed of a startled fawn.
So it is up and away, on the Height of Land, like the blue dust devils go—
The Sedan flees like an antlered buck, and the Ford like a barren doe!
Detour!

PREFACE

The Midland Trail has been a potent factor in the history of the United States. The geologist tells us that this is the oldest part of the nation since the continent rose from its last submergence. This great highway traverses this great peneplain and presents to the traveler the richest field on earth for the collector of the evidences of the upbuilding of the earth as shown by historical geology.

Here the New River breaks through the whole Appalachian range. Over this line of travel, General Andrew Lewis took his army and struck the first blow for the independence of the colonies. Here was the struggle which in the opening days of the Civil War determined the result of that appeal to arms.

When this highway was completed it was deemed proper for those who practiced the art of writing to turn to its inspiring history and to endeavor to make others feel the emotion that moved them. But we are a poor inarticulate race at the best and the efforts have not resulted in material worthy of the subject. That will have to come later. Some day a great singer will sing the song of the paw-paw and the pine.

The subject is inexhaustible. Every foot of the road furnishes a subject for a chapter. The following articles will be found to be in that strained condition that results when a poor orator has to keep one eye on his subject and the other on his reader.

ANDREW PRICE.

Marlinton, W. Va.

CHAPTER I

The Midland Trail over which Westward the Course of Empire took its way.

The Midland Trail is a restless place. It is a good deal like another trail in the north called Broadway, where people hurry to and fro. It is road number 3 cutting the State into two parts, after the manner New-Kanawha River first overcame the mountain barrier. Later on the Indians marked a trail, and perhaps the Kentucky buffalo made a trip through the rugged mountains to use the grass lands of the Valley of Virginia. Then the white men made a road called the James River & Kanawha Turnpike. Then the Virginians made the noble project of building a canal across the mountains, and they would have done so, too, but for the fact that the modern invention of the steam railway decreased the economic necessity of a water way from east to west. Then the C. & O. Railway crept across the divide and took away the dividends of the stage companies and the old pike fell into disuse except for local purposes. The pike had tackled mountains on the proved proposition that a straight line is the nearest way between two points. But the railroad had its limitations and it sought the grades along the stream. The railroad fixed the status of the State, for it came at a time when the natural resources of the State, especially its coal, were needed for the upbuilding of the Nation, and great cities like Huntington and Charleston and many other fine municipalities sprang up and flourished.

Then came the day of the new kind of wheel and the world commenced to sit on rubber pneumatic cushions and sew a finer seam, and then the old trail came back.

It appears that the commission was empowered to build roads and to give these roads names. The commission found it more convenient to give them numbers to begin with, but the more important highways began to get names, and the Midland Trail was the name that was placed on the old stage road, when it was broadened and surfaced and completed over mountain, hill, and dale.

It seems to me that I have always intended to travel this pike and see the wonders that the Lord hath made, but it was not until the year of grace, 1926, when I got a roving commission to go from county to county and talk to the hard-boiled professionals that go to make up the Institutes held during the summer time of the year that I had an opportunity to travel the road, and I cannot say that I saw everything that was to be seen, for I had to do the driving and the word has been passed around that he who drives the Midland Trail must keep his eye on the road every moment of the time. So the driver gets but fleeting glances.

It is about a hundred and eighty miles across the State of West Virginia by this highway, and about a hundred miles of it lies over the highlands through a rarefied atmosphere that is very grateful in the summer time, and the week I made the pilgrimage was said to have been unusually hot for any place or time. I know that I have never suffered from heat as I did at that time when I violated the rule to keep well above the two thousand foot contour line during the warm months.

The Seneca Trail will give even a better respite from the summer heat to the restless horde for it will afford a journey through the State of one hundred and ninety-eight miles, all of it well above the point of suffocation. These two trails will cross at Lewisburg, and the time will come when to even a greater extent than now the lowlanders will come to the uplands when the dog star rages and run their cars around in circles with glad cries.

The lowlanders have good winter climates, but we have the world beat on the upper levels in the summer time.

As most everybody else has taken a shot at the Midland Trail, I felt that I ought to be allowed to set down some of my observations.

I have read most of these rhapsodies about the Midland Trail, but they do not begin to bring home the realization of the pure delight that the presence of the woods, fields and streams bring to you.

The longer I live and the more I think about it, the more I am convinced that West Virginia, the odd State, is a magic world of its own not like any other part of the world, and I believe that I have discovered the secret hid in its mountains. In every age and in every time since history has been kept, there have been serious thinkers who tried to read the riddle of the lost island of Atlantis, or as it has been called the Islands of the Blest.

All historians sooner or later acknowledge that the only really ancient records are the stones and the record kept in the markings on the rock. Millions of years ago a drop of rain falling on a surface prepared to record it, now shows where it fell when the stone is brought in for the pile.

And so I will now drag in geology by the hair of her head and tell you something that has not been advanced before and that is that West Virginia is Atlantis. You remember the story of the man in the book. He had plenty of money and no work to do, and he devoted some years of his life to discover a specimen of that rare bird known as a man-about-town. Finally he himself got his name in the papers by reason of having got run over by a street car, and there it was stated that he was a man-about-town. All that he needed in his search was the thought to glance in a looking-glass. So it is with you West Virginians who have given the identity of Atlantis a second thought. All you needed to know about Atlantis, was to look out of the window and you would have seen the wonder land.

Let us reason together. Let us bring to the hearing pure minds, clear consciences, understanding hearts, and retentive memories, fully prepared to claim everything that will redound to the honor and glory of West Virginia.

It is written in the rock and expounded by the geologist, that once upon a time, all of the Western Hemisphere was a sea except that rising from that gray and melancholy waste was an emerald isle whose boundaries were nearly that of West Virginia of today. It was in the carboniferous age, and there was a luxuriant growth of vegetation such as is not known today. Club moss, now perhaps three inches high, grew as tall as hemlock trees, and other things in proportion, and the great coal deposits were formed and hid away for a future time and occasion. After some millions of years, this wonderful land was changed by the action of water. At first it was a great mass of rock, but in time erosion had reduced it to a base level called a peneplain, by which is meant a plain. It was tilted and sloped to the northwest, and on close inspection it was seamed and fissured with valleys through which the water ran to the sea. At a great height it would look like a level plain, but to those who dwelt upon its surface it seemed to be rugged and mountainous and anything but a plain. But the geologist is not deceived. He knows that it is the remnant of a great rock that once towered forty or fifty thousand feet above the surface of the water, and which has weathered down to its present form, still a plain but somewhat eroded.

This is the reason that you can look in the bottom of great valleys like that of the New River and the Elk River and other rivers and see rock stratas as level as the floor on the water line and then lift your eyes and see a thousand or more feet above you the crest of a mountain, and you know that it was wholly formed, cut out, and shaped by little drops of water. Time amounts to nothing with a mountain. After the lapse of some hundred million of years—to use that as a convenient round number—the mountain isle was ready to receive and support human life of divine origin. And that it when the supermen of Atlantis came into being.

The tradition is that the commonwealth of Atlantis was the most powerful and the best governed of any country under the sun. The men were the strongest, and the women the most beautiful. Its climate was equable. Its lands rich. Its waters the most pure. Its grass the greenest. In fact, it was a blue grass country. Sailing from its shores, the men of Atlantis conquered the world, save only and excepting Athens, whose men were left to tell the tale. Everything that was desirable was to be found in Atlantis, and it was the dream of the down-trodden European to sail away to the Islands of the Blest.

Sometime when I have more time, I will go into the details concerning Atlantis, to a fuller extent, but for the present, suffice it to say, that if you would cut away the later geological upheavals to the north, east, south, and west, of the Mountain State, that you would restore Atlantis, which as every one knew in those days of the dim red dawn of man, lay west of the Pillars of Hercules, which is now called Gibraltar.

The report that Atlantis had been sunk beneath the sea was not correct. What really happened was that on every side the earth trembled, and the continent of North America rose all around about it, and the ensuing heat, confusion, and torrential rain wholly destroyed the citizens of Atlantis, and it waited for another day and time, when Europeans would turn longing eyes to the west. There is no wonder that it could not be found when the ships were built that could traverse the Atlantic Ocean. Atlantis was hundreds of miles inland.

Sometime when we have time, it would be a delightful task to trace the limits of the acreage formed by erosion, as distinguished by that formed by sediment and that formed by folded strata. Then it is that we will know the limits of Atlantis famed in song and story.

And there is no better place to see Atlantis than along the Midland Trail. The valley of the high steep sides has the right to be called the New River canyon. There is just room for the river and the railroad in the bottom, and the highway occupies a terrifying height above the awful gorge. A top of a cliff known as Hawk's Nest, is a frightful place. A walk of about two hundred feet brings you to the brink of one of the most awful precipices in the world. Not a sign of a railing or support. Keep away from the edge.

The drop is something over a thousand feet. It is almost perpendicular. It takes a good thrower to send a stone into the waters of the New River, but that seems unbelievable to those who stand on the little platform on the brink large enough to afford standing room to about six persons. A person standing there is fully convinced that he could leap into the river.

In 1812, Chief Justice John Marshall, one of the State commissioners, came to this rock, and stood upon it, and had accurate measurements made of it. At that time, in honor of the visit of the chief justice, and the interest that he took in the place, the citizens of Kanawha County changed the name from Hawk's Nest to Marshall's Pillar, but the name did not take. One hears only of Hawk's Nest.

Something over a hundred years ago a traveler from a foreign country was traveling east on the stage coach. He arrived at Kanawha Falls at midnight, where a stop of three hours was scheduled at the inn, which by the way is still standing, an immense brick mansion, the property of Mrs. C. W. Osenton. The traveler clambered out over the rock to see the falls by the light of a fading moon. Here it was that Batts and Fallam took formal possession of the Mississippi Valley for King Charles II, of England, in 1671.

The passengers were roused at three in the morning to resume their journey and the road climbed Gauley Mountain, a continuation of the Cumberland Mountains. It is ten or eleven miles to Hawk's Nest as I recall it. The stage coach made it in four hours according to this account. Approaching the spot of great reputed beauty, they pledged the coachman to stop, and from the top of the cliff on which then stood an ancient pine, the traveler seems to have gotten quite a kick.

He wondered if it were possible to gain access to the level of the river, for it looked like he might find some peace there. As far as he could tell it had never been trodden by the foot of man. That is changed now. The railroad town of Hawk's Nest is there and trains de luxe go roaring through by day and by night, and I am here to tell to the cockeyed world that I much prefer to look up at Hawk's Nest the pillar than to look down at Hawk's Nest the town.

There is little doubt that the pioneer left the bottom of the New River gorge alone. The engineers sent out from Richmond to go through the gorge at Hawk's Nest to observe its possibilities were strictly enjoined to employ one particular man who was fond of roving through it on hunting and fishing expeditions. This man refused to go because he was preparing to plant corn. Instructions then became peremptory to get him no matter at what cost. They were prepared to pay him a thousand dollars. The only contract that he would make was that he should have the setting of the sum and he would not name it until he knew how long they would be getting through. It was so agreed and the party spent four days in the gorge, and the farmer, solely on account of having to hire hands to plant corn, demanded six dollars for the trip.

My observation is that outside of the garages and the drug stores and the hot dog stands, that tourists are not particularly welcome to the hard-working populace that inhabit the Midland Trail. In vain do the thinkers cry out to the people, "Make much of the tourist!" The citizen does not encourage conversation. At least those I tried to interest were polite but distant. I think they are fed up on strange faces. It was the hottest weather ever known outside of Hades, and it seemed to me that I was begging water with my hat in my hand all the time. And it was forthcoming, but it seemed to give no pleasure to the gracious giver. I tried tipping for water and that did not work, for I suppose that while they would like to have the money, it would not do to have it said that water was not free. It was in the dry season, and this condition will not prevail except in such a year as that and then only for a few days. I think I saw thousands of little children of school age carrying pails of water from distant springs. But I think the drought ended the day I came through on my way back, and paradise no doubt has resumed her sway in the delectable mountains.

I am glad I made that trip clear to the Ohio River on the Midland Trail, for if a gentleman can guide a car that distance over that road, meeting a car every few moments and being overhauled and passed by all kinds of craft—I say that if he can do that and still preserve his Christian integrity and the sunshine in his soul, then he ought to be able to drive on that other Broadway that follows the old calf path through New York City.

I observed a curious thing. After coming out of Charleston there came a lull in the proceedings in that while I met about thirty cars a minute, I was not overhauled for a couple of minutes. I went tooling along at a fast trot and came up to a car that was making about five miles an hour and I fell in behind it and on we went for some minutes at a fast walk. If it had not been for one thing I would have tried to pass, but so far I have not passed a single moving pleasure car. I have passed tractors and trucks, but so far each and every driver is fast enough for me. I saw the driver turn and look at me several times, and he was about fifty years old and had the eye of an eagle and the whimsical face of a kidder.

Presently other cars drew up and one of them gave a polite "Toot," which meant "damye, get over and slow down and let me by." He went by me and was going on by the front man, when that car picked up speed and kept ahead. Every now and then the speeding car would say "Toot!" Then it got to saying "Toot?" and then it ceased all sound. By and by, some twenty or thirty cars got by me and fell into line behind the two leaders, and then I got to speeding up for I wanted to see how it all came out. And another car came up. A many-colored roadster driven by a male about eighteen years old accompanied by two females still younger . With a polite salute and with a wide sweep on the margin of the road he went by me, and when he found what was up, he gave one fell whoop and charged into the pile and by the time he had got to the head of the column he had broken the race all up. He picked them up and flung them behind one by one, for youth will be served. I have no doubt that the youngster got safely to the end of his journey in a short time and sat down to loaf.

These crowded roads are not so comfortable as they seem though the country has many millions of drivers who are far more resourceful and expert than the old time locomotive driver who was regarded with so much awe. All he could do was to keep to the rails. The common ordinary family driver, man, woman and child, must be prepared to drive a car through the eye of a needle and never scratch the paint.

I saw one aggregation of human beings and the perils of the crowded road. I came to a railroad crossing. I saw the first sign. The highway paralleled the track and crossed diagonally. Between me and the crossing was a Ford, then a boy on a bicycle, and my car. A street car whistled for the crossing. I was well to the right of the white line. The Ford in front slipped across ahead of the street car. The boy on the bicycle slowed so he barely moved, and I was barely moving well behind him. Just then a car banged into my running board, so that it was badly bended down and cost seventy-five cents to get it fixed. I never knew who hit me for the traffic flowed on in a stream for a few minutes. A dozen or more cars went by. As soon as I got across the track I stopped to see what damage had been done. A couple of walkers then came to me full of indignation. "Did you get his number?" Never had identified the car. Then the men told me what had happened. Most of us had lined up as I was giving the street car the ten seconds it needed, but one man had left the line to pass so that he could graze the tail end of the street car and get to his loafing place without delay. He passed successfully until he came to a point opposite my car. There he encountered the two pedestrians walking towards him on their right-hand side of the road, and as they refused to give in, the car driver had turned violently to the right and landed against me. The walkers were in workingmen's clothes. It was about six in the evening, and I bet they belonged to the union and stood upon their rights. Envying the lamb in the large place, I grinned and went on. There was a combination of a street car, a boy on a bicycle, a lot of motorcars, and a couple of walkers, on a busy highway at a railway crossing. I am more than ever convinced that in emergencies that if every mother's son of them will stop and freeze that nothing can happen.

Even though a tourist may be unwelcome to a man with a house by the road, I came back from a swing around in nine counties more than ever convinced that West Virginia is the show place of the world. I am tired of that Switzerland business. Switzerland is not worthy to hold a candle to Atlantis.

And when I come to think about it, I, too, live by the road and thousands go skyhooting along, and maybe they think that we are cold. Well, it is a fact, that they are on a lark, and I am at home grubbing along. I have got a notion to put up a sign "This is a friendly house. Call for water or anything else you need. Talk your blamed head off if you want to."

CHAPTER II

Nine Miles Lost, but it was Nine Miles off the Top of the World. Dunmore's War. Camp 12 was Charlestown, now Charleston.

South by sou'west and all sail set, and a wet seat and a wandering foot, and ho for the Midland Trail! That is the country where I am going to take my pleasure pretty soon. I had known about that kind of a country for a long time. In the days when I took to the woods, I always went to the west. In that direction lay trout, and deer, and blackberries. No snakes in Erose, at least no pizen snakes. The only time that I remember having chosen the east side of Greenbrier River as a place to camp, and having picked out a smooth place underneath some overhanging trees, a rattlesnake lifted up his head and shook his castanets at us, and we camped on the west side of the river after that sinister welcome.

Many is the month that I have roamed through the rich lands to the west and slept on the ground. Strange as it may seem, I do not count that time as lost. It now appears that it was the most sensible of the things that I did. I got to know that country of great mountains and forested valleys. I have seen from the high peaks, the dawn come up like thunder. I have heard the roar of the rivers. I have been in the shadow of the great trees. And then the time came when fate put the harness on me and I had to go to work, and I neglected the wilderness. And the timber men came to give the mountains a hair cut and messed things up considerably. But the memory of those woods was clear and the thought of the peace there has soothed me to sleep thousands of times.

The other day I had occasion to go to the southwestern part of the State and we went forth in the Ford car, and in that way we found the Midland Trail, and for something like seventy-five miles I saw the land of my dreams from the sure foundation of a boulevard. So I want to go back and take my time and jog through the country that lies between Lewisburg and the mouth of Gauley River, for that is the kind of a country that I delighted to frequent in the dear dead days now gone beyond recall.

But I must get down to my knitting and stop trying to do fine writing like a lady. I have been trying to explain the geological formation of these endless mountains, and I cannot get the stuff verified by the scientists. The trouble about them is that they lack the vision to see the land as it once was. A peneplain is to them a peneplain and it is nothing more. They cannot see the part that has disappeared, and if they could they would not dare to talk about it, for they are materialists of the most pronounced type. One of the greatest of all geologists, Dr. I. C. White, gave me the clue once when I heard him make the assertion that nearly all the mountains of West Virginia were formed by erosion. And starting from that accepted truth, I was able to build my mountains in the air. I got one other cold fact. The table lands in these parts once rose fifty thousand feet into the air. That is from a book. Starting from this true premise, I am going to make another effort to get my vision to you after the manner of the inarticulate.

A million years is but a moment in the sight of a geologist, and yet he cannot afford to have any imagination. I can wander in the realms of fancy.

And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, and said let the dry land appear. Then where we now sit, surrounded by all that endears and embellishes civilized life, on the third day, there arose a great level of an oblong shape, with a flat top, ten miles above the surface of the water, slightly tilted to the northwest. That was the beginning of the western hemisphere. And the Lord said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, and that was still accomplished in the third day.

In pursuance of this command, the great flat rock began to weather down and in course of time it had lost nine miles of solids in height, and the irregular wearing away by the winds and the water had left an erosed surface consisting of mountains, hills, valleys, and plains, the whole constituting a peneplain, by which is meant a land surface reduced by erosion almost to base level, so that most of it is nearly plain. For instance you think of Elk Mountain as a great mountain, when in fact it is but a bump on the plain. And we think that we are above highwater mark and safe from the waves of the sea. Just remember that out of the ten miles that we once had that we have left less than a mile to go upon. We are down to the last mile and going fast, geologically speaking. We are nearing base level.

The washings from this great plateau formed the Mississippi Valley to a great extent. Nearly all of the fertile part. That is what the State of Mississippi owes to the State of West Virginia. Let them look to the hills from whence cometh their help.

As the great rock wore down the long water courses flowed to the west and on the east the slope was precipitate and plunged to the sea, and the surf beat upon a narrow beach just about where the Greenbrier flows today. You can go along a well defined and curving line and pick up coral and shell shapes today.

And this was the end of the fourth day. And then in the fifth period there came some animal life into the world but it was confined to the waters, with the exception, that certain aquatic forms could fly over the land and return to the waters, and that is the reason that fish, birds and reptiles are the oldest form of animal life. And on the sixth day the land animals were made, and then the earth was ready for man who was t have dominion over the creatures. That is the history of creation, especially that part of it where we live.

We do not have everything here for we have been saved from great convulsions and from volcanic fires. The muck heap to the west became the great valley, and to the east the sea pushed away several hundred miles by some bastions that were thrown up by the folding of the crust of the earth, so that instead of the bullering of the surf, we hear the murmuring of the brook.

So the Midland Trail affords a most convenient way to view the oldest part of creation.

And by the way the more I think about it, the more I am convinced that if we had more poetical geologists, that we would get a better picture of the earth as it was at the beginning.

Geologists are inclined to be too matter of fact. They rely too much upon the printed word. They are too much like the ancient witness. In Morgantown, on the banks of the Monongahela River, at the courthouse years ago they were examining an old lady who was to prove an event that happened almost beyond the memory of man. She said that she did not know what year she was born. She did not know how old she was. Then the lawyer asked her if she could not fix her age by some event that had occurred in her early childhood, for example her first visit to Morgantown. Her answer was: "I could not pretend to give my age but I am very certain that when I was a little girl and first visited Morgantown there was no river there."

That is my idea of a geologist. A person whose field work is crippled by imperfect recollections of textbooks. It is getting to be about time for a new deal. Time to burn all the geological works except the first chapter of Genesis, and to let men of the radiant radio age give us their ideas of creation and the meaning of the markings on the rocks.

But at this rate, I am going to be quite a long time getting to the Midland Trail. Midland Trail is road 3, to be succinct. The crossroads are at Lewisburg. The Midland Trail is an east and west road. The north and south road had no individual number but you cannot keep a good road down so it just growed, and to give it entity they called it the Seneca Trail. In the confusion of the christening in the first instance, it should have been road number four, but that fell to a road that runs through the central part of the State, the great road in Braxton County.

Every since the Seneca Trail has been growing like a green bay tree, road four has been in trouble. We hold that is one of the reasons that the tribes that live on Road 4 will not let a Senator come from the Seneca country.

My home is forty-two miles north of the Midland Trail and we have to win our way over Droop Mountain and Spring Creek Mountain, and through the red McCready shale of the Little Levels, and Renicks Valley, and the Big Levels to get to the Midland Trail. If we could follow the bank of the Greenbrier River down to the Midland Trail, it would not be so bad, but we have to go over the uplands where the people live to get there.

I went down one day to add to the confusion that exists in the mind of the educated, and talked to the Institute of Greenbrier County. I thought we might be able to do something about New England having stolen all the credit that belongs to Greenbrier County as the birthplace of American independence. We did not get it fully accomplished, but I hope that we got something started.

After the lecture, and before I had come out from under the hypnosis superinduced by an effort to speak in public, a young lady professor from Frankford asked me how I secured my facts that I used in my writings about this part of the country. I was not at all clear with her, I am sure, and being a writer, rather than a speaker, I want to set down a few matters here in that connection. I am credulous by nature and am willing to believe. I think we can sense the truth. I know women can. Do not ask me how I know that. And I go so far as to say, that if a community has no historical matters, that it is the duty of the local historian to supply them. But it is all bosh to say that a community has no history. There is material for many books in the history of every cross-roads. And I would rather be asked about specific statements anyway, for I will be only too glad to furnish detailed information as to my authority. That is one of the important things about putting your assertions in print. It is scanned by thousands, and if it stands the pitiless publicity without contradiction, it is almost established itself. Look at that statement about the burial of Washington Neff, the soldier. I had him buried on the right creek but in the wrong field, and full and complete facts were forthcoming at once from every point of the compass to set the record right.

The lady asked me about Fort Stuart or Stewart. They say that Col. Stuart signed his name both ways. Frankford lies between here and the Midland Trail in the Big Levels. It is a town first settled by Col. John Stuart in 1769, and it is the only large town that I can recall that does not have as much as a spring branch to give it the name of a ford. Ford is an Anglo-Saxon word and until the other day had but one meaning and that was where a stream can be crossed by wading. Lately it also means a pleasure carriage.

So I take it, that the name has suffered somewhat in transmission for it was a fort, and not a ford. So that is one way that a historian reasons aloud, and whether it is sound or not is for the reader to say.

The question is whether Fort Stuart was on the other side of Lewisburg or whether it was the Stuart place at Frankford. Lately I have been giving it as my opinion that it was not Frankford. Col. John Stuart had a fort at Frankford but the name of that fort was Fort Spring, a name that is given to a town in another part of Greenbrier County.

It is very hard to get documentary evidence of those days on the Western Waters. On the 2nd day of September, 1774, Col. William Fleming was in camp at the big spring at Lewisburg. He set down in his journal that day the following words: "We were alarmed by a report that Stewarts Fort, four miles from camp, was attacked by Indians."

On the first day of August, 1774, Gen. James Robertson wrote to Col. William Preston, that he had just received flying news that the Indians had shot one of Arbuckle's sentries on Muddy Creek; that John Stewart had a company in the levels of Greenbrier, "not more than six miles from Arbuckle's fort." I do not know this Midland Trail country so well, but it appears to me from my local knowledge of Muddy Creek, which is the stream that comes into the Greenbrier River near Alderson, that Stuart's Fort as depended upon by the community in 1774 was south of the Midland Trail and not at Frankford, ten miles north of the Midland Trail and much further than that from Muddy Creek.

There it is for you. That is the evidence that is convenient. We know that in 1774 there was no fort at Lewisburg. The place was chosen for the assembling of the first army to resist the power and orders of the British king in regard to settlements west of the Allegheny Mountain.

Stewart's Fort must have been the nearest fort to the big spring. The evidence that I have used in this article as to the record in the handwriting of Fleming and Robertson was gathered by the Wisconsin Historical Society which was the first to collect the old letters and journals preserved in these mountains, and which are in that western State. Wisconsin has done more to preserve our history than we have ourselves. That record refers to Frankford and as Frankfort. Their books can be consulted, and for a very reasonable sum they will send photo copies of any of the old manuscripts that they hold. The index to their manuscripts makes a large volume in itself.

Before the snow flies, I hope to have time to go to the Midland Trail and loiter along it and make a complete and satisfactory study of the way the army marched in 1774, in the current of the Revolution.

Col. Fleming, commanding the Botetourt militia, left Lewisburg on the Midland Trail, September 12, 1774, and marched seven miles crossing Muddy Creek Mountain. By constant marching his command reached the mouth of Elk River at Charleston on the evening of the 23rd day of September, having spent twelve days on the march. Here the army halted for something like a week to get canoes made. Then they marched and floated down the river to the mouth of Coal River, to a camp.

I followed him to that point, but I noticed some changes. From the camp that he calls Camp 12, to the mouth of Coal River, I found a great city, and for something like fourteen or fifteen miles, I was driving through a town. Here is a significant thing. That Camp 12 was somewhere in the upper part of Charleston, above the State House, and the countersign for the day for that camp was "Charlestown." This antedated by some years the establishment of Fort Clendenin, by George Clendenin, and Charleston was named in honor of his father, Charles Clendenin. Yet we find that the parole word for that first encampment of Americans to be "Charlestown," which was the original name given the present city. At Elk River the work was "Dunkirk." At Coal River the word was "Burke." At Point Pleasant the first day, the word was "York," second day "Cork," third day "Gooch," fourth day "Richmond." And the fifth day they got into a fight before a word could be given out.

At the mouth of Coal River, the ancient and honorable city of St. Albans, the Midland Trail swings over a mountain and keeps to the left, while the pioneer army kept on down the river towards the Point. I was not prepared to leave the line of march so I turned on down the river and followed it some twelve or fifteen miles on a broad road that leads to Winfield, the county seat of Putnam, on the banks of the Great Kanawha, where the steamboats stop. The courthouse has a bell that was salvaged from a great steamer that blew up at this point.

I had a most delightful day at Winfield concerning which I hope to write at some future time. It is a small town, with so much strength in stores, hotels, newspapers, lawyers, banks, and schools that it seems to be over-engined for its beam, but that is because it is the county seat of a great county.

I had seen about the fishing in 1774 in the army records and I made inquiry of the barber of Winfield while he was trying to make me look like an old basin freshly scoured, he knew about fishing. It is different there from the kind I was used to, where the fish are jumping crazy for the fly or bait. It is still water and when a fisherman overcomes a big catfish they butcher it and put the choice cuts on the market and retail it out at from twenty-five cents to thirty-five cents a pound. There is a recollection of one big one that weighed eighty-two pounds gross that was peddled out to the public.

There was another case of an eighty-pound catfish. In this case the fish had taken refuge in a big hollow sunken log and it had grown so big that it could not get out of its retreat. So the log was hauled out and split open and the fish extracted.

I asked the barber if there were any notable fishes frequenting that part of the river which had not been taken. He said there certainly was one, and he had seen it. When it came to the top of the water that it made as much commotion as a horse. It could not be taken with a line. It went around trailing fishing lines from its mouth. They called it "Old Ruffner." And the taking of Old Ruffner is the thing that those boys have to look forward to.

CHAPTER III

Dunmore's Army on the Midland Trail. The Surveying Parties of 1774. The Dunmore Campaign the Beginning of the Revolution.

A lady in Point Pleasant said to me that she would like me to give some authority for calling the battle of Point Pleasant the first battle of the Revolution. She had a son who lived in Washington and it seems that when he advanced that claim, the people laughed. The New England bodyguard would see to that. It has always been plain to me that the Revolution began at Lewisburg and ended at Yorktown. Began in Virginia and ended in Virginia, but great is the power of the printed word, and New England claims the beginning of the Revolution to be the battles of Lexington and Concord in April, 1775. Ridpath refers to Patrick Henry and his speech in 1765 in the House of Burgesses in Virginia in which he declared for liberty or death as the effort of an "uneducated mountaineer of Louisa County."

Roosevelt's construction is the true one. He was more than a historian. He was a history maker himself. But he is second to none as an interpreter of history. In his "Winning of the West," Part I, chapter two, "In the Current of the Revolution," he said:

"Lord Dunmore's War waged by Americans for the good of America, was the opening act in the drama whereof the closing scene was played at Yorktown. It made possible the twofold character of the Revolutionary War, wherein on the one hand the Americans won by conquest and colonization new lands for their children, and on the other wrought out their national independence of the British king."

If a West Virginian desires further verification he is hard to please.

Roosevelt cannot be charged with sectional influence. He was a citizen born and bred north of forty-one, and was not moved by sectional prejudice or pride. Surely any fair-minded man will accept his value of the worth of the efforts of the mountaineers in asserting their rights in defense of their homes.

Dunmore's army at Fort Gower, November 5, 1774, declared by written resolution:

"The love of Liberty, and attachment to the real interests and just rights of America outweigh every other consideration."

"We resolve that we will exert every power within us for the defense of American liberty, and for the support of her just rights and privileges."

Those were the declarations of men under arms at the end of a successful campaign and antedated the formal declaration of independence that was to follow nearly two years later.

Revolution implies the overthrow of one government and the substitution of another by the governed. Rebellion is the open, organized, and armed resistance to constituted authority. As a revolution the revolt was on the part of the thirteen colonies of the British empire, and did not involve the whole empire. Therefore it might be said that when the movement succeeds that it is a revolution, and that when it fails it is a rebellion.

The point I wish to make is that when the colonies revolted and acted independently of Great Britain, that they asserted themselves as Americans, and when they were engaged in establishing their rights by the force of arms, that all who opposed them were enemies, whether they were British soldiers, Hessian troops, Indian warriors, or Tories. It must be remembered that some of the greatest battles were fought against Americans, as in the case of Kings Mountain, where so many Tories lived.

In the case of the war of 1774, every citizen on the Western Waters held his homestead in defiance of the king's proclamation to vacate. This was passive defiance. When these citizens formed an army and fought a war that was an overt act against the constituted authority of Great Britain, as construed in London, and in a great measure at Williamsburg.

Virginia was having an unhappy time. The loyalists were so strong that it forced all to declare for the king, and the distinction was made as to king's ministers. It took a couple of years to bring the temper of the people to the point of issuing the declaration of independence.

In regard to the proclamation of the king in 1763, to prevent additional immigration to the west, and to require those who had settled on the Western Waters to return, that applied to Virginia and Pennsylvania particularly. In Pennsylvania, that colony approved the king's order and forcibly removed the settlers from the Indian land. Virginia did not attempt that. But the House of Burgesses took the middle course of refusing to authorize or appropriate for the war of 1774. As far as I can learn, there was not a dollar of public money to back the campaign, and though after its wonderful success, commissioners were appointed to list the soldiers and fix their rewards, I find no record of any appropriation for them.

When Dunmore stepped in and prevented the plunder of the rich Indian towns in Ohio, then the minute men were about to turn on him, and it afterwards appeared that they did lose there the only chance that they had of reimbursing themselves for their time and expense. But it was part of the Providence that watched over the destinies of America, that the soldiers did not help themselves to the riches of the Indians, though great quantities of spoil from the paleface cabins had been carried into those towns the preceding summer. Think of the emotions of a mountaineer who identified his favorite horse or his rifle gun in the hands of an Indian, and not being able to replevin them.

It was my intention on taking up this subject to compare the moving causes of the Revolution. I cannot help but feel that the land laws of Virginia had more to do with the spirit of revolt than even the stamp tax or the tea tax.

It is well known that sandy and desolate lands of the Atlantic seaboard caused the land that comprised the thirteen colonies to be ignored by the European nations for more than a hundred years. Vessels would be put into Chesapeake Bay and seeing a country not much better than the Sahara Desert would leave for the rich lands of Central and South America. England was slow to act upon the discoveries of Columbus, and when she did act, about all that was left was that uninviting country along the seaboard lying between 34 degrees and 48 degrees north, and England had a most difficult undertaking to get settlements started at Jamestown and Plymouth Rock. But when it was found out that the land as it extended inward became much better, the country settled up very fast.

The Blue Ridge Mountains were fixed as the western line for a long time, but after a hundred years or more, Fairfax and Borden succeeded in making a foothold in the Valley of Virginia, and in 1722, the Great Men of the Five Nations at Albany ratified a treaty fixing the Great Ridge, the Allegheny Mountains, as the partition line between the land of the palefaces and the lands of the red men, and after that the settlement of the Valley of Virginia and all of the waters of the Potomac River was rapid, and the settlers came largely from Pennsylvania and New Jersey, for the land was the best in the world.

Borden had succeeded with his colonization scheme by which he was entitled to take up five hundred thousand acres in odd shapes and sizes, and this was managed from Staunton with the aid and assistance of John Lewis. Borden got this concession in 1736. In ten years the great county of Augusta was formed. The rich lands of the Shenandoah waters., ready for the scythe, gave a great impetus to immigration from the north and east. In a few years the game had been driven to the mountains, and it became a custom to make hunting trips into the Indian reservation to the west in the fall of the year for a supply of venison. And thus the pioneers saw much fine land especially in the Greenbrier valley.

In the seventeen-forties, squatters began to come here. The oldest recorded settlement is that of Jacob Marlin who was established here in 1749, but who had come some time before that. Owing no doubt to fortuitous circumstances, his presence here was noted in such a way that every conservative history of the Western Waters starts with 1749, and Jacob Marlin's house, making the town of Marlinton the oldest English settlement in the Mississippi Valley, for which background we are duly thankful.

In the course of events, the rich lands of the southwestern part of the present boundary of Virginia attracted attention, and also the rich lands now within the bounds of Kentucky. But the trouble was that they were on the Western Waters, and when the palefaces broke over the border, the Iroquois or Five Nations, put up a regular protest with the colonies of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, giving each year the number of trespassers on their lands, and objecting to the invasion. And these complaints reached London. The government of all the colonies except Virginia were able to control the tide of immigration, but Virginia could not control it. For instance the topography of the country was such that it was impossible to tell what was what as between the waters that flowed to the Chesapeake Bay and those that flowed to the Gulf of Mexico. The Indians knew but the white men did not, but they did not greatly care. The tourist today does not know as he hastens across the mountains where he leaves the Mississippi Valley. And the great New River rising in North Carolina and breaking through the mountains to the Ohio River added to the confusion.

The government of England no doubt intended to keep their compact with the Indians but they became muddled owing to the lack of maps and definite information. In 1749, they granted to John Lewis and Thomas Walker and a lot of other men under the name of the Loyal Company the right to locate 800,000 acres in small detached parcels from the Blue Ridge west, north of the North Carolina line, all of which was on the Western Waters. And in 1751, the right was granted to the Greenbrier Company to take up and locate 100,000 acres to the northwest and west of the Cowpasture River, and Newfoundland. Newfoundland was the name given to the Cowpasture settlement. Note that northwest and west description. The mouth of the Greenbrier is due west of the mouth of the Cowpasture River. And all of the great Jackson River valley is west and northwest of the Cowpasture, and one is forced to the conclusion that the canny Scotch put it over on the Londoners in both instances.

The result was that though more than a thousand surveys were made by these companies, no grants or patents were issued until after the titles had been confirmed by a revolution, and then by the new government.

The French and Indian War brought out the truth in regard to these grants, and it was in 1763, that the king attempted to nullify the western movement by his proclamation. And when that did not succeed, in 1768, he bought the land out from under the settlers and claimed it as against all the colonies.

The companies were in a bad fix. In the first place they had only four years to complete their surveys, and the French and Indian War breaking out drove most of the palefaces off of the Western Waters. The annual complaints of the Indian governments kept them in hot water. The king claimed the land by right of purchase from the Iroquois. The Shawnees disputed the title of both. The Greenbrier and the Loyal Companies granted rights contingent on their own rights being ratified at some subsequent time. The word "if" controlled the grants. The pioneers decided that they would go on over and settle in the land of Canaan and take chances. Once in a while some settlers would shelter behind a company permit.

In 1768, Governor John Blair in his message to the House of Burgesses of Virginia, said: "A set of men regardless of natural justice, and in contempt of royal proclamation, have dared to settle themselves upon lands near Cheat River, which are the property of the Indians."

This was the condition up to 1773. That year the two companies, Loyal and Greenbrier, appeared before the governor and council, and represented that certain soldiers holding military grants under the order of 1763, were locating their lands on surveys made by the companies, and that when there was such a superabundance of land that it was not right that the soldiers should take land that had been previously claimed. And on this hearing the council ordered that the holders of military grants for service should locate their lands so as not to interfere with legal surveys or actual settlements.

This was the entering of the thin edge of the wedge. The order was entered on December 16, 1773. It was destined to bring great results to America. It was a test as to whether the colonies were to grow and expand and govern themselves or continue to be at the mercy of the politicians in London. The king had shut up the land office to prevent the issuing of grants to public land, and necessity had sharpened the wits of the mountaineers and they were going ahead, and getting as much authority as they could.

By 1773 the settlers had moved to the mountains by the thousands, and they were without title papers. The Iroquois had made a quit claim to the king of England, but they knew nothing of land titles other than that a cultivated field belonged to the Indian or his family as long as they used it and no longer. They understood the grant to the king to be permission to use the land with them. The king held it to prevent settlements. The Shawnees claimed it.

No doubt on the evening of the 16th of December, 1773, John Lewis, Andrew Lewis, Thomas Walker, William Preston, Hugh Mercer, and the other mountaineers had a quiet meeting celebrating their victory, for they had ground to argue that the governor and council had recognized that the settlers had some rights. That the effect of the decision was that all that a settler had to do to perfect his title was to buy a right from the companies or some military scrip, and that the king would have to open the land office sooner or later, and then the grants would issue. It is hard to say what would have happened if the war had not broken out the next year. But no sooner had the decision been announced than a great land boom began and surveying parties got ready to go into the mountains and take up land for the companies or locate lands on military scrip. The grand rush started as early as January, in the dead of winter, and the Indians went to war. In May, Dunmore tried to get the House of Burgesses to act. When they refused he told the mountain counties to raise armies, and he went with them.

The mountaineers had a dreadful time the summer of 1774, while the word was being carried from clearing to clearing to call the minute men to meet at Lewisburg on the first of September. The issue was either to fight or get out. The statesmen in the capitals of the colonies might argue themselves hoarse as to the right of the British parliament to impose stamp taxes on deeds and notes, and the right to collect custom dues on imported goods. Those are words of peace and they have been the subject of debate in peaceful times since then.

In the mountains of western Virginia the people were arming to protect themselves and to justify their disobedience to the royal proclamation. To add to the confusion of the Virginians, Pennsylvania got angry and declared that no title should be perfected by Virginian surveys in any of the boundary claimed by it, which included Virginian territory almost as large as the present State of West Virginia.

But the new brand of liberty was in the air and inoculating the populace from the seaboard to the height of land. Almost on the very day that the biggest army America had seen rendezvoused at Lewisburg, the first continental congress met at Philadelphia, for the express purpose of assuring the king that Americans were loyal to him, and to petition him to make parliament and the ministers give America a square deal.

The army was American and fought for an American ideal, and asked no odds of London. Dunmore was with them. It was the climax of his life. He carried the war through to a glorious and successful conclusion, and never held up his head after he got back to the palace at Williamsburg. There he found serious charges from London against him. He justified himself as best he could, ate humble pie before the king, put himself to the work of combatting that curious brand of liberty that had been invented for the good of the souls of men, and so fades out of the picture. He was a good friend to the mountain people, but red tape got him and kept him out of the fruits of his victory.

By 1779, there was no question in the minds of the Virginia assembly that we were no longer a part of England. They then ignored the rights of the king and the Indians, and passed a law validating all claims to unpatented lands, and opened the land office. And the assembly went further and recognized a settler right as good without the scratch of the pen from anybody. The marking of a few trees around a spring, called a tomahawk right was as good as any if there was no opposing claim, and if there was the tomahawk owner hunted up another spring.

And they divided the counties on the Western Waters into four districts. Monongalia, Yohogania, and Ohio, was one district. Augusta, Botetourt, and Greenbrier another; Washington and Montgomery another; and the county of Kentucky another district. Four commissioners were appointed for each district. These commissioners traveled from place to place and granted lands by the thousands of tracts, and from their finding there was no appeal.

It is true that the Virginians under Dunmore and Lewis did not face British soldiers, but the Revolution was not a war against any particular enemy. It was based on the theory of the Declaration of Independence, that the United States of America are free and independent states with power to do all things that independent nations have the right to do. And this declaration was the somewhat belated expression of the principles of liberty that had been exemplified by the battles of the American soldiers, and the acts of the respective colonies from the first overt act, that of assembling an army of volunteers at Lewisburg. Then is when the American first asserted himself, and our independence faced, east, west, north and south.

The battle of Point Pleasant was the first battle of the Revolution. And as to our wiping out all the flaws from our titles, and the removing of all the clouds that lowered about our homes, I sometimes think that they were the most revolutionary of all the things that went to make up the Revolutionary War.

CHAPTER IV

The Midland Trail the War Road of the Shawnees under Cornstalk. An Interpretation of the Hannah Dennis Captivity.

The Midland Trail crosses West Virginia through the counties of Greenbrier, Fayette, Kanawha, Putnam, and Cabell, all of which were once parts of Greenbrier County, and I feel that I ought not leave the subject of this great highway without recording some of the most important historical events that occurred along the trail in the Greenbrier settlements.

The Greenbrier Valley was once a choice hunting ground for its treeless plains afforded much range for buffalo, elk and deer. West Virginia was never much of a buffalo country but there were enough buffalo here to afford the primitive hunter an occasional shot, and to leave its mark in the way of names for many places and natural objects.

The first settlements were made in Pocahontas County on the Greenbrier, but as soon as the wider pastures around Lewisburg and Union were realized by the immigrants, the lower valley soon became the most populous and powerful.

At first the settlers around Lewisburg did not realize that they were on the trail that brought the hostile Shawnee east, and it was not until a large number of the settlers were killed and the settlements broken up, that they woke to the dangers of their position.

It is set down in history generally that after the Clendenin massacre in 1763, that all the settlers who were not killed in the Big Levels removed east of the mountains, but I have reason to believe that at least one settler remained in his cabin. He was a short distance off of the trail but in a way, the knob to which he gave the name was in sight of the passway.

I am satisfied in my own mind that William Price, the weaver, continued to occupy his cabin on Weavers Knob north of Lewisburg from 1749 until his death after the Revolutionary War.

Every few days I get letters asking me if I can give any particulars about certain ancestors of persons who would like to trace their line back to the immigrant. These requests from all over the United States leave me helpless, for while it would be quite possible no doubt to trace the line, it would be a matter of months' steady work, and there is no work more galling than that of the genealogist. These persons seem to think that a family tree can be furnished by return mail. I have to tell them that I cannot make the long and expensive searches. And I do not crave to be a genealogist for hire for the reason that there is the great temptation to furnish ancestors whether the record justifies it or not. The prayer is to Lead us, but not into temptation.

But I was so bedevilled with inquiries about the Price descent in the Greenbrier Valley, that I did look into that question a little and I unearthed a pretty kettle of fish, let me tell you.

There seems to have been two men in a small Hundred in Wales. And William Price, weaver, executed to Hugh Donnelly, cordwainer, a note for two hundred pounds, equivalent to about a thousand dollars. A cordwainer was a shoemaker. I know nothing about the transaction or the merits of it. But it seems that William Price came to Newcastle, Pennsylvania, and that Hugh Donnelly followed him there, and that then William Price came to Staunton Virginia, where Hugh Donnelly again caught up with him, and brought suit on the note, and the judgment not being paid, William Price, was committed to prison. Note this that in those days, 1749, the criminal and the malefactor, were committed to jail, but that the unfortunate debtor was committed to prison. The two words were not synonymous.

In England, the debtors' prisons were elaborate affairs with rooms around four sides and a large court in the middle, and the debtors carried on a more or less futile life with their liberty confined to the rooms and yards of the institution. But in Virginia, the towns were all small and the rule was to make prison bounds of about ten acres so as to include taverns, stores, churches, so that the prisoner could have the run of the town like a high-class pauper in the county infirmary.

During the year of 1749, William Price, having become tired of town life broke prison and the next we hear of him was at his home in the Big Levels of Greenbrier, and there can be little or no question that he did not refugee back to Augusta on the account of any such thing as an Indian uprising. He rounded out his life on those plains and after the Revolution he was granted the land that he had in possession so long. And in addition, it is a fair conjecture that Hugh Donnelly followed him to the Greenbrier Valley and took up land contiguous to William Price, at Donnellys Fort, and that he and William Price lived as neighbors and friends for many years, and that no doubt the little matter of a couple hundred pounds sterling was fixed up between them.

I claim descent from that William Price and a great many hundred others in the counties lying round about, but the Price name is getting scarce in the mountains. That William Price had three sons, and they perpetuated the name, but they have scattered far and wide. I do not know how the proud descendants of William Price will like my claiming him as my ancestor, but I am very proud of him myself. I think that the money matter must surely have been adjusted satisfactory to Hugh Donnelly, and that they had a peaceful and happy old age, and saw the United States formed and flourishing. I think I can say that there is very little disposition on the part of his blood to hire money. I have in mind such persons as the late J. Washington Price, Hon. Jesse Bright, Dr. J. W. Price and others.

No history of the Midland Trail would be complete without mention of the Cornstalk massacre and the seige of Fort Donnelly in the Big Levels.

Cornstalk as a soldier, statesman, and friend was satisfactory to all the world except to those of us living in a sort of Grisons canton, composed of the counties where Cornstalk slew hundreds of the pioneer, sparing neither young nor old, male or female. It is fit and proper that the rest of the world should adore this dangerous old savage, but it is not proper that we should, for it stultifies us to accept the estimate placed upon his worth and character by third parties. We are the people that suffered from his forays, and we are the people that accepted the arbitrament of war upon the issue of who should occupy these lands, and we are the people who scattered his armies and destroyed him. We are willing to admit his good qualities and that he had good reasons to fight, but as we got the decision and kept the land, it does not lie in our mouths as descendants of those Indian fighters to put them in the wrong.

That one trip over the week-end at Clendennins, near Lewisburg, and on Kerrs Creek netted the savage chief Cornstalk something like two hundred white scalps in 1763.

It came about something like this. To begin with the settlers had taken up homes too near the highway. A house by the side of the road is not all that it is cracked up to be. In the first period, the people who lived too near the road were massacred. In the second period they were eaten out of house and home. And in this third period of skyhooting motor cars, they get nervous prostration.

Two years before, in 1761, the gay and festive Cornstalk with three inch silver saucers in his ears, and a nose ornament had led a party down to the country where the meeting of Cowpasture River and Jackson River forms the James River, and among other settlers he had killed and captured the Dennis family and the Renick family on Purgatory Creek. There were about sixty warriors in Cornstalk's party that trip.

They killed Robert Renick, the head of the house, and took Mrs. Renick and five children captive and carried them to their towns beyond the Ohio River. Four of the children were redeemed when Bouquet made the treaty in 1764. Betsy had died in the Indian Camps. Joshua would not come home, and he lived to be a great Indian chief. Mrs. Renick reached home in 1767. All the Renicks that I ever heard of were descendants of this Robert Renick.

Another family broken up was that of Joseph Dennis, wife and child. Dennis and the child were killed, and the wife, Hannah Dennis was carried into captivity to the towns. She is one of the heroines of pioneer times. It appears that she was separated from the other prisoners and there were many. Hannah Dennis found herself at the town of Chilicothe. She was a smart woman. She soon learned the Indian language and conformed to the manners and customs of the tribe. She paid attention to sick persons and administered medicines. And she professed to be a witch and prophetess and she became a sort of queen among the Indians. This was Cornstalk's home town and he was a wise man and she was a wise woman. She was undoubtedly a wonderful woman. She never gave up the idea of escape. After two years, she went forth one day to gather medicinal herbs, and she kept going. She crossed the Scioto River three times in forty miles and was just about to cross it again when her pursuers on the opposite side of the river discovered her and fired upon her. In turning to run she injured her foot on a sharp stone, and to elude them she crept in the hollow limb of a large fallen sycamore where she remained all night, the Indians camping close by. She crossed the Ohio River at the mouth of the Kanawha River on a drift log and made her way by the Midland Trail to the Clendennin settlement where she was given food, and was taken on horseback to Fort Young at Covington. She had subsisted on roots and herbs, green grapes, and mild cherries, and fresh water mussels.

Cornstalk, the Solomon of his nation, finding that the Queen of Sheba had gone, though she took nothing with her, rounded up his team of sixty warriors and followed her up, and appeared in the Greenbrier settlement a day or two after Mrs. Dennis had passed through, and that is how Cornstalk came to take such heavy toll from the white men.

The old Indian trail led them to the headwaters of Muddy Creek where there were a number of clearings, and here the Indians appeared in small parties as visitors at every cabin. At a given time this settlement was entirely destroyed, and they then proceeded over the mountain to Clendennin's, before any word of the Muddy Creek massacre could be carried.

There was no great apprehension it appears at that time of danger from the Indians owing to the Bouquet treaty entered into the spring before. The settlers were curious to see friendly Indians. Clendennin had just come in from a successful hunt bringing in three elk. This fresh meat and the presence of an interesting party of Indians, under the personal supervision of the great chief Cornstalk, caused all the settlers living near Clendennin's to gather to the feast and Cornstalk expressed himself as being there as a friend. The Indians were all fed and treated with the greatest hospitality. Finally an old lady with an ulcer on her leg asked an Indian warrior if he knew of any cure for that disease, the Indians being noted for some of their lore of this kind. Perhaps the warriors remembered the loss of their famous women herb doctor, or perhaps at a signal, he said that he did know a cure for it, and promptly tomahawked the old lady, so that she died instantly, and the Indians then arose and killed or captured the whole settlement.

Thus perished something like a hundred of the intrepid pioneers who had come from the Augusta settlements to people that portion of Greenbrier. It is generally admitted that upon the news of this massacre reaching distant cabins that every white person in the Greenbrier Valley fled to the east of the mountains. But this not correct. I feel sure that neither the Donnelleys nor the Prices living some ten miles to the north, went back, and it is certain that the settlers in what is now Pocahontas county remained in their homes and stockades.

But still Cornstalk had not overtaken his valued captive, the wise woman, and he left his prisoners with guards and continued over the Allegheny. He passed near Fort Young where Mrs. Dennis was recuperating and passed over North Mountain and fell on the unsuspecting inhabitants of Kerrs Creek and killed and captured upwards of a hundred more, and with bells on his horses, and his plunder and his captives, he marched back in triumph to Chillicothe.

Mrs. Clendennin made a bold escape on Keeneys Knob by handing her infant to another prisoner, and jumping over the road and running down the mountain side. The Indians killed the child.

Mrs. Clendennin made her way to the Augusta settlements and returned to the place of the massacre, where she lived to be an old woman. Anne Royal, a woman writer, talked with her daughter about the occurrence in 1826, sixty-three years after.

The Shawnees continued to give us trouble culminating in Dunmore's War, when a great battle was fought at Point Pleasant, Cornstalk, in command, and in the front line of battle. A treaty of peace was made with Virginia through Dunmore by Cornstalk. This was in 1774. In 1776, the Revolution having begun, Great Britain succeeded in making an alliance with many Indian tribes, mostly through Gen. Hamilton, the hair-buyer, of Detroit. The Ohio tribes generally were drawn in, and the Six Nations turned their whole strength against the Americans.

In 1777, Cornstalk being in a quandary on account of his treaty with Virginia, appeared at the fort at Point Pleasant to confer with the commandant, Captain Arbuckle, as to what course he could pursue. Cornstalk said that it looked like every Indian tribe was going to join up with Great Britain, and that if they did, he saw nothing else for the Shawnees to do but to go with the stream.

Thereupon he was detained, and after a time an attack was made on two soldiers by Indians near the fort, and Gilmore, of Rockbridge county, killed. In retaliation, Rockbridge soldiers destroyed Cornstalk.

It was not long until it was apparent that the Shawnees were going to retaliate for the killing of Cornstalk. Within a few weeks a small band of Indians showed themselves outside of the fort at Point Pleasant, and Lieut. Moore and a party of soldiers were dispatched to drive them off. This party fell into ambush, and Moore and three soldiers were killed. The rest saved themselves by running back to the fort.

The next move on the part of the Shawnees to avenge the death of Cornstalk was the attack on Fort Donnelly, in Greenbrier county, north of the Midland Trail. Cornstalk alive or dead troubled the people of this valley.

In May, 1778, another party appeared at the fort at Point Pleasant, showing a few of their number, in the hopes that the garrison would rush out, as they did at Fort Henry, at Wheeling, and at Point Pleasant the year before. The garrison refusing to be drawn out, the Indians showed themselves in force and formed a line from the Ohio to the Kanawha, showing that several hundred were on the war path. They besieged the fort for a week, and one night they withdrew up the Kanawha. Captain McKee seeing in this a menace to the Greenbrier settlements called for volunteers to warn the people in Greenbrier. John Pryor and William Hammond volunteered.

These men disguised themselves as Indians and painted their faces and set out hot foot after the Indian army up the Midland Trail. They passed through the Indian army about where Rainelle is and carried the news to Fort Donnelly, the frontier post, and Captain Andrew Donnelly sent a messenger to warn Fort Savannah, now Lewisburg, under the command of Captain Stuart.

Pryor and Hammond remained at Fort Donnelly and the fort was put in a state of readiness. However, early next morning, John Pritchet, who worked for Donnelly, went to the woodpile for wood and was fired upon and killed, and the Indians immediately entered the stockade and attacked the kitchen door attempting to cut it to pieces with their hatchets. In the kitchen were Hammond, the courier and Dick Pointer, a negro slave belonging to Donnelly. Hammond armed Dick with a musket heavily loaded with swan shot, or as we would say, buckshot. Seeing that the door would soon be destroyed, Hammond threw it open and fired and killed an Indian, and Dick poured his load of buckshot into a throng of Indians. By that time, the rest of the garrison had wakened and they fired from the upstairs windows and there were seventeen dead Indians in the yard when the Indians drew off some distance.

Captain Stuart hearing that the fort had been attacked raised sixty-six men and with Col. Samuel Lewis, a son of Gen. Andrew Lewis, marched to their relief, arriving about two o'clock in the afternoon. They were able to enter the stockade without loss and the Indians kept up a fire until dark. Then an Indian called to the fort in broken English: "We want peace." He was invited to enter but declined. The Indians went back to their homes without gains. They had suffered a loss of at least twenty-five killed. The whites had lost four men. Pritchet at the first fire, Graham in the house, and James Burns and Alexander Ochiltree, who attempted to join the garrison, before daylight in the morning.

There were twenty-one men in the fort. The Indians numbered at least two hundred.

This was the last but one of the Indian raids into the Greenbrier Valley. The next year a war party appeared at Marlins Bottom and killed thirteen persons in the neighborhood, among whom were John and James Bridger and Henry Baker.

John Pryor who was one of the two famous scouts that carried the word to the Greenbrier Settlements the year before, was returning to Kanawha with his wife and infant child. The whole family were killed that dreadful day at some place near Mill Point.

Of Phillip Hammond, his companion, in that notable service, I have no further trace.

CHAPTER V

How the White Indian, Dickinson came back to Capture Kitty Moffett. This is a Moving Picture.

The Midland Trail crosses the Big Levels of Greenbrier Valley at the widest point. I have never seen anything just like these so-called levels that border the Greenbrier River on the west elevated some five hundred feet above the stream from the head of the stream to Ronceverte, something over a hundred miles. There the levels cross the river, or rather the river breaks through, and the result is that Monroe County gets the benefit of the rich, level lying land. They call them levels and explain that they are level plateaus, but they are really more like terraces than anything else. At the head of the West Fork of Greenbrier River, this terrace starts off with a width of about fifty feet and this broadens to fifteen or twenty miles where the Midland Trail cuts it.

The Allegheny Mountains divide the eastern and the western waters To the east there is a great net work of streams like the Jackson River, Back Creek, Bull Pasture, Cow Pasture, Calf Pasture, on which are beautiful homesteads, and which marked the western boundary of the white man's land for many generations. This was grouped into a region often referred to as Newfoundland. The settlers in Newfoundland suffered terribly in the French and Indian war. Dinwiddie, Governor, could not understand why these settlers refugeed to the Staunton settlements from the Indians, and he wrote them that if they abandoned their farms that they should not have them back after the war was over. He did not seem to understand that the Indian nations in the Ohio country swooped down on them by way of the Midland Trail and that against these raids isolated farms were helpless.

Dinwiddie was a nervous wretch. Braddock's Defeat seems to have broken him. He wrote complaining letters to the Augusta people wanting to know why they allowed themselves to be killed with impunity. But finally he and the assembly built a line of forts along the eastern foot of the Allegheny from the North Carolina line to Maryland and the Indians were held back.

After the Indians settled down a bit when Bouquet brought them to terms, the pioneers of Newfoundland commenced to covet the rich lands of the Greenbrier Valley. It did look like a hardship that the best and biggest valley of them all should be left to the Indians. Every hunter that came across on the western water to kill his winter meat saw richer land than any then in the white man's possession and it was not long until a steady stream of settlers flowed into this valley, and from the moment that the first pioneer trespassed on the Indian reservation, there was trouble with the mother country, which led up by slow stages to the war for independence.

Greenbrier valley was the last valley going west that runs north and south, but down where the Midland Trail lies, there is a great river which rises in North Carolina, traverses a great part of Virginia, and then turns and breaks entirely through the whole Appalachian chain of mountains. The New River. This river affects the contour of the Greenbrier valley in its lower and broader portions so that by following the Kanawha River and the New River for a distance the trail falls naturally into the Greenbrier Valley where the Midland Trail now runs, and from there through gaps in the Allegheny to the settlements of Augusta county. There is no place, north or south, where there is such a natural passway for the Indians in the olden days, and war parties were continually raiding the settlements, a condition that prevailed for about twelve years, when the Greenbrier Valley having been settled by white men formed a bulwark of protection to Newfoundland and Augusta.

There was no declared war after Bouquet brought the Indians to terms, but that did not mean that the killing stopped. It became a matter of private enterprise. The settlers in the northern part of the Valley of Virginia suffered from raids from the Wyandots, the Delewares, and other Indian tribes inhabiting the northern part of Ohio, and they came east on trails known to them, but the powerful Shawnee nation furnished the bands that came through the New River passage and worried the settlers that had Staunton for their head town.

A raid originated something like this. An enterprising Indian would decide that he was ready for war, and on the first suitable council day when the tribe was present and ready to hear him, he would stick his war hatchet in the council post and dance toward the point of the compass where his enemy resided. Then he would come back and make an oration, in which he would first recount all the deeds of valor that he had accomplished as a warrior and the congregation would respond by frequent uh-hus, after the manner of saying amen. Then when he had presented his credentials as a first class fighting man, he would stage the object of his proposed raid, and paint a picture of plunder and carnage, the intention being to induce other warriors to join him in the project.

He would subside, and if the party was a go, some other warrior would take up the chant and as the warriors qualified they would remain in line and dance to the east while the speaking was going on. When a party of nine or more had been secured, they retired to their wigwams and the next morning they marched out of the village in Indian file, with faces painted, each warrior discharging his gun as he slowly passed the limits of the encampment. Such parties came east continually for twenty-five or thirty years and the white men got so that they believed that they could sense the presence of Indians in the community and so guard against them. The Indians dearly loved to attack lonely cabins while the men were absent and destroy or capture the women and children.

It was this habit of warfare that turned the pioneer into an avenging angel, and caused so many to devote their lives to the extermination of the red devils. Historians think that after a father had returned home to find his home in ashes and his wife and children dead and mutilated, that they were never sane after that, and he took toll from the Indian tribes.

It is well established that the white pioneers made up war parties with all the dances and ceremonies that the Indians used.

Occasionally a white man would become offended and join the Indians and such renegades were despised and abhorred. The worst thing that could be said about a white man was that he had painted his face. Then too there were very numerous cases of children who being captured and growing up with the Indians would not leave them. But that was a very different matter. Simon Girty was the most notable case of a white man that painted his face. He was supposed to have all the attributes of the devil, and yet when he was a British soldier at Fort Pitt, he was considered to be a very decent fellow.

Along about the French and Indian war a young man by the name of Dickinson left the Staunton settlements and went to the Shawnees. The Dickinson name has been one of the very best in the annals of Augusta county. There was a Dickinson on the first county court of Augusta county. There is not much known about this boy that went to the Indians, and my research leads me to believe that it was the waywardness of youth and a hopeless love affair that sent him into voluntary exile.

The most that is known about him is his return to the Valley to capture his sweetheart and take her with him into that Indian country. In October, 1764, he came back as the head of a band of murderous Indians.

The girl in the case was a very beautiful young woman by the name of Kitty Moffett, who was the daughter of John Moffett, one of the first settlers of Augusta county. He married Mary Christian, and they had seven children, the oldest being the famous Col. George Moffett. John Moffett went on a journey to North Carolina and was never heard from again, and after a time his estate was administered upon. It was supposed that he had been killed by Indians. He was declared to be dead in 1749. Sometime after his widow married John Trimble. Their home was on Middle River near Staunton and not far from Churchville. They had one son, James Trimble, eight years old at the time of the Dickinson raid.

Dickinson was at the head of about nine warriors. He had evidently recruited them from some tribe that he had become a member of, for it was a rather queer aggregation of heathen, there being old men in it and very young boys, but they were dangerous. They came from the Shawnee country across the Big Levels of Greenbrier, and led by Dickinson did not strike until they reached Middle River, being the last raid that got that far east. They first appeared at the house of Alexander Crawford and killed him and his wife, and from there they marched down the river to John Trimble's and killed him as he was going out to plow.

There were at the house Kitty Moffett, who married and was now Mrs. Estill, the young boy James Trimble, and a slave, a Negro named Adam recently imported from Africa. Dickinson was well known to the family. He said to the boy James, "Come with me and I will make a good Indian out of you. But look at this (showing his father's scalp) if you do not come with me I will take your scalp also."

The Indians took four horses and loaded them with plunder from the Trimble homestead. They placed Mrs. Estill on a horse and Dickinson stayed close by her all the way. They made a quick get away and traveled west for five days.

Col. George Moffett on receipt of the news raised a company of eighteen Indian fighters and pursued the party fifteen hours behind them. At one place he thought he had lost the trail and was about to abandon the pursuit when he found his sister's garter hanging on a bush.

The white men came in sight of the Indians on the morning of the fifth day on the west side of the Allegheny Mountains near the White Sulphur Springs. It was determined to follow and attack the Indians at their next camping place after dark, and the parties moved west across the Big Levels. But at some time before the end of the day the Indians halted for the purpose of killing game and Dickinson left the party to go on a hunt. This must have been somewhere in the limits of Greenbrier County of today.

The whites not knowing that the Indians had halted pressed on silently and soon a shot rang out from a gun near them in advance and they supposed that they had been discovered. But it seems that the Indians had fired at a deer which came bounding back along the trail and came so close to the pursuers that one of them slapped it in the head with his hat and the deer then turned and ran back and was killed by the Indians. The men under Moffett then advanced and took the Indian party by surprise and fired on them and killed six of them. The other Indians scattered and all the prisoners were rescued and the return journey began.

Dickinson rallied his party of Indians and swinging around the white company lay in ambush before them, but fortunately the Virginians discovered the ambush in time to save themselves, and the only casualty was the wounding of a soldier by the name of Russell, who was carried back to his home in Augusta on a litter.

Soon after her return Mrs. Estill gave birth to her first child. Her husband was Benjamin Estill, a justice of Augusta County, at the time of the raid and a prominent man in the early history of the country. Soon after he moved to the Holston River. Captain John M. Estill, of Long Glade, Augusta county, was one of their sons, and Judge Benjamin Estill, a judge of southwest Virginia was another.

When the Indians were overtaken by the Virginians, they were resting easy in a sunlit glade. Mrs. Estill was sitting on a log sewing ruffles on a hunting shirt for Dickinson. Young James had been sent some little distance away to bring a bucket of drinking water.

There is some confusion about the date of this Dickinson raid into Augusta, but the county records fix it with a certainty as the year 1764. At the November Term, 1764, both the estate of Alexander Crawford and the estate of John Trimble, who had been killed by the Indians in October previous, were committed to administrators.

This was the last time that the Indians invaded the valley as far east as the Staunton settlements, and it is certain that John Trimble was the last person killed by the Indians in the present limits of Augusta County.

The little eight year old boy, James Trimble, had a hard time for five days keeping up with the Indians and acting as water boy and all around camp attendant. This James Trimble was afterwards Captain James Trimble of the Revolutionary war. He had to undergo cruelty and torture on the part of the Indian boys in the party. At the end of a long day's journey they would stand him up against a tree and throw tomahawks at him, burying them in the tree close to his body.

Adam, the Negro, lived to be a very old man in Augusta and never wearied talking of his experience with the Indians. He was a much-traveled person, having been reared in the jungles of Africa, enslaved, and worked on the farm, and then to undergo the captivity of the Indians. He said that he happened to find a large yellow jacket's nest on the line of march one warm day, and that he waited until the naked Indians came up, and then stirred the nest, and some of the Indians were stung and they were about to execute Adam then and there.

The Chief Dickinson was a well known warrior in the days that followed. Some warriors set him down as a half-breed, but I do not so read the sign. I think that he led a party of scrub warriors, young and old, back to capture his sweetheart, and if it had not been for the prompt action on the part of her brother, Col. George Moffett, he would have succeeded.

There is some further record on Dickinson in the history of the Indian wars.

In the spring of 1774, Captain Jack Floyd, father of Governor Floyd, led a surveying party to the Ohio River to enter surveys in West Virginia and in Kentucky. The first survey that they entered, was two thousand acres for George Washington on the Coal and Kanawha Rivers, through which the Midland Trail now runs.

By the 26th of May they were well down the Ohio River near the mouth of Kentucky River. On that day they noticed a canoe with a red flag, on which there were two persons, coming down the river. The surveying party hailed them but they would not come to them, so the surveyors went to them and found they were two Indians, one of whom was named Dickinson. Dickinson showed a permit from Fort Pitt to travel the river, and he said that he was on his way to call the hunters in, for there was war between the Indians and the white people; that all the white people had left their habitations in the region of Fort Pitt. He said the white people and the Indians had had a skirmish and that sixteen Indians had been killed, thirteen Shawnees, two Mingos and one Delaware.

He evidently referred to the killing about the first of May near Wheeling and Yellow Creek.

This was the summer of 1774, when the Virginians were gathering at Lewisburg, to march to Point Pleasant, to fight a great battle with the tribes under Cornstalk. It was just ten years after the affair on Middle River, when John Trimble was killed. Young Trimble showed up in the Lewis Division from Augusta County, as did the soldier Russell, who had been shot by Dickinson ten years before.

These soldiers followed the Midland Trail to the Ohio, where they came near to being surprised by a great Indian army. The battle began at dawn at the place Point Pleasant stands, and continued until dark, on the 10th day of October, 1774, exactly ten years from the date of the affair on Middle River. Russell was fighting under the command of Gen. Andrew Lewis, and Dickinson was there as one of Cornstalk's braves.

Sometime during the course of the battle these two men entered into a combat, and Russell killed Dickinson with his hands, and that is the story of the white Indian, Dickinson. And a very good moving picture it would make, too.

My guess at the place where the Indians halted to enable hunt to be had before dark to get food to go on with, was at the foot of Muddy Creek Mountain. We know that on the morning of the 15th day of October they had camped on the west side of the Allegheny Mountains near the White Sulphur Springs, and that from there they were followed for a part of the day by their pursuers.

Evidently Dickinson thought having got across to the Western Waters that he was safe from pursuit. It is something like fifteen miles to the foot of Muddy Creek Mountain. Anyway, the Indians were at the foot of a mountain at a spring, and Muddy Creek Mountain answers the description of the mountain, and if some of the people residing in that locality know where there is a spring where the Indian trail took up the mountain, it ought to be the place of the rescue.

The Midland Trail, the highway, does not cross Muddy Creek Mountain, but passes in sight of it and on the north.

It was the great passway, for having come by easy stages into the Greenbrier Valley, and crossed that the old timers found themselves on the waters of James River and an open road to the sea.

The way that war party retreated can be designated now by the following points: Middle River, Churchville, Buffalo Gap, Goshen, Panther Gap, Millboro, Clifton Forge, Covington, Callahans, White Sulphur Springs, Lewisburg, and Muddy Creek Mountain.

CHAPTER VI

The Midland Trail was the Northern Route to Kentucky, shorter and more Convenient than the Wilderness Trail, but far more dangerous. Governor George Mathews kept a Trader's Outpost on Midland Trail at Lewisburg.

The Midland Trail played its part in the stampede to take up the rich lands in Kentucky after the Revolutionary War. It was known as the Northern Route. The other and most popular line of travel was known as the Wilderness Road. The trails forked at or near Staunton. The pioneers who came by the way of New York or Philadelphia, or any of the eastern places in the north traveled south through the Valley of Virginia until they reached Staunton, and there they decided whether they would continue south through the Valley of Virginia to Crab Orchard and go in by the Wilderness Road, or whether they would go to the Ohio River at the mouth of the Great Kanawha River and thence to Kentucky.

Much has been written about the perils of the Wilderness Road and there is no doubt that many immigrants were killed on that route, but the fact remains that all that commended the Wilderness Road to the traveler was its safety, and that is the reason that it was the favorite line of travel. The distance from the falls of the Ohio (Louisville) to Staunton by the Wilderness Road was five hundred and nine miles. On horseback the trip took something over a month.

Isaac Weld, an English writer, speaks of the great number of travelers that he saw all on horseback, traveling from Baltimore and Philadelphia to Kentucky and Tennessee. This on his visit to Staunton.

A great many Augusta county men were in the Revolution and they were entitled to land grants after the war for their service. The rich lands of Kentucky proved very attractive to hundreds of these Revolutionary soldiers and there was a great migration to the dark and bloody ground. Robertsons, Seviers, Moffetts, Poages, Allens, Trimbles, and all of the well known Augusta names had representatives in this exodus, and some of the most prominent Kentuckians trace their ancestry back to Augusta. Irvin S. Cobb, for instance, is of the Augusta Lewis descent.

It is not certain that the Northern Route was any shorter than the Wilderness Road, but as soon as the pioneer reached the mouth of Kellys Creek, at the place then called Boatyard, he could purchase a dugout canoe and float down the placid waters of the Kanawha and the Ohio. As soon as he had passed the white water of the New River, that way was easy from that time on, with the exception of the Indians watching from the north bank of the Ohio.

At Staunton, if the traveler decided to go by the Northern Route, he turned west through Buffalo Gap and came by the Warm Springs, and from there through the Narrows by Huntersville, to Marlins Bottom and then by the War Path of the Seneca Indians to some point near the White Sulphur Springs, where he turned west on the Midland Trail, through the rich lands of the Big Levels, and over Gauley Mountain.

There can be little doubt that the ghost of Cornstalk still walked and that after the party got beyond the settlements in Greenbrier that they were in hourly danger from the Indians, and that as they floated down the broad rivers they never knew what eyes observed them from the leafy coverts along the bank, or when lead would sing round their boats.

Washington must have made a trip over this Midland Trail, for he says in his will that he had been on his lands near the mouth of the Kanawha River. He says, too, that he and Gen. Andrew Lewis owned a tract of 250 acres surveyed so as to include the Burning Spring, on the Kanawha, or as he spells it Kanawa, River.* For a number of years, Lewisburg was the frontier on the Midland Trail for the Kentucky travel, and all to the west was Indian infested. Lewisburg was then known as Fort Savannah.

When Lewis's army was camped at the big spring that made Lewisburg in the first instance, in 1774, there were no people living by the big spring. This may be accounted for in either of two ways. There is a great deal of rocky, difficult land around the spring, and this may have caused the land lookers to avoid it, but it is more reasonable to suppose that when the Greenbrier Land Company were making surveys some twenty-odd years prior to that date, that company had marked the spring and the land surrounding it for its own.

One of the captains under Lewis, was George Mathews, and while there he saw the advantage of the place as a trading post and when he had come back from the campaign, he opened a store there with his partner, another young Virginian, Captain Mathew Arbuckle.

This was the first settlement in the town of Lewisburg. This Captain George Mathews was a famous man in the annals of the Nation as well as these mountains.

He was the son of John Mathews, one of the first settlers on the Borden grant, in Augusta County. Sampson Archer settled about this time in Augusta County. One of the daughters was Ann Archer, and she and John Mathews were married. George Mathews was born in 1739. He was a brother of the first Sampson Mathews, there being three of that name in successive generations. The first Sampson Mathews was colonel of Augusta County.

* General Washington and Andrew Lewis were joint owners of a survey at the "Burning Springs," on the Kanawha, a few miles above Charleston. The tract was supposed to be 250 acres, but by actual survey was found to contain 587. Lewis visited this land, but Washington at no time ever saw it. His nearest approach was in 1770, when he followed the Kanawha for about fourteen miles from its mouth, then returned to the Ohio. Washington was, then, within forty-four miles of his "Burning Springs" land.—B. B. S.

John Mathews had eleven children and their descendants are scattered far and wide, but the Mathews blood tells for good, faith, honor, and ability wherever found.

Another son John Mathews, Jr., settled early in the forks of James River and he and his wife and six children were killed by the Indians.

I want to devote some space here to George Mathews, the trader at Lewisburg for one or two years between Dunmore's war and the main Revolution.

George Mathews won his spurs and fame when he was twenty-two years old. When the Cornstalk raid was made in 1761, to Purgatory Creek, near Buchanan, on the James River, at the time that the Renicks, Smiths and Dennises suffered, George Mathews was on his way to that settlement on horseback and heard the firing of the guns, but paid no particular attention to it. Mrs. Robert Renick was an aunt of George Mathews.

When he found the dead bodies, he recruited twenty-one men, and as their leader followed up the Indians and killed nine of them.

It was this prompt and efficient action that gained him a captaincy in Dunmore's war. In 1776, when the colonies were arming for the great conflict with Great Britain, George Mathews was commissioned Lieutenant Colonel of the Ninth Virginia Regiment, which was ordered north to join Washington. Col. Fleming dying soon after the regiment was formed, Mathews was made a full colonel and led it during the Burgoyne campaigns in the north.

He was regarded by Washington as an invaluable soldier and officer—one who could be relied upon to carry out and execute any order given. On October 3, 1777, Washington conceived the plan of surprising Howe in a night attack in Germantown, after the manner of the Trenton affair. He formed his army into several divisions and marched on to Germantown. The Ninth Virginia was one of the few regiments if not the only one that carried out instructions to the letter, and that regiment led by Mathews fought its way into the very heart of Germantown, while many of the divisions never even reached the city. Being surrounded by an overwhelming force, the regiment was surrendered, and Mathews spent several years as a prisoner of war in a prison ship in New York harbor.

Being exchanged about 1781, he was ordered to join Gen. Greene in South Carolina, and he served to the end of the war as commander of the Third Virginia Regiment. While on this campaign, he saw a place in Georgia that he liked, and he bought it, and moved there in 1784.

He came out of the Revolutionary War with the rank of general. General Mathews was a short, thick man, standing very erect, and carrying his head thrown back. His features were bluff, his hair light red and his complexion florid.

He was married three times. His first wife and the mother of his children was Anne Paul of Augusta, a step-daughter of Col. David Stewart. His second wife was a Mrs. Reed, of Augusta County, from whom he was divorced, and his third wife a Mrs. Flowers, of Mississippi.

The Mathews family claims descent from Samuel Mathews one of five commissioners sent by King James to the colony of Virginia in 1622, but the Augusta County descent that has produced so many great men dates from John Mathews, who went to the mountains, and married Ann Archer. It was this union that really founded the family as we know it. It is a fact observed by students of history that great families date back to some particularly happy marriage that seems to extend its blessings to many generations.

General Mathews was elected governor of Georgia in 1786, two years after he had moved from Augusta County to that State. His first term was served without making much history, and after it had ended he was elected as the first representative in Congress from the State of Georgia. He served one term in Congress, and on his return, in 1794, he was again elected governor of Georgia, and it was during that term of office that fur began to fly.

Georgia claimed all the land lying between her present borders and the Mississippi River, now contained in the States of Alabama and Mississippi. It is true that she did not have much title to it, but it was customary for States on the Atlantic seabord to claim all land back of them until stopped by the bounds of Spain or France.

Four companies, known as the Georgia Company, Georgia-Mississippi Company, Tennessee Company, and Upper Mississippi Company, as tenants in common offered the legislature a half million dollars for thirty-five million acres of land at the rate of about a cent and a half an acre. The governor opposed the bill but he was induced to sign it.

One of the members of the legislature was General Samuel Blackburn, who had married Ann Mathews, the oldest daughter of the governor. He had voted for the bill.

As soon as the legislature had adjourned a storm of protest went up from the whole State of Georgia, and the transaction was at once dubbed the Yazoo Fraud, and Blackburn fled before the anger of the State, but the Governor faced them like an angry bull. Blackburn came to Staunton where he passed the remainder of his life, being one of the most noted trial lawyers and orators that Virginia has ever produced.

Governor Gilmer in his writings speaks of hearing Blackburn defend a person charged with murder at Harrisonburg. In the poor house of Rockingham County, two paupers fought. They were each over eighty years old. One killed the other. The dispute was over the ownership of a cucumber. The only eye-witness was over ninety years.

General Mathews acknowledged but one superior and that was Washington. The State of Georgia threw a fit. They elected a legislature to repeal the land sale, the Yazoo Fraud. Not a vote opposed the repeal. And it was further ordered that the pages of the journals and record books and the bill itself be burnt in front of the capitol in the presence of the legislature. James Jackson had resigned a seat in the United States Senate to be elected to that legislature, and when the papers were ready to be burned, he produced a sun glass and called down the fire from heaven to destroy the fell works.

The Yazoo Fraud got into Congress, and John Randolph, the leader of the Democrats, then in the majority, made it live hard. It was a favorite subject for his bitter eloquence.

John Randolph must have been a thorn in the flesh and a rankling fire to the ordinary peace-loving citizen. He was a kind of a scorpion and rattlesnake and mad dog combined. He was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and he swore by all that was good and bad that never should the Yazoo title be fixed up or compromised, and right there is where he ran athwart of one Madison, then in the cabinet, and afterwards President. While the diatribes of John Randolph of Roanoke, make interesting reading about this deplorable chapter of Georgia history, he alienated a great many level-headed people by reason of them.

John Marshall, of the Supreme Court of the United States, as clear-headed a lawyer as ever lived, propounded the question to the effect that if a court could inquire into the question of the good faith of a legislative body passing bills, would it not defeat the plan of American government? And the act repealing the Yazoo grant was held to be unconstitutional as abrogating a contract.

The water was so hot in Georgia, that every person in anywise connected with the Yazoo grant was accused of fraud and corruption. Historians clear the General of any wrong in connection with the act of the legislature. But the fact remains that they made it so uncomfortable for him that he finally refugeed to Florida, then a sort of no man's land, not stoutly held by any government.

He was a Federalist in politics with Washington and Adams. That is, he belonged to the party that favored a Constitution and a closer union of the States. Adams, becoming President, and the General being at leisure in the wastes of Florida, the President appointed him governor of the territory of Mississippi, but the Senators making a row about it, the appointment was withdrawn. General Mathews rode to Philadelphia on horseback and mounted at the front door of the President's house, and walked in wearing his old army sword and his three-cornered cocked hat, and proceeded to cuss Adams out. But the President pacified him and sent him home satisfied.

The next and last great mission of General Mathews was in connection with Florida. In 1813, James Madison was President. He had condoned the Yazoo business by trying to compromise it. So he appointed General Mathews and Colonel John McKee receivers for the great colony of Florida. This was Spain's colony, but Napoleon had conquered Spain, and the English were driving the French out of Spain, and it seemed to Madison that Great Britain would seize Florida, and there was a war on between the United States and Great Britain.

The commissioners were instructed to receive that country if surrendered by the Spanish authorities voluntarily, and to take it by force if any other foreign power attempted to take it.

The commissioners did exactly what Andrew Jackson did a few years after. They recruited an army of their own just as Old Hickory did, and raised the United States flag over the Spanish capital, over the protest of the Spanish authorities.

This seizure was nullified by the President who recalled the General and ordered him to restore the country to Spain.

The General flew into a tremendous rage and started to Washington to have it out with the President. Some say that he threatened to beat him up. But he fell sick and died at Augusta, Georgia, on the thirtieth day of September, 1812, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Andrew Jackson a few years later seized Florida in the same way and Spain made to the United States a quit claim deed for the State, in consideration of a quit claim to Texas on our part, and that the United States would pay five million dollars to American citizens who had been injured by the Spanish navy.

I have taken up a good deal of space in writing about the sturdy old general, but I have never seen his life written up in West Virginia history before.

Great strains of blood spring from great marriages. It never runs out. Such marriages as John Mathews and Ann Archer, Jacob Warwick and Mary Vance, John Lewis and Margaret Lynn, William Randolph and Mary Isham, and many others that could be named.

In Diary of an American Aviator Killed in France, published in Liberty, issue of November 20, 1926, is this entry:

"Alex Mathews is dead. He was walking across the airdome after a movie show over at 48, and a Hun bomber saw the light when the door was opened, and dropped a 212 pound bomb on him."

This a Mathews of the youngest generation, serving with great distinction as an aviator in the World War.

What I started to say away back in the beginning of this chapter was that Captain George Mathews opened the trading post at the Big Spring on the Midland Trail.

The war clouds continued to gather and it was selected as the fort for that community. It was enclosed in a stockade in size about what is now a city block, with a great gateway opening on to and next to the spring, and extending back across Main Street, which sheltered something over five hundred people in the summers of the Revolution. You can find the place, but when they point out to you some solid stone masonry as a part of the fort, take that with a grain of salt, for Indian forts were made of wood.

CHAPTER VII

John Field clad only in his shirt ran eighty miles over the Midland Trail without stopping, longest Marathon Race ever run. Thoughts of Indian Torture proved to be a Splendid Spur.

The Midland Trail is the kind of a path on which you can find such places as the White Sulphur Springs, and such cities as Charleston and Huntington. Charleston and Huntington, rival cities, challenging each to each, both putting on as much dog as little old New York. And having sat with gladness in the hospitality of such places, to come to a part of the road where the wild flowers are nodding in the wind, where the wild fox digs his hole unscared, I think theme may be something in these violent contrasts. I do not think that it is the scenery that makes me rave and write about the Midland Trail and all that the name implies. If any one is inured to scenery it is certainly this writer. I was raised on it. I can write about it even if I cannot talk about it.

The more experience I have in talking the more I think of writing. It is a harmless pastime for the writer and the reader can either take it or leave it alone. There is no compulsion about it. Lately I have been shouting all over the State trying to keep the teachers awake until I have nearly cracked my voice.

> I hate to mark those stifled yawns,
> In fat gazelles in dotted lawns,
> Or watch the tides of sleep arise,
> In yon pale lady's tired eyes.

But in this cross-section that is known as the Midland Trail you see all that is to be seen in the way of grandeur and beauty and art, except the surf and the desert.

Up until the automobile came the record for quick traveling over this trail was held by Captain John Field who in the summer of 1774 ran from Kelly's place twelve miles below the Kanawha Falls to Arbuckle's Fort on Muddy Creek, between Lewisburg and Alderson, a distance of eighty miles without stopping, clad only in his shirt. He arrived tired and hungry and badly lacerated by the briers and brush. Ordinarily it took three days to march this distance from Kelly's to Kelly's, but Captain Field made it without stopping. He was a man fifty-four years of age and his splendid spur was the thought of torture by the Indians.

John Field was a citizen of Culpepper. He had served in Braddock's War and under Bouquet. He was one of the many surveyors who went into the Kentucky and Kanawha countries to survey land under the military scrip gotten from the English government for service in the Indian wars. He had gone to the Kanawha Falls country with two servants, a Scotchman and a Negro woman cook. In the summer runners were sent through the woods to warn the surveying parties that the Indians were up and that they had better withdraw. There was a Kelly place on Muddy Creek near the Big Levels on the Greenbrier and another Kelly place at the mouth of Kelly's Creek below the great falls. This Kelly Creek crosses the Midland Trail. Walter Kelly lived on the Kanawha and when the runners came from Greenbrier sent out by Col. John Stuart, Walter Kelly sent all of his family under the care of his younger brother back to Greenbrier, but he remained with Field and the two servants at Kelly's Creek with the intention of going on with the surveys. This was in July. The family of Walter Kelly reached the Greenbrier settlement safely. Col. Stuart took some soldiers and went westward but they soon met Field. It then appeared that soon after the Kelly family had started home that Indians surprised the Kelly house in Kanawha, and fired on Field and Kelly as they were shifting some leather which was tanning in a vat in the yard. It is probably true that Walter Kelly who raised a crop of corn at the mouth of Kelly's Creek in the year 1774 was the first settler of Kanawha County. At the fire Walter Kelly was killed and Field escaped.

The Indians then killed the Negro woman and took the Scotchman prisoner, and this prisoner was not afterwards heard from.

The Kellys were to suffer more losses from the Indians. About the first of August a party of Indians came near Kellys on Muddy Creek. The younger brother of Walter Kelly who had just been killed and scalped on Kelly's Creek, was walking near the house with a daughter of Walter Kelly. They were fired upon and young Kelly killed and scalped and the girl carried into captivity.

This is the true statement of the fate of the Kelly brothers, one killed on the Great Kanawha River and the other on Muddy Creek. There is no reason to doubt this. There has been some confusion as to this, some saying one thing and some another, trying to reconcile the tradition of one Kelly being killed by the Indians at widely separated places. Two Kellys and within a few days of each other, about eighty miles apart.

John Field being hunted out of the Kanawha Valley became a partisan of the Lewises and spent some time in raising a company for the Point Pleasant campaign. He made a hurried trip to Culpepper and raised a company of thirty-five men and these were the Culpepper men who came across the Blue Ridge Mountains to join the war waged by the mountaineers.

Field reached Lewisburg with this small company and made a demand that as he had outranked Andrew Lewis in the Bouquet war that by rights he ought to have command, but Andrew Lewis was county colonel of Botetourt, and he was made commander in chief. Whereupon, Field was angry and marched away off to one side of the main army, but by the time that Field had reached Meadow River, somewhere near Rainelle, Indians fired on his company, and that caused him to close up with the main army, where he was mollified as being listed with the rank of colonel but had charge of only thirty-five men.

At the battle of Point Pleasant, Col. Charles Lewis was killed at the first onset and the men gave back under the attack, and they were rallied by Col. Field approaching with reinforcements, but later in the day Col. Field was also killed.

Col. William Christian in a letter written on the 15th day of October, 1774, said that Col. Field had gotten behind a great tree and that an Indian near him talked to him to draw his attention while some other Indians on the right hand of the tree behind some logs shot him.

It will be seen then that the last two months of the life of John Field would make a basis for a historical romance if anyone desired to develop the character of an outstanding pioneer in that way. By gum, if I had time, I would do it myself.

Here was a man who had won fame as a young man in two great campaigns. He returned to the sheltered life in Culpepper. Then when the great land boom came in 1774, when Washington and other shrewd land-hungry Americans found a way to make a breach in the mountains and acquire Indian land in the reservation, John Field burnishes up his compass, and taking a raw Scotch immigrant and colored mammy to cook, turns his back on the luxurious life in the lowlands and wins his way across the terrifying mountains until he comes to Walter Kelly's on the Kanawha. Walter Kelly had established the outpost of the settlements, but he was not inviting any company. He had come nearly a hundred miles west so that he would not be disturbed. He had urgent reasons for remaining secluded. Something to do with an issue raised in North Carolina. And here in 1774 he found that he lived on a highway and he tasted the first onrush of the Midland Trail. April 14, 1774, Surveyor Jack Floyd's party of eight men came to his house. They were surveying for Washington and others. Thomas Hanson kept a journal of the expedition. At the mouth of Elk River they made a canoe which they called the Good Hope, and drifted down the river and surveyed 2,000 acres for Col. Washington bordered by the Coal River and the Canawagh River. And by the way, Hanson spells the name of the river C-O-A-L.* This party does not seem to have disturbed Walter Kelly, but later when Field and his party came to put up with him, Kelly got restive, sent his family back to the settlements and was figuring on some way to stop on and save his corn crop and get rid of his visitors, when his life was cut short by Indian warriors.

Field then being the only survivor and making his escape by the skin of his teeth in his shirt tail devoted the rest of his life to war on the Indians.

Hanson caught a pike at the mouth of Elk River forty-three inches long.

Field refused at Camp Union to submit to the leadership of Andrew Lewis. Charles Lewis marched his detachment first and Field took his company on as an independent command until they got to the banks of Little Meadow River. Here two hunters by the name of Clay and Coward went to hunt deer and encountered two Indians. The Indians shot and killed Coward and before they could scalp him, Clay killed one of the Indians. The other Indian escaped and took the report of the advance of the army to the Shawnee towns. This was on the 10th day of September, 1774. Field then waited until Andrew Lewis came up with the main army and while that army was encamped in a meadow or Savannah on Meadow River, he brought his men into camp and after that harmony prevailed.

The Midland Trail skirts the brink of the New River canyon on the south side of Gauley Mountain and comes down to the edge of the New River just above the mouth of Gauley River. But the army avoided that awe-inspiring gorge and turned to the right and crossed over Gauley Mountain and came down on Gauley River. Fleming records the facts that Gauley collects the waters betwixt the Greenbrier River and the Elk River. They marched down Gauley River and crossed over to the headwaters of Kelly's Creek by way of Bell's Creek on the line between Nicholas County and Fayette County. They marched down Kelly's Creek to the Kanawha River. Kelly's place was found to be about a half mile from the river. Here Fleming places Paw Paw trees, the flowering Poplar, and leatherwood. They found coal which burned well.

*John Peter Salley was the discoverer of this stream in 1742, and was the first to traverse its full length. He named the stream "Coal River." It has been asserted that the original name was "Cole" in honor of a soldier who served in Lewis' Big Sandy expedition in 1756, but the daily journal kept by Salley disproves the statement. In the journal the following entry was made: "In these mountains we found great plenty of Coal for which we named it (the stream) COAL RIVER."—B. B. S.

The name of the town at the mouth of Kelly's Creek is now Cedar Grove, but for many years it was known as Kelly's Station. A fort was built there in 1774 or shortly after by Captain William Morris who was a member of Captain Arbuckle's company and who was wounded at Point Pleasant. It was the head of navigation of the Kanawha River. In the years that followed it was the end of one of the Kentucky trails, and was the place that the immigrants came to navigable water on their westward journey to the rich lands of Kentucky. Here they dug out canoes and floated with the stream to Kentucky. It was a most important place.

After a time when the fort had rotted down it was known as the Boat Yards.

Now it is in the rich coal fields. It is in Cabin Creek district. Above and on the opposite side of the river is Paint Creek and below and across the river is Cabin Creek.

If I get the time, I want to go down to the Kelly place and follow up the line of travel that the army took in 1774. It would be a very interesting expedition to go there with Fleming's journal, and also his orderly book in hand and tramp over the route of that army.

There is tradition that I would like to verify, too. Fayette County was formed in the year 1831, from the counties of Logan, Greenbrier, Nicholas, and Kanawha. It fixes the boundary on the Nicholas side as coming to the mouth of Bell's Creek and running up and with the same to the house of James Nicholas, and from thence a straight line to Rock Camp, on the line between Kanawha and Nicholas, thence a straight line to Kanawha River. They say that in after years that considerable confusion arose about the lines on Bell Creek, as to the residence of certain citizens, and upon the matter being investigated, it was found that James Nicholas moved several times as his clearing extended up the creek that he lived upon, and that every time that he moved he took the county line with him. As I heard it the matter was adjusted by locating the original Nicholas homestead and fixing the lines to corner at that point.

There is another tradition about a kink in the line of Fayette County that is of great interest. It will be noticed that on its western boundary that the line between Fayette and Kanawha running south comes to the Kanawha River so as to leave Cannelton in Kanawha, and then follows the river down for about a mile and then continues south so as to throw Montgomery into Fayette County. As I heard it, when the new county was proposed, this line crossed the river where it cornered on the river, but the owner of a farm at that place on the south side of the river, Col. Montgomery, hearing about the proposed measure, and being at outs with the then government of Kanawha County, hot-footed to Richmond, and had the line so adjusted that his land was included within the new bounds of Fayette County. By this adventitious circumstance the large and important city of Montgomery was destined to be in Fayette County.

Montgomery is a fine city. I knew it when we both were young and we went the pace and went it blind. Twenty-five years ago Montgomery was in its hectic youth and its saloons sold a brand that would enable a man to go home and argue with his mother-in-law. The only honest-to-goodness dance-halls that I ever saw in my life, were in the moving pictures, and in Montgomery. But that is all changed now. Montgomery is noted for culture, schools, science, and art. I saw one of the best college publications that came from there the other day. It was the issue of its college paper of August 11th. You cross over dry shod on a bridge from the Midland Trail. When my wife and I were tourists, we paid the town the greatest compliment that a tourist can pay to a community, we stopped overnight there both going and coming. And they have a doctor there of the kind that causes the world to make a path to his door. The time is coming, if it has not already come for the people down the river to speak of that town as Kanawha Irredenta.

There is another place along the Midland Trail that I hope that the bright-eyed youngsters will look out for. I do not know how long a tree will live in this climate. Certainly not the hundreds and thousands of years that some enthusiastic tree lovers assert. But two hundred and fifty-five years ago, Thomas Batts and Robert Fallam came to the Kanawha Falls on the 17th day of September, 1671. They had been commissioned by General Wood to make an expedition to the west and to go through Appalachian Mountains until they came to the waters of the South Sea, and there ascertain the ebbing and the flowing of the waters on that side of the mountains so that a discovery of the South Sea might be accomplished. They were to go until they came to the tidewater rivers so common in Virginia, at Petersburg from whence they started. A third man was commissioned at the same time, Thomas Woods, but he fell sick and died before he reached the end of the journey.

The explorers found four trees in a row and marked them for the king. They took possession of the country in these words: "Long live Charles the Second, by grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, Ireland, and Virginia, and of all the territory thereunto belonging, defender of the faith, etc." They bared some places on the trunk of the tree and with marking irons burned C. R. and the royal arms, and placed various letters including W. B. for Governor Sir William Berkeley and A. W. for General Wood. These trees if they have not been destroyed are somewhere in the region of the great falls.

They traveled northwest from the extreme headwaters of Roanoke River for seventy-one miles and when they were thoroughly well satisfied that they had reached the place on the Great Kanawha where the tide ebbed and flowed they took possession in the name of the king and went back home again.

The trees stood on the other side of the river, I think, and they are on the hill for after the trees were marked the explorers went to the river's edge but with great difficulty on account of the thorns on the locust and the dense brush. This would correspond with the terrace on which the town of Kanawha Falls is built.

CHAPTER VIII

As you approach the break between the States of Virginia and West Virginia take note of the Mineral Waters. The greatest variety of Mineral Springs in the World as well as the Boldest.

Mineral waters affect me differently. The absorption of natural tonics inclines me to dance, hunt, fish, golf, lie and romance around. To eat, drink and be merry. The theory is to go to the springs and be sedate and build up for the battle of life. But so far all the effect that it has had on me is to increase my capacity for pleasure and the question has been not so much whether I could come back stronger and better for the experience, but whether I could go there and retain my Christian integrity.

If you have followed me this far, I would remind you that in writing on the subject of mineral waters, that I approach it from a viewpoint of an observer who has lived all his life in the heart of the most prolific region of mineral springs to be found anywhere in the world.

One of my earliest recollections is that of helping a gentleman gather up and place a few hundredweight of second-hand horseshoes and other scrap iron in the flow of a celebrated chalybeate spring and cover up the place. The object was to improve the quality of the water. I think now that it was a harmless experiment and that it was in no wise to be compared to the salting of a mine. My part of the work was to accumulate the iron. I got five cents for my part of the dirty work.

Later on, it was a matter of great interest to make a trip in a covered wagon across the mountains and observe the superior mortals who dallied around such summer resorts as the Hot Springs, the Warm Springs, the Bath Alum and Millboro Springs, all of which lay on the road to the railway depot. There we saw a set of carefree mortals, and it never occurred to us young ones that these kind of people ever had any troubles and tribulations. I know better now.

There is a real value in the curative powers of mineral waters and many instances occur where persons are sent to the springs by anxious hearts at a cost that makes it a supreme sacrifice. It is a terrible drain on the family savings but it is given in hope of saving a loved one's life. And tragedy walks hand in hand with pleasure at watering places.

People of this section do not realize what a wonderful geological region they live in. There are so many tinctured waters that they have invented a word for water that does not have a pronounced mineral taste, and they call it freestone water, and prize it very highly.

The Encyclopedia Britannica lists the mineral waters of North America according to the German classification. It gives thirty springs in the United States and Canada as representing the best of the classes and subclasses, including such springs as the Hot Springs of Arkansas, and Saratoga Springs, of New York. Yet notwithstanding the immense area covered by the list, there are in it eleven springs in this vicinity.

Six indifferent or thermal springs are given. Local springs included in the list are the Healing Springs, Warm Springs, and Hot Springs of Bath County.

Six calcareous and earthy springs, of which the Sweet Springs, of Monroe County, Berkeley Springs of Morgan County, and Allegheny Springs, Montgomery County, are the local representatives.

Four sulphur springs: The two close by are the White Sulphur Springs, of Greenbrier County, and the Salt Sulphur Springs, of Monroe County.

Five iron springs: Included in the list are Rawley Springs, of Rockingham County, Sweet Chalybeate Springs, of Allegheny County, and Rockbridge Alum, of Rockbridge County.

The classes in which this region does not take first place are epsom salts, common salt, glauber salt, and alkaline. Other States take supremacy in those.

The reason of the great abundance of mineral waters in the mountains is stated as follows. The Devonian and Silurian formations which overlie the Eozoic rocks along the course of the Appalachian range, especially in Virginia and West Virginia, have been greatly fissued—the faulting of the strata in some places of enormous magnitude—by the series of upheavals which gave rise to the many parallel mountain ridges along the lines of fault.

In other words, the Accordion Mountains. The surface of the earth once stretched far and wide. Then it folded like an accordion, and the ridges appeared. If you do not know what an accordion is it can be stated that it is a musical bellows. Now when the earth's crust gets to folding up like a bellows, there is apt to be some fracture of the strata, for there is only a limited amount of elasticity to the rock beds, and the dislocation caused by the slipping of rock masses along the plane of fracture, is called a fault. In following a vein in mining it sometimes disappears, and it may be found many feet below on account of a subsidence of a considerable portion of the broken strata. But nature did such a neat job of folding up these mountains that there are surprisingly few faults, and most of our noble mountains west of the main break, the Allegheny, are due to erosion. Most of the ridges that run north and south are folded mountains and most of those which set some other way are eroded.

One naturally looks for the mineral waters then along the great break of the Allegheny Mountain dividing the two Virginias. But as a sort of a compensation to the people living west of the main break, nature provided a very important mineral water in vast quantities, and that is a calcareous or earthy water, known generally as limestone water. And but for its great plentifulness this would be the most valuable mineral water of all for it makes men grow strong and well and to attain great size, strength, and stature. In limestone countries look for six-footers. We call it hard water. It is cold, clear, invigorating, healthy. The housewife learns to qualify it by buying an alkali soap to wash clothes. Something in the nature of soda. The chemists of the kitchen know about it. At our house until the last year, we had a fine limestone water and when the new source of supply came to the town water works, and it commenced to use an indifferent water, or as we would say, a freestone water, the soap bill for wash day was about one-tenth of what it was when we had to soften up the noble and calcareous mixture.

For years the main water supply of this town was a mixture of iron and salt and a few other powerful remedies, and in all the years, the chemists had not found any commercial soap that would qualify it and make it tractable. It was good to extinguish fires, and it was healthy to drink, though not so palatable. But they gave it up as a bad job and took a soft water.

But let us have a few more scientific observations. The folding of the mountains caused faults and fissures and the rains descended and the floods came and the cracks and crevices of the earth were filled and the water went deep and returned again to the surface, and a number of warm springs were found flowing. I have never seen a thermal spring that was not a bold and abundant flow and volume. It is unaffected by change in the seasons. Wet and dry weather does not affect it. Such springs go so deep into the surface of the earth and find such vast reservoirs, that they go on forever, unchanged. They take their temperature from heat deep in the bowels of the earth and they flow in such volume that they are not subject to much contamination in the way of nauseous minerals, but come forth bubbling with gas, and the water is the most palatable of all waters, in spite of its temperature. It is very different from the ordinary tepid water. The gentleman who chambers a gallon or two of the light, airy water fresh from the inferno rejoices like a strong man to run a race.

All through these mountain counties there are mineral springs. They are in such numbers that it may be said that no community is without them, and these offer to suffering humanity a cure for almost every ill. The fact is that the very number make mineral water so common that it is not valuable as mineral water. The great price that it brings in the cities represents labor and transportation. I had this experience. I drove down Anthony's Creek passing near where Alvon water comes out in such great abundance. The next day I was in Charleston at a great hotel. Feeling faint, in a moment of weakness, I ordered a bottle of this water to be used internally and the charge was fifty cents for a half-gallon bottle. This was about four times the price of gasoline. It shows what a man will give for a drink of water when he is away from home.

A light water. That is the kind that a person can carry easily. Those used to a moderate tumbler full of ordinary solid water, are surprised to find that they can chamber glass after glass of light water that rises from such great depths that it carries with it a great deal of gas. Thus a gallon of water from the Warm Springs if consumed in one drink, will furnish to airy, fairy Lillian four and one-half cubic inches of gas, and she will float away on the wings of the morning feeling fine.

The tradition of the Warm Springs is that a party of Indians on a forced march camped there one night and one of the warriors attracted by the temperature of the water bathed in it, and it was so agreeable that he found a suitable wallow and slept in the water all night. On the march being resumed the next morning, it was found that the Indian who had slept in the water had more speed and stamina than any other in the army, and he flew up the mountain like a bird, and ever after that the magic of its waters were recognized. Long before settlers came to Bath County, the value of the water for bathing became known, and sick persons were carried there. There is no question as to value of these thermal waters to persons afflicted with rheumatism and a large number of other complaints that take the joy out of life.

The most luxurious resort is the Hot Springs but most of us Scots keep away from there on account of the worry attending the brooding over the scale of prices. There is such a thing as paying so much for food that it takes away the appetite. And while the visitor may be there for his health the hotel keeper is not. I have had experiences at the Hot Springs ranging from sleeping in the road at the railway depot under a covered wagon, to that of dining with the President of the United States. I have even had the experience there of meeting and being associated with a courteous caddy of an understanding heart, and that is making a bold and broad statement, but it is true.

The Warm Springs is the county seat town of Bath County and when I can first remember it, it was more important than the Hot Springs. That was before the millions were expended on the Hot Springs. My father used to preach at the Warm Springs. And then in the seventies he went there to attend a meeting of Lexington Presbytery, one of the most intellectual and powerful institutions in the world. It was my time to go to Presbytery and I went along. I have never forgotten the boiling caldron of water, appreciably warm to the taste. It was a round well-like spring covered with a round shelter. On the ground near the spring, I found a beautiful print, and I asked my father if I could have it. He hesitated for a moment to answer but said yes. It was a playing card, the three of diamonds, and I carried it home with me. The water flowed into great bathing pools and it maintained in these pools a temperature of ninety-eight degrees. The water is clear as clear can be and is thoroughly well charged with gas. At these springs in Bath County, bathing has reached its highest state of perfection.

Of all the vistas afforded by the Accordion Mountains, there is none more wonderful than the one from Warm Springs Mountain, where the innumerable crests of mountains can be seen as far as the eye can reach. Some delirious summer boarder remarked that it was like a dark blue sea of giant billows, instantly stricken solid by nature's magic wand.

For many years the wagon road ended at Bath Alum, at the eastern foot of Warm Springs Mountain, and this was the end of wagon transportation for emigration and trade. From that point on, it was pack-horses.

The Hot Springs is east of the great divide, but the other great watering place is in West Virginia west of the divide. It is in West Virginia between the Greenbrier River and the height of land. The Greenbrier River people are placed on the dividing line between the mineral waters of the east and the petroleum of the west. The White Sulphur Springs probably give the drinker more suspended matter than is to be found in any other nearby waters. At least I have always felt like there was some very substantial qualities to the water. I see it stated that by evaporation a hundred cubic inches of this water (between a quart and a half gallon) will yield sixty-three grains of solid matter. Or.

63.54 grains to be exact. It is a light palatable water and one readily sees that after the third or fourth glassful of this beautiful water that he would be well supplied with a number of healthful and invigorating grains.

Like so many other sulphur springs, this was a famous deer lick in the old days. Another tradition is that in 1772, a woman who was so sick that she was given up to die, was brought there on a litter. A poplar tree was felled and a large trough for bathing purposes was constructed with adz and axe. Sulphur water was put in it, and it was heated by placing hot stones in the water. The sick woman was bathed in the water thus prepared and she drank freely of the water from the spring. In a few weeks she went home cured.

It is a matter of utmost importance to Virginia and West Virginia to have the world realize the beauty and the importance of the mountain counties and nothing adds more to their attractiveness than the great number of beautiful springs all of which have curative values. These springs are so numerous that it may be said that they have never been numbered. They are to be found everywhere. Some of the most natable have fixed the sites of watering places, but there are many just as valuable which are disregarded and known only to those who live in the locality.

It is a day of easy and cheap transportation by means of the motor car and the world do move. About sixty-odd years ago, the powers that be staged a great Civil War which was fought for four years, largely in the zone of fracture, which divides Virginia and West Virginia, and after it had been kept up for years, the people of the cities had found other and safer resorts, and our watering places came out of the war all shot to pieces with much of their glory departed. They have not had the vogue since then that they once enjoyed.

But the country has increased in population and the motor car has come, and it may be that the mountains will once more come into their own.

About the best evidence that there is universal, internal heat in the interior of the earth is furnished by the great number of thermal springs that flow from this broken and disjointed mountain country.

For petroleum we know that one must look for a hermetically sealed container which is without a leak and in which the oil has been stored by the action of nature. And for warm springs one must look for some condition of the strata just the opposite, for these flowing springs are supplied by the rainfall and are rendered warm by traversing hidden channels under the surface.

Petroleum is a mineral like coal. There is a deposit and when it is exhausted it cannot be replenished under modern conditions. And petroleum is like water in that it will drain away if a leak occurs, but there is no power to restore it as has a spring that feeds from the rainfall. I asked an engineer how big was an oil pool? And he said: 'How long is a stick?" One well may be all that will touch a particular pool or there may be hundreds.

It is indefinite to say mineral water. Probably the White Sulphur Springs handles the extremes, Alvon water from up on Anthonys Creek will probably show less than five grains of solids to the gallon and the water from the main sulphur spring shows one hundred and twenty-four grains to the gallon.

And then, too, in this country there is a dispute as to what is a thermal spring. There is no question about the hot springs, but what of the others that show no variation in temperature from atmospheric conditions? Do they not have the right to be called thermal and are they not extremely valuable on account of the tremendous purifying process they have undergone within the deep and vast confines of subterranean caverns?

Alum water is the heaviest and most powerful of all our iron springs. It is often so acid as to make it disagreeable to drink. The springs that give the red color to the soil from the flow of water are not the strongest necessarily in iron. It may be that other springs that do not have the red running water may taste strong of acid. The main quality of iron water is that of a tonic and the use of it greatly stimulates the appetite for plain and wholesome food.

In the plan to have the teacher from every sub-district in the State make a record of the predominant features of the sub-district, the thousands of notable mineral springs of the mountain counties will be listed and made available for inspection by any person interested.

In the meantime rest assured that the border counties on either side of the Great Divide, the Allegheny Mountain, in West Virginia and Virginia, have the world beaten as to the volume and variety of mineral waters.

CHAPTER IX

Civil War activities on the Midland Trail. The stamping ground of Lee, Crook, Wise, Floyd, and other generals. Here Milton W. Humphries invented indirect fire.

In regard to these chapters on the Midland Trail, fast assuming the size and shape of a history of southern West Virginia, the period of the Civil War demands some attention. The activities along the James River and Kanawha Turnpike, now called the Midland Trail would demand a book in themselves, but there would be so many statistics in it that you would not stand for it. The names of the regiments and companies clutter up war history until the unfortunate reader throws the thing across the room.

When Moses was writing and compiling the Pentateuch, some earnest souls thought that he was not getting enough statistics in it, and they called for a recording of facts. More facts and less style. Moses seems to have been a nervous man, and he gave them some chapters of genealogy running like this: And Joktan begat Almodad, and so forth. And all the world gives it the go by. In the days when we read the Bible through every few months at family prayers, our good father would direct the skipping of the begatitudes.

And now that I am undertaking a chapter on the Civil War, I am going to see if I cannot make it run along in a sort of general way pleasing to the company in an attempt to get at the kernel of the subject, even under the danger of being accused of soldiering.

During the whole four years there were armies marching to and fro across the southern part of West Virginia from the first to the last, and there has not been very much said about the campaigns in any books that I can get hold of. A similar activity was to be observed along the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, the parallel road farther north, but it seems that most of the writers have been from the northern part of the State, and small attention has been given to the tremendous happenings of what is now the more populous half of West Virginia, to wit, the southern end—that part of the State that lies south of the Bison Range, the unbroken divide that lies from the Virginia line at the junction of Pendleton, Highland, and Pocahontas counties, to the Ohio River above the mouth of the Great Kanawha River.

Among the actions fought on the Midland Trail were: Battle of White Sulphur Springs, two battles at Lewisburg, Sewell Mountain, Carnifax Ferry, Cotton Hill, two battles at Fayetteville, Charleston (September 13, 1862), Scary, Hurricane Bridge, three battles in Lincoln (Sandy Lick, Curry Farm, and Coon Creek), Winfield, Pore's Hill and Guyandotte.

In the beginning, Gen. Cox advanced eastward on the highway from Ohio, with the Union Army, and Henry A. Wise and John B. Floyd came from Virginia, as rival commanders of the Confederate forces. And the feeling between the Blue and the Gray was mild compared to the fierce conflict between those two generals. It is apparent that the dislike between the two commanders extended to the rank and file.

Henry A. Wise had been governor of Virginia just preceding the war, and had steam-rollered the ordinance of secession through the Richmond convention the year after his term as governor had ended. He emphasized his remarks with a horse pistol and carried everything before him. He put Virginia with the seceding States and caused West Virginia to leave home and set up for herself. In 1856, when Henry, the Worst, was nominated at Staunton, much of his strength came from the western counties. I have it on the authority of a son of Dr. English, that Dr. Thomas Dunn English, of Logan County, first suggested Wise as a candidate and put his nomination over. Anyway he hotfooted to the Kanawha Valley on the outbreaking of hostilities, to hold these counties in line, but he met with only partial success. He did raise a considerable army by bringing on Virginia troops to augment his volunteers from this side of the mountain, and so far as Wise's campaign was concerned he succeeded in what he undertook. Probably his most signal success was the winning of the battle of Scary, down the river between St. Albans and Winfield.

Gen. John B. Floyd had also served as governor of Virginia, and in addition to that he had been Secretary of War in President Buchanan's cabinet, immediately preceding the war. His commission antedated that of Wise, and on this ground he claimed to be in command. Wise who had driven a recalcitrant convention at the point of a horse pistol was not one to submit tamely to an old political rival, and he took it up with Robert E. Lee as did Floyd, and Lee seems to have intimated that while the position of one of them was safer that the position of the other was stronger. But finally the President of the Confederates States ordered Wise to turn over everything to Floyd and to report in Richmond, which he did after consulting Lee on that, too. Wise retained his rank as general all through the war, and was with Lee at Appomattox.

After Wise got to Richmond, he gave such an account of the troubles in the Kanawha Valley that the department allowed him to withdraw his Legion to eastern Virginia, and ordered Gen. Loring's army to march on to Charleston by the Midland Trail, while Floyd with 4,700 men was ordered to proceed in a parallel line on the south side of the river. But en route Gen Loring was ordered to Cheat Mountain, and Floyd was left unsupported. He had several contacts with Gen. Cox at Cotton Hill, Fayetteville, and other points in Fayette and Raleigh counties, and he reported that the Union forces would not stand up and fight. The Union officers reported Floyd in hasty and disorganized retreat. The Richmond department was not satisfied with Floyd's account and his command was ordered east. This was in November and thus ended the first season in southern West Virginia with the Union army in possession.

The next year, the Kanawha campaign was turned over to Gen. Loring.

Detailed accounts of this and other campaigns may be found in a pamphlet by Milton W. Humphries, entitled "Military Operations in Fayette County and the Lynchburg Campaign printed by Charles A. Goddard, Fayetteville, W. Va."

One of the units of the Confederate forces that traveled the Midland Trail was the Monroe Artillery, more often referred to as Bryan's Battery. In charge of the first gun of that battery was A. N. Campbell, known as the Big Sergeant of Bryan's Battery. He was a powerful man over six feet tall and weighing about three hundred and fifty pounds in his prime. After the war he became a famous judge and lawyer. He was judge of the district composed of the counties of Pocahontas, Greenbrier, Monroe, Summers and Fayette, which he served for eight years as presiding judge for a salary of eighteen hundred dollars per year. The vicissitudes of politics retired him in 1896, when he was approaching old age and he was very much concerned about the chances of building up a pracice again. But his ability was recognized and he at once was retained by two clients on a yearly retainer of $2,500.00 each, and he built up a great practice and accumulated a fortune. His defeat had proved a blessing in disguise. Soldiers who have seen him in action serving his piece of artillery have said that it was one of the most remarkable exhibitions of courage and strength that they had ever seen.

Captain Thomas A. Bryan's battery in the opening of the campaign of 1862, consisted of two pieces of artillery and eighty men. The men served with an infantry regiment.

The sergeant of the second piece, a twelve-pound howitzer, was Milton W. Humphries, of Monroe County, aged eighteen, who had been recalled from college life to fight for the Confederacy. He served throughout the war, and studied ballistics with an acute and scientific mind until he became a recognized authority in the science of the motion of projectiles. For instance a shot from a cannon must take into consideration the rotary motion of the earth and that the target shifts to the left and that has to be taken into consideration in firing smooth bores, but with rifled guns the drift caused by the rotation of the ball offsets his shift, or some such rule, if I read him right.

In the last great war, the gunners fired the cannon without seeing the target fired at. They would elevate the cannon and let fly and shoot the head off of a squirred in a tree in the next county or country, the ball traveling high in the air, over the intervening hills, mountains, and valleys. They fired by maps. And if they did not have one handy of the country they sent up an airship with a camera and got a photograph. One colored trooper insisted that all the gunners needed to get a man with a cannon ball was his post office address. This firing at unseen targets is called indirect fire or defilade fire, and is about the only kind of shooting that is done in this day and time.

Milton W. Humphries worked out the science of indirect fire while serving with Bryan's Battery in the Kanawha Valley, and first practiced it at the second battle of Fayetteville. He continued to improve the theory by actual work, until it was universally accepted.

The occasion of the first firing of this kind, was when he set up his howitzer on the 19th day of May, 1863, three-fourths of a mile from Fayetteville on the Oak Hill road. The Federal forces the year before had erected well-built and extensive earth forts on the heights at that town. Humphries set up his gun in plain view of the fort and fired through an opening cut in the woods. At his third or fourth fire he hit the flagstaff in the fort cutting the colors down. Then the fort answered him with artillery shell fire which was so accurate that he shifted his gun where it would be hid by the intervening wood and from that time to night he fired on the fort some sixty-odd times.

The Federal forces withdrew during the night but occupied the same forts again the next day, and the Confederate forces withdrew towards Beckley.

The other battle at these same forts at Fayetteville had taken place September 10th, the year before.

Prof. Milton W. Humphries, the gunner, became famous after the war as one of the great educators of the country. He was at Washington College the year the war opened, and finished there after the war, and became one of the faculty under Robert E. Lee. He finished his education in Germany at the University of Leipsic and served as professor in the Vanderbilt University, the University of Texas and in the University of Virginia, where he served for twenty-five years until his retirement in 1912. He was a native of Monroe County, a son of Dr. A. C. Humphries and Mary McQuain Heiner Humphries. He has attained fame as a writer and lecturer, gunner, Greek scholar, and as one of the greatest of chess players.

The year of 1862, the Confederates under Loring occupied the Kanawha Valley and held Charleston until October 8th. On September 13, the artillery of the Confederate forces fired on Charleston all day while Gen. Lightburn, commander of the Federal forces was getting his army out of town. On that day he crossed the bridge at the mouth of Elk River with eleven hundred wagons and then burned the bridge that carried him over. While Loring held Charleston, innumerable wagons appeared at the salt works and hauled salt away. It was getting scarce in the Southern States.

Loring marched back to Lewisburg with his whole force for some unexplained reason. The Federal forces occupied Charleston again and held it to the close of the war. At Lewisburg Loring was halted and he returned but failed to take Charleston. His retreat from the Kanawha is about as hard to understand as that of Floyd's the year before.

The most reasonable explanation or conjecture as to Loring moving his army a hundred miles east on the pike to Lewisburg, and his frantic effort to get back to Charleston before the Federal forces occupied it is that Loring received a command from headquarters to report at Richmond that he read to mean to bring his army with him. So much for the vagaries of the English language.

From this year 1862, the West Virginia mountains, and especially this road, was to see a great deal of a hero of American history, Gen. George Crook, the "Gray Fox" of the Indian wars. He got that nickname from his shrewdness and by reason of the fact that he wore a beard that was very much the tint and general makeup of a fox's bushy tail. He was born in Dayton, Ohio. He graduated from West Point in 1852, and immediately joined his regiment in California and saw nine years' service in keeping the Indians in order on the Pacific Coast. When the war broke out he came east as fast as he could by way of Panama, and receiving a colonel's commission he joined the 36th Ohio Volunteer Infantry at Summersville.

The next May he occupied Lewisburg, with a brigade of troops. The Confederate force sent to dislodge him from Mercer County under Gen. Heth, though much superior in number and arms, was defeated and retreated with great loss. The reason ascribed by commanders on both sides was that Crook at the beginning of the winter had erected a large building and in it had drilled his raw recruits hard and the Confederate forces were undrilled. This victory made Crook and it worsted Heth, who was relieved of his mountain command.

The people of West Virginia after the war spoke often of the Gray Fox and he was universally liked and respected for his fairness and as a capable man. He saw service in all parts of the Virginias. He got to be major general in the latter part of 1864, and was placed in command of the Department of West Virginia, with headquarters at Cumberland. In the spring of that year he was placed in command of the Kanawha Division and he fought the battle of Cloyd's Mountain, and took and burned a bridge over New River, and lay at Meadow Bluff in Greenbrier county on the pike from May 19 to June 1, the day that his army crossed the Greenbrier River on the way to the Lynchburg campaign.

After the war Crook went back from major general to lieutenant colonel and went west to fight the Indians again, and it was this period of his life that so much has been written about him by the authors of the country, and it was during these years that his fame in the west kept his memory alive in West Virginia.

He was not only a great Indian fighter but he understood the Indian character and he accomplished more by peaceful settlement than by fighting, though he saw much of that. He conquered the Snake Indians, the Apaches, the Sioux, and the Chiricahaus.

No story of Indian war for twenty years after the Civil War was considered complete without some reference to the Gray Fox. He was a quiet, soft spoken man, who dressed shabbily, and who knew the army from the ground up, and who inquired into the minute details in regard to his soldiers, their arms, stock, and equipment.

He had the distinction of working his way up to the position of major general the second time by a commission dated April 6, 1888. He died in Chicago in 1890.

In February, 1865, Crook was ordered to turn over the Department of West Virginia to Major General Benjamin F. Kelley, and take Sheridan's place in the Valley of Virginia. Kelley came to Cumberland and Crook started to Winchester. Captain Jesse McNeil's rangers had torn up the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the train backed into Cumberland. Crook went to the hotel where Kelley was stationed.

That night same twenty-odd of McNeil's rangers made a raid on Cumberland, and in the dead of night rode into the city then occupied by a Federal army and going into the hotel, woke up the two major generals and at the point of the pistol carried them off and delivered them to the Confederate authorities at Richmond.

I got the details of this exploit at first hand from Armistead Combs who was in the surprise that night, and according to his report they had no trouble in riding into Cumberland and up to the hotel, which was called the Windsor, the last time I stopped over in that city. The generals gave them no trouble, as they probably knew that there would be shooting and that death would be their portion.

This company was from Hardy County and knew all the ins and outs of the mountains, and riding with them was a man by the name of Charles J. Daily who knew all about the city and the hotel where the generals stopped.

When they delivered the major generals at Richmond, the Confederates wanted to trade them for all the prisoners in the northern prisons. The Secretary of War at Washington wanted to dismiss both generals but Grant would not stand for that. The Confederacy was on its last legs. Less than two months was to see the end of the war. The stage had been reached where it took a barrel of money to buy a barrel of flour, and a pound of money to buy a pound of bacon. But they made a quick trade with Crook, and by March 27th, Crook was on duty near Richmond in command of all the cavalry of the Army of the Potomac.

With only fourteen days of the war remaining, Crook managed to fight four battles, Dinwiddie Courthouse, Jetersville, Sailors Creek, and Farmville, and it was Crook's cavalry that held Lee on the 9th of April, when the advance of the infantry convinced him that his case was hopeless, and he surrendered to Grant. Crook's success started at Lewisburg and it carried him through to Appomattox.

It took more than the rugged mountains to awe Crook. He was the Gray Fox of the West. And nowhere did he have more friends and admirers than those who lived along the Midland Trail.

CHAPTER X

The Mouth of the Guyandotte River and the Trail to that point from the Mouth of Coal River.

The Midland Trail was an Indian trail and not a buffalo trail. No record of any kind is extant of seeing a herd of buffaloes in the wooded slopes of West Virginia. There were many cases of solitary wood buffalo, but they differed materially from the grass-eating buffalo of the plains, and they were solitary and not gregarious. The wood buffalo did not travel all over the country. They stayed where they were put.

The old Indian trail followed the Great Kanawha to its mouth, and across the Ohio River, and that is the line of travel that General Andrew Lewis's army took in 1774, in Dunmore's War.

When the white men occupied the country and it became expedient to connect Richmond and Staunton with the traffic on the Ohio River, there was a change made in the line of travel at a very early date.

The Indian trail was followed to the mouth of Coal River, at St. Albans, on the two thousand-acre Washington survey, and there the road branches off to the south to reach the Ohio River at the mouth of the Guyan River, and that is the way that State Highway No. 3, the Midland Trail, follows.

The road began at the important town of Guyandotte and reached the top of Allegheny Mountain at the pass near White Sulphur Springs. It is hard to say when this became the great highway, but it must have been as far back at 1800. There was every reason for taking the near cut through the hills to the Kanawha River at the mouth of Coal River. It was only about forty miles. For the boats down the river there were two great highways in the north, the Braddock road, and the Pennsylvania road. But for the boats poled laboriously up the Ohio River against the current, the deep inlet formed by the Guyan River, formed a most tempting and convenient place to branch off and use the great canyon of the New River, where the mountains were rent in twain, and which led to the metropolis of Richmond, and to the sea.

A great traffic was maintained on this road long before the James River and Kanawha Turnpike was incorporated. Guyandotte and Wheeling were the two principal towns on the Ohio in Western Virginia, handling the river travel and freight. It was this transportation problem that led to the founding of those ancient towns, Barboursville and Guyandotte, and to the formation of the county of Cabell, in 1809. William H. Cabell was governor of Virginia and the new county was named in his honor.

The first court was organized when Judge Coalter arrived at Barboursville one day, soon after the formation of the county. Barboursville was the first county seat. He reported that there was considerable debate and opposition to his mission, on the grounds that the inhabitants were of a mind to try to get along without a court or grand jury, and that they did not want any protection of that kind. But Judge Coalter proceeded to organize a court. This Judge Coalter was the Staunton attorney. He was born in Rockbridge County and was a judge of the general court and afterwards a member of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Edmund Morris was appointed clerk of the Cabell court and James Wilson, prosecuting attorney. Lawyers qualified to practice were David Cartmill, Henry Hunter, William H. Cavendish, John Mathews, Ballard Smith, Lewis Summers, and Sylvester Woodward, afterwards attorney general of the State of New York.

A hundred years ago, Guyandotte could not compare with the metropolis of Wheeling in size but it was its rival so far as an inland port was concerned. It had about eight hundred people as compared to Wheeling's five thousand, but it was the route that many chose for goods or travel who came out of the west headed to Richmond and the ports on the Atlantic Ocean.

The sign in which Cabell County conquers is transportation from the first. About fifty-odd years ago, the great railroad builder, C. P. Huntington, came by and he was intent on joining Cincinnati and Richmond by means of a railroad, with a side service to New York, and he picked out Cabell County as the spot for the halfway place, and that carried along the plan of making Wheeling and Guyandotte the two most important West Virginia towns on the Ohio River.

Guyandotte did not know what luck had come to her, for the place that Huntington took for the town of his name was miles away from the town of Guyandotte, but the time has come when the city has reached out and included that town in its improvements and is on its way to absorb Barboursville, and right the ancient wrong of taking the courthouse away from that ancient town.

We have five or six big cities in West Virginia but all of them except Huntington are old and go back to the days of Cornstalk, but Huntington only goes back to the days of Jesse James, and the good Queen Victoria. There on some broad level lands on the banks of the Ohio River so high that it fears no flood, the great railroad man Huntington, said there was to be a city, and after a time it grew so fast that it took in Guyandotte with its brick work and paved streets, and that in a way is the oldest part of Huntington. And the wayfarer should note that Guyandotte stood on its dignity, and advanced no part of the way to join up with Huntington. She waited in all calmness and dignity for Huntington to come and get her and envelop her with city improvements.

Jesse James was a great outlaw in the days gone by, some fifty years ago. He was a sort of Rob Roy and Robin Hood and Jack Cade combined. They used to sell his life in the shape of a subscription book. I can well remember how disappointed we children were when our minister father refused to subscribe to the life of Jesse James as represented by a book agent. They say that Jesse James ravaged as far east as Huntington, and that a robbery in Huntington was actually his farthest east. Last summer at Princeton, I ran on a tradition that one day Jesse James came there to consider the advisability of robbing a bank that stood there in what was a very small village then, and that having partaken of the hospitality of the president of the bank, he stayed his hand, and left it undisturbed.

In those days, Jesse James was a great lawbreaker and hero, but he would not amount to much in this day of bootleggers and other evils. He specialized in robbing banks, and he would ride up and get a bag full of money and ride away, but he would find his occupation gone if he lived today, and he would probably have to hold up a truck load of liquor or something like that if he had to make a living for his family.

Cabell (Kabble) County was formed in 1809, from Kanawha. It was at the time that William H. Cabell was governor of Virginia, hence the name. It was a fine large county to begin with. It ran from Mason to Giles, and with Giles and Tazewell to Tug River, and with Tug River to the Ohio River and up the Ohio River to the Mason County line. Wayne, Lincoln, Mingo, Wyoming, and other counties have reduced it to its present boundaries, but with it all it has kept the old road and the brightest jewel, the city of Huntington.

There seems to be no West Virginia historian who has called attention to the part that the port of Guyandotte and the road to the mouth of Coal River and to the Kanawha River have played in the development of southern West Virginia, which, much to the mystification of the great northwest, turned up a short time ago with more than half the people of the State.

So far as I know, it was Professor Brown, of the University, the geologist, who traced strata of the earth and took note of the way the streams ran, and how the land lay, who announced some thirty-odd years ago that Huntington was destined to be the big city on the Ohio River between Cincinnati and Pittsburgh.

First the flat boats poled up the river from as far south as New Orleans and found a harbor in the still water between the high banks of the Guyan River where it entered the Ohio, and later steamboats followed the same course, to connect with the carry-across the Appalachians, by way of the great watering place, the White Sulphur Springs.

Huntington is the big Victorian city of West Virginia. It grew without noise, fuss, or confusion until the time is near at hand if not already come when it can claim its six figures in population. Many of us who belong to the Victorian age are inclined to think that the world reached the high point of valor and endeavor during those halcyon years, and that the great events of the twentieth century are builded on the sure foundation of those years, of the good queen, who kept the noiseless tenor of her way and reigned for sixty-four years. The gentle lady who as the old Irishman said had shown interest in but one piece of music in her life, when the tune was traced down and discovered it was found to be "Come where the booze is cheaper."

But with all the overwhelming bigness of Huntington, Cabell is an important farming county, having still some two thousand farms.

Thomas Hannon was the first settler. He moved from Botetourt County in the year 1796, and settled up near the Mason County line, on what was called Green Bottom. Shortly after, Thomas Buffington settled at the mouth of the Guyan River.

The earliest reference that I find to Guyandotte River is in the journal of Floyd's surveying party who made camp at the mouth of the Great Giandot on the 27th day of April, 1774. The party was at that place thirty-seven strong, having joined some other parties of surveyors. While in camp there four Delaware Indian men with fourteen squaws and some children came to the camp and told them that there was a party of about fifty Indians on the River below them. They stopped over on the 28th of April on account of rain and proceeded to the Big Sandy on the 29th. And Nicholas Cresswell notes in his journal that on the 10th day of May, 1775, that he passed the mouth of Giandot Creek coming in from the east. These journals both show that the stream had been named previous to the times, and that the name was in common use and intelligible to the people of that day and time. In 1756, almost twenty years before, Gen. Andrew Lewis marched an army of 418 men to the mouth of the Big Sandy River, a few miles below the mouth of the Guyandotte, and had marched across the headwaters of that stream from the place that he left New River. Either that or around the headwaters.

The first congressmen elected in western Virginia after the secession movement were: William G. Brown, Jacob B. Blair, and Kellian V. Whaley. These men served in place of the seceding members. They were electd in 1861. Congressman Whaley was commissioned a major by Governor Pierpont and authorized to recruit a regiment. Major Whaley made his headquarters at Guyandotte and up to November 10, 1861, had enlisted about 150 men. On that date a Confederate force under Jenkins and Clarkson of twelve hundred men made a raid on Guyandotte, and captured Major Whaley and a number of his men.

It was not much of a battle. There was some firing but no one hit. Major Whaley was firing a rifle but a soldier overpowered him and commenced talking about killing the damned abolitionist, but Col. Clarkson, of the Confederacy, rode up and told the soldiers to behave themselves, and that Major Whaley was a brave man and was to be well treated. The Confederates then moved rapidly towards Barboursville, where there were other prisoners and the whole command went on a forced march and landed about Chapmanville, in Logan County. The distinguished prisoner thought they marched about forty miles that day. The prisoners had to walk at first but later they were taken up behind soldiers on the horses.

During the day a messenger overtook the cavalry and reported that Col. Zeigler, of the Union Army, had taken Confederates prisoners and burned the town of Guyandotte.

By night, Major Whaley was turned over to Captain Witcher's command, and placed under guard of eight men in a house. He woke about three in the morning and found that all the soldiers were asleep. He took Witcher's hat and his own shoes, and stepped outside, ran to the Guyandotte River and swam across. He had gone about a mile when he heard the firing of guns announcing his escape.

He climbed a mountain by daybreak. He stayed all that day in a thicket of redbrush, walking most of the time in a path to and fro to keep from freezing. He had no coat and a cold wind was blowing.

When night came he started down the valley and in about two miles came on a camp of Confederate soldiers. He took to the hilltops. Next day on Harts Creek he came to a place inhabited by a family named Adkins. Here he got a boy to guide him to Keysers Creek for two dollars. Arriving at Keysers Creek he found that he had but twenty-five cents, as all the rest of his money had been taken from him. He gave the twenty-five cents to Adkins and his shoes and took an old pair of moccasins the boy had worn. Whaley went on down the creek and barely escaped capture. He laid down behind a rail fence and a Confederate troop passed within six feet of him. He had been thirty-six hours without food. He went to the nearest house but could not get anything to eat. He offered the man five hundred dollars to guide him to the house of Absolom Queen. The man was a Union man but he refused from fear of the Confederates. He gave Whaley a blanket and told him how to find the Queen place.

When the got to Queen's he found a Union home guard of twenty men, and at last got something to eat.

Queen and eleven of his men then took Whaley, traveling only by night, to the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River. They crossed over into Kentucky and stopped at the house of Roland Sammon. At night they floated in a boat down to the forks of the Big Sandy where they found about midnight the regiment of Col. Laban Moore, of Kentucky, also a member of Congress, and from there they went on to the mouth of the Big Sandy, where they were safe and were received with great rejoicing.

Whaley presented to each of Queen's men an Enfield rifle and a thousand rounds of ammunition and a lot of store goods. Absolom Queen was a veteran of the War of 1812.

The present limits of Cabell County were free from Indian raids, for the reason there were no inhabitants, but there was trouble along the border of the county as originally laid out. There was an Indian war road up the Big Sandy and the Tug rivers, on the line between Kentucky and Virginia, and over to the Blue Stone and the Roanoke settlements, that was used after the settlements in the Greenbrier Valley had blocked the Midland Trail to the Indians. Much of the trouble in the year 1774, in the summer, was occasioned by what James Robertson called the little straggling parties that came east on the Big Sandy route and killed the pioneers in their cabins. I think it was the road most used by the Mingoes that summer when Logan set out to kill and torture at least one hundred and twenty white persons, in revenge for the Yellow Creek battle.

There is one thing about Cabell County that I have always wanted to find out about, but nobody seems to know anything about it that I ask. It was reported over a hundred years ago that there was the distinct outline of an important prehistoric city, about eighteen miles up the river above the mouth of the Guyandotte on what was called Green Bottom. I understand, too, that the land was exceedingly rich and valuable and that the signs of the city were disappearing before the careful farming and improving that was being carried on.

It was said that this city had a frontage on the Ohio River of about half a mile, and that the streets were laid out in regular form so as to form a city with streets of about a hundred and sixty acres. The signs show that it was compactly built and that it was in most respects like the cities found in Central America which indicate a civilization whose other records have been lost in the passage of time.

The big mound farther up the Ohio at Moundsville, is another instance of this ancient people. The labor required to build some of these prehistoric mounds is comparable to the work that it took to erect the pyramids of Egypt.

If the place on Green Bottom was one of the ancient cities it is probably the one farthest north that has been discovered, as these are found in the southern part of the continent, as a general rule.

Cabell County is but a remnant so far as acreage is concerned, of what it was in the beginning, but it kept the tote road, that is now the Midland Trail, and the place where the big city, inconceivably fine and great, was to be built, so that she hardly misses the land that went to make up the rich counties carved out of her original boundary. Cabell is richer than ever.

One more thing. Cabell County was the point farthest north that wild cane grew in the United States, though it has long since disappeared owing to the importation of domestic cattle.

CHAPTER XI

How General William H. Powell won the Congressional Medal at Sinking Creek in the Civil War.

This story is not intended for the Midland Trail series, but it got back there of its own accord, and it belongs to that place in the west of Greenbrier County, where there is a sign "Sinking Creek."

This history business is like tracking game in the woods. One impression among many others on a game trail may cause the hunter to pause and examine it and decide that there is big game afoot, that will be worth while to follow.

And there is another way to put it. In a distant county last summer I saw an aged lawyer and passed the time of day with him, and inquired how everything was with him. And he said that he was like the rest of his profession and subsisted on the crumbs that fell from the rich men's tables.

In making up these chapters on West Virginia history, we have to depend upon fragmentary evidence and use the little odds and ends that have been preserved. It will not be that way in the future about the events that are happening every day, for there is a sufficient number of presses running in West Virginia to perpetuate them, but it is a question whether they will have the appeal that the traditions of a more primitive people have for their descendants.

What put me on inquiry in this instance was a medal awarded by Congress with this inscription: "The Congress to General William H. Powell, and 2nd West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, Sinking Creek, Virginia, November 26, 1862."

I had heard of Powell and knew that the 2nd was one of the biggest regiments of West Virginia, with the longest continued service of any troops of the Mountain State but I had never heard of any Sinking Creek affair and I went on a cold trail in an effort to run it down.

As I read the record the first name that it had was the 2nd Regiment Loyal Virginia Calvary which was the name when Governor Pierpont accepted their services in 1861 and mustered them in. Then after the State of West Virginia had been created and ratified by an act of Congress, the name was changed to the 2nd West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers. And if I am not very much mistaken it was a different regiment serving under the name of the Second West Virginia Mounted Infantry at Droop Mountain battle. That was the regiment that old soldiers say flinched on its way up Droop Mountain in a galling fire from Confederate riflemen, and were boosted back into line by the Tenth West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, under General T. M. Harris. They topped the mountain and were in at the victory, but that is only whispered, and there is no doubt that they reached the top and did all that was required of them.

The Second West Virginia Cavalry were mustered into service at Parkersburg and for four years were busy practically all of the time on Virginia soil. The first winter saw them with Col. James A. Garfield in Kentucky. They were here, there, and everywhere in the mountains.

In 1862, Lightburn commanded the Kanawha Division, with headquarters at Charleston, and on September 13, 1862, artillery was placed on the south side of the Kanawha, by the Confederates, and all day long the Federal Army was bombarded. Lightburn moved out with all bags and baggage from Charleston and never rested until he had nearly all of his army in Ohio. It was not on account of the cannonade, but because there was word that Loring was advancing with a vastly superior force against him.

The Second always prided itself on the fact that it did not quite cross the Ohio River. This was the occasion that Loring of the Confederates marched his army east and Lightburn marched his army west, each day widening the gap between them. Both thought discussion was the better part of valor and did not fight. When Loring got to Lewisburg, Echols took over his command and hurried the army back over the Midland Trail, but in the meantime the Federals came back and never after that gave up the Kanawha Valley. Loring's move is supposed to have been caused by an order from Richmond to come there, and that Loring thought it was an order to bring his army, when the order meant for Loring to report in person and leave his army to hold Charleston.

The Second had three colonels during its fighting years. Colonel William Bolles resigned June 25, 1862. Colonel John C. Paxton served nearly a year with signal success, but when he fell in with Edgar's Battalion on the Midland Trail near Tuckwiler Hill and lost a fight he was dismissed from the service May 7, 1863. And on May 18, Colonel William H. Powell was promoted and took the regiment over until October 19, 1864, when he was promoted to brigadier general. He was the hero of the regiment.

He was born in Wales and at the age of five years was brought to the United States. The family lived in Tennessee and Powell took up the profession of mechanical engineer and at the age of twenty-five years he was employed to superintend the erection of a large plant near Wheeling known as the Benwood Iron and Nail Works, and from that time until the breaking out of the Civil War, found him engaged in some capacity or other in iron works in the Ohio River towns along the western border of Virginia.

In 1861, he recruited a company attached to and made a part of the Second, with Powell with the rank of captain. From the very first he made good as a commanding officer. He was promoted to major the first year of the war. The second year to lieutenant colonel. The third year to colonel. The fourth year to general. He was a steady fighter.

In 1863 he was captured at Wytheville, and he was confined in Libby Prison for thirty-seven days. Libby Prison was no first-class boarding house at the best and it is said that Col. Powell was given cruel and unusual treatment, even for that noted resort. It is said that he was confined in a cell in the basement, and that in that cell was no bed or bunk. The only food was corn bread, and his water supply was limited to one bucketful a week which was delivered to him in his dungeon on Sunday mornings. This had to last a week for drinking and washing. It soon became apparent that the Federal government was anxious to get him back and made many efforts to exchange him which were without avail until they offered Col. Richard Henry Lee, who was at Johnson Island, and that offer was accepted, and the exchange was effected. He was given a great reception by the people of Ironton, who presented him with a gold watch, a horse and equipment, a sword, and two revolvers.

In browsing through the dispatches printed in some one hundred and thirty-nine great volumes by the government, I think I ran on the reason that Powell had such a hard time at Libby. There was a dispatch from the Confederate general, Sam Jones, notifying the war office at Richmond not to exchange Powell for the reason that a soldier had informed the general that Powell had made an assault upon the soldier without cause, and that Powell was a dangerous man. Putting these things together it is a reasonable conjecture that there were special instructions issued both as to his exchange and treatment.

And as I searched through the records I came on some allusions to Sinking Creek and it became apparent that it was in sight of Cold Knob. Now Cold Knob is one of the high points in West Virginia mountains, and at first I could not tell whether it was on the Nicholas County side or in Greenbrier, but it must be in Greenbrier for there is where the big lime is and there is where the streams find the underground passages that cause them to be called sinking creeks.

About that time I had a business trip to make to Greenbrier County to have a conference with a lady who wanted to borrow enough to pay all her debts, and there I had no trouble to locate Sinking Creek. It heads in the forests to the southwest of Cold Knob, between the post office of Trout Valley and the town of Williamsburg, in what is called Sinking Creek Valley. It flows about half a mile west of Williamsburg, and about a mile farther down it passes under a natural bridge. It sinks at the Midland Trail on the Dick Watts farm about twelve miles west of Lewisburg. It comes to the surface again at Pierces Mill and empties into Muddy Creek which flows into Greenbrier River near Alderson.

Lightburn was criticized for abandoning the Kanawha Valley and he was relieved by General Gilmore, who assembled the army at Point Pleasant, and in a few days General Milroy took over the command, and a few days after that, General Cox came and made up the army and marched them back to Charleston.

Here he prepared to go into winter quarters and the Second was ordered into winter quarters at Fort Piatt twelve miles up the Kanawha River east of Charleston. This was in the last week in October, 1862. Then Crook took them over.

On November 23, 1862, the Gray Fox issued his special order at Charleston, to Col. John C. Paxton, commanding the Second Loyal Virginia Cavalry, to take all his serviceable men on the 24th to Cold Knob, in Greenbrier County, by the way of the Summersville and Lewisburg turnpike, leaving the Kanawha River at Cannelton. On Cold Knob they would overtake Col. P. H. McLane, commanding the Eleventh Ohio Infantry, which had been ordered to that point to reinforce the Second. From that position they were to proceed against the Fourteenth Rebel Virginia Cavalry in winter quarters in Sinking Creek Valley recruiting. Break up the organization if possible.

The Second must have been in prime condition both as to horses and men for they left early in the morning and rode through to Summersville, a distance of sixty miles, over rough roads by supper time. That night they camped at Summersville. They broke camp early on the morning of the 25th and rode towards Cold Knob, when it came on to snow and it was the beginning of one of the biggest snow storms ever in these mountains. The regiment was riding towards the uplands and the farther it went the worse the storm came on. In the smother of the storm they came upon a squad of Confederate cavalry and invited them to accompany them, which invitation was accepted. About mid afternoon somewhere in the tall timbers they halted to eat a bite and feed their horses and regard the blinding snow storm. Taking to the road again they forged ahead and somewhere between Summersville and the top of the mountain they made a bivouac for the night and got what comfort they could in the open in a snow storm. The next morning they broke the road and got to the top of a mountain. Now Cold Knob proper is a pinnacle in the Appalachians 4,318 feet high set opposite Grassy Knob, which is 4,390 feet. Between these two knobs the road tops the upland and passes them. These knobs form the gateway where the road begins to descend into Trout Valley, but to the west the road maintains its average altitude of four thousand feet for many miles. The man who goes over it first naturally expects a road that climbs a mountain to descend on the other side, but this is not so of the road between the railway station at Renick and the city of Richwood. About half the way between those points is in the clouds and the road followed one crest after another, until the weary and perplexed stranger to the route begins to think that he has traveled a hundred miles on the ridgepole of the world.

In the summer time it is a pleasure to dwell in these highlands. There the traveler feels the exhilaration of height. A man who has never been four thousand feet up in the air is in the position of one who has never really breathed. But in the winter in a two-foot snow it is very different and very terrifying. It is no fit place to take your pleasure.

Colonel McLane's infantry had duly arrived and had been loitering along the primrose path of dalliance among the splendid cold springs of that high level. But when it came on to snow so fast and furious and the snow got so deep under foot, McLane decided to call the expedition off and they gathered their belongings together and as the Second with its fine horses and gallant men topped the rise, they met the Ohio troops going out and as they were allowed to depart in peace it is easy to be seen that the expedition was postponed until more suitable weather. The official dispatches do not read that way. Col. Paxton makes it appear that he allowed the Ohio troops to return to the lowlands, while the Second went on to give battle to the army. But it is safe to say that this report was not written until after Powell and his squad had pulled off their psychological exploit and had received the surrender of the Confederate regiment.

There are some things that do not fit in together. It is certain that a squad of twenty-two men took the Confederate regiment and came back with as many as twenty-two could drive without losing any. But I will never believe that the commander of the Second Regiment had any intention of attacking the Confederate's camp in the lowlands until after the Cold Knob road was open and free from snow. Technically the Second certainly did overcome and take prisoners the Fourteenth Virginia Confederates, but the Ohio regiment had been sent back to Summersville, and ninety per cent of the Second never did get near the camp of the Confederates. So handicapped was the squad that out of upwards of a thousand men that they surrounded, they got back to their regiment with but one hundred and eleven, as the official dispatch puts it. It does not say anything about the hundreds that simply spilled out of the hands of those twenty-two soldiers who had taken more prisoners than they could drive up the mountain towards a Federal prison.

I asked a lot of people in Greenbrier County about the Sinking Creek affair and I did not find but one person who had any knowledge of the occurrence, and that was James McClung, who pays attention to history. "Yes," he said, "they captured Uncle Sam Tyree there that day but he escaped." And I really think that about four-fifths of the prisoners either walked away or were excused.

It appears that while the Second lingered on the dreadful miles that lie along the top, that Major Wm. H. Powell and Lieutenant Jeremiah Davidson and twenty men rode on to the end of the road to the place where it pitches over the side lying next to the Greenbrier River. From this point the road descends rapidly until the fringe of the timber is reached, and from there a magnificent view of the Sinking Creek Valley on one hand is to be had, while on the other side and immediately before the observer lies the equally beautiful Trout Valley. These valleys in the summer time with their rich blue grass farms present a very lovely landscape view. The traveler on the Seneca Trail passing through Frankfort does not realize that beyond the hills to the west such peerless valleys exist. And they have a high altitude of twenty-five hundred feet and more, and frost is no joking matter there any time in the summer.

While the blue-clad soldiers sat on their horses and gazed at the camp of their enemies silent upon the peaks of West Augusta, Powell spoke up and made a dare-devil proposition, that if the men agreed, they would simply ride down to that camp and arrest every one of the Confederate soldiers.

They were many miles from their command. The snow was deep and the day was bitterly cold. As they watched they saw two Confederate scouts pass beneath them and ride into the camp, slow and deliberate, showing that there was no intimation that the camp was about to be attacked.

Something went through that body of men that caused them to agree to Powell's proposition and the little squad came out of the timber and rode into camp, and when they had arrived there they called for the head man and assured him that if the Fourteenth would submit to superior force and surrender, they would be treated with consideration, and their lives spared, and that they would be protected from all harm and injury. And just as the sheriff in the play induces the bad men to give up their guns, so did the Fourteenth lay down its arms and agree to go home with the Federal troops.

I looked for a long time to find a report from the Confederate commanding officer concerning this act of more than Christian humility, but not a word could I find anywhere, and I wonder if any report ever did go into Richmond about it.

And I could see a glimmer of light as to what happened when the twenty-two soldiers tried to round up a regiment and drive them up the mountain. Right then is where the private soldier in the long line would take to the brush and make his way to the Big Levels of Greenbrier County where practically every home was supporting the southern cause. And that is the reason that by the time they joined the main command, but a hundred and eleven prisoners remained of the great herd they had started with.

The Gray Fox appreciated it, and from that time on Powell's advancement was rapid, and the Gray Fox did not forget the day. In 1889 when he had attained the rank of major general in the army, and was about ready to depart from this world, he wrote to Congress about it and Congress had the medal struck, and given to General Powell who had moved to Indiana and was still making iron. Crook said that he regarded the Sinking Creek bloodless battle as one of the most daring, brilliant, and successful expeditions of the whole war.

Years after Owen Wister wrote a story called "The General's Bluff," about a similar victory won by the Gray Fox with a handful of men against a great force of Indians.

CHAPTER XII

The Town of Ansted the Burial Place of Stonewall Jackson's Mother. One of the Notable Women of the Virginias.

The town of Ansted, Fayette County, lies in the curve of the road on the Midland Trail, on the brink of the New River canyon, close to the Hawk's Nest. It has been touched with the evidences of wealth that have come to the rich coal fields in the last two generations, but it has been able to keep to a greater extent than many of these poor little rich towns, that background of ancient worth and greatness, retaining some of the charm of a less complex civilization.

One of the things that is mentioned often by the visitors and tourists is that here is the last resting place of Julia Beckwith Neale, the mother of Stonewall Jackson.

In the well kept Westlake Cemetery on the hill, the grave may be seen. It is easily identified by a tablet on the railing around the grave, and the neat monument bearing the following inscription:

Here lies
Julia Beckwith Neale,
Born
February 28, 1798,
in Loudon Co., Va.
Married first
Jonathan Jackson
Second
Blake B. Woodson
Died September, 1831,
To the Mother of Stonewall Jackson, this tribute from one of his old brigade.

It seems that this monument was erected at an opportune time, for if it had been allowed to go much longer the place would have been hard to locate.* As it was, there were a number of living witnesses to the place. Especially is this true of Mrs. Elizabeth Singleton Hamilton, the grandmother of Mrs. W. H. Evans, who was a near neighbor of the Mrs. Woodson, who nursed her in her last illness, and who prepared her body for burial.

The time has come when there ought to be another line in the inscription and that is the name of the soldier whose thoughtfulness has helped so much to enshrine the memory of this noted American woman in the hearts of her countrymen and that name should be Captain Thomas R.

* Captain Ranson caused the stone to be erected many years after the conclusion of the Civil War; about 1906, if a letter from the donor is to be taken as correctly placing the date. General Jackson had some doubt as to the exact location of his mother's grave. In August, 1855, he made a journey to Ansted for the purpose of locating the grave and causing a suitable stone to be erected; later he wrote his aunt, Mrs. Alfred Neale, of Parkersburg: "The gentleman with whom I put up was at my mother's burial and accompanied me to the cemetery for the purpose of pointing out her grave to me but I am not certain that he found it."—B. B. S.

Ranson, of Staunton, Virginia. Captain Ranson was one of the finest gentlemen who ever lived, and this act is very like him.

I belong to the school of thought who believe that all great men owe their mentality including their immortal souls to their maternal ancestor. If you would know what makes a man great look for the woman. And the hic jacet of this country graveyard is best exemplified by Gray's Elegy. "Full many a gem, of purest ray serene, the dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear; full many a flower is born to blush unseen and waste its fragrance on the desert air."

There are two inseparable things, a great man and his mother. And that may not mean heredity so much as it may mean the first six years of a child's life passed in the association of a wise and brilliant woman.

The life of Julia Beckwith Neale does not sound like a happy one. Dead at the age of thirty-three years, twice married, with four children.

George Neale, an uncle of Mrs. Jackson, was an important citizen of Wood County, a county that was formed in 1799, about the time he moved there. Blennerhassett made his purchase of half of the island in 1798, and as George Neale spent the rest of his life in Wood County, there can be little doubt that he was there during the Aaron Burr excitement when that politician was mustering his forces to occupy lands down the river and was putting the come hither on the Blennerhassets. An indignation meeting was held at the courthouse of Wood County on account of the warlike preparations that Burr was making and it is apparent that the county was highly suspicious of the expedition. This meeting was in October, 1806, and on the strength of it three companies of militia volunteered and were organized to oppose the movement. This was probably caused by the effort made to recruit the citizens of Wood County to join the expedition down the river with the promise of a part of Burr's 80,000 acres of land, the men to be young, amenable to discipline, and each to bring a rifle and a blanket.

This action broke up the expedition and Burr and Blennerhassett being arrested and tried at Richmond came out of the trial broke. Blennerhassett came back after a year and found his fine estate ruined, his slaves gone, and his stock driven off, and his house wrecked. He left his estate in the hands of Col. Nathaniel Cushing on a rental contract, and shortly after notes of Aaron Burr indorsed by Herman Blennerhassett showed up in the courts and the property was sold. The first to purchase the island was John S. Lewis, a merchant of Philadelphia, and the property passed into the hands of George Neale, Sr., whose wife was a Lewis.

Julia was eight years old at the date of the Burr episode which shook Wood County and caused it to rise on the side of the United States. In 1820, she was twenty-two years old and was married that year to a young lawyer by the name of Jonathan Jackson. These Jacksons who have played such a large part in winning the west and holding it are all descended from one John Jackson, of Ulster, who emigrated to this country some time before the Revolution. He met a girl on board ship by the name of Elizabeth Cummins, and they were married and founded the Jackson family so closely identified with the history of West Virginia. They had a lot of children—George, Edward, John, Samuel, Henry, Elizabeth, Mary and Sophia.

John Jackson was one of the earliest settlers of the Tygarts Valley River, arriving there with his sons, George and Edward, in 1768, and following the Pringles on the Buckhannon River. He took up land at the mouth of Turkey Run on Buckhannon River, where the Pringles had sheltered the winter before in a hollow sycamore tree. His place was sometimes called Fort Jackson, but he was also one of the settlers who sheltered in the fort at Buckhannon. On one occasion, in 1781, just after the Tygarts Valley massacre, he and his son George were returning from their farm at Fort Buckhannon, when they were ambushed and shot at by Indians. George fired a shot at one Indian peeping around behind a tree.

George Jackson was a very prominent man and was a colonel of the militia. His son was Gen. John G. Jackson who married in the White House, Mary Payne, a sister of Dolly Madison, the wife of the President. His son was Gen. John J. Jackson, of Parkersburg, who appeared at Wheeling as one of the convention looking forward to forming the State of West Virginia. He was the delegate that thought they ought to put off decisive action until fall and all go home. It was corn planting time. His sons were Judges John J. Jackson, James Monroe Jackson and Governor Jacob Beeson Jackson.

Edward Jackson, the grandfather of Stonewall Jackson, married a Miss Hadden. He set up his plantation on the West Fork in Lewis County below Weston and close to Jane Lew. Here he established a noted mill and it is on this farm that the Four-H state camp for boys and girls is located. Edward Jackson was a surveyor, miller, and millwright. He represented Harrison and Lewis counties in the Legislature.

One of his sons was Jonathan Jackson who married Julia Beckwith Neale. In 1820, the year of his marriage, he commenced the practice of law in Clarksburg, and in four years the young couple were the parents of four children, the youngest being Stonewall Jackson, born January 21, 1824. In 1826, there was much sickness in the family, and Jonathan Jackson fell sick while nursing his sick children, and died. The family were left unprovided for. The mother kept school for three years in Clarksburg, but some notes which her husband had indorsed had to be paid and the family were sold out and the home went. This was in 1830. In that year the widow married Blake B. Woodson who was as poor as herself. He was a citizen of Lewis County. The newly married couple determined to go to the New River country. Woodson had a brother who lived on the James River and Kanawha Turnpike at Lewisburg, and Blake B. Woodson went farther west and made a home at Ansted. This home was poor enough no doubt, but Julia lived but a year or so after arriving there.

Before leaving the northwest she had left her children with her first husband's people.

Shortly after settling in Ansted, Julia fell a victim to tuberculosis from which she died on September 4, 1831. But before her death she was able to have her youngest son, Stonewall, with her, and there is no doubt of the truth of the tradition that Stonewall Jackson as a child played with the children at Ansted.

When the day of her funeral occurred, the minister was Rev. John McElhenny, the famous Presbyterian pastor of the Old Stone Church at Lewisburg, whose parish extended from the head of Greenbrier River to the mouth of the Kanawha.

There is a traidition that on the day of the funeral President Andrew Jackson was passing through Ansted and stopped and attended the services.* There is no reason for doubting the truth of this tradition. It was on the road that the President traveled to and from Tennessee, and the act is characteristic of the man. Fayette County was formed that same year, 1831, and Blake B. Woodson was made the first clerk of Fayette County.

These are then the short and simple annals of Julia Beckwith Neale, but those crowded years were full of sorrow and suffering. She departed this life not knowing that one of her children would be a man known throughout the whole world. Each year adds new lustre to his name. But for this son the name of the poor suffering woman who was acquainted with grief would not be exalted over that of her sisters.

The story of Stonewall Jackson has been often told but I take the liberty to here set down some of the things that I have heard about him that appeal to me very strongly. Whatever may have been the intention of his mother and step father to make a new home for him in the New River country, after his mother's death, his home was at Jackson Mill. Here he lived the outdoor life of the farmer boy, and his schooling was very desultory. He had a spirit of adventure in him that developed at a very early age for he was the original Huckleberry Finn of America. His brother Warren, two years older than Stonewall, and Stonewall himself, aged fourteen and twelve years, respectively, becoming dissatisfied with life on the West Fork, made a raft and floated down the rivers a thousand miles until they came to an island in the Mississippi where they camped a whole winter, and subsisted by cutting wood to sell to steamboats. But both fell sick of malaria. A steamboat captain finding them sick, took pity on them, and sent them home to the mountains of West Virginia.

When his mother left for the New River country, Stonewall was but six years old, and the distance in point of time between the West Fork and New River was farther than the distance between New York and San Francisco. But there is no doubt that the little boy was with his mother before she died, and that it was after her death that he came to live at the mill with Cummins Jackson.

The reason that Stonewall was with his mother is owing to the fact that he was first sent to the house of one of his aunts, and he did not like it there. His uncle-in-law had the reputation for being near, and no doubt the child did not find his surroundings pleasant. Anyway he ran away and showed up at the home of his cousin, the one that married Judge Allen of the Supreme Court of Appeals. The lady was kind to the young runaway but she told him that he ought to go back and stay where he had been placed. He said: "Maybe I ought to go back, but I am not going to." I wonder sometimes how he found his long, lonesome way to the southern part of the State. But a boy at twelve years who could take his place as a business man on the Mississippi River, would find his way at six years to the home of his mother in the same State without much difficulty.

* President Andrew Jackson was in Washington at the time of the death of Mrs. Woodson, so there can be no foundation in fact to account for the legend. His presence is proven by letters written on September 5th from Washington and from other records extant.—B. B. S.

I do not propose to write a life of Stonewall Jackson. It has been done so often. But I beg leave to write a little about him without going into tedious details. I have often heard my father speak of him. When my father was a student at Washington College, Jackson was an instructor at the Virginia Military Institute, and the two school lots join. They were both Presbyterians, and worked and taught in the same Sunday School, and I have often heard my father speak of being there with him, but I never heard of Stonewall Jackson doing anything unusual or queer. I get the impression that he was a silent man—the kind of a man that it would take the sound of a battle to rouse. He was a praying Presbyterian and a military genius and a brave man.

The boy developed character at a very early age. General Jackson died before I was born, but I have seen and known a good many of his tribe, and I picture him as a powerful man mentally and physically. His grandfather, Edward Jackson, the Indian fighter, was a rugged mountaineer.

John Esten Cooke takes no account of the three long years that Julia Neale Jackson kept her babies under her roof at Clarksburg, tending to four little ones and keeping school. So Cooke makes out that he was constable at sixteen and immediately entered West Point, but Cooke's own record shows that Jackson was twenty-two when he graduated, in 1846, just in time to prove his courage and ability in the Mexican War.

Stonewall stayed with his uncle Cummins Jackson, at the mill for upwards of thirteen years, with the exception of the winter on the Mississippi in 1836. He was a hunter and a fisher. There must have been a great many fish in the mill dam in that day and time, for he let it be known that he would take orders for fish to be delivered as wanted in the nearby county seat, the town of Weston.

And just before he went to West Point, he was made a constable of Lewis County by appointment by the county court. About that time he had a chance at an appointment to West Point.

He had two powerful friends at the county seat in Jonathan M. Bennett, Auditor of Virginia, and Judge Matthew Edmiston, then a young attorney who had moved to Weston from Pocahontas County. These two and no doubt many other influential friends put forward the young man's fitness for an appointment to West Point. S. L. Hays, of Gilmer County, represented the district in Congress, and he gave Stonewall the appointment. Congressman Hays was the ancestor of the gentleman of the Tenth Legion, of that name, whom we still elect or defeat as the case may be.

Stonewall fought many battles and always managed to get the decision either by a knockout or on points. He had the country habit of early rising and he and his men knew how to get off quick on either a march or a charge.

His greatest feat was the manner in which he plucked victory from defeat at the first battle of Bull Run. This was near Washington, and the Federal commander had planned a play in the game that was meant to win. Having the Confederates stationed in an area that was to stop the advance of the Federal army, that army marched past them and pivoted on a point, so that the advance was in the shape of a fish hook, so to speak, and as they came marching back on the Confederates on their rear, they were sweeping everything before them, when they came to Jackson's Brigade. Jackson had his men charge in the bend of the hook and broke it in two, and then the Federals were scattered and the rear-guard put out for Washington as fast as they could lay their feet to the ground. Jackson tried to get a chance to march into Washington with them, but there was so much confusion, that the Confederates never got a command to pursue the fleeing army, and the one big chance of capturing the city of Washington was lost. I have often thought that if Jackson had it to do over he would have followed on his own authority. It was in this battle that Gen. Bee just before he fell dead on the battlefield said that Jackson was standing like a Stonewall. This was but half of it. He was like a ford—when he was still he stood, but when he went forward he went with irresistible speed and force.

CHAPTER XIII

The Battle of White Sulphur Springs in the Civil War When Averell Could Not Get Out of the Ravine.

Another article on the Midland Trail. I have written enough already to make a book on that highway and I have made only one round trip over it.

In recounting some of the Civil War activities of this region, it would not do to omit the greatest fight of all, the Battle of White Sulphur Springs, the time the Confederates built a fence across the road and said they should not pass.

On this road there were three battles at Tuckwiler Hill with but one name, and there was one battle at White Sulphur Springs, but it has three names. It has been called variously, Battle of White Sulphur Springs, the Battle of Dry Creek, and Battle of Rocky Gap. It lasted for two days in hot weather and it was a desperate encounter. Both sides had enough of it the first day, but both waited overnight to give the other a chance to withdraw, and when daylight came both armies were facing each other, and the battle was renewed, but the Federals had been getting ready to withdraw and retreat over the crest of the Allegheny Mountain to the east, so they fought for a while, until they could get their wagons loaded, and then they turned and went back the way they had come, fighting rear guard engagements for miles. But presently they came to some fine tall trees that the commander had ordered to be cut almost to the last blow, and as the last blue soldier passed, these trees came thundering down across the road as it lay at the foot of the narrow valley, and closed the road to travel for a day or so. The Federals made good their escape on that retreat, save only one Pennsylvanian captain and his company. This captain instead of going into the fight where the bullets were falling like hailstones had turned to one side and finding a pleasant cove in which to shelter, he and his men were having a sound sleep when the withdrawing movement occurred. The Federals marched away and the Rebs came on and found the sleeping company and captured them.

And in one of the wagons was another gallant captain who in the excitement of the battle, had drunk too much whiskey, and he had been skidded into a wagon to sober up and wait for a general court martial. And in those wagons were a number of dead soldiers, including Von Koenig and McNally, two gallant officers who had died in the charge at the fence.

In May, 1863, General Averell was given command of the Fourth Separate Brigade in West Virginia, his orders being to sweep the mountain country clear of Confederate partisan rangers. Averell had won his advancement in the Indian wars in the west. He was a native of the State of New York. He had his leg shattered by a bullet in the fighting with the Navajo Indians in the year 1858, that put him on crutches for two years. A study of the tactics used by Averell and Stonewall Jackson will convince you that they were very much alike in their handling of troops, their quick movements, and their unerring judgment. They were both West Point men, and both elders in the Presbyterian Church.

When Averell got his brigade, it first consisted of three regiments of infantry, the Second, Third and Eighth Loyal Virginia, and of the 14th Pennsylvania Cavalry, and Ewing's and Gibson's batteries of artillery. It will be seen that this made a very fine little army of rifles, sabers and cannon to go rambling through the green valleys of West Virginia in the summer time. The first thing that Averell did was to buy each one of his soldiers a good horse to ride, something no other general in the mountains had thought necessary. It took no time at all to teach his soldiers to ride for every one of them had been raised on the back of a horse.

In the Alleghenies the mountains parallel each other like a lot of potato rows, and Averell could marshal his mobile force in some sweet spot near the Mason and Dixon line, and raid south through the troughs of the Alleghenies, passing from one to the other through the numerous gaps and passages that made the mountain country like a great maze. Averell's men were mountain bred and they took to the excursions that he laid out for them as to the manner born. Where other commanders had made little circles like the rabbit, the army of Averell swung wide like the red fox. A thousand miles was just a pleasure jaunt for the Fourth Brigade.

Averell started to organize his troops about May 16, 1863, and by July first he was ready to commence operations. Note that the Second West Virginia was a different regiment from the Second West Virginia Cavalry.

This was the season that Lee had led his ill-starred armies into Pennsylvania, and suffered his great defeat at Gettysburg, and was extricating himself the best he could by falling back towards the south in the broad valley between the Blue Ridge and the North Mountain. Averell's first work was to march east and watch the passing of the Potomac and to hang on the flank of Lee's army and thus the month of July was passed, harrying the defeated Confederates. He wound up at Winchester on July 30th, and stayed there until August 5th, in the morning. Then he got ready to go about his work of putting the Confederate armies out of West Virginia.

So Averell went jimmying around with his mobile little army on the Western Waters and it must have been a pleasant experience to ride with Averell.

Leaving Winchester on August 5, 1863, he marched the army over North Mountain and arrived at Wardensville, and the next day to Moorefield on the South Branch of the Potomac, thirty miles farther. On this day they met with Confederates and on the main line of march, Captain von Koenig captured a lieutenant and ten men of Imboden's command. But a company of the Pennsylvania regiment that had been sent on to Moorefield by way of Lost River turned up minus thirteen men who had been taken over by the Confederates. In addition four Federals were wounded and three Confederates killed and five wounded. Averell halted at Moorefield two days and on the 9th he marched on up the river eleven miles to Petersburg. He was short of supplies and he waited here ten days. He was needing horseshoes and nails and ammunition more than anything else. He had thirty-five rounds of ball cartridges to the man and when the ammunition did not come, he decided to go on with what he had, and on the 10th moved his rear thirty miles to Franklin. On the 20th of August he marched twenty-four miles to Monterey at the head of the Potomac destroying the saltpeter works five miles above Franklin.

Court was going on at Monterey and the court was speedily adjourned and the court officers were arrested. Here it was found that Imboden had been in conference with General Sam Jones as to the chance of making an attack on the Federals at Petersburg, and Averell learned here that a Confederate army was strung out on the road to Huntersville for the purpose of intercepting him. The Confederates were advised that it was Averell's objective to reach what we now call the Seneca Trail and to march south on it until the Virginia and Tennessee Railway was reached and to destroy it and return. Therefore the Confederates had been marching north to intercept them, with Col. Jackson sent with a regiment to Back Creek in Bath County to keep them from turning off to attack Staunton.

The troops of the Confederates in Greenbrier County were what was known as the First Brigade, Gen. Echols, but commanded this week by Col. George H. Patton. A part of this brigade was Edgar's Battalion. In addition Gen. William E. Jones had a small force that fell back from Monterey before Averell. The First Brigade marched north on the Seneca Trail to the Little Levels of Pocahontas County.

On the 21st Averell started to Huntersville, and halted his main command at Frost, a distance of about twenty-four miles, while some of his cavalry drove the Confederates down the fertile Knapps Creek Valley until they reached the Northwest Passage or the Narrows between Huntersville and Minnehaha Springs, a gorge in the mountains through which the Marlins Bottom and Warm Springs turnpike passes. Here they took a stand and in that canyon a handful of men might hold an army. Averell learning about it at Frost, on the 22nd, sent Gibson's Battalion down the Knapps Creek road to make it appear that it led the army. Then Averell with his main army crossed over by the Hill Country road through the Shrader settlement. This is the road that climbs over Michaels Mountain that we used to use when the fords in Knapps Creek were in flood. By this means Averell rode into the deserted village of Huntersville, the then county seat of Pocahontas County, in the rear of the Confederates who were holding the Northwest Passage. A squadron of cavalry under Col. Ohley was sent through the Narrows and found the Confederates retreating towards Warm Springs. They were overtaken at Camp Northwest where there was a rear guard fight as they ran and the fight continued until the Confederates were driven through Rider Gap on top of the Allegheny, the line between the States.

Camp Northwest was the first elaborate camp to be built in the Civil War. It was located on the White farm on the Warm Springs and Marlins Bottom turnpike and there were substantial log buildings and much equipment and a lot of supplies there. The camp was burned on the 22nd day of August, 1863. The commissary buildings, stores, cabins, blacksmith shops, wagons, rifles, and so forth were destroyed, and a large lot of plunder carried away. All the wheat and flour in the mill opposite J. A. Reed's house was also destroyed. That night the Federals camped at Huntersville and waited for two regiments that were marching to join the Fourth Brigade by way of Beverly, Mingo, Marlinton. These were the Second and Tenth Infantry. On the 24th Averell marched his army east 25 miles to Warm Springs, Col. Jackson and Gen. Jones retreating before them to Millboro. Averell rested that night at Warm Springs, and having cleared the county of Pocahontas of three Confederate armies that had been there a few days before, decided to do the same for Greenbrier County and turned his army south and marched by way of Covington to Callahans on the 25th.

To keep Pocahontas County clear he sent back the Tenth West Virginia which went into camp at Marlins Bottom. This Tenth West Virginia which watched at Marlinton during the week of the battle of White Sulphur Springs was probably the most distinctively West Virginian of any regiment organized in the Civil War. It was the regiment of Gen. Thomas M. Harris. At the outbreak of the war General Harris was a practicing physician of Gilmer County, and he canvassed twelve counties and raised this regiment and was commissioned colonel. He served with great distinction throughout the war and it was his command that fired the last shot at Appomattox. After the war he served on the commission that tried the assassins of President Lincoln.

At the time he was in camp on our farms at Marlins Bottom, he had with him his twelve-year-old son, who had a horse of his own and who rode as the mascot of the Tenth Legion. This twelve-year-old boy is none other than the Hon. John T. Harris, the stated clerk of the West Virginia Senate, and the most popular man in West Virginia. It makes no difference as to the political make up of the Senate, he is chosen year after year, and has served in that capacity for thirty-two years, having been elected seventeen times in succession. He remembers all about the green fields edged by the clear running streams at Marlins Bottom and has planned to come here next year and cover the ground over which his regiment campaigned.

The Echols army having reached the Little Levels and hearing that Averell had cut away to the east through Riders Gap, concluded that he was making a detour to the east in order to come into the Greenbrier Valley at the place that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway crosses the divide. In this surmise they were eminently correct. So they swung to the east and being mountain men, they found the way to intercept them. They turned and marched to the mouth of Anthonys Creek and across the bridge of the Greenbrier River and came out on the road that leads from Rimel to the White Sulphur Springs, and there marched south with Edgar's Battalion leading. When they reached the junction of the road with the Midland Trail they had sure information of the approach of the Federal army crossing the Allegheny Mountains. The Confederates built a fence across the Midland Trail from hill to hill, using all the fence rails that they could get convenient to that place. It was a strongly built barricade and it held through the two day's fight. The idea was that they should not pass. It was against this fence that charge after charge made by the Federals broke and failed. The Confederates were placed on the hillcrests commanding the barricade and they poured a devastating fire into every charge that was made against the fence. One charge was made with two men on each horse and that failed as the others had failed. I have talked to many men who were in that battle and they never could understand the persistence that the Federal troops showed to break through and charge the infantry posted on the hills. It seemed to them to be unnecessary slaughter.

Averell had moved at four in the morning and it was about nine o'clock that he arrived at the barricade across the road. His march lay through a narrow valley for about four miles from the foot of the mountain and his brigade occupied the road for about that distance. Von Koenig, the Pennsylvanian captain was in the lead, and he met his death in the battle. He was a brave and valuable officer.

The land was cleared and in fields at the forks of the road where the battle was fought. For perhaps a mile of the branch followed by the Midland Trail the land was open forming a narrow valley. There were a number of houses on the battle field.

The town of White Sulphur Springs lies about a mile west of the battle ground and there is a double valley extending north towards Pocahontas County and between the two valleys there is a dividing ridge, at some places approaching the height of a small mountain, and at other places it is worn down to very moderate heights. The Midland Trail at the forks of the road turns to parallel this rampart, and it was on this bulwark facing the barricade across a piece of bottom land that the most of the Confederate riflemen were posted.

The battle the first day commenced at nine in the morning and lasted to seven in the evening. It was the 26th day of August, and a hot, clear, summer day. The most vivid recollection that the Confederates have about it is the thirst that they experienced during that long day. They learned there to chew bullets and bits of gravel to endure the thirst.

The Federals got out their artillery and fired round after round. Their first work was to set fire to the Miller house with shells. Every now and then they would charge the barricade and be driven back. The Federals tried to flank the Confederates but the lay of the ground did not permit any wide encircling movement and whenever the Federals would climb one of the low ranges to get out of the little valley they were in, their movements could be seen and the Confederates would send out a force to meet them on top of the hills and there was nothing gained by that.

Both sides reported that they became short of ammunition. Averell had received a fresh supply of ammunition at Huntersville, and both armies had been moving rapidly and traveling light.

But there was so much powder burned in that long day's work that it is no wonder that the supply ran low.

Averell's hope was that some of the Kanawha Division, under General Scammon would be camping in the western side of Greenbrier County and hearing the cannon would come marching east over the Midland Trail.

Averell said that he had a column of horses four miles long in a narrow gorge and that added to his embarrassment in effecting any manevuer.

I think that there were two fences built across the Midland Trail that day. The Confederates were making a quick march to reach the forks of the road and Edgar's Battalion was in the lead and moving swiftly. When they got to the forks they marched up Dry Creek for about a half mile and built a fence and this was the fence that Captain Von Koenig first ran against in his position leading the Federal army and it is the one that was first charged. After a short time, and when the Confederates had built their much more elaborate stockade out of fence rails down where the valley opened out, the first fence was abandoned, and it was the second barricade that held the enemy.

It will be remembered that hundreds of the soldiers who were in that fight that day were from the Greenbrier Valley and those of us that knew these soldiers after the war have had a great deal of first hand information about that battle, especially about the repeated cavalry charges at the barricade where so many men were killed. And the Confederates always maintained that it was a desperate and useless sacrifice of men, especially the last charge that was made about four o'clock in the afternoon with two men on each horse. It looked to these Confederates who were pouring in the rifle fire that it was a great blunder on the part of some one.

Averell explains this charge by saying it appeared that he could get a part of his army over the low hills to his right so that they could intersect the Anthonys Creek road and march down in the rear of the Confederate position, and that the strategy was to make a desperate charge down the road and engage the attention of the Confederates by an effort to break the barricade, while the movement to the right was attempted. He says that the charge was splendidly made and splendidly supported by Major McNally's force; that they caused about three hundred Confederates to break and run at one point, but they were rallied and brought back by reserves. Averell said that he had issued commands for all the forces on the right to make a drive for the Anthonys Creek road, and that after the cavalry had failed, that he found that there had been no united effort on the part of those companies to go forward while the charge was on, and that the effort failed. This will explain the reason of all the desperate charges during the day. It was to cover up the efforts made to get men to go to the left and the right in an effort to flank the enemy.

It was a day full of sorrow for Averell. It was his only defeat in some twenty-three engagements that he fought during his command of the Fourth Separate Brigade, but it was his first pitched battle. He lost about 150 killed and the Confederates about 60. Both suffered a large number wounded. The armies slept on the battle field. The next morning found no sign of Gen. Scammon coming from the west and the Confederates were as full of fight as ever, fighting as they did a defensive battle. After two mild demonstrations to cover his movements, Averell withdrew his troops back through the pass of the Allegheny and by way of Jacksons River, and Mountain Grove to Marlins Bottom where he picked up the Tenth and so on to Beverly. About Mingo they found a timber barricade but cut it away and reached Beverly by August 31st.

The battle can be plainly demonstrated upon the ground by anyone who has made a study of the dispatches from both sides, and it is well worth a trip to the White Sulphur Springs to see the lay of the ground and the nature of the contest.

CHAPTER XIV

The Battle of Lewisburg, the Fight That Won for Gen. Crook, the Grey Fox, Speedy Advancement.

They used to call it the James River and Kanawha Turnpike when it was little more than a trail, and when it became a broad highway surfaced and finished like a city avenue, they called it the Midland Trail. But in the Civil War it was in constant use by the contending armies. Most of the time these armies were able to avoid one another. Lewisburg is located in a long hollow place in the hills, and the road tops an eminence on each side. The Lewisburg people got used to the presence of soldiers, and they were accustomed to see the Grays disappear over the hill to the east, and westward look and the land was blue. Or if the Blues went over the western crest the eastern hillside soon was gray.

But once in a while these armies would stand still and fight. I have had a most trying time to get the battle of Tutwiler Hill figured out. A historian in one of the best known histories states that there was such a fight but that it was undecisive, both sides claiming it. I have come to the conclusion that there were at least two fights at Tutwiler Hill, as well as a fight between that hill and Brushy Ridge that many think was the Tutwiler battle, so it is not too much to say that there were three battles.

This hill is in the Richlands, one of the garden places of the State of West Virginia. The first disturbance was when the Second Volunteer Cavalry, West Virginia, was ordered to sweep the Grays out of Lewisburg. They rode with some other troops, and came in the night time.

Col. Edgar of Edgar's Battalion heard of the advance and moved his troops to the top of the hill and disposed of them on the top of that hill and along the rail fences. That was the evening of May 1, 1862. They waylaid the road nearly all night, and he had given the strictest orders not to fire prematurely, but along about the small hours of the night they heard the Blues coming and they approached riding four abreast, talking and laughing and not apprehending any danger. A Confederate Irishman could not wait and fired his gun when the Federals rode up and warned them. In the fire that followed, twelve Federal soldiers were killed and seven wounded. No casualties on the Confederate side. The Federals retired in disorder, and by the breaking of day, a courier arrived under a flag of truce and asked for truce and it was agreed that a cessation of hostilities was to last from 6 a. m. to 11 a. m. This was the morning of May 2nd. Col. Edgar of the 26th, says in his official report that Col. Paxton, the Federal commander took advantage of this truce, granted to take care of the dead and wounded, to extricate his army from danger of capture. He left his surgeon and some men. The Federal surgeon reported to Col Edgar that two men were so badly wounded that they could not be moved had obtained permission to stay at Mr. Tutwiler's and would Col. Edgar kindly lend him a surgeon to help amputate a leg, all of which Col. Edgar agreed to do.

Col. Edgar was a very gallant figure in the war. A native of Monroe and a highly educated gentleman, he went through the war much respected as a commanding officer. He fell badly wounded in the battle of Lewisburg. After the war he was president of a college in Alabama, and was offered the presidency of the University of West Virginia.

That there was a fight on Tutwiler Hill on the morning of the 2nd day of May, 1862, is proved beyond all doubt by the report of Col. Edgar printed in the records of the United States after the war. Now hearken unto the second fight at a place within sight of the first fight ten days after that. Bear in mind that we are talking about the eventful May, 1862, when a batle was staged in Lewisburg.

Just ten days after the first battle of Tuckwiler's Hill, the Second West Virginia Cavalry advanced again. This regiment had been divided into battalions. They joined the 47th Ohio Volunteer Infantry at Gauley Bridge, and marched to Meadow Bluffs in Greenbrier County. They attempted the same thing that Col. Paxton had failed to do, and that was 1862, when a battle was staged in Lewisburg.

Accordingly the cavalry was ordered to proceed during the night of the 11th of May under Major Hoffman and Captain Powell, over the road leading by way of Blue Sulphur Springs and to come into the turnpike at a point west of Lewisburg and between the Tuckwiler Hill and that place. Colonel Elliott marched his infantry along the pike. The orders were to join at daylight on the morning of the 12th of May. Edgar's Battalion and White's cavalry were camped in the fields on the west side of Lewisburg all about the junction of the roads. The two Federal forces arrived at the junction of the roads at the same time. During the night they had captured some Confederate pickets who had informed them of the position of Edgar's troops. Other pickets had escaped and informed Col. Edgar of the approach, and though it was still dark there was no surprise on either side. The Federal forces charged the Confederate camp and those soldiers scattered and let them through so that no one was hurt in this battle. The Confederates retreated east and Captain Powell was ordered to pursue the rebel cavalry, and this was done with such promptness, that about daylight on that morning the people of Lewisburg were treated to a horse race on Main Street, the Confederate cavalry fleeing before the Federal horsemen. The chase was kept up to within a mile of White Sulphur Springs, and resulted in the capture of a number of prisoners. There was no number mentioned in the accounts that I found.

This was a second battle on the road just west of Lewisburg and there is no doubt about it. The Confederates prevailed in the first battle and the Federal forces in the second. These operations were leading up to a more serious encounter eleven days later.

After the second bout, the Federal forces returned to Meadow Bluffs, and the Confederates naturally gravitated back to Lewisburg, where they occupied the west crest, which belonged to them. It will be remembered that the year before that both Wise and Floyd had left the Kanawha Valley to be occupied by Federal troops, and that on the breaking up of winter, that the Confederate armies were anxious to regain that valley. Salt was manufactured there and it was a prime necessity. And the Federal forces by the same token were on their way to the east to whip Virginia back into the Union.

On the 16th day of May, 1862, Col. Crook, the Gray Fox, arrived at Meadow Bluff with other troops and proceeded to organize a brigade, the 3rd Brigade of the Kanawha Division, with three Ohio regiments and one West Virginia regiment. It has been stated that Crook had drilled his men hard the previous winter and that they were in fine condition. He moved forward quickly and marched through Lewisburg, the Confederates making way for him politely, for Crook had the first hard-boiled army that had as yet appeared on either side. They were winter drilled. They were allowed to march straight through on the pike until they came to Jackson River, and it was then discovered that there were no Confederate armies in that direction to be attacked. The only meat that they got that advance was six Moccasin Ranger captains, and the two officers and twenty-five men captured at Callahan Station. These fell to the Federal army as prisoners.

At Jackson River Crook learned that a Confederate army under Gen. Henry Heth was approaching the Midland Trail at right angles over the road that we now call Seneca Trail. This was the army that had wintered in Mercer County and they were coming to take over the Midland Trail and Kanawha Valley. Their line of march lay through Union and Ronceverte, and Crook saw that in marching east over the Allegheny Mountains that he had left the way open for a Confederate army to march between his brigade and the rest of his division at Charleston and other points west.

So he fell back quickly to Meadow Bluffs, passing through Lewisburg before Heth arrived. Close on his heels followed the Confederate battalion which took up its place on the eastern ridge overlooking Lewisburg.

At that time Lewisburg had a population of about eight hundred persons and was one of the most important towns west of the Allegheny Mountains in Virginia. It had six stores, one newspaper, three churches and one academy. The Supreme Court of Appeals met in regular session there. It had a big brick tavern, and it was about as much like a city as was to be found on the Western Waters.

Henry Heth and George Crook, the leading characters in this campaign had been classmates at West Point. Lewisburg was to prove to be the place of trial by combat between the two trained officers, and was destined to see the defeat and ultimate end of Heth's military advancement, while, Crook was to commence there a military career second to none that was to continue through the Civil War and down to the year 1890, when he departed this life with the rank of major general, and fame that is as everlasting as the hills.

I have one document in my possession that indicates that Heth had arrived at Lewisburg over a month before in person and had looked over the troops at that place, for it is recorded that a delegation of prominent citizens from Pocahontas county had waited on him there and made complaint that while they were Confederates and for the south, that by an act of the Legislature of Virginia, authorizing the formation of companies of rangers or home guards, that Pocahontas County had been overrun by rangers and that the farmers of that county were being deprived of their horses and other property by their own rangers, and that unless the Commonwealth of Virginia could call off these dogs of war, they demanded the right to send for their young men then serving in the Confederate armies to come home and protect the farm from these depredations.

Heth required them to make the charges in writing which they did, the specifications being dated at Lewisburg, April 4, 1862, and signed by William Skeen, prosecuting attorney of Pocahontas County. He blames the hasty legislature that made the rangers possible, and the force that he complained of was the famous Tuning company, which was afterwards surrounded and wiped out in Webster County. He charges Tuning with killing three men, Arbogast, Buzzard and Alderman. With three robberies. Fifteen or twenty horses stolen. Heth forwarded the papers to Richmond.

On the morning of May 23, 1862, Heth marched his army by way of Ronceverte and in the early morn placed his line on the east crest just as Crook and his brigade came to the western brow and deployed to the right and to the left so that he formed a line of his hard-boiled infantry in a line along about where the woman's college buildings stand. Then, as now, two principal roads run north and south through Lewisburg. One runs by the courthouse and one by the military school. The one by the military school is about half way up the eastern hill, and at that time it had heavy rail fences on it. Heth has been criticized for not putting his infantry behind these fences. He had them much higher up. There was a great rye field up the hill from these fences and it was a forward season and it was high enough to hide a crouching man, and as they tell it to me, Heth's men tried to take advantage of this cover when it was too late.

There was heavy timber out towards Mr. H. Frazier's country place, and this was the only cover that Heth had, and that did him but little good when they crumpled up his right wing, and defeated him. The Confederates had some artillery and they fired many shots into the town. One shell burst in the vestibule of the Negro church. Another went down the chimney of the Cary home, and the Cary girls, the belles of the town, went to work while the battle was raging its fiercest, to carry out the debris, and keep the mansion from burning down.

Crook had built sheds for drilling his soldiers the previous winter and worked them hard. After the heavy firing began and the shell and minnie balls were raining down on his command, he moved the infantry forward and secured the road that leads by the military school, and his men sheltering behind the rail fences poured in a devastating fire on Heth's men at from two to three hundred yards range, and it speedily became so deadly that flesh and blood could not stand it and Heth's men turned and faded away towards Ronceverte, on the road on which they had so recently marched to the battle ground. As Heth so sadly reported to the war office, after being allowed to pick his place, and with a vastly superior force, he had been defeated.

When the Confederates gave way, then came the spectacular charge. It will be remembered that Main Street lies at right angles and across the hollow that is Lewisburg, and that for an hour or so, Gen. Heth had been rolling cannon balls down that street towards Crook, like a lot of bowling balls, but when the galling fire from the rail fences put him out of that, five hundred blue-clad cavalrymen charged the whole length of that street and hung on the flanks of the fleeing Confederates. That was the grand finale, and it was a day full of sorrow for Lewisburg, for it was solid for the south.

One of the charging cavalrymen rode too close to the edge of the road, and his horse slipped on a flagstone and fell sideways, rolling the rider over into the front yard of a residence, where he had to be helped up.

I suppose the only living man who saw that battle is Marcellus Zimmerman. He was eleven years old and was out in the center of the battle field during the whole fight riding a stick horse and playing that he was a horse soldier.

After the fight was over on that beautiful May morning, the work of gathering up the dead and wounded began. Many were found in the deep rye. Col. Edgar was shot through. His bloodstained sword is still to be seen in Ronceverte. The wounded were cared for by surgeons and the town people. The dead were laid out on the floor of two churches, the Old Stone Church, and the colored church.

In this short and swift fight lasting not over thirty minutes, the Confederates' loss was 80 killed, 100 wounded, 157 prisoners, 4 cannon, 25 horses, and 300 stands of small arms. The Federal loss was 13 killed, 50 wounded, and 6 prisoners.

The Federal cavalry drove the Confederates across the Greenbrier River at Ronceverte. Heth reformed his army at Union and rested there for a month, and Crook tried to bring on another battle on June 24th, at Union, but Heth retired over Peters Mountain.

At Lewisburg, the Federal troops that charged up the hill were three regiments of Ohio Volunteer Infantry, the 36th, 44th and 47th.

Among the Confederates at Lewisburg was the father of J. H. Buzzard, of Huntersville, who has held many important offices in this county.

Crook remained in Lewisburg for sixty days after the battle and then fell back to his camp at Meadow Bluffs.

Of all the battlefields that I have studied, I know of none quite so dramatic as Lewisburg. Fought in a mountain town, before breakfast, and combining rifle shooting, artillery fire, infantry charges, and cavalry, all in a sleeping little city whose inhabitants awoke to hear the cannon boom and the rifles speak, and who had no time to do anything in the way of escape until it was all over.

I see I did not finish what I started to say about the Tunings, the dreaded outlaws mentioned by Gen Skeen to Gen. Heth. These were three brothers out of the northwest who ravaged this section of the State for years during the war. The three brothers were Al, Fred and Jack Tuning. The name was probably Chewning. They had the settlers buffaloed and they would come to a farm with their followers and demand to be kept, and no one was brave or foolhardy enough to deny them. They harried the country for years, but finally they were surrounded by about thirty Federal soldiers on leave. The outlaws were in the house of James Dyer, on Gauley River, in Webster County. James Dyer was one of the best citizens. He was the first county superintendent of schools of Webster County. The Tunings attempted to run and Al and Fred were shot and killed. Jack got away and went to Ohio, where he landed in the pen. The Tunings were wiped out March 4, 1864.

Now as to the third battle of Tuckwiler Hill. Hu Maxwell says that on April 19, 1863, the battle of Tuckwiler Hill was fought. You will note that this was almost a year after the other battles. The Federal dispatches call this the battle of Brushy Ridge, a hill about five miles west of Tuckwiler Hill, and it is probable that it was fought between the two places, for the Federals rode into an ambuscade and suffered severely. Gen. E. P. Scammon in command of the Kanawha Division ordered Col. Paxton to reconnoiter Lewisburg, and as he rode with the 2nd West Virginia Cavalry, he encountered Edgar's Battalion and suffered a loss of fourteen men as well as losing a large number as prisoners. Col. Paxton, a gallant officer, on making his report to Gen. Scammon was summarily dismissed from the service by the irate general. Gen. Powell took his place.

Here is the truth about the Tuckwiler Hill fights. On one side in each one of the three encounters was the 2nd West Virginia Volunteer cavalry, and on the other the noted Edgar's Battalion. This is the reason that they run together in the minds of the careless historian.

CHAPTER XV

The Salt Wells of Kanawha Valley and Whether the Stream Ebbs and Flows Like a Tidal River. Some Say it Do.

Continuing to write unto you about the Midland Trail, which is the way I long have sought, I would remind you that it is a passway across the State of West Virginia from the crest of the Allegheny Mountains at White Sulphur Springs to the Ohio River at Huntington. It is a hard-surfaced road and is remarkable for its sudden and violent contrasts. One hour a tourist is in the city streets and in another hour he is in the midst of what looks like a wrecked world. It is the kind of driving where it is better to hug the bank than it is to hug your companion.

In a general way it is about the same kind of a march that the Revolutionary army made across the peneplain in 1774 when they were trying to cut down Cornstalk. It winds in and out and gives the tourist a great variety of sights.

It cuts the State of West Virginia in two so that about two-fifths of the State lies south of the trail, and that is where the people are congregating that make up the population of the State. We have been getting more numerous of late years. West Virginia has more people than had the combined area of Virginia and West Virginia in 1861, when the war broke out. Those old-time golfers who went out in '61 and came home in '65.

A generation ago Prof. Samuel Brown, the geologist at the University, explained very patiently year after year, to student ears that heard not, that the mineral wealth of the southern part of West Virginia indicated that the population would gradually center there, and to be more specific, he said that the time would come when the town of Huntington would be the greatest city between Cincinnati and Pittsburgh, and that having attained an ascendency would thereafter maintain it. All this has come to pass.

And a man of a younger generation now is pointing out that there is untold wealth in New River coal in the county of Randolph, and his words will be remembered some day.

We are used to green fields and pleasant pastures in the blue grass section where I live, but down the State coal is king, and the concentrated extract of vegetation is what makes the country rich. I branched off the Midland Trail to go to Princeton and saw evidence of much mining wealth. The Virginian railway gives time for the grandeur to sink in for it takes about eight hours to win through from Princeton to Charleston. I made myself a nuisance on the train by trying to find out what watercourses I was following, for so many did not think it was of any importance. But you cannot know your West Virginia without getting a working knowledge of the watershed. As near as I could figure out we left the waters of East River and crossed over to dally with the headwaters of Bluestone River, and leaving that to cross the divide to the waters of Guyan River, where the city of Mullens sets in the forks like the town of Durbin in the forks of the Greenbrier. Then to the waters of Coal River, Paint Creek, and other waters of the New River.

The streams I had learned from the pioneer reports and the maps. One day Congressman Taylor and I were rolling down the Midland Trail and when we approached the town of Malden, we began to inquire for the Burning Springs.

The Kellys Creek that I wrote about is still there. I wrote about it and then went to see it. The town of Cedar Grove is built there as is an old mansion house known as the Tompkins Place. The Journals of the officers in Dunmore's War would indicate that Kelly's cabin was almost exactly where the Tompkins house stands.

Col. Fleming says that nine miles below the mouth of Kellys Creek the burning springs were to be found. He observed that they were on a high bank and consisted of two basins some three or four feet in diameter, and these were filled with water. When he came there he found the basins full of black water that had a greasy taste. It boiled and bubbled some three or four inches above the surface, without either emitting air or heat so far as he could see. The springs had no apparent outlet but the water seemed to escape by soaking through a fattish earth. From them there was a descent to a miry place of fat, black mud where there was a fallen tree and grass. The water as it boiled was black and had a slight sulphur smell.

He flashed a torch over the water at a distance of four or five inches and the flame communicated itself to the surface of the water and burned with surprising force, like a cooking fire of ash wood. After burning a long time the water heated and evaporated. After a time the party tried to put the fire out but was not able to do it. They piled grass on it and it consumed the grass.

The other day we could see no sign of the burning springs but we did not have much time to look for them. Two citizens resting by the roadside said they knew about as much about them as anyone and that they did not know whether they could be definitely located or not, but that tradition said that they were near a certain stump of a tree that stood near the river.

Another traidition says that in the olden times it was a favorite place for boatmen to camp as they could cook by the fires.

Another ancient account says that the burning spring was about eighty yards from the river bank in alluvial soil. In 1842, in boring for salt, the depth of a thousand feet was reached. This was the record for a deep well at that time and a copper pipe was inserted to shut off the surface water. The salt water and gas flowed into the cistern sixty feet above the surface of the river. One well was obtained that spouted a stream of mingled gas and salt water thirty feet in the air, and this when lighted at night made a brilliant display.

The Big Lick was somewhere about five miles above Charleston, that is, above the mouth of Elk River and this is the place that the first well bored by white men for salt was located. That was in 1809. It was the place that the Indians used to make salt. That the Indians made salt here rests on the fact that remains of rude pottery vessels were found here in great abundance which would indicate that they were used to boil and evaporate the water for salt. At a garage on the Midland Trail above Montgomery, the proprietors being of the class that hankers after things that others idle by, have been collecting flint and celt Indian relics, and they have a bit of pottery picked up on the Kanawha River.

About a hundred years ago close by the Big Lick was a rock called the pictured or calico rock; on it the Indians sculptured many figures of animals and birds and other records. Unfortunately it was needed to make furnace chimneys and the rock was destroyed.

It is a pity that the sign was not allowed to stand. It was of the kind known as petroglyph or rock carving. In this case it was probably a set of symbols carved in the rock and colored. They have about given up the idea that these writing were made to preserve wise thoughts or historic happenings. In the case near the Big Lick salt spring belonging to a very fierce tribe locally referred to as the Salt Indians, it might be inferred that a loose translation of the petroglyphs was something like this: "Notice. This is private property. No trespassing by hunting, fishing or making salt. Keep off. This means you."

There is a tradition of a bearded gentleman from New England who was traveling along by the salt works boring where a well was spouting finely. He had heard that such wells were often accompanied by a flow of gas that could be ignited. He got hold of some fire with his flint and steel and touched the well off and was badly burned, and had to lie up for repairs at Charleston for a long time. It is related that the owner of the well being a good deal damaged by the fire visited the injured man for the purpose of collecting from him, but the stranger was such a pitiful sight that he forebore to bother him about it.

It has not been so very long since wagons went down from the Greenbrier Valley to the salt works on the Kanawha for salt.

It is generally conceded that the original name among the white people for the Great Kanawha River was Wood River, named in honor of Gen-Abraham Wood, whose place was Fort Henry, at the falls of Appomatox River where Petersburg, Virginia, is located. He was a great Indian trader and explorer and was the first to discover that the Great Kanawha River cut all the mountains in two. He had probably mapped the river correctly as early as 1654. His was the name it bore for many years. A great river, four hundred miles long, rising in the State of North Carolina and flowing northeast for a hundred miles and gradually turning to the west and finally running true to the dip of the strata northwest to where it joins the Ohio. It is said the word Kanawha means the river of the woods. The trouble about the mutters that pass for words in a savage tribe is that they can be construed to mean almost anything, and the fate of the word lies in the ear of the hearer. The white men have almost a hundred ways to spell Seneca, and finally they adopted the spelling of the name of the ancient philosopher.

I got out my books to see if I could check up on the meaning of the word and it looks to me that it means the river of the great elms, and that is not so far from the river of the woods.

Now since I made a few observations about Batts and Fallam, I have been over the ground again, and I am about ready to abandon the northern route and come back to my first conclusion that they came over the southern route. It is somewhat puzzling to follow them. But it is possible. For they kept a journal of each day's travel, and I am about ready to adhere to the belief that they pursued a line of march along Indian paths conforming very closely to the line of the Virginian railway from Roanoke, Virginia to Deepwater, West Virginia, only that they came to the Great Kanawha River at the falls. The terrain at the village of Kanawha Falls answers the particular description that Batts and Fallam give as to the place where they took possession of the Mississippi Valley in the name of King Charles the Second.

When Batts and Fallam made a solemn report that the water in the Kanawha River ebbed and flowed with the tide, we took it for granted that they did not know what they were talking about, but when I got down there the other day, I found that there was a belief that there was some sort of an ebb and flow of the tide, but I do not feel at liberty at this time to give the name of the observers. But there are more things in this world than are dreamed of in your philosophy, Horatio! Therefore, the attention of those uninteresting men, the exact scientists, is invited to this phenomena. I would not care to have the weight of such worlds of science upon my back. I would rather be a dog and bay the moon.

I have not even a jibboom to go searching for tides, but I offer a few golden thoughts on that subject. In the first place the river lies east and west and the moon or whatever it is that affects tidal rivers may coincide with the orbit of its axis in such a way as to magnify its circumference and produce an oscillating isochronism. Who can say?

But in the days of the early salt wells there was a phenomena that has never been satisfactorily explained but which may have a bearing on the ebb and flow of the tides of Kanawha. In those days the salt wells and they were there by the hundreds, fifteen miles on either side of the stream, were bored by going from three to five hundred feet below the bed of the river. The surface water was then carefully excluded by copper pipes which were well wedged into the solid rock, and the result was that the salt water, the desirable commercial fluid would at all times maintain a level with the river of fresh water. When the river rose the salt water in the tube, maybe hundreds of feet from the water's edge would rise like mercury in a thermometer and would subside with the stage of water in the main river. This is given as a historical fact in sober histories, and is not more wonderful than the tides of Kanawha. It may have some bearing on the subject.

No one knows quite so much as he thinks he does, so do not dismiss these dull scientific musings in disdain.

The river was first named from Gen. Abraham Wood, and about that man there is high color and romance. He was about ten years old when he stowed himself away on a ship called the "Margaret and John," sailing out of old England and he was landed on our shores at Hampton Roads in 1620. Up to 1645, he cannot be definitely traced, but he shows up in 1646 as the commander of Fort Henry an outpost of Virginia. It appears that from 1607 to 1644 our pioneer ancestors never left the hearing of the sea, but that about 1644 the Indians killed so many of the first settlers, that it became necessary to fortify against them and that the plan was to erect strong forts at the falls of each of the rivers. Thus Fort Byrd was built at the falls of the James at Richmond, and that town was thus begun. Another was called Fort Henry at the falls of the Appomattox River, and that in time became the city of Petersburg. Wood commanded there. The Indians were subdued and westward the star of empire took its way. After a few years Virginia found it burdensome to maintain these forts and a bright idea was given to some ancient statesman, that these forts could be well treated as concessions to Indian traders, and in this way the watch and ward would be kept without expense to the State. And it was done.

Wood got Fort Henry. He had a wonderful trade with the Indians in south and west. He went through the woods at first himself, and I see no good reason to doubt that he reached the Great Kanawha in the year 1654, in person. That was the reason it was called Wood River.

But in 1671, when Batts and Fallam were sent across the mountains, they said it was a pleasing though dreadful sight to see the mountains and hills as if piled one upon another. Rest easy Captain Batts. It has the same effect today upon the lowlander.

Wood was a man of sixty-one years and he was sending out agents to trade for him. Furs became a great source of gain. Dryden wrote in 1672:

> Friend, once twas fame that led thee forth,
> To brave the tropic heat and frozen north,
> Late it was gold, then beauty was the spur,
> But now our gallants venture but for fur.

One of Wood's agents captured by the Indians was horrified to see them singe the fur of a beaver to eat it, and that was somewhere in the neighborhood of the Shawnee towns in Ohio.

Wood was not on good terms with a tribe that lived on the Great Kanawha about fifty or sixty miles above its mouth. He called them the Monetons but who are classed as Mohetans, a cognate tribe of the Tutelo, the tribe of the great chief Nastybone. These Mohetans had moved over from Roanoke to the salt springs of Kanawha. Batts and Fallam found a bit of level land where they had once lived at the Falls of the Kanawha, but it was overgrown with locust, and other growth that causes some historians to put the expulsion of the Indians from the Western Waters in the year 1656, by the Five Nations. But be that as it may, a strong colony of Mohetan Indians still lingered around the Big Lick just above Charleston, for Batts and Fallam were afraid to go closer to them than the falls in 1671.

In 1674, Wood sent James Needham and Gabriel Arthur into the Indian country south of Fort Henry to trade, and they got along pretty well until some of the tribe of Indians went to the far south and were killed for their furs by white men. Needham was killed by the Indians in retaliation, and Arthur was tied to a stake and fire set around him, but at the last minute he was saved. He conformed to the life of the tribe and later he went on a ten-day journey to visit the Mohetans at the Big Lick. Here he was allowed to swim in the river several times and he found that it was fresh water, but he observed that it ebbed and flowed. He reported that it was the same river that Batts and Fallam had visited higher up on its course.

When the Indians took in their furs to Fort Henry they took Arthur with them, and he was able to relate the fate of his companion, James Needham. Wood writes: "So died this heroyic Englishman whose fame shall never die if my penn were able to eternize it. He had adventured where never Englishman had dared to attempt before and with him died one hundred and fourty-foure pounds starling of my adventure with him. I wish I could have saved his life with ten times the vallue."

I am getting this Midland Trail and its history somewhat straightened out in what I am pleased to call my mind.

When we consider that this great mountain country tributary to the Midland Trail has been the scene of the lives of millions of people. When it was freely predicted by historians and writers not more than a hundred years ago that this country would never be inhabited, on account of its rough and mountainous surface, and that only the bear and the other wild animals would ever be found here. When we remember that this rugged land has given to the country great men, beautiful women, and richness beyond computation, it is apparent that it affords an inexhaustible subject for books, and that the best that the most voluminous writer can do is but to mention a few among a myriad of subjects which add to its renown.

I was moved to make the Midland Trail a subject, because so many other writers have been affected the same way, but who were not able to continue any considerable length, probably owing to the immensity of the supply of material. And I find that I have used my space up without making more than a beginning.

PART II

THE SENECA TRAIL OR THE GREAT NORTH ROAD

The sparkling streams that wend their ways
Through pleasant valleys, fair and bright,
Woods where the flickering sunbeam plays,
The peaks lit by the morning rays,
That sweep away the night.

The cliff that rears its frowning face,
The driving snow, the storm's wild strife,
The somber, serried heights that space
The confines of a rugged race—
They weave a spell on life.

O West Virginia, thy good name,
Thy people breathe in love and pride,
The glory of thy days and fame,
Shines with a steady glowing flame,
Time cannot dim or hide!

O mountaineers who rule in stead,
Of those who lived to make men free,
Each mountain peak that lifts its head
Is towering over gallant dead,
Who left their work to thee!

The time may come and that not long,
When greed and hate their deeds complete,
Humanity from out the throng
Looks to the hills to right the wrong,
And raise her to her feet.

INTRODUCTORY

The Seneca Trail is the name that has been given to the great highway running from the north to the south boundary of West Virginia, through the trough-like valleys on the eastern border of the State.

Three rivers lying end to end water these valleys, Cheat River, Greenbrier River, and Bluestone River.

It takes its name from the warpath of the Seneca Indians as formed after the treaty of Albany, 1722, had confirmed the act of the House of Burgesses of Virginia, making the Allegheny Mountain the division line between the lands allotted to the Indians and the lands that could be settled by the white people, a line that was observed with more or less fidelity until the Revolution.

A well-traveled road was established by the Seneca tribe, the most powerful of the Six Nations, over which they traveled from the waters of the St. Lawrence to the northern part of Georgia, and as this followed their eastern border in West Virginia, they were at all times informed of the acts of the bold white settlers in breaking the agreement to remain on the east side of the divide.

The old warpath is still visible in many places. In a general way it follows the highway, first on one side of it and then the other. In many places the two roads occupy the same space.

These articles touch some of innumerable incidents that occurred in the region served by the trail. As long as they are, they are as a drop in the bucket of the rich history of this road.

CHAPTER I

The Seneca Trail connects with the Wilderness Trail. Captives of Abbs Valley.

When we get the Seneca Trail opened up the Greenbrier Valley will come into its own in this way, that we will be in close touch with a country that has been close to us but closed against us by the mountains. We will be open to the southwest portion of Virginia and in touch with Tazewell, Russell, Grayson, Washington counties. Our own kind of people. That throws us once more convenient to the Wilderness road of song and story that Daniel Boone blazed into the dark and bloody ground of Kentucky. The Greenbrier Valley settled up with pioneers first and the lure of the setting sun led the pioneers that felt crowded west. They did not go as we go now towards Cincinnati for that was a country strongly held by hostile Indians. We found a way to slip between the dangerous Cherokees of the south and the Shawnees of the Ohio country through Kentucky. And in doing this we would work down through the southern end of the Valley of Virginia. Pretty soon there were enough people to justify a county. A lot of them stayed on the Holston on the border of North Carolina, but many of them took the turning to the right and settled Kentucky, and while the fate of the Kentucky settlement hung in the balance many years, the inevitable retreat of the victorious Indians took place before the endurance of the white people. So they cut off a county from the lower side of Botetourt County, and called it Fincastle. That took a part of West Virginia, South West Virginia, and all of Kentucky. A big lot of territory later surrendered to North Carolina, and Tennessee was also included.

It was settled and managed largely from Staunton. Col. Wm. Preston was the colonel of that county. He lived in Staunton for the most part and made frequent trips to Fincastle County. Michael Price seems to have established a home down there, center of a Welsh community. It was on Toms Creek, then if not now, Montgomery County. Preston would make appointments to meet persons at Price's. They were no kin to me. They had this set of Prices up for being loyal to the crown, whereas all of the Greenbrier Valley Prices were fighting for the Republic.

The Bluestone River that flows so far to meet the Greenbrier River leads into Tazewell County, and Road 24 ought to give us a chance to explore that Bluestone River country. I would not be surprised to learn in a few years that next to the Greenbrier that the Bluestone River country will be very important and well known to us.

At the head of the river is Abbs Valley, the scene of the tragedy concerning the Moore family. In 1775, James Moore, Jr., settled there. He was born in Rockbridge County, then Augusta. His father was an emigrant of the Lewis colony. Moore moved to Abbs Valley with his wife and a family of three small children. The land was rich and in nine years he prospered exceedingly and had as many as a hundred head of horses and other stock in proportion. The first nine years were passed in peace and safety, but in 1784, his second son James, fourteen years of age, was sent to a distant pasture to bring in a horse. While on his way he met a party of three Indians—a chief named Black Wolf, so called from having a black beard, and two Indian boys. They were Shawnees.

At our house there used to be a little book called the "Captives of Abbs Valley," and it made a deep and lasting impression on my young mind. I remember that it said that when they moved there in the spring of 1775, that they could carry little or no flour and meal and that to get bread they had to wait until the corn ripened. The nearest thing to bread that they had to eat was the breast of wild turkey. I think it was in this book that it was related with great fervor how provisions of all kind had about disappeared when a fine buck deer showed up one Sunday morning, and though the necessities of the family were great, they could not bring themselves to fire a gun on Sunday. But it pleased fate to make the deer repeat his visit on Monday when it was duly slain. It never occurred to me to pity the poor deer.

But the thing that impressed me most was the perfectly delightful adventure that young James had by being captured by the Indians and carried away on a march of twenty days to the Chillicothe towns and being adopted into the Indian tribe. According to our way of looking at it he was in the best of luck. The chief, old Black Wolf, had a time with the three boys. They not only killed deer but they got some buffalo. They all had big loads to carry and did not carry meat. So when it came on to rain they were three days without food. On the fourth day they killed a buffalo and made broth out of the paunch and broke their fast that way. At Chillicothe they traded James Moore to a sister of Black Wolf for a horse, and it was not a good horse at that. He lived with the Indians then and had a good time. In the same way I used to envy Robinson Crusoe and greatly desired being cast away on an island.

James Moore remained in the Indian country for years. There he discovered his sister, Mary Moore, in rags and destitute, a prisoner.

On the 14th day of July, 1786, occurred the massacre and capture in Abbs Valley. It was during wheat harvest. About thirty Indians crept close to the house and fired. Two children, William Moore and Rebecca Moore, were bringing a bucket of water from the spring. They were killed at the first volley as was Alexander Moore, a child, playing in the yard. Mrs. Moore and Martha Ivins shut the door of the house. Another occupant was John Simpson, an aged man in bed sick. A bullet through the logs killed him. The Indians cut the door down and took prisoner Mrs. Moore, Martha Ivins, John Moore, Jane Moore, Mary Moore, aged eight, and Margaret Moore, an infant. James Moore, the father, ran to the house and was shot as he crossed the fence and fell dead with seven bullet holes through him.

The Indians then went towards their towns. The baby was killed by dashing its brains out against a tree. The boy, John, was tomahawked because he was too weak to travel. When they reached the towns, Mrs. Moore and her daughter Jane were tortured, both dying a dreadful lingering death. It appeared afterwards that the reason of this cruelty was the appearance of a war party of Cherokees smarting under defeat and determined to put to death the first white persons they could lay their hands upon.

Mary Moore retained a copy of the New Testament all through the period of her captivity which lasted three years. The brother of Martha Ivins, Thomas Ivins, having made his way through to Detroit, was able to secure the release of his sister and Mary and James, and they all came home to Rockbridge County by way of Pittsburgh in one party.

Martha Ivins married a Mr. Hummer. They moved to Indiana. Two of her sons became distinguished Presbyterian preachers.

James Moore grew to manhood in Rockbridge County and went back to Abbs Valley where he raised a large family. He was a prominent and respected citizen and a leading member of the Methodist Church.

Mary Moore married Rev. Samuel Brown, pastor of the New Providence Church, the Church with a History. Mary Moore Brown lies in the graveyard of that church. She had eleven children all of whom were noted for their devout religious lives. Five of her sons became Presbyterian ministers.

Mrs. H. W. McLaughlin, the lady of the manse of New Providence Church, is a lineal descendant.

We have all been taught to revere the name of Mary Moore. Some day a historian will arise who can do justice to the theme and who can form the gallery of fame of the great women of the mountains of pioneer times, and among those names will be the names of Mary Moore, Margaret Lynn Lewis, Mary Vance, Elizabeth Dunlap, and many others who have been too long neglected and obscured by the fame of the fighting side of the house.

CHAPTER II

Battle of Droop Mountain. Tenth West Virginia saved the day. See Blue Book 1926 for another Chapter.

If this article had a head it would be called the Confederate Alibi. It is about the battle of Droop Mountain and the fight was won on points by the Federal forces. But it was a convention in the Civil War practiced by both sides to magnify a victory and minimize a defeat. In this way both sides kept their courage up during a four-year period of great tribulation. The Confederates blocked the road and the Federal army made an attack and drove them from the position. Or rather the Confederate army withdrew gracefully and intimated to the Federal army that if it wanted that place they could have it. It had ceased to be either safe or comfortable.

In November, 1863, there were no considerable Confederate forces anywhere in West Virginia except in the Greenbrier Valley. That was held by the Confederates from its head to its foot some one hundred and seventy miles on the Virginia frontier, protecting Virginia from attack from the west. General Kelly in command of the department of West Virginia gave orders to General Averell at Beverly and General Scammon at Charleston to send armies to meet at Lewisburg and drive the Confederates out of the valley of the Greenbrier and to go as much farther as they, in their discretion, deemed expedient.

Averell took his army over the Seneca Trail and Scammon sent General Duffie over the Midland Trail, and they met by appointment in Lewisburg, November 7th, and found one Confederate army over the border.

Averell came into the county by the Staunton & Parkersburg Turnpike and turned south at Travelers Repose. At that time the Confederate troops were stationed as follows. At Glade Hill in the upper part of the county was Captain W. L. McNeel's company. At Edray Captain J. W. Marshall was in charge of a detachment watching the Marlins Bottom and Huttonsville turnpike. Colonel W. W. Arnett had a regiment at Marlins Bottom in comfortable log houses getting ready to winter there. Colonel W. L. Jackson had the main part of his regiment, the Nineteenth Virginia Cavalry, at Mill Point. Colonel W. P. Thompson was away with a portion of this regiment on an expedition to Nicholas County and had got as far as the foot of Cold Knob in Greenbrier County. General Echols had the main part of the troops at Lewisburg.

McNeel's company discovered the advance in the upper part of the county and a messenger was dispatched at once and he brought intelligence of the movement to Arnett at Marlinton. Averell moved quickly and but for the courier getting through he would have surprised the Confederates in their camps. As it was, the McNeel soldiers got too close and four of them were captured and one wounded. That was John Adam McNeel, whose horse was shot down and the soldier got a broken leg out of it. The main camp of McNeel's company was cut off and they escaped by going up Galford's Creek and crossing the Allegheny Mountain to the waters of Back Creek. They continued south and had got as far as Callahans, in Allegheny County before the battle of Droop Mountain was pulled off.

Arnett got his regiment out of Marlinton by the skin of his teeth, as it was. He sent off a horse soldier hot foot to Captain Marshall at Edray to come on, telling him that he was going to barricade the road on Price Hill, and for him to march on the back road and come to the pike at Mrs. Kee's. This place was at the top of Price Hill. Arnett cut a lot of trees across the road and dug some of it away on that sliding hillside.

The exciting days for this neighborhood were Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the 4th, 5th, and 6th of November, 1863. Then it was that the biggest battle ever fought in West Virginia occurred.

Arnett pulled his freight at sun down on Wednesday, and Colonel Ohley moved into his deserted log cabins at dusk.

There is only one road between Marlinton and Mill Point and Averell with his main army at Huntersville had laid a plan to capture Arnett's force by sending Ohley down the pike to get Arnett started south, while Colonel Harris moved his forces down Beaver Creek to get ahead of him by blocking the road at Marvin Chapel where the two roads unite. The strategy of Averell would have succeeded but for Col. W. P. Thompson's efforts. That morning Thompson had been recalled from Cold Knob with his cavalry and was unsaddling at his old camp at the John S. Kellison farm, when W. L. Jackson's courier rode up and told him to hold the Beaver Creek road. Thompson immediately took a squadron of his cavalry and hot-footed it to the Beaver Creek country. This was a narrow road used for years as a short cut from the Little Levels district to the county seat at Huntersville. Thompson got several miles up that road and spent a pleasant evening in cutting trees across the road and falling back and firing as he fell back so that the Federal army was considerably delayed in getting to the fork of the road, and Arnett got by.

On this expedition, Averell had with him some signal experts, the art of signaling then being perfected by the experience of the armies in the Civil War. It was arranged that the main corps would stay at Huntersville, while other signal troops would go on to Marvin Chapel where they would use rockets to communicate the position and success of the movement. At Huntersville, Merritt went to the top of the knob to observe the signals and Dernicke went on with the troops to report. It was arranged that the rockets were to be sent up at 8 p. m., and Merritt waited on top of the knob until 10 p. m. and seeing no rockets, he went back to headquarters. It afterwards appeared that Dernicke was not able to send up his rockets until 11 p. m. and they were not observed at Huntersville, though the Confederates saw them red against the sky. They were a sort of a new departure in mountain warfare. Thompson and his blockading tactics had interfered with the march so much that the army was three hours late.

Thursday was Mill Point day. Mill Point has never been given the credit for the baptism by fire that she had that day because what occurred next day at Droop Mountain, five miles south, has overshadowed it to such a great extent. There was enough powder burned that day at Mill Point to fight a great battle. The Federal armies were at Stephen Hole run and on the hill between that run and Mill Point. The Confederates formed a battle line along the banks of Stamping Creek for a mile or more and their artillery was on the hill just south of Mill Point. When the guns began to thunder it occurred to Jackson that his battle line was just the right distance from the Federal batteries to be in range of grape shot and he withdrew his army by having them slip silently up the stream until they were hid by the bend of the mountain, and he took them out by the flint pits.

And having gotten his troops under way he looked up to the long smooth summit of Droop Mountain and decided to take his stand there, and by nightfall he was in camp on the crest looking down on the Federal army as they kindled their fires in the broad fields of the Little Levels.

On that Thursday, the Federal troops at Marlinton got word to cut out the blockade and move on to Mill Point and before they left they burned the log cabins that the Confederates were to winter in. The fire wall of one of those cabins is in my front yard. My father would not allow it to be disturbed in his lifetime and it will be preserved. A few years ago we found a big machete buried there.

On Thursday, too, General Echols at Lewisburg, heard that they were converging on him from Charleston and from Beverly and he got busy. He sent a regiment west on the Midland Trail to hold Duffie and got his army to move to Pocahontas. That day he marched his men fourteen miles and went into camp at Spring Creek. The arrangement was to reinforce Jackson who was to fall back until Echols could join him. They were from nine in the morning until night marching that fourteen miles to the Seneca Trail and had covered but half the distance to the battle ground.

That night messages were received by Echols to the effect that the Federal army was much larger than they had thought at first and that the north was red with camp fires and that there would be a battle the next day where the pike came to the top of the mountain. And this was no night to sleep; so Echols got his forces under way by two in the morning and reached Droop Mountain at nine the same morning. This was a record march. Twenty-eight miles over mountain roads in twenty-four hours is making good time for the first day out. But when they came back that same night they made it in eleven hours. These mountain troops had marched fifty-six miles in forty-two hours and wasted seven hours in fighting a battle. And they were still going strong when they passed through Lewisburg on their way back, for they never even hesitated, Duffie being due there that same morning.

It is no wonder that after General Sam Jones had telegraphed to Richmond that Echol's brigade had been nearly destroyed, that General Echols and his officers should have felicitated themselves on the fact that they had got away practically intact, and that most of those missing men who had been scattered in flight had reported within a day or two for duty.

Edgar's Battalion had been dispatched from Renick over the back road which he held during the fight and he extricated his army without the loss of a suspender button.

Echols reported that the only trophy that the Federals could boast of was the capture of a brass cannon.

I have heard about this cannon all my life. It was a twelve pound brass howitzer. Howitzer from a foreign word meaning sling. This cannon was the pride of the army. The soldiers said that every time it was fired it called for the "First-born!" It had been injured at White Sulphur Springs in that battle the previous summer. In the hurried retirement from the field at Droop Mountain it was attached to the limber and the pintle hook broke. Then it was lashed to the limber and the gun carriage broke down. It was lifted from the gun carriage and placed in the limber chest and the limber broke down under the additional weight and the cannon was then hid in a morass on top of the mountain, such places as are generally referred to as bear wallows. Old soldiers have spoken about this to me and were always on the point of going to hunt for it, but so far as I know it was never found.

Most of us have grown up with the idea that the Confederates neglected to guard their left flank and that they were surprised and flanked and that was the reason that the battle was lost. But a study of the official dispatches on both sides does not bear out this theory. It seems that no less than four detachments were sent against this attack from the west and that the soldiers fought a long and bloody battle in the thick forest and undergrowth on the flat top of the mountain extending for a mile or more as level as a floor from the fortified places by the pike clear back to the Viney Mountain.

And what is more, instead of being surprised by the flanking movement, a Confederate soldier fired the first rifle shot on that flank. This soldier said that they were lying in the woods watching for the Federal troops to advance and that the first that they saw of them was when a Federal soldier showed his face over a rail fence. "Shot him square between the eyes and he squealed like a pig." This was the first soldier killed at the battle of Droop Mountain.

Colonel Augustus Moor, of the 28th Ohio regiment, and Col. T. M. Harris, of the 10th West Virginia, were the commanding officers who made that fatal and deadly attack on the left flank of the Confederate army and it was not so much finesse as hard knocks that drove the Confederates in upon their center and disorganized the plans so that there was nothing to do but to run.

Moor went the long way round and Harris joined him somewhere near the Dar Place, so named after Abraham Dar, a pioneer. Moor did not move before daylight, as reported, on this encircling effort. He marched down from near Mill Point to Hillsboro before daylight, but he was still at that town at nine o'clock. Then being in plain view of the enemy on top of the mountains, he received orders to go round them and he was in a broad, open country, and the question was how to get out of there without being observed?

He said that he went northwest taking advantage of woods, hollows, rail fences, and every other thing that could hide them. He had his men trail their rifles. He must have struck the Viney Mountain somewhere back of Captain McNeel's for he said that after getting on the mountain that he marched for one hour due south, when he arrived at a fence. The main crest of Droop Mountain runs north and south for more than a mile, but there was continual fighting on the full length of this ridge, 3100 feet in elevation. He says the Confederates raised at this fence at a distance of not more than twenty-five or thirty yards and poured a devastating fire on his men. That this was the critical moment of the day. He intimates that if his men had broken at that surprise the battle would have been lost. The men were commanded to lie down, and in a few minutes Col. Harris's regiment joined him on that top and they went forward, fighting every inch of the way in thick brush. They must have fought it out in the brush for something like a mile, for they finally arrived at the "cleared hill where the rebel artillery was." When Harris came up he passed through Moor's regiment and formed by inversion on his right, and battle front as they moved forward through the woods was very broad. Just behind the Confederate fortifications a road comes in which intersects the Lobelia-Jacox road and this flanking movement debouching from this road added to the horror and confusion of the Confederates.

Moor says that just as he reached the cleared field that the dismounted men joined him on his left and so they took the Confederate works, but as he emerged from the woods the artillery had already limbered up and started for the pike. This accounts for the fact that the Confederates were able to bring off their batteries, even the piece which demanded the "first-born."

I think that the battle hung in the balance as the fight went on in the flats west of the pike. The Confederate commander knew of the importance of that movement. He sent Captain Marshall's force in there first. It was reinforced by Colonel Thompson and some more companies of the same regiment. Then the Twenty-third Virginia Battalion was ordered into the woods on the extreme left to support Thompson. Then Patton says: "The action became very heavy in that direction." Then Colonel Gibson with four companies of the Fourteenth Virginia Cavalry (Cochran's regiment) were ordered into the woods where the killing was going on. And finally a picked body of troops from three companies of the Twenty-second, including Capt. Jim McNeill's Nicholas Blues, were placed under Capt. John K. Thompson and they plunged into the fatal woods and by a desperate charge actually stopped the advance and threw back the front, but the next wave went over them and they got to the pike in time to see the Confederate army streaming out towards Lewisburg and fought a stern chase battle with them for hours.

Capt. John K. Thompson received his third wound in that battle. That was where he lost his eye. He was mentioned in the dispatches for his bravery and his courage. He said that it was the hottest fire that he ever experienced. Captain Thompson lived for many years in Putnam and Mason counties. He was noted for his wisdom and intellectual culture. He was the owner of one of the big farms facing on the Kanawha River. Was marshal for West Virginia, chairman of the Republican party in the State. He never married.

Another West Virginian who was desperately wounded in that battle was John Y. Bassell, sixteen years old.

Captain Marshall and Captain Hutton received honorable mention in the dispatches. Also Lieut. John J. Beard.

It was a more far-reaching victory than the Richmond government was willing to admit. For it was the last stand in a way that the Confederate States made in West Virginia. The retreat took them well down to Dublin, and no rebel army was assembled in West Virginia after that time. That was the turning point of the war so far as the mountains were concerned. When the Federal army returned to Beverly they went over the Seneca Trail and as they approached the top of Elk Mountain beyond Edray they were fired on from the woods by a troop of about sixty Confederate soldiers. Bushwackers they called them. The army was halted and a company climbed up the mountain on the right of the road, and another company climbed up to the pass on the left and by the time they all got to the top, the Confederate company was going down the hill on the other side. But they ought not to call them bushwackers. The most of the battle of Droop Mountain was fought in the brush so thick that all of the movements of the troops engaged were obscured from view, and the issue of the battle hung on a hair.

You might travel the world over and not see as fine a scene as is to be obtained from the battle field of Droop Mountain. You see the mountains, the smiling plain, and the river. There above the clouds are to be seen in the latter part of the summer and early fall the famous cloud seas of the Alleghenies. Some time or other when West Virginia is willing to devote some small part of her time and earnings to history and her good name, the citizens of West Virginia will make here a park like that of Gettysburg, and other battle fields, and when they do they will have one that excels all of the rest in natural beauty and scenic value.

With the exception of Point Pleasant which has been thus honored there is no place in West Virginia more deserving the attention of her citizens.

CHAPTER III

Stephen Sewell in whose honor many places in West Virginia were named. See his cave by highway near Mill Point.

Word came that the road work at Stephen Hole Run on the Seneca Trail had destroyed the cave in which Stephen Sewell lived in the Indian days, so I hot-footed it down there to investigate the rumor and was delighted to find the cave was still there. The big limestone cliff a couple hundred feet high faces the State highway about three hundred yards distant. It is of the Big Lime or Greenbrier Limestone and many thousand tons have been blasted off the face of the cliff for use in surfacing the road.

The quarry is where the main spring issues and what gave rise to the report that the cave had been blasted out was that at the point the work had been going on the cliff overhung and formed a kind of shelter from a rain, but it in nowise filled the specifications as a den or habitation. It would be like living out of doors. The real cave is set high upon the cliff some two hundred yards south of the works, and it is safe for many years to come. It is not at all likely that it will ever be needed for road work.

Stephen's Hole, as it is called, overlooks the little valley and is a hole in the wall that encloses the whole of the upper part of the valley. It is in a similar position to Cluny's Cage, that Robert Louis Stephenson tells us about in "Kidnapped," which was the hiding place of Cluny MacPherson at the time he was outlawed for the part that he had taken in the war against Cromwell in favor of the exiled Stuart kings. It is in the top of a cliff and hid by the trees and timber.

Stephen Hole Run, or Sewell Run, as it was sometimes called, is a little spring branch crossing the highway a mile north of Mill Point. At this point the road to Huntersville branches off to the east and descends the little valley to Greenbrier River, where it crosses at the mouth of Beaver Creek, up which it goes. This was the old time near cut to Huntersville, in the days when it was the county seat, and the river was low enough to ford. Above the road the run has formed a bog of a few acres in extent, and the bold clear stream that issues from it is from everlasting springs and does not vary much in volume the year around. In the old days there was a well-founded belief that if horses afflicted by the scratches, an affection of the skin in the fetlock, were watered and their feet washed in this little stream that they would be cured, and it was the custom to bring horses there from the surrounding Levels community.

In the tourist day that is coming it will be the regular thing to halt the car at this point and the visitors will walk some three hundred yards and climb up the declivity that brings them near the top of the cliff and inspect the cave. It will also afford them the boon of the finest drinking water, as cool and clear as is to be obtained in this world of ours.

I have never seen a cave that was so well suited for a habitation as this one. On climbing to the level of the opening, first is found a smooth platform sort of place perhaps thirty by forty feet in size. Next is a great roof or portico which shelters a large portion of this terrace, with an out-curving roof perhaps ten feet high. Then in the wall is a room about six feet wide and ten feet deep, with a low ceiling. A fire across the opening would keep this little retreat comfortable in the coldest weather. Back of this room is an opening of unknown dimensions but extending well back into the cliff. It is very dark there and would not be suitable for living rooms but would be an ideal place to store food and supplies. The front room is fitted with a level floor, and being open to the outer air is in good condition now without a particle of fixing to afford a comfortable place to sleep and take shelter. No stream issues from this cave, and there is no current of air. It is an ideal place for camping and it is one of the sights of the county.

If you have occasion to visit it, follow the path up by an old abandoned sawdust heap. The place is on Dr. H. W. McNeel's farm, the top of the cliff being the dividing line between his farm and that of F. W. Ruckman. Perhaps if you go into the cliff you will be on the Ruckman land as well as the McNeel land.

As is the case of every man who has ever cleared and reclaimed land, I am something of a landscape gardener. As you drive through these pleasant valleys, you should remember that it was the man with the axe whose vision splendid and whole arises. So I see great possibilities in that little cave which has not been much more than a waste place so far. It has been talked of as a place to grow water cress, and there have been some slight efforts to transplant wild cranberries into the bog part of the shut in place. On every side is rich farm land, but the cove has been unused except for some indifferent pasture, which in a section so solidly bluegrass has not been much esteemed. With very little work there could be a little lake formed here of clear pure water. It would be surrounded by beautiful grassy shores and beetling crags would overlook it. There you would have grass, water, and a precipice in close harmony, and it would be one of the beauty spots of West Virginia. The highway would skirt one side of the park, and Sewell's everlasting house would look down on it. It would be just the right distance, eight miles, to make an attraction for the town of Marlinton, and it would be an objective for drives from Lewisburg, Ronceverte, White Sulphur Springs and Hot Springs, Virginia.

I have been weighing the somewhat slight evidence that has been left of the pioneer Sewell. He came here with Jacob Marlin in the seventeen-forties, both of them long hunters. I am now informed by competent authority, Hon. Boyd B. Stutler, the historian, that long hunter is not a synonym of a tall man, but was a term to distinguish the professional hunter, who crossed into the forbidden lands beyond the mountains for months' stay, as compared with those who took a week or so for the purpose of providing their winter meat.

He owes his fame like Marlin and every other notable to the fact that his name got into print and was preserved in that way. Owing to this fact he and Marlin have come to be first English settlers of the Mississippi Valley. Their permanent camp was where the town of Marlinton is located and where they were found by Gen. Andrew Lewis. Marlin survived the French and Indian war, and lived to the end of his life here. He married and had a daughter who married a Drinnin, and he has descendants here now.

Marlin and Sewell had the experience of men who are too closely associated. They quarreled and Sewell left the cabin and took up his abode in a hollow tree. The two places were separated by the crystal waters of Knapps Creek. Both the cabin and the tree dwelling were located in the narrow pass through which Knapps Creek breaks through to reach the Greenbrier River. This stream flows between two peaks or headlands marking the gateway to the great Knapps Creek Valley, one a spur of Buckley Mountain and the other a spur of Marlin Mountain. These peaks have never been given names, and it is now proposed to name them Mary and Elizabeth, after Elizabeth Dunlap, and Mary Vance Warwick.

The people of this county have specialized on the name of Marlin, and have allowed the people in a distant part of the State to use the name of Sewell. Thus Sewell is remembered by Big and Little Sewell mountains, Sewell Creek, Sewell Valley, the town of Sewell, and one of the measures of coal of the New River section, known as the Sewell seam.

It is the common belief based upon a tradition, that Stephen Sewell left Marlin here, and moved to Sewell Creek which flows into the Gauley River, and that he was there killed by the Indians. As a defender of traditions, I am sorry to say that I have come to the conclusion that Sewell never lived farther west than the cave at the run that bears his name in Pocahontas County, near Mill Point.

That he lived on the waters of Gauley is due to a statement prepared by Col. John Stuart, the grand old man of Greenbrier County, in the year 1798. And it is based on his report that Sewell moved forty miles farther west and lived on a creek that bears his name. It is not at all likely that Sewell lived on Gauley or any point west of the Greenbrier Valley prior to 1756. David Tygart had to leave the nearby valley of Tygart's Valley River in 1754, and he is undoubtedly the original settler west of the long intervening valley of the Greenbrier.

At the same time, it is probable that Sewell ranged widely and Sewell Creek could well have been named for him. But we have definite history of the time and place of his death. It occurred on the 11th day of September, 1756, on Jacksons River, near Fort Dinwiddie. In 1750, Dr. Thomas Walker, an explorer towards Kentucky, crossed the Greenbrier River at the mouth of Anthonys Creek and noted that he had word of white settlements higher up on that river. He referred to people living at or near the mouth of Knapps Creek.

The next year the Lewises were settling whites on the lands surveyed for the Greenbrier Company. The war clouds began to gather in 1753. France claimed all of the land drained by the Mississippi. In pursuance of this claim they commenced the erection of a fort at Pittsburgh. Governor Dinwiddie in 1753 sent George Washington with an ultimatum to the French to abandon their claim to Fort Duquesne, to which the French gave no heed. In 1754, Washington fought a losing campaign and reached some agreement with the French at a place called the Great Meadows or Fort Necessity, near Brownsville, Pennsylvania. Later in that year the Indians killed the Files family at Beverly, the first settlers to be massacred by the Indians in the French and Indian war. The next year the settlers on the frontier felt reasonably safe while Braddock was forming his army but even before his defeat in July, 1755, the Indians were killing on the Holston River and on the headwaters of New River. The first effect of Braddock's defeat in this section occurred just about a month after that time, when the Indians appeared at the mouth of Knapps Creek and killed twelve persons and took eight prisoners.

This raid ended the hostilities for the year 1755. But in February and March, 1756, they broke out again.

This was caused largely by the unfortunate expedition led by Gen. Andrew Lewis in the winter of 1755-56 against the Ohio Indians. He marched an army of 418 men clear across the State of West Virginia to strike the Indians in their towns on the Ohio. It is called the Sandy Creek Voyage. It resulted in disaster and the men suffered from want of food and from the cold weather. The survivors got back in March, 1756, but a good many of the party perished in the wilderness. There never was any way to tell whether they perished from want and exposure or whether the Indians killed them.

That was a bloody summer on the waters of New River and Roanoke River, but the settlements between here and Staunton were not disturbed until September, and the pioneers had gotten careless and caused the authorities a great deal of apprehension. It is certain that a big company of soldiers were garrisoned here in 1756, but must have been recalled before August 12th. It is likely that from that time on Fort Dinwiddie twenty-five miles from Marlinton, on Jacksons River, was the fort on which the settlers relied for protection.

The way I read the record is that about September 11th, Indians appeared in the territory protected by Fort Dinwiddie, which included what is now Pocahontas County, and that they raided the settlers for four days, the 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th, at which time they withdrew with their prisoners.

During that raid they killed twelve persons, wounded two, and carried off thirty-five prisoners. It is practically certain that these persons were killed and captured at their homes, for there is no evidence of any fight at the fort. In fact on September 11, 1756, when the Indians were engaged in killing the settlers in the Greenbrier Valley, the outskirts of the territory guarded by Fort Dinwiddie, the military officers of Augusta County were holding a court martial to excuse certain citizens from serving in the militia.

It is a fair conjecture that the Indians killed Stephen Sewell at his cave residence on Stephen Hole run. His home was in sight of the war road, and the raiding party would naturally come from the south, and by his hole in the wall. So passed Stephen Sewell. It is presumed that he was not married. He was from New England and had been in the Greenbrier Valley for perhaps ten years or some such time.

If he was not killed in Pocahontas County, he was killed in Bath County, on Jacksons River, but Col. William Preston who recorded his death laid all of the casualties of this raid on Jacksons River, though the chances are that the people were surprised in their homes some distance from the fort.

It was in this same raid that James Mayse was killed and his family taken prisoners. It is also known that when the Indians came back from the raid that they came down through the Narrows and by Marlinton, and that they were closely pursued by the militia of Augusta County; that the Indians were overtaken at this place, and that one of the first things the Indians did when they found they were being followed, was to kill a baby, and its body was found and buried near where the courthouse stands; that when the whites got to Marlin Ford that the Indians were just getting out of the ford and that they had a lot of horses with them; that after the firing the Indians fled towards the mouth of Indian Draft, and that a small boy by the name of Joseph Mayse, riding a horse, was pulled off by a grapevine, and the Indians were not able to harm him, and that he was carried back home, and became a very prominent and useful man.

So taking the rule that when a pioneer was killed by the Indians, and there were thousands of them so killed, the presumption is that he was killed at his own home, it is likely that Stephen Sewell was surprised some morning about daylight at his cavern as he stepped forth to greet the sunrise, and shot down, killed and scalped.

The measurements of Sewell's abode are as follows: The roofed terrace or portico, twenty-nine feet long by ten feet broad, with the projecting roof eight feet in the clear. The hall bed room in which he slept and which could be made snug and warm by hanging a bear skin as a front door, is thirteen feet deep, six feet six inches broad, and four feet and eight inches high over the part used for sleeping with an offset where the ceiling is seven feet eight inches high in a two-foot passage. The place is neat and dry and clean. Just how far back the passage extends which forms a rear room we do not know, but with a flashlight it was easy to see a high passage about two feet broad and very high winding back into the mountain.

Governor Dinwiddie had a fit when he heard of the great losses in the Indian raid of September, 1756. On the 30th day of September he wrote that he had ordered one-third of the Augusta militia out to protect the frontiers as well as militia from other counties, but they are such a dastardly set of people that he is convinced that they do not do their duty. They have neither courage, spirit, or conduct.

I have seen the date of the raid in which James Mayse was killed given as 1765, but this is an error caused by the transposition of figures. There was peace in Augusta County with the Indians from the year 1764 to the year of 1774; the date of Dunmore's War. It was during that period that so many persons moved into the Greenbrier Valley that there were enough to form a county in the year 1777, and that is conclusive proof of the peace that this valley enjoyed after Bouquet's treaty, until the breaking out of the war over the surveying parties sent out in the early part of the year 1774.

There is not much known about Stephen Sewell's life and character. The subject is one that historians have dodged and if they have mentioned him at all it is only for a few words. For a man who has left his name on so many important places in West Virginia, it is strange that some effort has not been made to make him a well known hero. It is well established that he lived at two places in the Greenbrier Valley, but it is doubtful whether he ever lived farther west, when we consider the date of his settlement here, and the date and manner of his death. Walter Kelly, killed by the Indians in 1774, at Kellys Creek, is probably the first settler of that part of the Kanawha Valley. He had been there at least a year before he was killed. There is no reason for believing that there was a settler in central West Virginia as early as 1756. And if he had been he would not have been killed in a raid on the Fort Dinwiddie settlers. You can take your choice between a stream eight miles west of Marlinton and the other eighty miles west.

CHAPTER IV

Flint Pits at Mill Point. Here General R. E. Lee camped in 1861.

Being in need of a gun flint, it occurred to me that perhaps Barlow & Moore, at Edray, carried them in stock and I phoned to the store. The young lady who answered the phone, hearing that I wanted a gun flint referred it to the proprietor. A. R. Gay is the Barlow & Moore of this generation, trading and doing business under the old name. He assured me that he could supply the demand and sent me down a gun flint, once a staple article of commerce in these parts but not active for the past hundred years.

The Times office has an old flintlock gun with the date, 1742, carved on the stock. It is in perfect condition. When the hammer falls it falls with great force. It gives a blow like a carpenter driving a tenpenny nail. They do not make such hammers these days. It falls like a thunder bolt. The flint is the tip end of the hammer and it hits a steel elbow which is thrown forward by the force of the falling hammer and a spark is produced by the same motion that uncovers the powder pan. They gave way to the percussion cap, invented in 1820. The flintlock won the war of the Revolution. But I doubt very much that a gun flint could be procured in any store in the United States other than Barlow & Moore at Edray. It is the same store where I bought a set of frizens.

I have never seen a flintlock gun fired and I do not propose to carry the experiment that far, but it was a great weapon in its day. I wonder if the gunsmiths ever made their flints here? I imagine not, for they were cheap. A flint maker was called a knapper and one workman could turn out about three thousand in a day. For something like fifty years after the use of the flintlock had ceased in England and America, the gun flint continued in trade, large quantities being sold in Africa and in the eastern countries which continued to use the device for discharging the gun.

Flint is very plentiful in this valley but it is not in demand. Our flint quarries or flint pits have not been worked for several hundred years.

The flint that is found here is a very superior quality and is found in conjunction with limestone. The nodules have the elegant local name of nigger-heads. The geologists do not agree as to the way that flint is formed and that gives to us that follow the loose trade of writing a chance to get in some fine work in the way of conjecture. I think it is the same process that forms the fossil. Let us deduce a few things. Focile is the French for flint. When the flintlock was adopted in France they called the arm a fusil and that became English language meaning a gun. And by the same easy deduction our other word fossil. A fossil is formed by animal or vegetable matter decaying and leaving in the mud a cavity mold. The mud hardens into rock and the cavity remains. Then through the pores of the stone the hardest and most minute particles of silicon work their way and fill the cavity and form the fossil and this stone so formed is the hardest kind of stone.

Limestone was formed under the sea, a comparatively soft and porous stone. Cavities were left and these fill with fine particles of silicon, or call it sand for short, for silicon next to oxygen is the most plentiful constituent in the earth's crust.

But us scientific boys are hard to follow, but if you have come this far, please bear with me for a few more minutes, and then take your little hammer and begin to knock on the nearest nigger-head to your house.

This limestone as it forms develops cavities. In this section they seem to have ranged generally in size from that large enough to contain a cocoanut to that of a hen's egg. That is the size of the best quality of flint. Those very large nigger-heads are apt to have streaks through them.

These cavities being left in the limestone, and nature having millions of years to do it in, and abhoring a vacuum, proceeded to fill it up with filtered sand. It can well be seen that those particles that made their way through many feet of limestone, those resolute atoms, would form a stone of hardness next to that of the diamond.

Now take the next process. Limestone erodes and mingles with the dust. Thus limestone soils are the most fertile. The soil is formed. Many feet deep in places. Rich garden spots in limestone regions. But the flint would not yield to the dissolving process. It would last millions of years after the limestone was gone. But in the rich soil these nodules would lie like raisins in a loaf of bread or even form a layer at a certain depth as if the raisins had sunk to the bottom. And the primitive man like the American Indian to whom gold was nothing, would seize a good big nodule with all the joy of a California placer miner finding a nugget of gold.

How men change! The farmer quarrying lime for his kiln will toss into the discard the precious flint and use the softer limestone.

The other day a party of us went to the flint pits and observed the work of the Indians and the work of the palefaces in the same field. Around the recent working were found large numbers of the pear-shaped nodules. They were covered with a dirt-colored husk, but under this husk was a solid mass of black flint that flaked off under the hammer.

There is something peculiar about the fire in flint. It is the home of the fire. The spark that is produced has real fuel qualities. It is fire itself and lasts a perceptible length of time, not a glow but a burning fire.

When the nugget is first flaked off it is of a very dark color, has a certain amount of moisture and is easier worked than after it has been exposed to the air.

This flaking process is a work that the ancients were skilled in and it meant arms, and tools, and weapons to them. One day when I was experimenting with the freshly opened mass of flint, I took a bone stylus formed from the handle of a toothbrush and shaped out an arrowhead in a few minutes. It was not much of an arrowhead, but if it is ever picked up from the soil it will pass for one for it has the serrated edge from the conchoidal fractures occasioned by the pressure. But I have a more wonderful thing to tell. The flint flaked, and split, and fractured into all shapes and sizes, and I picked up a bit about as big as a silver dollar, nearly square, on one edge, thick as the back of a knife blade and on the opposite edge as thin as the cutting edge of a knife blade.

I said to Parson Cleveland, who was researching with me: "I believe I can shave with this piece!" And so said, so done. I shaved a place on my wrist with a good deal of success. It did not pull but cut the hairs very cleanly and nicely. It can be said that it shaved better than a knife and not so good as a razor. If you do not believe me, ask the parson, or better still, try it yourself.

Then I got the vision of what it meant to the primitive man to have flint. It must have been the highest form of wealth. In the Appalachian Mountains, it would be flint. In the Rocky Mountains, obsidian, volcanic glass. In other parts of the country, perhaps, it was jasper, hornstone, agate, bloodstone, or onyx, but wherever it was used it was one of the chalcedonic group to which flint belongs. But hold on, cut out obsidian from the chalcedony, for obsidian is formed by heat like modern glass.

To the Indian, gold was trash. It was too soft. He had no use for it. He had no iron. Though strange to say the eastern Indians had found out that iron pyrites and flint would make fire, and they used in some places what was the equivalent to flint and steel and tinder box.

To get edged tools that could be used as weapons, as knives, and as augers, it was necessary to get flint, and if you lived far away from the limestone ledges, then expeditions had to be made to go after flint, or it would have to come to the tribe in the course of trade. The Indians down about the mouth of the James made beads out of sea shells, and this was wampum or money. With it they could trade for flaked flint from the limestone country at the head of the river. And in Crabbottom, at the head of the James River and the head of the Potomac River (and they both head on the same farm) are extensive flint pits from which many a ton of flint has been carried away.

Indians did not wear beards as a rule. They were not afflicted with hair on the face to the extent of the palefaces, and to see an Indian with whiskers was as rare as a day in June. But at the same time without the flint cutting edge the Indians would have presented a hairy appearance. They also shaved the skull, leaving the scalp lock for the benefit of anybody that would take it. And every Indian carried a knife. If he did not have a knife. how could he dress a deer, or do any of the many things about the camp requiring this universal tool? He might bite off the scalp lock as was sometimes done when the warrior was entitled to a scalp and had mislaid or lost his knife. We all find these knives constantly lying around on the fresh plowed field and call them spearheads. All bosh! Who would be caught carrying a spear through the thick brush in this country? Those are knives. And sometimes those knives were worked with such art that they were worth as much in the Indian nations as the fine diamonds are in our nation, and with a great deal more reason. I have seen these knives in the great collections like the Smithsonian that show like fine jewels, and one can well believe that they constituted wealth to the savage possessor.

The gimlet was a common instrument from flint. The gimlets are picked up constantly. The handles in all cases were wood attached to the flint blades by rawhide put on wet and which bound it like iron when it had dried.

The Indians were no mean surgeons, and there are many instances of trephining brought to light by the finding of skulls that have been preserved. In the days of the war club one of the dangers of life was a broken head, and if a gent got a blow on the head that dinged it in, he suffered from pressure on the brain, and he lay unconscious and at the door of death unless the pressure could be relieved. Then came the medicine man and with a sharp bit of flint he uncovered the skull. Then with another bit of flint, he cut through the skull and made a circle and lifted out a bit of the skull about as big as a half-dollar, and cleansed the wound, and sewed the scalp together, and the patient woke up and got well. If I remember the treatise right, there was one skull found in South America which showed that at three different periods in life the patient had been trephined for head injuries. It was apparent that he had continued to fight and get knocked on the head and to undergo operations. As the bone grows and has a tendency to close, it was apparent that the three injuries were the result of three battles separated by years, as shown by the growth of bone.

Catlin says that the Indians used a bone punch to shape the flints and other historians agree that bone was used for the shaping of arrowheads and knives and other manufactured articles. Historians seem to agree, too, that the mountain Indians living in a region where flint abounded, manufactured large quantities of flint weapons and tools and traded them to the Indians on the seacoast for wampum and shell.

By far the most common form is the arrowhead. It was in constant use and most easily lost. And as the color of the chalcedony varies in the different parts of the country it is interesting to note in finding these arrowheads what part of the country they had been carried from by the human being who last used them.

I have made two visits to the flint quarries or flint pits on Stamping Creek, near Mill Point. These workings are in sight of the State highway known as the Seneca Trail on Tom Beard's land and about a half a mile back of his residence, in a fine blue grass pasture. There must be several hundred of the pits. I tried to count them but I lost my notch stick pretty soon, and wherever I went I found a new set of them.

The most remarkable is that part of the range that has been called the Rich Garden for the past hundred or so years. It is pasture land now, but Uncle William Beard farmed it for a number of years. It is a depression in the hills and a little stream sinks out of sight in the lowest part of it. Though the land has been plowed many times the pits are plain to be seen. At first sight it looks like a place that had been a village where houses had been set close together, walls touching, and under each house there had been a cellar. This little hollow in the hills owes its great fertility to the disintegration of the limestone, and there can be little doubt but that a large number of boulders, or flint nodules were deposited there and that the Indians worked the land to the depth of some ten to twenty feet to get the deposit of flint.

Near by are piles of round river sandstone or hammer stones and the books say that near these flint quarries these hammer stones or nutcrackers are invariably found. M. D. Dunlap used to live on Stamping Creek and he used to tell us that these hammer stones were to be found in great quantities there.

Here was Pocahontas County's oldest industry. Here the red men came from the far countries with their spades made from the antlers of deer, elk, and moose, and staked their claims and worked them and carried back to the flint workers the precious nodules secured by the expedition.

One who knows the geological formation of the State of West Virginia would read the sign as follows. The tidewater Indians would obtain their supply of flint from the quarries in the limestone country east of the Allegheny range, such as are to be found in Crab Bottom. It is not likely that they would seek their treasures as far west as the Big Lime of the Greenbrier Valley though freight tariffs and differentials in the shape of wars and treaties might throw the trade to the Greenbrier Valley instead of to the Valley of Virginia.

It is more likely that the northwest Indians from the counties as far as Ohio and Marshall would find it convenient to send their young men in the country of the Big Lime to get flint.

This seems remarkable that Indians would travel some two hundred miles for flint when they were within two thousand feet of the Big Lime at home, but this is explained that it was two thousand feet straight down in the ground and that they had to follow the streams on the surface of the earth until they found a place where it was within digging distance.

Let us go back to the scientific section again. Indians had no iron. They had a little copper in some distant parts of the country. None here. Some think that they knew how to temper copper until it was like steel. I do not think so. It does not lend itself to that. If it did it would not be copper.

For cutting tools, and general use, they depended upon flint. If they had had glass, it would have supplanted flint to some extent, but they did not have that. So they had to have flint. At the same time that they used flint for the every day wants of the farm, and house, and the weapons, they had another set of tools used, referred to as axes. These were used for flaking the flint in the first instance and reducing the nodules to many fragments.

We have a number of these axes or celts. They are made out of greenstone or diorite, an igneous rock formed by great heat. Volcanic origin. The edge was formed by grinding and the stuff is hard. They are generally called tomahawks, and that is an abused work like spearhead. Tomahawks were war clubs and nearly always made out of wood. Something after the order of a croquet mallet. The axes were used to reduce the flint to fragments.

The importance to the Indian nations of a flint supply can be gathered from an account of a meeting of the common council of the Powhatan Confederacy in the year 1609.

There were present chiefs from the thirty tribes ruled over by Powhatan, principal chief, and King of Virginia by appointment of his royal highness, James I, of England. My grandfather Powhatan was presiding, wearing his crown of good English gold, but I am not so sure that he had any pants on. Probably not. The question of the army and navy bill was being considered and it appeared from the report of the monitor of the flint warehouses that the supply of flint was running low, the main reason being that the Delaware nation who controlled the Crab Bottom flint pits had refused to accept the legal ration of three feet of wampum for one back load of flint, and were demanding four feet of wampum. No flint had been delivered for some months and the customary expeditions had not been set out because of the movement to put up the price of a prime necessity.

Thereupon the gentleman for Pamunkey arose and said that he desired to offer a resolution, that whereas, the Erie nation produced a high quality of flint from their pits in the Little Levels, and that by going by the southern route it was no farther than the Crab Bottom pits, and whereas unlimited loads of flint were offered at the legal rate, be it resolved that the Delawares be told to go to thunder, and hereafter that flint of standard weight and fineness be procured from the Eries, in the Little Levels. Carried with a whoop.

To see the flint pit of Pocahontas, get permission from Tom Beard to tread down his grass, go into the Stamping Creek gateway road, circle the high grassy knoll and there you are. It is a beautiful place, and the workings are well defined and easily identified.

CHAPTER V

Marlins Bottom ancient name for Marlinton. Before the railroad was built.

In 1751, Gen. Andrew Lewis came to Marlins Bottom and found Jacob Marlin and Stephen Sewell abiding here without families. One had the cabin and the other had a hollow sycamore tree. They were more comfortable apart. During the long hard winter they had tired of the close association and had separated. Lewis came here on the first day of April. He and others with him were working out a scheme to get a foothold in the Greenbrier Valley, on the Indian reservation. The choice places on the Shenandoah, the James and the Potomac rivers had been taken up. Old Virginia was getting crowded. It was an ancient and honorable colony looking back proudly upon its record of progress for one hundred and forty-three years. The white man when it comes to owning land has a modest desire only to own the land adjoining his'n. That is all he wants, and what he wants he takes, and justifies himself after the event. The people east of the Great Divide, especially those who attended court at Staunton, knew about the rich lands west of the mountain. They hunted in the forbidden lands. Men wanted for legal offenses found safe refuge beyond the border. And the general spirit of unrest and expansion forced them over the crest of the mountains.

When land was so plentiful in the old days, the custom was established of allowing the settler to take public lands by the acre and to allow him to lay it off in any shape he desired, and the desired location. The Virginia surveys present crazy quilt effect, and even today there are vacant lands that have never been taken, and they are called Waste and Unappropriated.

That word appropriated is a pretty good word for the plan of acquiring land on the western waters. At Marlins Bottom there were six or seven hundred acres of level land formed by the Greenbrier River and the streams that enter the river at this point. Andrew Lewis had the first go at it. Jacob Marlin and Stephen Sewell belonged to the Daniel Boone type that did not bother to take title to the land they lived upon.

So Andrew Lewis took first choice and he surveyed a boundary containing 480 acres, and went away and left it to ripen into a grant. This survey was respected and the settlers that stole silently into the pleasant valley made their homesteads on Stony Creek and the waters of Price Run, just outside of the 480 Lewis Survey, but it is on the Lewis Survey that most of the thriving town of Marlinton is built, on the oldest and best title in West Virginia, as the saying is.

Gen. Andrew Lewis set his compass on top of the leading ridge that runs down from the point just back of the courthouse towards Pine Crest. At one place this ridge gets so low that Knapps Creek laps the top of it in its highest flood stage but has not quite broken across it. From that point he ran towards Huntersville to take in a fine terrace known as the Hamilton field and then a short line of 22 poles towards Marlin Run. Then a line of 112 poles, about a third of a mile, crossing Marlin Run to the two oaks at the point of the hill, one still standing, widely known as King George's Oak, the Charter Oak, Member of American Hall of Fame for Trees, and the Corner Tree and so forth. Then he went north on the side of the hill about five rods above the edge of the bottom, to a point up towards the coal tipple, on the upper end of the tannery holdings, or as we called it when I was a boy, the Ingen Patch. Then he crossed to the west bank of Greenbrier River with a line 40 rods long. Then with the river to the mouth of Stony Creek 136 rods. Then to the west to the foot of the hill just about where the Warwick road leaves the turnpike, then with the foot of the mountain turning back in a southerly direction to the river at the island, and then with the river by the county bridge, the mouth of Knapps Creek to a point at the lower end of the McLaughlin or McClintic bottom, the corner of the town of Marlinton, and then across the end of the bottom to the foothill at the C. & O. Railway, and then a straight line through the low place in the ridge to the beginning point.

Lewis and others had a plan to colonize this valley under the name of the Greenbrier Company and that partly succeeded. But the king got suspicious of a description of land that lay north and west of the Cowpasture River. According to his view it should have been limited to the Allegheny for its western boundary. In the meantime a lot of us came in here the next four years and stirred up trouble with the Indians and started the French and Indian war. After they had defeated Braddock, the Indians raided this community at Marlins Bottom and killed and captured eighteen persons. That was August 12, 1755. Lewis had been here in a kind of a fort called Fort Greenbrier just before and after the date of Braddock's defeat, but he had taken some Indian prisoners at this place and marched them to Fort Dinwiddie on the eastern side of the Allegheny.

The king fought all efforts to settle the western waters for thirty years. And the Indians raided, and fought, and slew and tortured the palefaces without cessation, but they could not keep back the constant and increasing tide of white men who broke across the barrier, as Roosevelt describes with so much detail in his "Winning of the West."

Lewis made at least four military campaigns in that time on the western waters. Braddock's war, the Sandy Creek Voyage, the capture of Fort Duquesne, and Dunmore's war.

Finally four years after Virginia had become an independent state, and called herself the Commonwealth of Virginia, Lewis got his deed. Thomas Jefferson, Governor, reciting that Lewis had made composition with the commonwealth by the paying of two pounds and two shillings, he was given a grant or deed for 480 acres of land at the mouth of Ewings Creek by virture of a survey made on the 11th day of October, 1751. That was on the 2nd day of June, 1780, and students of history will observe that the Revolution had been about won by that time and that American land hungry people were eating a little further back on the hog. Thousands of these surveys and settlements that the king had refused to grant, were perfected in a wholesale way by Thomas Jefferson as governor. And right there and then he got the idea which he afterwards carried into effect as President of the United States of selling all public lands by squares and sections, and not according to the irregular sides occasioned by the idiosyncrasies of the land-looker.

Andrew Lewis was a general in the Revolution. He was much honored and respected. A tall commanding figure of a man. As the Indian chief said he shook the ground when he walked. He departed this life in 1782, leaving a will by which he devised a great many tracts of land to his children.

The 480 acres on both sides of Greenbrier River at the mouth of Ewings Creek he willed to his son, John Lewis.

John Lewis died the next year, 1783, leaving the 480 acres to four of his children: Andrew, Charles, Samuel, and Eliza. Eliza conveys her interest to Samuel.

Samuel, Andrew, and Charles Lewis sign a title bond to Jacob Warwick, my great, great grandfather. He assigns the title bond to my great grandfather William Poage, junior.

William Poage had in addition to this tract, adjacent land sufficient to make up something like two thousand acres and he cleared and established a large farm at this place. He was one of the charter members of the court that formed Pocahontas County and was sheriff of the county. He was a very large, heavy, fat man, a jovial disposition, and very popular. His father was William Poage, senior, who lived in the Levels and who survived his son. His father was John Poage of Augusta who was a member of the first legislature of Virginia, after the date of the Declaration of Independence, and his father was Robert Poage, the immigrant, who could claim to belong to the aristocracy of Augusta County, by reason of having paid his passage money in advance.

William Poage, Senior, was in Dunmore's war and in the war of the Revolution. William Poage, Junior, was a major of the war of 1812. In 1827, there was a celebration at his plantation and there was a kind of a banquet. Anyway, there was a good deal of drinking. One of the party had a great idea to propose the toast to Major Poage congratulating him that it was his forty-fifth birthday, and that from that time forth he would not be liable to be called upon for military service. This was drunk with great zest and Major Poage got up from the table and walked toward the barn. He stepped on a corncob which caused him to fall heavily and he so injured himself by the fall that he died.

His first wife was Nancy, one of the daughters of Jacob Warwick. From this marriage there were four daughters and one son. Rachel married Josiah Beard. Sally married Alexander McChesney. Mary married first Robert Beale and afterwards H. M. Moffett. Margaret married James A. Price. The son, Col. Woods Poage, married Julia Callison. My great grandmother Nancy married for her first husband, Thomas Gatewood, and they lived at Marlins Bottom. One son, Andrew Gatewood, was born. He got the Glade Hill farm at Dunmore for his share at Marlins Bottom. His wife was Sally Moffett. Their daughter, Hannah, was John W. Warwick's first wife. Their only child was Mrs. Sally Ligon.

William Poage, Junior, after the death of his first wife married for his second wife, Polly Blair, who survived him as a young widow, without children. For her second husband she married Big-foot Wallace, one of the heroic figures in the history of Texas, a contemporary of Sam Houston, the president of that republic, and one of the founders of that State.

William Poage, Junior, had a number of slaves, one of them was the late Wesley Brown, who departed this life some years ago aged near a hundred. The Poages imported an iron cook stove and set it up as an improvement on the open hearth process. A number of neighbors had come in to see how the invention worked. Wes, the slave boy, had gathered a lot of buckeyes and put them in the stove. When the stove was well fired up it exploded with a great noise and was a total wreck. Wes said that he took to the water birch coverts along the river and hid himself away all day.

Major Poage made a will leaving the Marlins Bottom lands undivided, one-half to Woods Poage and one-half to Margaret D. Price, both infants. Soon after their inheritance came into effect, Josiah Beard as next friend instituted a suit to enforce the title bond and possession and the papers were drafted by an excellent lawyer by the name of Reynolds. The court decreed a deed and William Carey executed it. Then a short time after that the land was divided between my grandmother Price and Woods Poage, my grandmother getting all the lands west of the river and all the land north of Main Street as now located and twenty acres south of that street. The road used to run through a lane across the bottom to a ford in the river at the mouth of Price Run, and the present location is due to the bridge that was built in 1851 at the end of Main Street.

The next move in the title was that Woods Poage sold to my grandfather, James A. Price, his half of the lands, and this gave the Prices 2,211 acres holding in and around Marlins Bottom. My grandmother would never part with an acre of her land and in that way she maintained her position as a woman of property all her life, and showed her wisdom. She had a theory about land that has been remembered to this day, and that is that there was not an acre of worthless land—that every acre was valuable for some purpose or other. My grandfather disposed of his Marlins Bottom tract, the Woods Poage farm, to Dr. George B. Moffett, a well beloved county physician. Dr. Moffett had married Margaret Elizabeth Beale, the daughter of Mary Vance Poage by her first marriage. Dr. Moffett had lived at Huntersville; then at Marlins Bottom; then at Hillsboro. His last years were spent at Parkersburg.

It was at Marlins Bottom that James A. Moffett, son of Dr. Moffett was born. James A. Moffett in after years became the president of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, and was president of that company at the time it had its famous hearing before Judge Landis, when he imposed a fine of twenty-nine million dollars. This decision was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, but the Standard had to fee some lawyers of renown and I have heard that the compensation was considerable. There is not a shadow of a doubt that James A. Moffett was born here at Marlinton. He said so himself and I have stood with him on the site of the ancient house on lower Camden Avenue. And my father had a distinct recollection of the day that James A. Moffett was born, and remembered wading the river to see the new baby.

The only time that the Lewis title was ever questioned or attacked was in 1828, when Margaret Tharp laid a survey for a patent of 165 acres on Still House Run and Greenbrier River, at Stillwell. This took in the Joshua Kee bottom, and interlocked with the extreme southern end of the Lewis survey of 480 acres, involving a part of that bottom, some twenty or thirty acres, perhaps. Alex Lamb got his title or went into possession of it and my grandfather Price brought a suit in ejectment against him, under the quaint old rule of using fictitious names. The suit was styled Peter Fairface versus Jonathan Badtitle. Grandpa was Peter Fairface and Alex Lamb was Jonathan Badtitle. Lamb lived on the Jericho place afterwards with my grandfather so I suppose the suit did not destroy the friendship between them. Josias Shanklin, county surveyor of Greenbrier County, was sent to make the surveys, and he established the Lewis lines. There was very little variation of the needle for that survey was made so long before the date of the true meridian that one movement of the magnetic pole offset the contrary movement beginning in 1810, if you know what I mean. If not look it up, as I do not have time to stop and explain.

Shanklin was considerable of a surveyor. He constantly refers to Knapps Creek once called Ewings Creek. As a matter of fact he gets the name wrong after all, for it was changed from Ewings Creek to Knapps Creek in honor of a settler by the name of Napthalium Gregory and it should be Naps Creek. You might as well write Knapoleon.

The jury found for the plaintiff and the title of Lewis was confirmed. It has always been a matter of satisfaction to the people here that when they started in to build a fine city on the banks of the river and in the hollow of the hills, that they had the oldest and best title in the Mississippi Valley to offer to the investor.

Dr. Geo. B. Moffett in his turn sold the southern half of the survey and the surrounding tracts to Hugh McLaughlin, Esquire, and that is the way the McLaughlin family came here.

When the town site was proposed in 1891, as the last of the Virginia boom towns, the title was in Wm. H. McClintic, Wm. J. McLaughlin estate, A. M. McLaughlin, S. D. Price, Wm. T. Price, James H. Price and Levi Gay.

These were all farms. There was no commercial activity whatever. Huntersville was town to us. Edray and Buckeye were the nearest stores. We had a one-room school. In the eighties we formed a debating society to meet once a week. There is where the Rev. Dr. H. W. McLaughlin, one of the great orators of the South, made his first attempt at public speaking, and showed some signs of stage fright. Uncle Sam Price was the moving genius in the forum. We debated one night in the eighties: "Resolved that the county seat should be moved from Huntersville to Marlinton." It was a one-sided, unilateral discussion, no one taking the negative. At Uncle Sam's suggestion I sent the topic and the news of the meeting to the Pocahontas Times, then published at Huntersville. The proposition was treated with silent contempt, but as has been remarked so often, many a true word is spoken from the chest. Within five years the voters of the county had moved the county seat from Huntersville to Marlinton, where the Prices and the McLaughlins had lived so long in the swamps that they had become webfooted according to a canard of that election.

In the beginning, and down to recent years, Marlins Bottom where the waters meet was a great place for game and fish. The contour of the country threw great numbers of deer into the runways here. Windblown sea gulls settled and all kinds of wild geese and ducks. Bear and panthers have been seen here in the memory of Henry Cleek, who is visting back from Florida. He was kind of raised at the old Price place.

He went one morning to feed the horses early, and his attention was attracted to the baying of hounds. Grabbing a mountain rifle, he went to the river and found in the river near the end of Twelfth Street, a big buck deer bayed. He shot it in the head and knocked it down. Putting down his rifle he waded in and was about to bleed it, when the buck came to life, and attacked him. The boy was able to fight his way to the bank where he was treed in a clump of water birches opposite F. R. Hunter's and C. J. Richardson's residences. And the buck walked about those trees for more than an hour with fire in his eyes, until old man James Henry Price came silently along the rail fence and shot the buck and killed it.

It was not by accident that Marlinton became the metropolis of the Tenth Senatorial District. There are only two low gaps in the great Allegheny, one the Rider Gap, and the other the Frost Gap, and both of them lead into the Narrows, as the Northwest Passage just east of Huntersville was called by General Andrew Lewis. And all the waters from these gaps lead to the Greenbrier River, the first large stream to be reached after crossing the divide.

There is a tradition, which is as worthy of belief as any of the traditions, concerning the Knights of the Golden Horseshoe, and that is that this is the farthest west reached by Governor Alexander Spotswood, in his expedition west in the year 1716. The trophy that he gave to every member of that expedition bore this inscription: Sic juvat transcendere montes. (This he swears to cross the mountains.) I think he actually crossed the mountains, and not the Blue Ridge only.

CHAPTER VI

One of the Able McLaughlins from the Country of the Seneca Trail.

One fine day I returned from a tour in West Virginia, having addressed eighteen county teacher's institutes from the pawpaw to the pine. I came home a physical wreck caused, as I verily believe, by my efforts to keep up the heads and the eyes open of thousands and thousands of teachers, with my naked and perspiring soul. Mentally speaking it is a good deal like driving a swarm of bees across the plains and never losing a bee.

I felt too sick to prepare an article, but in a past winter's day I had prepared a sketch of "An Able McLaughlin" for the West Virginia Review which I intended to submit to mine own people through the Pocahontas Times:

Some years ago I was in New York just after the book of the year, "The Able McLaughlins" came out. We Pocahontas County people seized it sooner perhaps than the average reader because it described our clan of that name so well. In the big city in the marble halls one day I was in society up to the saddle girth and acting as pretty as I knew how. I was introduced to a beautiful lady, a Miss McLaughlin. "Ah," I said, archly waving my little finger, "One of the Able McLaughlins?" "No," replied the lady, "Adam McLaughlins." "Ho," I said, "From the Cow Pasture country!" And it was even so. The world is a small place, ain't it? Way up there above the Mason and Dixon, I met a girl from home. Adam McLaughlin and I were boys together.

This assignment is about another Able McLaughlin, one of the big preachers of the country, Rev. H. W. McLaughlin, D. D., Superintendent of the Country Life Department of the Presbyterian Church, recently established by the General Assembly.

Dr. McLaughlin was born at Marlins Bottom, now Marlinton, in the year 1869. He was the oldest child of A. M. McLaughlin and Mary Price McLaughlin. He received some desultory instruction in the free schools. There was a one-room schoolhouse and a four months' school term. He got some inkling of the classics from his uncle, Rev. Dr. Wm. T. Price, who lived on the adjoining farm. When he was nineteen years old he was inducted into college life at Hampden-Sydney College, where he speedily developed into a brilliant student and graduated as an honor man in 1893. Having been chosen for the ministry, he followed his college course with the customary three years at the Union Theological Seminary.

His first work was in Fayette County, West Virginia. He was then pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Hampton, Virginia, during the Spanish-American War. Here he worked with Dr. Calvin Dewitt among the sick and wounded soldiers at Old Point Comfort, which marked a practical beginning of Red Cross work among soldiers. He then became pastor of Liberty and Baxter Churches in Pocahontas County, West Virginia. In 1902, he was abroad making a tour of the Holy Land, the Mediterranean countries, and England. Then he became pastor of the Stuart Robinson Memorial Church in Louisville, Kentucky, where he remained for six and a half year. While here he became associated with Alice Hegan Rice, author of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," in carrying on the philanthropic work of the Cabbage Patch Settlement House at Louisville.

He then became pastor of the New Providence Presbyterian Church of Rockbridge County, Virginia, and served as such until the year 1925, when he became the head of one of the departments of the General Assembly. The New Providence Church is a famous institution in the annals of the Scotch-Irish in America. It is the largest Presbyterian Church in the open country in Virginia. It was organized in 1746. It is the principal source of the educational impulse which has resulted in that great institution of learning, Washington and Lee University.

Dr. McLaughlin was married August 31, 1897, to Miss Nellie Swann Brown, seventh daughter of Rev. J. C. Brown, of Malden, West Virginia, and granddaughter of Rev. James M. Brown, once pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Charleston, West Virginia, and a great granddaughter of Rev. Samuel Brown and Mary Moore, the Captive of Abb's Valley. To this union were born nine children, all of whom take to learning as ducks do to the water, who are ornaments to the various institutions of higher education where they have been students. Rev. Samuel Brown was in his life time for a long period pastor of the New Providence Church.

I have got tired writing these statistics and with your permission I am going to wander around for awhile. I would like to bring up the question of how much luck has to do with the lives of successful men. In this case we are discussing a man who picked out for himself the best of fathers and the best of mothers, the best of wives, and the best children. How could it be otherwise, that everything that he did should prosper? But a discussion of that sort of force leads into ways that we know not, and we will not dwell on it. One thing is certain, that something must have been done in his connection that pleased the Lord, for this cousin of mine has been granted a full and satisfactory life and he has not reached the zenith of it.

Great men come from the mountains, and it looks sometimes like it was absolutely necessary for the germ of greatness to find fertile soil, that the subject must be placed in a one-room school in the country.

Let me quote from an article by Dr. McLaughlin, in the "The Biblical Review":

"On the eighth of June as I was passing through Charlottesville, the university town of Virginia, I met my friend the county agent. He introduced me to the teacher of the Men's Bible Class of the leading Baptist Church, who said: 'Yesterday I had an interesting experience. I had seventy-four men present and took a census to find out from whence they had come. Sixty-nine of the seventy-four had been born in the country'."

Forty years ago the McLaughlins lived on one side of Greenbrier River and their land came down to the river on the east side. The farm we lived on, that is the family of Rev. Dr. William T. Price, my father, came down to the other side. The houses were about a mile apart across the bottoms, and when the river got very high the waters extended from one house to the other. The generation before, Henry's father, Andrew M. McLaughlin, had married Mary Price, my aunt, the result of a boy and girl courtship, lasting during the Civil War, when our community seemed to be continually on the firing line. The Greenbrier bridge at this place seemed to be the local Mason and Dixon line within the county.

Andy McLaughlin, when I first remember, was the prosperous farmer of the county. He was a powerful man and a great manager of men. I worked for him a lot myself and I remember his faculty of getting the greatest amount of work out of his men and making them like it. At that time the community of Marlinton did not have even a store. It was forty-six miles from the railroad. The streams were pure and the boundless continuities of shade covered the land. We used to say that Pocahontas County was the pearl of the Alleghenies, where the men were all true, the women were beautiful, and the fishing was the finest in the world. As a fact we did not know our luck. We hankered after railroads and cities and towns and thought we were shut in. We did not realize that there was a lot of sin and misery shut out.

There were three of us boys about the same age. My brother who is now Dr. J. W. Price, Henry McLaughlin and myself. We were workers in the fields and made a pass at doing all kinds of work. Henry excelled in caring for sheep and he was lucky with them, and any man that can bring sheep to fruition has untold wealth in that quality. We three boys turned our thoughts to matters of public importance. I know that we did not consider ourselves young or immature. We had access to books and periodicals, and we passed on matters that occurred throughout the world with a good deal more thoroughness than any of us do now. We come from a reading stock of people and it was not remarkable that reading being the only connection that we had with the rest of the world that we were readers, and that is why we had the world at our feet.

I think it must have been an unusual one-room school that we all attended, for I counted up the score the other day and out of twenty-eight children, twelve of us had broken into the professions.

The imagery of the Bible likens the work of the pastor with that of the shepherd and those words are interchangeable in the English, German and romance languages. Henry McLaughlin who, as a young boy, knew everyone of three or four hundred sheep by their faces, has never gotten far away from the care of live stock. He owns the Maxwelton farm, out of Lewisburg, and is known all over the world as a breeder of polled shorthorns and Hampshire sheep. He is equally at home in the pulpit and in the bull-pen. He sits with the righteous and the just in the highest church courts and chancelleries. Makes a quick change and appears at the Chicago live stock occasions and talks the language of the breeders.

The McLaughlin home was a big rambling farmhouse by the road. It had been built in three parts, the additions coming as required and there was a lot of porch room. It was a great stopping place for travelers passing on the long roads in the mountains. They would make it suit to stop over night there. There was plenty of room. The barns and stables were commodious. And the long dining table was full every meal. Not the least of our resources in those days was the fine pack of deer and fox hounds. The splendid fishing. By every field there was clear water swarming with fish easier to take than the domesticated animals of the farms. It was an ideal life. Books counted for more than in town. My Aunt Mary McLaughlin, Henry's mother, was one of the most diligent housewives that I ever knew, but she was one of the most delightful readers. She always managed to lose herself each day in a book for an hour or two's surcease from the cares of life, and float away for a brief season to the islands of the blest. Such mothers inspire their children. I belong to the school of thought that holds that we owe our temporal and spiritual salvation to our mothers.

there had to be rules against reading all night, the exception being a concession when the child had the tooth-ache. This orgy of reading was guarded against by limiting the candle power. Sometimes we could beat the rule by demanding that we be allowed two candles to improve the illumination, and then burning only one at a time.

The two families were almost the same as one. One thing I remember with a great deal of gratitude was that I could always depend upon my Uncle Andy's for a square meal, the picking being somewhat meager in the minister's family. Another thing it was the point of contact with the world, and the only one I had. Ministers, judges, statesmen, lawyers, and every class and condition of people who passed through the county were to be seen and heard at that hospitable mountain home.

A. M. McLaughlin was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church for some forty years and he made a teaching elder of his son. He bred back through several generations to the highlands of Scotland. He was a Scottish chieftain, and he talked like a Highlander as recorded in the Waverly novels.

As I remember it, the county did not approve of Henry McLaughlin entering the profession. When he went to college at Hampden Sidney, it was considered that a very fine live-stock artist was being sacrificed to the cause of higher education.

It is a matter of congratulation that he has shown the wisdom of the move by becoming a power in the Southern Presbyterian Church.

After he had been at college for a couple of years there came a time when things broke loose at his home. It was in the days of the Virginia booms which were exemplified recently in Florida. Though far removed from the railway, it occurred to some optimistic West Virginians that Marlinton was a very good place for the Virginia fever in real estate to cross the crest of the Allegheny, and the McLaughlin farm was sold for a town site. The great engineer, Mr. Venable, of Charleston, came and laid off the town of Marlinton, and in the excitement the county seat was moved from Huntersville to the new town, and then the bottom fell out and we had to wait ten years for the boom to get under way.

In 1890, the McLaughlins emigrated to Greenbrier County, purchasing the great blue grass farm at the cliffs at the place now called Maxwelton, the place that Dr. McLaughlin owns as his stake in West Virginia. And there the McLaughlins set up another home and center of hospitality. And naturally a church sprang up there, and there the old chieftain and his wife are buried. Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them. The chieftain chose for his epitaph one line: "A ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church."

Maxwelton braes are bonny, and the name is a compliment to a beautiful lady, Dr. McLaughlin's sister Annie, Mrs. J. D. Arbuckle, of Greenbrier County.

The home place fell to Dr. McLaughlin and it is Maxwelton stock farms, the head and front of the polled shorthorn breed, that makes it a well known name in such distant lands as the Argentine, or in South Africa.

Between a mixed descent of Scot and Welsh, Dr. McLaughlin has more

Pocahontas County was the pearl of the Alleghenies, where the men were all true, the women were beautiful, and the fishing was the finest in the world. As a fact we did not know our luck. We hankered after railroads and cities and towns and thought we were shut in. We did not realize that there was a lot of sin and misery shut out.

There were three of us boys about the same age. My brother who is now Dr. J. W. Price, Henry McLaughlin and myself. We were workers in the fields and made a pass at doing all kinds of work. Henry excelled in caring for sheep and he was lucky with them, and any man that can bring sheep to fruition has untold wealth in that quality. We three boys turned our thoughts to matters of public importance. I know that we did not consider ourselves young or immature. We had access to books and periodicals, and we passed on matters that occurred throughout the world with a good deal more thoroughness than any of us do now. We come from a reading stock of people and it was not remarkable that reading being the only connection that we had with the rest of the world that we were readers, and that is why we had the world at our feet.

I think it must have been an unusual one-room school that we all attended, for I counted up the score the other day and out of twenty-eight children, twelve of us had broken into the professions.

The imagery of the Bible likens the work of the pastor with that of the shepherd and those words are interchangeable in the English, German and romance languages. Henry McLaughlin who, as a young boy, knew everyone of three or four hundred sheep by their faces, has never gotten far away from the care of live stock. He owns the Maxwelton farm, out of Lewisburg, and is known all over the world as a breeder of polled shorthorns and Hampshire sheep. He is equally at home in the pulpit and in the bull-pen. He sits with the righteous and the just in the highest church courts and chancelleries. Makes a quick change and appears at the Chicago live stock occasions and talks the language of the breeders.

The McLaughlin home was a big rambling farmhouse by the road. It had been built in three parts, the additions coming as required and there was a lot of porch room. It was a great stopping place for travelers passing on the long roads in the mountains. They would make it suit to stop over night there. There was plenty of room. The barns and stables were commodious. And the long dining table was full every meal. Not the least of our resources in those days was the fine pack of deer and fox hounds. The splendid fishing. By every field there was clear water swarming with fish easier to take than the domesticated animals of the farms. It was an ideal life. Books counted for more than in town. My Aunt Mary McLaughlin, Henry's mother, was one of the most diligent housewives that I ever knew, but she was one of the most delightful readers. She always managed to lose herself each day in a book for an hour or two's surcease from the cares of life, and float away for a brief season to the islands of the blest. Such mothers inspire their children. I belong to the school of thought that holds that we owe our temporal and spiritual salvation to our mothers.

One of the faults I find with the modern system of intensive education is that it does not encourage reading. As I recalled our boyhood of the characteristics of the Scotch in appearance and in traits of character. A big Scotchman, and in the pulpit to the manner born. After he had been ordained a few years, he came back to the old homestead at Marlinton, and preached in the church, and he made a good impression on his boyhood friends, with the power and beauty of his sermon. We had heard about him, but that day we heard and approved his oratory. He belongs in the pulpit.

Another Scotch trait, is his attitude towards education. The Scot knows how to take care of his money until it comes to educating his children and then he will sell the last button from his coat, and with nine children to put through college, he has his work cut out for him. You heard this one about the Scot? He said that he could not smoke a pipe—when he used his own tobacco he packed it too loose, and when he smoked his friends' he packed it too tight.

Last summer, Dr. McLaughlin's oldest son, Rev. John Brown McLaughlin, a theological student, appeared here and preached in and about Marlinton during the vacation and the people received him gladly. It looked to some of us oldtimers like time had turned backward in its flight. He was the same big, powerful, broad-shouldered six-footer that his pa was when he went forth from Marlin's Bottom to work his way up the ladder of fame.

This is a whale of a biography. I have been thrown between the two standpoints of a genealogist and a historian and have not succeeded with either end of the subject. And then, too, we are not to call anyone blessed until he is dead, and at the age of fifty-six, Dr. McLaughlin is just coming into his estate. He is a powerful influence in the Southern Presbyterian Church, and the Southern Presbyterian Church at the present time is acting like the old guard of the solid south, that dies but never surrenders. Even our Methodist brethren, who used to stand like a stonewall for the lost cause have shown signs of relenting. As time goes on a good many of us unreconstructed grow less solid from the ears up.

My mind goes back to the days of the tallow candle, and the readers each with his tallow candle in one hand and the book in the other. And I introduce you to Preacher McLaughlin, the product of that school. And here is to his good health, and his family's good health, and may they all live long and prosper.

CHAPTER VII

Battles of Marlins Bottom and Huntersville.

There used to be a covered bridge at Marlinton across the Greenbrier River. It was built about 1851, and it was the sop to the Cerebus who was guarding the treasury when great turnpike schemes were being carried out in Richmond. This was one of the bridges that came through the Civil War. Armies marched back and forth over the bridge and it figured in battles and retreats, but as it happened, the critical occasions did not occur in time of flood except once, and that was during Averell's raid, and then they kindled a fire that my grandma Price was able to scatter.

Before it was torn down, I went across it one morning and saw an old Confed examining the walls. It was my very good friend, James Schisler, of Greenbrier County. He said he was looking for the loophole that he had used during the war.

As near as I can figure it out there was but one time that they had a battle here at Marlinton, during the Civil War, though it was for months at a time a fortified camp. And I never understood the nature of the controversy at that time, and I am pretty sure that none of the local people here on either side ever understood it. All they knew was that there were soldiers stationed at the bridge and suddenly the bottom was full of blue coats and there was much firing and cavalry charging and an awful racket, and the Confederates retreated west and south, and the Yankees went away.

Dr. George B. Moffett was here that day. He was the father of the president of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, the one that the umpire fined twenty-nine million dollars. That president said that the fine did not hurt so much as the attorneys' fees that the company had to pay.

Dr. Moffett withdrew that day. In telling about it afterwards he said: "Well, I thought I had a fairly fleet horse, but with all those bullets flying around me, it seemed like Gizzard could not run at all."

Col. Gratton Miller was here that day. He told us children about it forty-odd years ago. He said that he ran through the bridge and got so much dust in his lungs that he could not run and he dared not stop. "Why could you not stop?" "Because I had to run or get shot in the back." So it is to be presumed that he was moving rapidly.

But after so long a time I think I have been able to figure out what the fuss was about, and if you will bear with me as long as the tale unfolds, I will try to pass it on to you. That is the reason I would rather write than speak. In writing I am not interrupted and I do not suffer from the sight of weariness.

The day that the Yankees and Confederates sowed the bottom with minnie balls was January 3, 1862.

It will be remembered that the war broke out in 1861, and that for a time Pocahontas County was the objective of both armies. That is the glorious year in the history of this county. The strength of the militia just before the war was six hundred and fifty, and yet before June 10th, over five hundred had entered the Confederate army from Pocahontas County. Robert E. Lee spent something like two months here in the summer of 1861, between Huntersville and Linwood. His exact whereabouts during that time can be traced by the letters he wrote during his stay in this county.

There had been considerable fighting in Tygarts Valley as the Confederates fell back before McClellan and Rosecrans. The Federals dug in at Elkwater, and Lee fortified the passes through Valley Mountain and Middle Mountain. The Federals had fortified White Top of Cheat Mountain on the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike. Lee tried to get Loring's army across the Cheat country and they got lost in the wilderness. If he had got that army in behind the Federals who were at Elkwater, it is to be presumed he would have attacked in the front.

It is pretty plain reading between the lines that Lee was worried about not having word from Loring about whether he had got across or not, and sent Maj. John A. Washington with a handful of men to reconnoiter and see if he saw a Confederate army marching up the river by some hook or crook. And Washington kept looking and looking in vain for such a force and got so near the fortifications in trying to discover the lost army that he was fired upon and killed.

Then Lee pulled up and left in the fall and the troops settled down for the winter. The Federals were at Beverly, and Huttonsville, White Top and Elkwater. The Confederates were at Bartow, Top of Allegheny, Monterey, Huntersville and Marlins Bottom. On the Marlins Bottom and Huttonsville Turnpike the Confederates had fallen back to this place and farther east. The Federals had been stopped in two severe battles on the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, one fought at the fording of the East Fork of Greenbrier River, on October 31, 1861, and one at the Top of Allegheny on December 13, 1861. In addition to that there had been two skirmishes at Travelers Repose, at that same ford, one October 3, 1861, and one December 12, 1861. We had six battles in that one year in Pocahontas County. That is counting the battle of January 3, 1862.

At Huttonsville that winter the 25th Ohio was camped, and with them was Maj. George Webster of that regiment. General Milroy was in command of the forces at that time and he conceived a plan to let the young major have a chance to lead a small army into the Greenbrier Valley by the way of the Old Field Fork of Elk to Marlins Bottom, it having been about two weeks since he found the upper road across the Greenbrier Valley blocked at Top of Allegheny.

Webster entered upon his campaign with enthusiasm and he executed his orders with neatness and dispatch. His little army was made up of 400 soldiers from his own regiment. They marched by the Elk Water fort and there he picked up 300 men from the Second West Virginia, and at Linwood he was joined by a little troop of 38 of Bracken's cavalry. He had loaded up his supply wagons and the army of 738 men moved south into the country of the rebel angels. He started from Huttonsville, December 31, 1861, at 1 p. m. The road follows the Tygarts Valley River to its head at Mingo, and from there it crosses over the Valley Mountain where it strikes the upper waters of the Dry Branch of Elk at the post office of Mace. The road descends a little along the foot of the great Cheat Mountain, whose southern end faces this little valley. The road then climbs again for part of a mile to the gap between Cheat Mountain and Middle Mountain. Then down the long slope by the camp that General Robert E. Lee had vacated some months before. Then down the Big Spring Branch of Elk to the Hugh Sharp place, then across a divide to the waters of Slaty Fork of Elk by L. D. Sharp's store, and then across another divide to the Old Field Fork of Elk, so called from an old Indian field near Mary's Chapel. I remember Dr. Lacy's dilemma when he came to change the name of this chapel, from Saint Mary's Chapel, about the time it was dedicated in 1888 to Mary's Chapel. The original name did not appeal to the old ironsides.

The route lay up the Old Field Fork of Elk for seven or eight miles and when Webster's army reached the place that Crooked Fork of Elk turns to encircle the upper reaches of Gauley River, they found the timber barricade cut into the narrow defile the fall before when Lee's army withdrew from the waters of Elk to the waters of Greenbrier. This barricade was a formidable one, for the trees were all cut for more than a mile. I remember it very distinctly. Webster reached this blockade on the evening of January 2nd, and there were so many trees across the pike that he concluded it would be impossible for him to cut them out so that his wagons could continue to go forward without losing too much time. So he parked his wagons there and left a squadron of fifty men to guard them.

He found a path to the left, on J. C. Gay's side of the blockade and he climbed to the top of the mountain in that way, early on the morning of January 3rd.

When Webster got to the top of Elk Mountain on the Gay place he could look down on the valley of the Greenbrier like whatyoumaycallhim looked down on Italy from the Alps. He could see the tents of the winter camp of the company who had started to winter on the Ingen Patch, that part of the city limits now occupied by the Union Tanning Company. Another company (Louisiana) was camped down the river on the west side where the old Price place is. They had cut every tree on the plantation of any size except a walnut and a hickory that the children begged the colonel to spare.

Marlins Bottom was fortified against invasion from the north. The old pike came up a little hill and dropped down to the bridge head. On top of this hill was a cannon. A part of embankment can still be seen. On the east of the river on the bank was a trench for rifle fire extending the length of the Tannery Row of tenement houses, with another cannon styled where there is now a big oak where the road topped the bank from the Marlin ford. These fortifications commanded the turnpike at a distance of some four hundred yards and made the road extremely dangerous as a passway.

Webster marched his command down Elk Mountain through the loyal village of Edray, across the flats to Drennen's Ridge, and down that ridge into the rebel settlement of Marlins Bottom. At or about the mouth of Stony Creek, a mile above the bridge, he stopped long enough to send his squad of cavalry across the river at the Gay place, and they galloped down the east bank of the river and came out on the bottom land and to the Huntersville road, firing and acting outrageous, while Webster's infantry came down the west of the road. The cavalry cutting in behind the Confederates caused them to stampede and most of them made it across the bridge to the west side and they all fled south and west into the woods. This engagement while a very noisy one resulted in no loss by death or wounding on either side.

And it hardly halted the advance of the Federals. They crossed the bridge and advanced on Huntersville, six miles distant, driving before them some mounted Confederates. Huntersville was the county seat of Pocahontas County, and was located about four miles from Camp Northwest. It had seen some big armies during the year 1861, and when Lee left everything in charge of Loring, the Confederates made Huntersville their headquarters for all their activities in this part of the county.

Webster had left Captain Johnson with fifty men to guard the wagons at the barricade. So now he left Captain Williams and fifty men to guard Greenbrier Bridge.

When Webster arrived at the ford of Knapps Creek at the place where J. H. Buzzard lives, he found the Confederate cavalry on the south side of the creek in a level bottom field with Knapps Creek on one side of them and their line extending up and over a hilly spur that jutted out into the field, the line crossing the turnpike. Webster sent a detachment up the mountain to turn the Confederate's right while the rest of his command marched upon their front and the firing became general on both sides. But the Confederates perceiving that the Federals on the north side of the creek were encircling them, fell back and formed a new line of battle across the pike and along Cummings Creek near the town. The pickets coming in from Marlins Bottom had reported the Federal force to be about five thousand men.

Webster crossed at the ford at J. H. Buzzard's and topped the little spur and finding that the Confederates were in battle line on Cummings Creek, he sent two companies to his right through the woods on the hillside, and the Bracken cavalry to swing far to the left towards the bank of the creek, and the rest of the troops advanced forward. After some firing the Confederates mounted their horses and retreated to the town, and as the Federal troops entered the town from the west side, the Confederates left by the east side.

The number of Confederates engaged at Huntersville was about four hundred regular cavalry, several hundred citizens of the county, recruited the day before, and two companies of infantry.

In the meantime, at Camp Allegheny, Gen. Edward Johnson was filled with apprehension. This was the Kentucky general. An old lady told me that his ears flapped when his horse trotted. General Johnson's scouts had reported the forward movement of the Federals as being 5,000 men, and Johnson figured out that they would circle around by way of Huntersville, Frost, and Crab Bottom, and detach him violently from his base, at Monterey.

The troops at Huntersville fell back to Monterey. The Federal loss was one man shot in the arm. The Confederate loss was one man killed and seven wounded. At Marlins Bottom all that they lost was their wind.

When Webster marched into Huntersville he found it deserted. Not a soul was living there. The courthouse and jail and stores, and houses were all empty. War had come too close to them, and the county seat and largest town of the county was abandoned by its population. It remained in this condition for most of the war, and the soldiers used the Presbyterian church for a camp, and the houses were abused. Windows were broken and the doors left swinging, and an old timer told me that this, the scene of much social life and gayety, became one of the dreariest sights that he had ever observed.

A civilian came to the Webster command and told him that the people had moved out and taken their belongings with them because the Confederate general had told them that if his army was beaten, the town would be burned.

When the town was captured January 3rd, large army supplies were found stored there. There were 350 barrels of flour, 150,000 pounds of beef, 30,000 pounds of salt, and large quantities of sugar, coffee, rice, bacon and clothing.

Not being able to move anything, fire was set to the stores and they were destroyed.

Then Webster turned and marched his men back to his wagons that night in the sleet and driving rain, having fought two engagements, and marched something like twenty-eight miles on foot. That was a big day's work. It took an hour and a half to drive the Confederates a mile, and he was in Huntersville two hours destroying rebel stores.

It is no wonder that the local people did not understand the movements on that day, for the Confederate commanders did not know what was happening to them. Webster's return march from Huntersville was what they had not counted on. They went on the basis that a big army was on the move, and looked for it to go almost any way but back. They figured on a march to the White Sulphur Springs, or on the Central Railroad at Millboro, or to Monterey.

But the little Federal army marching so jaunty with their young commander had no notion of penetrating farther into the strongholds of the Confederacy than any Union army had reached up to that time, and he had swept the country clean as he went along and extricated his army with much neatness and dispatch. The 4th and 5th of January, were spent in marching back from the barricade to Elkwater. On the night of the 5th they were in the fortifications at Elkwater, where they were royally entertained by the soldiers at that camp, and on the morning of the 6th they were in their old headquarters at Huttonsville. They had pulled out on a Tuesday and they got back the following Monday, and it was as fine a little campaign as ever a set of youngsters put over. Maj. George Webster, of the 25th Regiment, Ohio Volunteers, Commanding Huntersville Expedition, was there and back again, with all his men and horses intact, having carried fire and sword into a hostile country, and marched 102 miles in six days. And he threw a scare into the Confederates that made their lines quiver from Huntersville to Winchester, and from Camp Allegheny to Staunton. Scouts rode headlong in every direction carrying dispatches. They seemed to have agreed on the strength of the Federal army as being 5,000 men instead of the 738 that it actually was.

The same week of the Huntersville expedition, Sutton, the county seat of Braxton, had its awful time. In that town a Federal company was stationed under Captain Rowan. The town was attacked by 135 Confederates. The Federal company retreated to Weston, and the Confederates burned the town and took what commissary stores they found there. Colonel Crook with four companies went in pursuit of the Confederates (claimed to be irregular soldiers) and killed six, and dispersed them in the Glades. On the 30th, Colonel Anisansel organized an expedition of two regiments and marched them to the Glades in Webster County and killed twenty-two and burned twenty houses. This was about the time that Webster was operating in Pocahontas.

Before Webster marched out of Huntersville that rainy day, he nailed the Stars and Stripes to the top of the courthouse and left them flying, with their bright colors against the sodden sky.

There was another skirmish at Marlins Bottom, April 19, 1864. Capt. J. W. Marshall's company of the 19th Virginia Cavalry, C. S. A., came upon a company of Federal soldiers, identity unknown, and chased them north towards Edray.

CHAPTER VIII

Battle of Duncan's Lane fought on Stony Creek near Marlinton. Important Services of State Troops to the Union.

Hearken unto the battle of Duncan's Lane. The story of that battle has never been printed before. It is ignored by all histories of the war. Until late years it was not a subject of frank and open discussion by the people of this county. Time cures all things. There are still living a number of men who participated in that fight, and I have talked with men on both sides recently and after so long a time this historic event, which had been so nebulous, came out clear and distinct and I will endeavor to state the case.

At the West Union schoolhouse at the foot of the mountain, on the road that leads to the Williams River country, in 1864, lived Henry Duncan, in a double log house on the headwaters of Stony Creek. The house was opposite the mouth of a draw or hollow leading off at right angles toward the south, and up that hollow lived William Beverage about a quarter of a mile distant. A pass-way was used up that hollow to reach the Griffin place, and the homes of people living on Days Mountain, and on over to the headwaters of Dry Run, a branch of Swago Creek. Part of the passway between the Duncan place and the Beverage place was fenced on both sides in 1864 as a lane. It was this lane that gave the name to the battle.

The State was formed in 1863, and in the early part of 1864 a regiment of state guards was formed at Buckhannon, and of this regiment Pocahontas County furnished one company, captained at times by Capt. Sam Young, a minister, and later by Capt. I. W. Allen. Captain Young preached at the sulphur spring on Stony Creek (Ellis Sharp's) on May 3, 1854, and made an appointment to preach there again in forty years after. A great concourse of people gathered there in 1894 to keep the appointment, but the captain was dead. Eleven survivors appeared at the meeting.

This regiment had its headquarters in 1864 at Beverly. These state guards were gallant soldiers and were exposed to all the perils and privations of the Civil War. It is not too much to say that they performed service attended by unusual dangers and hazards, and it is a matter of general regret that they were not recognized and rewarded by the Federal government after the war, for however home guards in uninvaded states were placed, those in West Virginia were real soldiers.

In 1864, the Union depended upon the result of the presidential election, as a peace party had set out to defeat the election of Lincoln, and if this had succeeded the erring sisters would have been allowed to go in peace, and the United States would have disintegrated.

The dauntless Averell and his mounted infantry, like a thorn in the flesh and a rankling fire to the Confederates, had conquered and subdued West Virginia for the Union. He was ignominously discharged in Septemper, 1864. The county of Pocahontas, in the fall of 1864, was controlled by the Confederacy. It was determined, however, by the West Virginia authorities to hold an election for president in this county, and arrangements were made to open the polls at Edray. And the Pocahontas County State Guards company was detailed to bring that election off. They marched on foot from Beverly to Edray, a distance of fifty-four miles, coming in by the way of Elk River, and arriving a day or two before election. It was recognized that it was a dangerous expedition, sending one company into Pocahontas County.

The company camped near the headwaters of Elk on the way in, and one of the soldiers, Washington Neff, obtained leave of absence to visit his wife who was stopping at William Gibson's. Here he was captured by a squad belonging to Captain J. C. Gay's company of Confederate scouts, and was taken as a prisoner to the headquarters of that company, at the farm of Samuel Gay just above the mouth of Stony Creek. That night in attempting to escape, Neff was shot and killed. The prisoner had laid out Private Bennett with a stone and had been shot as he fled near the ford in Stony Creek.

This word had reached the company at Edray. Capt. Sam Young was in command. Capt. I. W. Allen was there, too. Nearly every member of the company was a Pocahontas man. Already apprehensive of the danger of being in the heart of a Confederate county, the death of Neff must have impressed them with the dangers of their position. The polls were opened under the oaks standing in front of the William Sharp house, near the big spring. The soldiers all voted irrespective of age and a number of citizens of the vicinity, and the vote was solid for Abraham Lincoln for president.

Aaron Moore was chosen as the messenger to take the vote into the northwestern part of the State, where the existence of the government of West Virginia was recognized, and the company of soldiers prepared to act as his guard. William Hannah was one of the commissioners of election but he had the uniform of a soldier. It was decided not to attempt to return by the pike to Beverly, the road now called Seneca Trail. The return was to be made by crossing the river at Marlins Bottom, by Huntersville, and the Hill country, by Dunmore and Greenbank to the Staunton and Parkersburg pike at Travelers Repose and across Cheat Mountain. The company marched four miles south to Marlinton and when they came in sight of the bridge they saw a Confederate soldier at the end of the bridge on horseback. This soldier saw the Union soldiers at the same time and whirled his horse and galloped back through the bridge. This was construed to mean that he was a picket and that he had gone to notify southern cavalry of the advance of the northern soldiers. Upon a council of war it was decided to take to the mountain and make a detour in the direction of Williams River in such a way that cavalry could not follow them. They realized that they were a small company of men in a country that was hostile to them, and that they might be killed by an ambushed force at any minute.

It turned out afterwards that the soldier at the bridge was not a sentinel, but was a deserter who was making his getaway to Buckhannon, where they saw him a short time after.

The little army turned up Price Run and from there climbed Bucks Mountain through the grass lands until they reached the fringe of trees near the top, and there they took some cold food from their haversacks and lay down to sleep without any fire whatever.

They were stirring before daylight and marched to the head of Dry Run and called at the house of Peter Beverage, a Union man, and there got something to eat, and then proceeded by the way of the Griffin Place, to William Beverage's place. William Beverage was a brother of Peter Beverage, but was a Confederate in sympathy, and a non-combatant.

Here there were bees, and the little army feeling safe from possible pursuit, commandeered a bee gum or hive full of honey. It was the first week of November and the hive was heavy with honey. The soldiers made the farmer give them buckets and they proceeded to fill the buckets with honey, preparing for a mid-day feed.

In the meantime, the Confederates had been laying plans to capture the Union soldiers sent here in such a small force to beard the lion in his den. Capt. J. C. Gay, holding a commission as captain under the Confederacy, with authority to guard the border, was the ranking officer in this emergency; he augmented his force by summoning to his headquarters at his home, at the mouth of Stony Creek, all Southern soldiers who were at home on furloughs, and his command was made up of about half scouts and half soldiers on furlough.

Godfrey Geiger says that he and his brother, Adam Geiger, were called from their home at Stony Bottom and that they reached headquarters at the Gay farm about dark on the day of the election.

The company was made up there and moved before daylight the next morning, and took the trail of the Union soldiers on Bucks Mountain and found where they had bivouaced in the edge of the woods. They then went to William Kinnison's on the mountain to get some bread but before any could be prepared they heard the northern soldiers' platoon firing at Peter Beverage's near by, and they did not wait for anything to eat.

They hung on the trail slowly which led through the woods for the most part, until they came to the open grass land around William Beverage's, and there they saw the Union soldiers in the act of taking the honey from a bee hive. The distance was about three hundred yards.

The order to fire being given, a volley was let off, the result of which was a general scattering of the blue coats for shelter. Some went to the hillsides on either side of the hollow. Some went down Duncan's Lane, and sheltered in and behind Duncan's house, and some to the knoll commanding the mouth of the hollow where West Union schoolhouse stands and in this way gave battle and returned the fire.

Aaron Moore with the election returns ran up the hillside, and Godfrey Geiger says that he would most certainly have been killed if it had not been that he was in citizen clothes, the rule being to shoot no one not in a uniform.

At or about the first fire, Bernard Sharp, of the Union army, a son of William Sharp, of Elk, and a brother of Silas, Harmon, and Hugh Sharp, fell mortally wounded. He was shot through both hips. Godfrey Geiger says that he was carrying an army gun called a musketoon, which took a paper cartridge. That he went into the fight with three charges and that he would have been out of the battle but for the fact that he got a supply of cartridges from the battle field after the first volley, the Union ammunition just suiting his gun. Godfrey Geiger says that his was a long range gun, and that he saw Captain Young in the passage way between the two parts of the Duncan house and that he shot at him. That Captain told him afterwards that the ball cut away his clothes across his chest. The bullet was recovered after the war from the log where it had lodged.

The two little armies having taken shelter continued to fire at each other for something like an hour and a half, and neither side making a charge, the Union soldiers gradually withdrew and made their way by little squads to the original rendezvous at Beverly taking with them the result of the election.

When it became apparent that the Union army had retired from the place, the Confederates went on down the lane, and came on Bernard Sharp, and carried him to Henry Duncan's house. It was apparent that he was near death, but they sent for a doctor and did what they could for him, but he expired in a few hours.

The Union soldiers wounded were John Armstrong, Moffett Walton, John E. Adkison, William Kinnison, James L. Rodgers, received serious wounds. Moffett Sharp shot in the mouth.

J. R. Moore, who was under fire from the first, says that no one was hit at the first fire, that is the firing that occurred while the Union soldiers were getting the honey for lunch in William Beverage's yard. I think this is correct. I think Bernard Sharp was hit in the hips with a mountain rifle ball while he stood behind a tree, returning the fire of the Confederates. He was a fine, tall, slim young man, and his untimely death was greatly regretted.

The wounded soldiers were taken to a cave near James McClure's, under the shadow of Red Knob, and concealed, and they were treated with great kindness and consideration by the McClure family.

There was no one hit on the Confederate side. The Confederates turned back at Henry Duncan's and they took from his farm a bee gum and bees which they carried to William Beverage to replace the one that he had lost to the Union army. There seems to have been no cause for this other than Duncan was for the Union, and Beverage was for the Confederacy.

I have talked with Register Moore and Peter McCarty, soldiers of the Union, on one side, and Godfrey Geiger, soldier on the Confederate side. Godfrey Geiger was in some of the biggest fighting of the war. George McCollam was eight years old and he has a vivid recollection of the soldiers returning from the battle field, shouting and victorious. He was at his Aunt Ruth Kee's on Bucks Mountain; George M. Kee, a wounded Confederate soldier, being at home.

It is probably impossible for complete lists of the soldiers to be obtained at this late day and time, and the names here given are those furnished by survivors of the affair.

Union soldiers: Capt. Samuel Young, Capt. I. W. Allen, Lieut. Wm. Kinnison, Corp. John Armstrong, William Hannah, William Gay, George Cochran, Clark Dilley of Ewing's Battery, Jeremy Dilley, Sheldon Hannah, Clark Kellison, Newton Wanless, Moffett Wanless, James L. Rodgers, Aaron Moore, J. B. Moore, Henry Pugh, William Simmons, John E. Adkison, Peter McCarty, James Rider, Aaron Kee, Columbus Silva, Henry Sharp, George McKeever, Moffett Rodgers, Hanson Moore, and Moffett Sharp.

Confederate soldiers: Capt. J. C. Gay, James Shannon, Jacob Simmons, Michael Willerton (one armed soldier), Godfrey Geiger, Adam Geiger, Azri White, Bax White, Charles L. Moore, Mathias Moore, James McLaughlin, George H. McLaughlin, Charles Jackson, Jacob Beverage of Clover Creek, Harvey Lindsey, Geo. Simmons, Hiram Dorman.

There can be no question but that there are many names omitted on both sides. It was not a battle that would be reported in detail to the war office of either country. And though I have known the most of the soldiers mentioned above intimately, it was not a case that was discussed freely in the olden days. It was only when the story of this battle was about to be lost to history that I gathered some of the salient facts in connection with it, and fortunately I was able to talk to soldiers who had been in it.

As a battle it does not rank high in the national issue to be decided other than it had a direct bearing on the election of Lincoln the second time. If he had been defeated, it would have been a long farewell to the greatness of America. But it was not in the plan of Providence for him to fall.

As a part of the travail of West Virginia in her birth throes such contests as these, occurring in the border counties, are of the greatest importance.

I have never been able to understand why the home guards of West Virginia were not pensioned and rewarded like the rest of the volunteer army. To belong to a state guard company in West Virginia and preserve the entity of the state and to assist in every military movement within the borders of the state, was a service of the greatest peril and importance.

I have heard that the troubles in the way of this recognition, was the stand that the all powerful Grand Army of the Republic organization took in the matter. And I can see how a home guard in New Hampshire, for instance, would never hear a shot fired in anger, and might not have the right to as much consideration as the soldier who faces death at the call of his country. But the West Virginia state guard carried his life in his hand during the fourteen months of his active service, and many perished in the discharge of their duties.

The formation of the state guards seems to have released in a great measure the Army of West Virginia for service in the Valley of Virginia and beyond the Blue Ridge. In April, 1864, the state guards were organized and took charge of the danger zone in West Virginia, and in May, 1864, the entire force of the Army of West Virginia, as the regulars stationed in the mountain state were called, were on the move to report to Gen. Hunter at Staunton in a movement against Lynchburg, Virginia, and from that to the end of the war at Appomatox, the Army of West Virginia, fought on the other side of the mountain, with the exception of a detour on a retreat from Salem to Martinsburg by way of Lewisburg and Charleston, from June 29, 1864, to July 18, 1864. The policy of West Virginia for the last year of the war was given over to the state guards, and I feel that they have not been given due credit for their courage and fidelity and efficiency. In peace they seem to have been forgotten, and their signal service ignored. They have not been treated as well as Confederate soldiers, for most of the Southern States have taken very good care of destitute Southern veterans.

The home guard movement should not be confused with the home guard companies formed on either side at the beginning of the war in the West Virginia counties. These un-uniformed patriotic citizens represented the sentiment of their respective sides, and played important parts in the earlier stages of the contest, and they all practically formed or entered regular companies in a very short time.

The West Virginia guards had all the standing of regularly sworn defenders, wearing the uniforms of their country duly authorized by law to lay down their lives for the Union. Unfortunately they became confused with the more peaceful organizations of other states and suffered neglect and ingratitude. Students of history are invited to study the record. They will be convinced that a very important body of Union soldiers failed to receive due recognition after peace was declared.

I am glad to be able to present to you the salient facts of the battle of Duncan's Lane, as an example of what might be expected as a part of the day's work from the West Virginia State Guards who fought a good fight, and finished the course, and who failed to receive the extra compensation after the war was over.

Pocahontas County, West Virginia State Troops:

Adjutant or mustering officers:

Claiborne Pierson, commissioned August 8, 1861.

John Sharp, commission ordered September 30, 1863.

Captain William King, commissioned order of November 6, 1861, to rank from September 28, 1861.

First Lieutenant David King, commissioned November 6, 1861, to rank from September 28, 1861.

Captain Samuel Young's Company compiled from roll dated February 4, 1865.

Captain Samuel Young, commissioned as captain ordered under date of August 29, 1864. (Order Book 6.)

Enlisted men: Benjamin A. Arbogast, sergeant; John H. Armstrong, sergeant; Alexander Atchison, Reuben Buzzard, George S. Cochran, sergeant, Thomas Cunningham, Jeremiah Dilley, Martin C. Dilley, William A. Gay, John S. Gibson, sergeant, Jonathan J. Griffin, Jesse Gregory, Morgan Grimes, William B. Hannah, Aaron Kee, George W. Kellison, John Kellison, William C. Kinnison, Peter McCarty, William McCarty, George W. McKeever, Aaron Moore, Hanson Moore, Harrison Moore, John B. Moore, Washington Neff, Henry E. Pugh, Moffett Pugh, Geo. M. Rogers, James L. Rodgers, Martin B. Sharp, Henry D. Sharp, Milton C. Sharp, Columbus C. Silvey, William Simmons, ——— Sines, John H. Simms, P. A. Smith, John U. Wanless, Newton Wanless, William M. Wanless.

Captain Isaac Allen's Company, Pocahontas County Scouts:

Captain Isaac W. Allen, commissioned captain of Pocahontas County Scouts to rank April 4, 1864.

Enlisted men: Benjamin H. Adkinson, Allen Arbogast, D. M. Burgess, John F. Clutter, Clark C. Young, B. B. Garvey, John H. Grimes, Samuel Grant, Robert F. Green, Adam Gregory, George G. Griffin, Joseph H. Hannah, Michael Hass, Kane W. Hinkle, William E. Johnson, John McLaughlin, Joseph Rapp, Esq., Christopher C. Silva, John M. Slaten, David Sullivan, Marcus G. Waugh, Solomon Westfall, Jacob Weiford, Robert N. Wilkins, J. B. Wright, Esq.

It will be seen from the above list that in regard to the Union troops in Pocahontas County during the Civil War two companies were recruited after the formation of the State in 1863, in this county, and that Capt. Sam Young commanded one company and that Capt. I. W. Allen was the ranking officer of the other company. In the lists given above it will be noticed that two names appear in both companies, that of Christopher Columbus Silva and that of John H. Sims. With these exceptions the companies are not the same. This explains the seeming discrepancy of the common belief that there was but one company of home guards with two captains.

The lists here given are more nearly complete than any that have heretofore been published, and they are secured from the department of history at Charleston, but there are names missing. For instance, the name of the late Sheldon Hannah is not listed. He belonged to Captain Young's company. I got his statement last winter. He had stopped on the march to Edray in November, 1864, to stay all night at his father's house on the Old Field Fork of Elk, and on Monday morning he woke up from a good night's rest in the barn to find that nine or ten soldiers of the Confederate army, under Capt. J. C. Gay, were searching the place for him. He was well concealed in the hay and though the soldiers searched the barn they did not find him. He escaped to the woods. That squad of Confederates marched south on the Seneca Trail but did not go through Edray, and Sheldon Hannah paralleled their march and joined Captain Young's company at Edray, and was in the fight at Duncan's Lane.

Nearly all these soldiers have passed on. I knew most of them. Without exception they were righteous and upright men, and leaders in the moral life of the county, and as far as I can recall them they were nearly all of them devout men. On account of the division in sentiment in this county, it suffered far more than other counties north and south. In many instances, brothers fought on opposite sides. I remember hearing much about the war at first hand and did not have sense enough to set it down. It was a subject that was avoided on account of the intense feeling that survived the war. A strange condition arose directly after the Civil War. The restoration of civil rights to the Confederate soldiers resulted in turning over the State government to them and for more than twenty years the Confederates ruled the State and most of the counties. I can remember the blue army overcoats that came out of the war which were worn by Union veterans. It used to make the Confederates grit their teeth when they saw the blue overcoats. And I have heard Confederates speak of the coming in of the first grand jury after that war, when the blue overcoats predominated and it looked like a squad of Union soldiers. And it was a day full of sorrow for the Confederates for most of the prominent Confederate warriors were indicted upon charges ranging from murder down. In fact, if you will examine the list of men indicted for murder just after the war, you will find that it reads like a register of the aristocracy.

But the resentment occasioned by the war became somewhat mellowed by the wisdom of the leading men and a condition of toleration was produced and while the soldiers continued to vote the way they shot, it was no more than healthy rivalry, and they worked together very well.

When Private Washington Neff was taken prisoner on Elk in November by the Confederate soldiers he was marched with them to their camp at the Samuel Gay farm on the river above Marlins Bottom. This is where Marlinton is built. Up the river on the west side the farms lay in this order: First the Price farm, then John Gay's place where the fair ground is, and next the Samuel Gay farm, now the Carter place. Above this the bottom land on the west side is pinched out by the river and then for a distance the bottom lies on the east side. Capt. J. C. Gay was a son of Samuel Gay and the rendezvous and camp was made on the home place. Captain Gay was assembling his company of enlisted men and commanding all Confederate soldiers home on furloughs to report for duty, to repel the invasion of the county by the Union company of State troops which had been sent here from the headquarters camp at Beverly to hold the presidential election in 1864.

They captured Neff who had obtained leave to go to William Gibson's to visit his wife. The Gibson place was in sight of the Hannah place. The fields joined, so it is probable that the same party attempted to capture Sheldon P. Hannah.

Neff was marched over Elk mountain under guard and was held a prisoner at the camp above the mouth of Stony Creek. It was a night with a bright moon. Some time during the night the soldier Neff, asked to be taken out to answer a call of nature, and he was guarded by Private Bennett. Bennett was close to him, and when Neff arose, he came with a large stone in his hand, and with it, he struck his guard a terrible blow on the head, and Bennett went down and out, and the rest of the camp thought he had been killed. Neff took to his heels and got well away, and would have escaped if he had taken to the woods, instead of pursuing his way along the road.

Captain Gay was asleep, but he roused instantly and saw Bennett lying there apparently dead with a broken head and the prisoner gone. He grabbed his army revolver and without dressing and in his stocking feet, he ran down the river bank, through the fields, keeping well away from the road which led along the foot of the mountain. In a few minutes he came to the ford in Stony Creek where the Warwick road crosses and there waited beside a rail fence. The John Gay farm house and buildings lay on the road between where he waited and the camp that he had left. In a short time the watch dogs at John Gay's barked and that gave the Confederate intimation that the escaped prisoner was coming.

When Neff came up to where the captain was waiting for him, he was given the command to surrender but instead of that he reached to the ground and came up with another stone, whereupon he was shot and killed.

By this time there was a terrible war cloud hanging over Edray district. A pitched battle was imminent to be fought by boys who had grown up together and who had been schooled for four intensive seasons in civil war. Neff was buried where he fell. I have been trying to find out whether his body was removed to the Federal cemetery at Grafton, as some say, or whether he still sleeps were he fell. I own the land at that point, and if the soldier is still there I want to put a marker over his tomb. Sheldon P. Hannah told me last winter in an interview that the body was not removed after the war, and he had good reason to remember the occurrence. The place where Neff is buried is in the woods, and we ought to find out about this before the land is ever used or cleared.

By the way, on the main Gay farm a son of Captain Gay and a daughter of Sheldon P. Hannah, Mr. and Mrs. Pat Gay, are living with a fine family of children, and that is one sign that the bitterness of the war has passed.

That terrible night of the killing of Neff, Captain Gay rode to Mill Point and woke Dr. Wallace up. This was eleven miles distant. Dr. Wallace heard a faint tapping on the window. Captain Gay said: "An escaping prisoner has been killed. My man Bennett is badly wounded. Where is the camp of my men down here. I must find them and get Bennett and the rest of them out of the way before we are raided tomorrow."

Dr. Wallace told him that the men were in a secluded place on Greenbrier River near Chicken House Run, now Watoga, and Captain Gay went there and found a squad of men who went back with him, and there they buried Washington Neff and recruited the company that fought the battle of Duncan's Lane. I think the chronology of the events are about as follows: Monday, November 4, 1864, State troops arrived at Edray, and on the same day Neff was taken prisoner and brought to Greenbrier River, and killed while escaping. On Tuesday, November 5, 1864, the election was held at Edray. On Wednesday, November 6, 1864, on the first anniversary of Droop Mountain the battle of Duncan's Lane was fought.

"In these woods' enchanted hall,
Unseen hands thy couch are strewing,
Fairy strains of music fall,
Every sense in slumber dewing.
Soldier rest, thy warfare o'er,
Sleep the sleep that knows no waking,
Dream of battle fields no more,
Days of danger, nights of waking."

It is the experience of men of mature years, to feel regret that they did not inquire more closely into the facts and circumstances surrounding heroic events, when the time comes that such history becomes vague and shadowy. None of us seem to have the right sense of proportion. And even as I record this propensity to neglect current events that will be so eagerly sought in future years, it would be well to mention, that right now there are more interesting things bound up in the inarticulate soldiers of the World's War, than any other event that has ever occurred locally.

Several hundred of the young men of this county, and every county in the United States went on the Grand Tour to the other hemisphere, and stilled the tempest of war that was raging and which threatened to engulf and destroy the whole of Christendom. Compared to the American Expedition, the Crusades amounted to no more than a Sunday School picnic. And yet you could not get the color out of the soldiers with a corkscrew. I am inclined to think that after the survivors of the World War have turned their fiftieth milestone in years, that the great deep will be broken up, and that they will become loquacious and tell what they saw and what they did. Just now their faces are turned toward the future. We will have to wait until they turn their faces toward the past.

A hundred years from now, historians will wonder what the writers of today were like who talked to these soldiers and recorded so few of the intimate details of army life. There never was but one Plutarch and there may never be one again.

And just now, we are running up against an historical problem. The State engineers in changing the grade of the Seneca Trail ran the line through the cemetery containing the remains of the soldiers of Robert E. Lee's army which was encamped on Middle Mountain and Valley Mountain in the summer of 1861. All summer the armies faced each other on this pike. McClellan entrenched below Elkwater, with his line extending back to Beverly, and Lee facing him with his line of supplies extending back to Huntersville. They never gave battle, but the summer was cold and wet and the soldiers not hardened to camp life, and they died in great numbers from typhoid and pneumonia. Soldiers far from their homes. Men from far Southern States. E. S. Gatewood, a son of the late Col. A. C. L. Gatewood, an officer of the Confederate army, on whose farm the burial place is located, made a vigorous protest against the location of the grade so far as it disturbs this burying ground.

CHAPTER IX

The English Colony at Mingo. A part of the Legion that never was listed.

There's a legion that never was listed,
It carries no colours or crest,
But, split in a thousand detachments,
Is breaking the road for the rest.
Our fathers they left us their blessing—
They taught us, and groomed us, and crammed:
But we've shaken the Clubs and the Hesses
To go and find out and be damned,
Dear boys!
To go and get shot and be damned.

Then a health (we must drink it in whispers).
To our wholly unauthorized horde—
To the line of our dusty foreloopers,
The Gentlemen Rovers abroad.
Yes, a health to ourselves ere we scatter,
For the steamer won't wait for the train,
And the Legion that never was listed
Goes back into quarters again.

—From The Lost Legion.

Why I can remember when the name of Rudyard Kipling was unknown! I remember how hard it was to assimilate the name. Some said they could not remember the name but it sounded like Woodyard Kindling to them. But he came to the real readers like a meteor across the sky.

We know what Kipling thought of Bhegwan Dass, the bunnia, who lived near Taksali Gate, but we do not know what Mr. Dass thought of Kipling.

My active interest in Englishmen dates from one hot day in hay harvest when I came in to dinner. The mail had brought a letter from England. In an educated hand, hard to read, the writer of the letter said that he was a man just through college, of athletic turn, with a thousand pounds capital, who would like to obtain a footing in the United States. We wrote him to come and see for himself.

About the first of September he came with his boxes driving through from Belington in a spring wagon he had chartered there; a little drive of seventy miles. He had lost his way and suffered extortion. The right way would have been to come to Millboro, Virginia, where he could have got here in forty-six miles and his boxes could have come by the covered wagon trains that ran winter and summer.

But he found comfortable quarters and an understanding people, used to Englishmen. He even found a countryman already stopping here. The first evening they made a bet. The new man bet the salted man that he, the tenderfoot, would catch a hundred bass before winter set in, and by the way he won the bet, to the astonishment of all of us.

We knew how to deal with the English. Three cardinal rules: Ask no prying questions, give him a bed to himself, and a small hand tub to bathe in, and the world is his.

It was in this way, thirty-four years ago, that James Henry Gilchrist Wilson arrived at Marlins Bottom, Pocahontas County, where it was destined that he spend the rest of his life. I remember him with gratitude and affection. To know him was a liberal education in itself. He was just out of Oxford, Christ College. He had the distinction of being a double first. I will not insult your intelligence by explaining what an Oxford double first is, but it is a wonderful attainment for a student. He played for that university on the rugby team at football. He played as an international. He played for his native county of Yorkshire. You can find his football record in the Blue Book. He had rowed for his university against Cambridge. He was a mighty man with whiskers on his hands, and the mountaineers received him gladly. About eight hundred years ago when the Scots were making it interesting for England, the King of England said of Yorkshire: "The Wilson seals the border." He was of a family of scholars. One brother who came here to see him was the head of a big school for boys in the Isle of Man. Another brother was a successful barrister in London. He got stuck with a horse the day after he arrived. A kind of an outlaw among horses, heavy on his feet and with a mean disposition. Wilson changed his name to Satan. Afterwards he became an expert with horses. He acquired Toby, the beautiful sorrel, and the famous dog Major, and the trio were known and welcomed far and wide. Years after, Wilson having found a way out, I packed up his effects to send back to his people. One of the things that he had saved was a lock of Toby's hair.

I desire to acknowledge my indebtedness to him for a deeper insight into the English language. He did not write and he did not make speeches, but his words fitly spoken were like apples of gold in baskets of silver.

About the same time the great blue grass plains around Mingo Flats filled up with the bull dog breed. There were about thirty of them over there, each one from a stately home in England. Now an Englishman fights against ennui all his lifetime, and the greatest resource that he has is out-door sport. So they educated us in the sports of England. The first golf course I ever saw was at Mingo, about 1891. They taught us to play cricket, tennis, polo, cribbage, and gave us an insight into steeplechases, paper chases and fox hunting, but the game that took like wildfire was football. We were a shut in people in those days, far from the railroad, and the maddening crowds ignoble strife. Mingo was twenty-seven miles distant, a comfortable horseback ride, and every boy by some hook or crook managed to have a horse to ride. The best polo pony that I ever saw was Latimer Tuke's gray mule.

One of the best things that we learned from the English was that it was the proper thing to respond instantly and agree to play in any game at any time to the best of our skill and ability. They got us so that we would try anything, and we found that we could hold our own.

They tried us a little high one time, however. Marathon races came in and a challenge came from Mingo for a marathon race from Jimmy Hebden's front porch on Valley Mountain to the Greenbrier Bridge, as near twenty-five miles as we could lay off the course. The route is now a part of the Seneca Trail you hear so much about. It lies over two mountains. As the day approached and training went on, our athletes at Marlinton began with one accord to make excuses, for twenty-five miles is a long run. Our entries dwindled down to one, but Mingo was in no better shape, for they found that they would have but one entry. For Marlinton, my brother, Dr. Norman R. Price, who has since won the rank of major in the army, was the only entry. S. E. L. Grews, a splendid gentleman, a son of an English colonel, was the other entry. A phone line had been recently built into the county and we could keep tab on the race. I was the timekeeper and waited at this end. The two boys raced too much at the start and made the first twelve miles in an hour, but just at two hours and fifty-nine minutes Grews came in, winning. The impression that flashed to me when I saw him come bounding in over the crest of the last hill just before he reached the goal, was that of a deer run to its death by hounds coming into a deer stand, a sight that I was accustomed to in those day. I gathered him up and wrapped him up and took him to my home and he tried to drink up everything on the place. All the milk, and all the cold tea, and all the water in the well. Another doctor brother of mine was raising sand about it and had gone out to meet our racer and flagged him in much distress four miles out and restored him. Grews went home with death in his face, and in a few weeks, he fell dead, absolutely run to death, as was the young soldier who brought the news of the victory of the Greeks over the Persians on the plains of Marathon.

The life of the party in those days was Arthur Lawson. At the time he came here, his father Sir Wilfred Lawson, was at the height of his fame as a parliamentary leader in England. If I remember correctly, he was the leader of the temperance movement and an advocate of peace. He was seventh baronet. His oldest son visited here, one of the most silent men, Clem Shaver not excepted, that I have ever known. We also had a visit from a sister, Mrs. Holland Hibbets, and her daughter. Mrs. Holland Hibbets, was one of the brightest and fairest ladies of the land. Mr. Holland Hibbetts was a great railway director in England and was here to attend that international railway congress held some twenty-odd years ago. They were the guests of the Stuyvesant Fishes in New York, and the Prices in Marlinton. I do not know how the Stuyvesant Fishes played up to them, but we put the best foot foremost at our house. The word has been grapevined through of late years that Arthur Lawson has succeeded to the title, since the great war. I have had no occasion to verify this until this time, and do not now have the opportunity. Anyway whether he has it or not is immaterial for he was a nobleman de facto every day in the year.

He used to furnish us oceans of copy for the Pocahontas Times, and it was brilliant. I remember one time he went away for a couple of months. He was doing Canada as it afterwards appeared. One day he showed up on the snowy road with a big Irish wolf hound, out of the storm. I said to him: "We were about to run a scare head about your mysterious disappearance." "O, by jove, let's do it anyway!" So we fixed it up together in a lurid style, and found him the next week.

He was an enthusiast and hated whiskey like the devil hates holy water. One of my keenest regrets is that I did not see as he saw in those days. One dreadful winter night, I rode into his house out of a driving snow storm, and found him in a state of exaltation. He was moved to write a poem and we sat up the entire night by a roaring fire in the hearth, putting together an epic about some matter that had happened in the course of the sports at Mingo. I must hunt that up and see how it flows at this late date.

I tell you who he was like when he was doing a stunt for the entertainment of the gathering after each football event, when each man had to tell a story, sing a song, or turn a somersault. He was like Harry Lauder on the stage.

This started off to be a football piece but I have been a long time approaching the subject. When the English explained football to us, it appeared that it was the principal sport of that country. That the schools played amateur football called rugby with an elongated sphere, with fifteen men on the side, but that these games though largely attended for a few games played comparatively small part in the general island football. The great professional game of soccer was the game for the highly paid experts, and as soon as we saw the difference between the educated foot and the uneducated, the whole country got animated, and there were probably as many as twenty-five teams in Pocahontas County alone. And there was a great devotion to the game. Great crowds of people lined the grounds. The season lasted from October to May, match games not being set in the dead of winter on account of snow possibilities, but practice games went on all through the winter, when the ground was bare. A man does not know what he can do with his foot until he qualifies in the game of soccer.

No age or condition seems to be wholly barred. Up on the head of Elk River there were giants in those days, captains courageous, whom nothing could daunt. One match game against another community was pulled off one day and on the Elk team there were three generations in direct line represented. In the goal, Grandfather William Gibson; in a fullback, his son James Gibson, and as a forward, Levi Gibson, grandson. And, by the way, last May, Jim Gibson, as a man sixty-eight years old, ran with the hounds after a bear from Gibson's Knob to the Hevner place on the head of Slaty Fork, and was in at the killing of the biggest bear that ever fell in these parts. Old Lame Paw, the sheep killer.

It was about this time, I think the same year, that Uncle John Hannah, up in the eighties, put on four pairs of specs and won the turkey at a rifle shooting match.

Here are the rudiments of soccer football. Take a level field about 225 by 100 yards. At each end a goal twenty feet wide, eight feet high. Eleven men to a side. Five forwards, three halfbacks, two fullbacks, and one goal keeper. The ball is placed in the center. The twenty-two men are equally spaced all over the field each side forming a triangle, the bottoms facing each other. No player may touch the ball with his hands except the goal keeper who can use both hands and feet. The great skill is displayed in dribbling the ball. That is keeping the ball at the feet and under control while running at great speed, and just before interference reaches the man with the ball, to made an accurate pass across the field to another player on the same side, or to shoot it through the goal. Each goal counts one point. The game is open and easily watched. The contests are between individuals, players being tossed for yards if caught just right on the point of the shoulder. Injuries are superficial, the greatest danger being a broken shin bone.

Football of this kind can be played on every village green. It does not take special clothes or training. And it is the very best of training in itself for the college game that the country is wild about.

We could get plenty of games near at home where the visiting teams could come and play and return in the same day. But the Mingo game requires three days—a day to go, one to play, and a day to return—so these were elaborate trips. The journey required a crossing over from the Greenbrier waters, across three or four branches of Elk River, and on to the Tygarts Valley waters. Where we played at Mingo was within a few miles of the uttermost fountain of the Ohio River.

The six and seven footers on Elk had a famous team called "Ironsides," and they were bad to beat. As between the Marlinton team and the Mingo team, the Ironsides favored the English team and we had to travel across Crooked Fork, Old Field Fork, Slaty Fork, Big Spring Fork, and Dry Fork of Elk through a hostile country.

We used to be able to describe each step of the game in the technical language of the sport. For instance: Center forward heeled the ball to the left wing who dribbled it for a matter of some thirty feet and then passed it to the right wing who immediately returned it to the left wing who took it down the side line and sidestepped interference and passed it with his left foot to the center who tried for a goal which was stopped for a moment by the goal keeper, but who was rushed by the opposing team who had been playing well up. The goal keeper and ball were hurled through the goal by the rush, Marlinton making a goal within two minutes from the time the ball was put in play.

In the picture of the ball in play in this article, Ernest Hedben, for the English team is in the act of trying for a goal, before Norman Price, his opponent gets the point of his shoulder under him and tosses him aside. Hebden being caught while on one foot will describe a parabola of some ten or twelve feet, much to the interest of the audience, and the goal-keeper will take care of the ball, maybe.

The Ironsides furnished some great athletes in those days, And by the way, Elk has the world's record for a running long jump, one that will never be equalled. Joseph Hannah, a pioneer, was made the victim of a practical joke. It was arranged to give him a scare. He was to work in the field with Old Dick, a Negro. Indian times were still fresh in the memory. Three boys fired on them from the woods. Old Dick fell down and pretended to be shot, and Hannah ran to the house, and jumped a ravine or gully, making a leap of forty-two feet.

My recollection of these English boys is wholly pleasant. I feel that they broadened our lives and that they left with us some of the fine traits of English character. I had some ups and downs with them. When I sided with the Boers in that war, some friendships were busted, but we all got together in the World's War. Jack Foster perished covered with glory in battle in South Africa. Christopher Hodson fell shot through the head in France. They are scattered to the four winds of the earth. The colony has ceased to be. And I have reached the age when—

"Come back! ye friendships long departed!
That like o'er flowing streamlets started,
And now are dwindled, one by one,
No stony channels in the sun!
Come back! ye friends, whose lives are ended,
Come back, with all that light attended.
Which seemed to darken and decay
When ye arose and went away!"

CHAPTER X

The Battle of Greenbrier Ford in the First Year of the Civil War.

Let us try to figure out the battles at Travellers Repose in 1861. There were three fights known as the battles of the Greenbrier. One was October 3, 1861, one was October 31, 1861, and one December 12, 1861. The first of these fights was the big one. The Confederates won it and called it one of the greatest victories of that year, and the Federals having lost it called a reconnoissance in force. It is the battle of October 3, that we will take up today, for it has taken many long years for me to get a comprehensive knowledge of the particulars of this fight, and I want to pass it on to students of history that come after me, while it is clear to my mind.

In a word, that fight failed because the soldiers on the Federal side, the attacking army, refused to face a heavy fire from the breastworks of the enemy coupled with a destructive fire of grapeshot from the cannon. And the regiments in front falling back in confusion carried with them the regiments behind which were backing them up. This made an awkward set of circumstances to report to Washington, and it was generally agreed that the trouble was that there had been conveyed to the front lines a bogus order to retire.

The first year of the war saw five battles in the Upper Tract. The reason being that the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike crossed the Greenbrier Valley at this place and it was one of the most important thoroughfares in the nation at the outbreak of the war. It was well served by stage coach lines and it formed a favorite route for persons from the middle west whose business or pleasure took them to Washington or Richmond. While it was never so much used as the National Pike through Pennsylvania, yet at the same time it was considered an agreeable change to come one route and go the other.

A trip across the Appalachians is a never-failing wonder to each successive generation for the folding mountains as well as the eroded mountains of this Atlantis present the most pronounced mountain scenery to be found in America. The political significance of West Virginia seceding from Virginia had made the passes of the Alleghenies the most important spots on earth to the military operations on both sides.

The Federal army had been promptly formed from the volunteers from the populous States of Ohio and Indiana and they had been rushed to Grafton by railroad and from there they had fought their way up the Tygarts Valley until they were halted in July at the summit of Cheat Mountain.

The Confederates had hurried an army to meet them, and the foremost post was at Travellers Repose, composed of troops from Arkansas, Virginia, Georgia, and other States. Among them was the 31st Virginia, of which the home company was from Greenbank district where these battles took place in 1861.

The Federal army was camped on the high divide on Cheat at an elevation of about forty-two hundred feet and twenty miles east of them on the top of the main Allegheny the Confederates were camped at an elevation of about forty-one hundred feet. They lay there for months in sight of each other. In September the Confederates attempted to pass the Federal fortifications by going through the woods and got lost and had a battle and were forced back.

The new soldiers drilled and were trained in sight of each other on these high tops. In addition to these fortified camps, the Confederates had fortified the road at the western base of Allegheny mountain, where the road dips down to an elevation of three thousand feet to cross both forks of the Greenbrier River. This fort was known as Camp Bartow. Since the building of a town on the battle field the post office once known as Travellers Repose has been changed to Bartow. This camp was named in honor of Col. Francis S. Bartow of the 7th Georgia Regiment, who was killed in the battle of Bull Run in July, 1861. The camp was commanded by Gen. H. R. Jackson, of Georgia, who no doubt named it in honor of his friend. Colonel Bartow had said just before the fight, "I shall go into the fight with a determination never to leave it alive, but in victory," was shot through the heart while rallying the 7th Georgia. He lived but a few moments but he was able to say: "They have killed me but never give up the field." This was just when the Stonewall Brigade made the wild charge which won the battle.

It is about three miles the way the road goes along the bottom land between the foot of the main Allegheny and the foot of Back Allegheny. One fork of the river to one mountain and one to the other. The one to the west is known as the West Fork, but it has also been called the North Fork and another name was the Far Fork, as well as the Fur Fork. The one to the east is the East Fork but it is called in the war dispatches the South Fork. The West Fork flows south in a nearly straight line to the forks of Greenbrier in the town of Durbin. There is little level land on the West Fork. The East Fork is the longer. It follows the foot of the Allegheny to Bartow and then flows west for about three miles. Some level beautiful farms are on this fork. At one time there was a lake here about seven miles long and half a mile broad. It was walled in by a mountain at Durbin, and when it broke and drained it left an opening called the Narrows, which is probably the best deer stand in the county. The Narrows divides the town of Durbin from the town of Frank where the big tannery is located. In the Narrows in the old days was a fine spring, and tradition is that Henry Clay had a hunting cabin at this place.

The bed of the old lake formed fine bottom lands and shortly after the Revolution, five pioneers settled in those rich lands: John Yeager, John Slaven, Abraham Burner, Moses Houchins, and Adam Arbogast, and at the outbreak of the Civil War the descendants of these men still held the lands. John Yeager the second, lived at the Top of Allegheny, and Peter D. Yeager had the bottom land where the stage stand known as Travellers Repose was located, which was the forks of the road where B. B. Beard's house stands. The Houchins and the Arbogast farms were farther up the stream where the town of Thornwood is located. The next farm along the pike was occupied by George Burner, one of the leading men of the county. This was known afterwards as the Charles Burner place. The farm on which the town of Durbin was built was occupied by J. H. Arbogast, another leading man of the mountains, and Jacob Slaven lived on the first top about four hundred feet higher to the west. All of them were secessionists. In fact there was hardly a Union man in the whole of Green Bank district. No where in the mountains were the Confederate States more solidly supported than in this district.

And the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike was the great highway that kept Pocahontas County in touch with the wide world. All sorts of distinguished travelers came through on the stages and the hospitable homes of the Upper Tract were known far and wide.

When I can first remember it the travel had fallen away and the grass grew in the pike where it crossed the Cheat country, but it has come much in evidence in the last twenty-five years since the country has been developed by the railroad building. And the days of the automobile bid fair to make it one of the favorite tourist routes.

After waiting for about two weeks in September, 1861, General Reynolds decided that he would advance an army east over the several crests until he could surround and subdue Staunton, which had become one of the most important centers in the Confederacy. The middle of September had seen him protecting the left flank of the army holding the Elkwater fort in Tygarts Valley, and he had kept Loring from passing. So he decided to do some passing himself.

He ordered the men to prepare four days' rations each and on the morning of the 3rd day of October, 1861, at the early hour of one o'clock a. m., he put his forces in motion and they marched down the mountain and crossed the Shavers Fork of Cheat, continued along the level road that leads to the divide with the waters of Greenbrier, and marched down the mountain to the Slaven plantation, and down the last hill, to the Arbogast farm at Durbin. He had about five thousand troops and six batteries of big guns. His forces were Howe's Battery, Fourth Regular Artillery, Loomis' Battery, Michigan Volunteer Battery, Daum's Battery, and Virginia Volunteer Artillery. Twenty-fourth, Twenty-fifth and Thirty-second Ohio Regiments, and Seventh, Ninth, Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Seventeenth Indiana Regiments of Infantry, Robinson's Ohio Cavalry, Greenfield's Pennsylvania Cavalry and Brackman's Indiana Cavalry.

Opposed to them were the Third Arkansas, First Georgia, Twelfth Georgia, Twenty-third Virginia, Thirty-first Virginia, Rice's Battery and Schumaker's Battery.

The Federals got to Durbin about sun up in the morning and saw an advance guard under Colonel Edward Johnson in front of them in or above the Narrows. They set up a cannon or two and fired at them, and the advance guard fell back in good order and the Federals marched up the road and through the fields. Johnson had his horse shot from under him and killed in this engagement. He held the column up for an hour and it was not until six cannon had opened on him, and a flanking movement started on his right hand that he retired to the main works at Camp Bartow.

The Federal army placed two batteries in front of the Confederate breastworks. These batteries were six guns in the meadow about half way from the Burner house to the East Fork, and two guns on the other side of the turnpike.

The Confederate batteries were on a low hill to the north of the pike back of B. B. Beard's house, where there are embankments still plainly to be seen. And in addition Lieutenant Wooding placed a gun in the turnpike directly in front of B. B. Beard's house from which he fired ninety rounds that day point-blank at the enemy across the river bottom or obliquely down and across the river at the Federal batteries. He was highly praised in the dispatches for his men got killed off pretty rapidly. The big guns kept up a steady firing from seven in the morning until two-thirty in the afternoon. A rifled cannon that the Confederates expected would do great damage, was a severe disappointment, for after the first few rounds they could not get the shot down on account of the barrel fouling. The ball stuck and could not be dislodged until Sergt. Timothy H. Stamps could get to the battle from Monterey. There was more powder burned in the big guns during that seven hours than in any other battle in the mountains. It was a great day for noise.

But all this cannon firing was meant to afford cover for infantry work. It will be remembered that the turnpike is an east and west road and that there is a north and south road paralleling the river. This Huntersville road comes to the turnpike at the bridge and crosses the east fork there, and runs with it across the level bottom, and then turns up the river at the foot of the mountain lying between the forks. The Confederate breastworks overlooked a run coming into the river above the bridge and continued at an elevation of something like two hundred feet around to the rivers passing east of the tavern to where the river hugs the foot of the mountain. In this way they commanded the road coming from Durbin from both sides.

General Reynolds proceeded to send infantry against both ends of the Confederate breastworks. It looks like one could hardly call it a flanking movement for these detachments did not attempt to swing in wide circles. It looks like the plan was to let the artillery keep everything hot along the turnpike, while a force was thrown against the left end of the Confederate works, and another against the right end of the Confederate position.

Jackson evidently expected to face a wide flung encircling movement for he had sent Johnson away up the river more than a mile, and he was clear above the place that the Federals attempted to cross.

Jackson entrusted the defense of his left (down the river), to Colonel Rust and his Arkansas troops. It will be remembered that the Federals had a right large order in that they had to charge across wide open fields, ford a small river, and climb a steep hill to take a fortified camp.

Rust marched down the road towards Green Bank until he had drawn away from the river some little distance and was on an elevation overlooking the river. He then marched by the end of the breastworks and took a station between the breastworks and the stream, and before he could form his men, the Federal batteries commenced a rapid fire, and a regiment of infantry left the road at the Burner homestead and marched across the meadow and waded the river and climbed the hill, but the Arkansas troops met them at the crest of the hill and fired on them, and made it so warm that this regiment went back down the hill and waded back across the river and found a reserve regiment by the Burner barn, and marched up the hill on the other side of the road. This was when Rust was considering following the Federals across the river and making a charge on the troops in the road and the battery in the meadow.

This movement of the Federal troops moving first to the right and then to the left of the road puzzled the Arkansas commander. It now appears that there was a very acrimonious discussion going on there at the Burner place as to what were the orders, one colonel being most positive that the orders were to charge on one side, and the other being that the charge should be made on the other side of the road. And it would appear that the regiment that got across the river and had to retreat decided the argument, for both regiments went into the woods to the north of the turnpike and materially added to the retreat and confusion that soon occurred in that quarter.

The Federal plan to win was by throwing full half of their forces to the north of the road and to charge across the open meadow and wade the river and to fall on the Confederates along the pike as it starts up the Allegheny Mountain. And this might have succeeded better if he had gone way up the river and crossed and come down as the Confederates expected them to do.

The mountain rising from the Burner house and facing the Allegheny is called Burner Mountain and rises to some four thousand feet and extends for miles north walling in the East Fork. It is around the shoulder of this mountain that the East Fork turns.

The Federal army as it came from the west turned into the shelter of this standing timber and clambered around the face of the mountain, until they had turned the corner. They then faced the breastworks of the Confederates and were distant less than half a mile. The forest was clad in the many colors of autumn, but the leaves were still upon the trees. There was abundant cover for the attacking army so long as they stayed upon the hill, but the moment they left the mountain they were in cleared, level, bottom fields, across which they would have to advance in the face of a galling rifle fire and grapeshot from the big guns.

In massing the Federal troops on the wooded sides of Burner Mountain, the first halt seemed to be opposite the center of the Confederate breastworks which would be on a line that would cross the river just above the bridge, but it was a wide open space in which to make an infantry charge. And about this time the Federals observed the Confederate force waiting up the river, a mile or so above the bridge.

It was then seen that they would be exposed to a fire on their left flank if they attempted to cross the bottom at that place, so the first regiments to come sidled up the hill under cover until they got to a point about half a mile up the river from the bridge and at this place the woods crept down across the road leading to Thornwood, and consequently the advance could be made to the edge of the meadow under cover of the forest. The regiment in advance came to the edge of the meadow at this point, and taking shelter in the fringe of the forest opened up a fire across the river with long range rifles, and as this firing continued the other regiments including the regiments that were meant to charge the other end of the works came around the mountain and an overwhelming force was getting ready to charge. But the firing of the advance regiment caused the whole power of the Confederate artillery to be directed at the place where this rifle firing had begun, and it was so galling and terrifying that the regiment gave way and fell back in confusion, and the regiments in turn gave way, according to the Federal reports, in obedience to an order to about face and march off of the hill.

The Confederate reports say that it was a panic, because they could hear the orders of the officers commanding them to rally and reform for a charge.

Reynolds was satisfied with it and reported a successful reconnaissance. Just as Lee did when he appeared before the Elkwater fortifications. On the other hand the Confederates regarded the battle of the Greenbrier as a great victory and an important battle won.

The turning point of the battle was the discussion of the orders between the two Federal colonels.

Said Colonel Richardson: "My regiment is to attack on my right."

"Not at all," said Colonel Wilder, "You are to attack the enemy's right."

And that is another case of the poverty of our language and the difficulty of conveying thought. But for that the day might have ended differently.

Reynolds got back to his comfortable camp that night, having marched twenty-four miles and fought a battle with green troops.

Loss in killed and wounded: Federals 43; Confederates 52, including 13 missing. The Federals lost one stand of colors.

CHAPTER XI

The Battle of the Top of the Allegheny on December 13, 1861.

This is an article about the Battle of the Top of Allegheny, fought in Pocahontas County, December 13, 1861, between the forces of the Union under Gen. R. H. Milroy, and the forces of the Confederacy, under Gen. W. W. Loring, Col. Edward Johnson, commanding.

The two commands had camped within sight of each other since the 13th day of July, the day that the Federal forces had occupied the place at White's on Cheat Mountain. For five months the hostile camps had watched the smoke rising from the camp fires, across one of the big valleys of West Virginia. Each camp was in the high altitude of more than four thousand feet above the sea level.

The Federal advance had been here blocked and the summer and fall had been passed with battles and skirmishes and an extraordinary effort was planned by Milroy. Both armies were on the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, a famous stage road which enjoyed in its time much of the travel that afterwards was accommodated by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The Federal camp was known officially as Camp Cheat Mountain Summit. The Confederate camp was known officially as Camp Baldwin, named in honor of a Confederate colonel of that name. Between the two for a good part of the time, and until the winter fastened down was Camp Bartow, named after a Confederate general who was killed at the first battle of Bull Run. This was at the ford of the East Fork of Greenbrier River at Travellers Repose, now the town of Bartow.

The Confederates had made a winter camp on top of Allegheny Mountain by erecting log cabins. As you go along the road there now you can see piles of stone placed at regular intervals which represent the chimneys of those cabins. You can see the trenches and fortifications at Cheat, Bartow, and Allegheny to this day. I have a recollection of seeing the log cabins on Allegheny Mountain. The pike climbs the mountain from its foot at Bartow to the top in long easy grades and it is an eight to ten-mile journey. The top of the mountain is a wind-swept pasture of good grazing land and the pike lies for some miles through this level tableland before it descends on the eastern side. In making the attack, the Federals had to climb up the side of the mountain and fight on top of the table.

There were three battles at the Greenbrier ford, October 3, October 31, and December 12. The Federals were repulsed in the first two engagements and returned to their camp on the top of Cheat. The advance of December 12 found the camp at the Greenbrier deserted, but on that day Maj. D. H. Ross, of the Fifty-second Virginia, had been dispatched to that point with 106 men to form an ambuscade on the road between Durbin and Bartow. When the advance guard came up, Ross and his men fired on them and killed ten men and wounded a number of others. The Federals deployed and advanced in great force and Ross withdrew and reached Camp Baldwin that night.

Ambrose Bierce was marching with the Federals that day. If ever

I have a literary executioner, he will find that years ago I referred casually to Ambrose Bierce as a Confederate soldier, being misled by an article of his that appeared shortly after he came back here to visit his fighting ground. I understood him to say that he had camped at Bartow, and naturally I jumped to the conclusion that he was a Confederate.

Since reading more of his books I am better informed now. He tells of a horror that was incidental to the battles of December 12 and 13. He said that after they had started to advance from Cheat, they marched down the mountain all day and up the other mountain all night.

The firing at the foot of the mountain halted the advancing columns for a time but after the nest had been cleared out the army reached the forks of the road where the Green Bank road joins the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, where B. B. Beard now lives. Then it was the old tavern known as Travellers Repose where the stage coaches changed horses.

At this place the army was divided. Something like half of them marched down the Green Bank road and turned at the Uriah Heavener farm and climbed the road that is still used as a short cut up the leading ridge between Saulsbury Run and Buffalo Run.

The rest continued up the pike. As the battle was scheduled to begin before daylight, the dead were not buried but were laid on the upper side of the road and covered with blankets. As the soldiers passed that way many of them stopped to look at the dead boys to see if they recognized a friend among them. The next day as they returned from the battle ground defeated, they found that a drove of hogs had been at the bodies and had eaten the faces of the dead men. The soldiers fired a volley and killed the hogs and gathered up the dead soldiers and buried them. This dreadful thing is described by Ambrose Bierce in his book entitled "Iconoclastic Memories of the Civil War." He said that when they got in sight of the dead men on that retreat, it seemed that they had moved and tossed their coverings off. War is too great a price to pay for glory.

It will be remembered that when the pike gets within a mile of the top of the mountain that it makes a sharp curve to the south and from there it climbs gently to the top where it passes a church. The Federal army left the pike at that curve and climbed directly up the hillside, the purpose being to get in behind the camp. But there were pickets out and the camp was alarmed by their shots at 4:15 that winter morning, and the Confederates marched several companies out to meet the Federals as they came to the top. The Federal army came to the edge of the forest and waited until near daylight and then advanced into the open field and the firing became general. The opposing lines swung back and forwards and at one stage of the battle the Confederates on this, their right flank, were driven to take shelter in their log cabins, and there was fighting all over the place from seven in the morning until two in the afternoon.

The party advancing up the crest of Buffalo Ridge failed in its purpose of surprising the camp. On that side of the camp there were trenches prepared to guard both roads and there was some very efficient artillery. The trenches were full of soldiers prepared for the emergency but when the Federals first appeared, Captain Anderson, of the Lee Battery, thinking that it was a band of pickets being driven in, sprang up on the side of the trench and called to them to hurry up and get into the trenches. He was shot and instantly killed by the troops and the fighting went on until the retreat was sounded and the Federal army made its slow and disconsolate way back to Cheat Mountain Summit. According to the dispatches that went in to the Confederate headquarters it was a great battle and a great victory. According to the report sent in by the Federals it was a reconnaissance in force. According to the Confederate reports 1,200 Confederates had repulsed an army of 5,000. The Federal reports show that they had 1,760 men and the Confederates had 2,500. Now that the Federal reports and the Confederate reports are printed in the same book, it is to be noticed that this same discrepancy always may be expected.

The damage done was as follows: Federal loss, 20 dead, 107 wounded, 10 missing, total 147. Confederate loss, 20 killed, 98 wounded, 28 missing, total 146.

As a Christmas gift, J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of War, wrote that President Jefferson Davis having been informed of the valor of Col. Edward Johnson in repulsing a vastly superior force, was much gratified at the news of success, and had made him a brigadier general.

This was the last battle of the season of 1861 on the Staunton and Parkersburg Tunrpike. The troops went into winter quarters. Ambrose Bierce says that he spent many a winter day in the snow up to his knees tracking bears to their dens. I fear his memory of bear hunts was not accurate for the Cheat Mountain bears usually hole up prior to the first big snow and hibernate. Still there may have been so many soldiers among the thornless blackberries of Cheat in the summer that the bears did not get fat enough to sleep.

April 1, General Fremont commanding the Mountain Department, wrote to Milroy at Huttonsville to get ready to take the road again. The Mountain Department consisted of something like thirty-four thousand soldiers divided into six districts. Cumberland, Railroad, Cheat Mountain, Kanawha, Big Sandy, and Cumberland Gap. Cheat Mountain had 6,082 men. On the 6th of April, 1862, Milroy marched into the deserted camp on top of the Allegheny and took charge. On the 12th of April he had reached Monterey, and routed a Confederate force, and on May 8, he met the Confederates under Stonewall Jackson at McDowell and suffered a defeat, and he then abandoned the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike and went around another way, extricating his army by way of Franklin and the South Branch Valley.

About this time in the beginning of the second year of the war with the troops swept out from northern West Virginia, the irregular fighters commenced to cause trouble. They called them guerillas at first but afterwards they coined the word bushwhacker for them, meaning one who shoots from ambush. It was the curse of a brave and impetuous people such as are to be found in the mountains, that they could not help taking part in the fighting, whether they had been sworn in as soldiers or not. They carried guns like city men carry canes, and they shot on one side or other according to their convictions. Milroy wrote to Fremont that such bands were being mustered in and asked that Governor Pierpoint, at Wheeling send recruiters to hold as many to the Federal side as possible.

I think that a personal letter that Gen. J. D. Imboden wrote from the mountains gives as good a picture as can be had of the irregular troops. It was while he was marching through the mountains as a colonel with his regiment, and he writes from the Forks of Waters, Highland County:

"There are no troops of consequence west of Beverly. Just in the edge of the village of St. George, I was riding some distance ahead of my men and suddenly came upon old John Snyder and one of the Parsons, both armed with rifles. Parsons fled and I got into a fight with Snyder. Just as he was aiming at me with his long rifle, I fired at him with my revolver. He dropped his gun like a hot potato and leaned forward on the neck of his horse and escaped into the laurel. Pursuit was immediate but he escaped. I have since learned from some refugees that I wounded him badly, though I fear not mortally. I had a fair shot at about 50 yards and I aimed at his hips. We were bushwacked about half a day in Tucker as we fell back from St. George by Union men, but the cowardly scoundrels went so far up the mountains that they only hit one of my men, and he was but slightly wounded in the foot. I sent out a whole company once to try to catch three bushwackers, but it was impossible to come up with them in the brush. If I had caught them I intended hanging them in five minutes. The greatest difficulty in our way out here is the infernal Union men. They carry intelligence and bushwack us when they can, and yet will swear allegiance a dozen times a day. The proper policy to pursue towards Union men who are not in arms as soldiers is one of the most difficult problems that I have to deal with."

The private soldiers found the winter long on Cheat Mountain and Milroy at Huttonsville grew restive before it was over. On March 16, 1862, he was chafing at the delay. That day he wrote to Gen. W. S. Rosecrans a plan of a campaign. He proposed to take his 3,000 infantry and march to a point seven miles east of the summit of Cheat Mountain, and instead of trying to go by the pike which was blocked by Camp Baldwin, he would turn to the right at the foot of the mountain and go to Green Bank eight miles from Baldwin. This road was not entirely cut out, referring, no doubt, to timber blockades so commonly used in this section during that war. At Huntersville twenty miles from Green Bank he would sweep out of the way the Confederate force consisting of twelve or thirteen hundred soldiers and two pieces of artillery. Here he suggested that he would wait until he could be reinforced by General Cox from Lewisburg. With that force he would cross over the Frost Gap into Highland and get to the rear of the camp on the Allegheny, which had at that time about 2,000 men. His greatest need was for some modern cannon. He had smooth bores and he wanted rifled guns. The reason for haste was that the day before had been set for the drafting of the militia of Pocahontas and Highland counties and that many citizens to escape the draft were hiding in the mountains and trying to escape. Seven had arrived the day before and they told him that General Johnson had been to Richmond to tell the war department that if he was not reinforced by 5,000 troops, that the Yankees would surround him. Milroy closed by saying that he feared the game he watched so long might escape him.

On the 19th day of March, three days later he wrote that forty-six refugees from Pocahontas and Highland counties had come to him to escape being drafted into the rebel army; that the penalty to refuse to be drafted was death.

Milroy moved a couple of weeks later and found that the game he had watched so long had really escaped.

March 31, 1862, Milroy at Huttonsville reported that refugees continued to come into his camp in great destitution in squads of from 5 to 25. This day twelve arrived from Pocahontas County and reported that the impressment still continued. A report came that 300 Confederate guerillas attacked a Union settlement in Pendleton County and were repulsed by 75 Union citizens. Confederates were reinforced and citizens driven back. Milroy had sent Major Webster and 300 men of the 25th Ohio to their assistance.

On April 12, 1862, Milroy wrote from Monterey that all kinds of bad men were organizing into gangs in western Virginia to plunder and devastate the counties there. One of the "cut-throats" that he had captured had blank commissions signed by Governor Letcher for guerilla captains and lieutenants. (We called them rangers.) Milroy suggested that if there was a live governor in Wheeling that he be sent out to organize Union home guards.

April 16, 1862, Gen. Geo. Crook reports that he is not able to apprehend the bushwhackers. He wrote from Summerville. He said they took to the woods and disintegrated and hid and then reassembled for fresh depredations. He thinks that if the Federal soldiers were withdrawn that the Union citizens would defend themselves but that they would not raise a hand while the army was there.

April 4, 1862, Gen. William Skeen wrote to the Confederate headquarters that these men that Virginia had authorized to organize as rangers for the home defense were devastating the country, and had killed three citizens of Pocahontas County and stolen fifteen horses. He complained of them as bitterly as did the Federal generals.

April 18, 1862, General Fremont ordered General Milroy, General Schenck, and Col. T. M. Harris to break up and destroy the guerilla organizations. "All adult males found at the houses of Sylvanus Harper, of Bennett, of Hedwick, of Ferris, and the Arbigasses, should be arrested, and every effort made to kill or capture all who belong to those bands in that vicinity."

May 1, 1862, Milroy wrote from McDowell that the guerillas had captured 20 wagons and 80 horses, and that he had compelled the neighborhood to furnish another wagon train and horses.

May 9, 1862, Crook wrote again from Summersville, that he had had word that 300 Moccasin Rangers were raiding Webster County and that he had sent an expedition there, but had found but three and they were too sick to be removed.

It will be seen by these reports at the time that the mountain men had divided in sentiment and had gone to war on their own hook. It was here that the word bushwhacker was coined. The dictionary says that it was a name for a Confederate guerilla, but we know it was used to designate anyone who shot from the brush. The soldiers who rode in these mountains believed that they were able by a sixth sense to feel the presence of bushwhackers, just as it was the belief that in Indian times, that the settlers had premonition of the coming of the Indians into a community.

During the first year of the war, the western waters were invested with a number of armies and there was hardly a county where there were not troops. In the mountains these soldiers covered all the territory. When they were withdrawn after the battle of the Allegheny, then it was that hundreds if not thousands of able-bodied mountain men took up arms to defend themselves, and there were uneasy times.

Soldiers at home on furloughs responded to appeals for assistance and little armies would spring up in a day and have a skirmish, and disband as quickly as they had come together. It was but an echo of the minute men of the Revolution.

The courts did not meet and the citizens suffered from the needs of soldiers of both armies and from the irregular troops. It is certain that nowhere in the country was there such peril to inhabitants as in these mountain counties. In the northwestern counties, the Federal arms from the first provided safety for the citizens, but in counties on both sides of the Allegheny there was great distress and danger on account of the strength that was divided between the two sides.

One general took to arresting men who had sons in the Confederate army, and he was quickly recalled, for it so often happened in these cases that the prisoners had sons in the Federal army also, and he retired before a storm of his own raising.

Word has recently come that Ambrose Bierce, who disappeared about 1913, went to Mexico during the days of General Villa and that he attached himself to the body of men surrounding that insurgent; that he was tired and sick of existence and so conducted himself that he was shot and killed in some way in that war.

CHAPTER XII

Battle of Cheat Mountain. This is a study of troops from the lowlands in the high mountains.

A mountaineer is an inhabitant of a mountain region as opposed to lowlander who lives on the levels or low-lying lands. The mountaineer is the wilder of the two. He is more active, more virile, and wilder. He grows strong with the struggle to maintain life. As compared to him the lowlander is as one who is down and therefore fears no fall. He is very sedate, he is good to his mate, and fond of amusement, too, he lives in a flat and is apt to grow fat, of a breed that runs even and true. But the mountaineer bold, is a hard man to hold, he has hair on the back of his hands, he leads in the ruction, of war and destruction, and is ready to meet all demands.

It is a study to see the lowlander trying to be familiar with the mountains. He is like a fish out of water. They overawe him and he steps high and softly when he is among them and leaves them at the first decent opportunity. There is no question but that the mountains get his goat.

For many years the first map makers of the colonies would lay down the Appalachian range and mark the maps, impassable mountains. It was accepted as a fact that the snow never melted on them in the summer time, and that no matter how far an explorer succeeded in clambering over them, still higher mountains presented themselves as barriers to his progress. And they insisted that the country was so broken and uneven it could never be good for anything.

The lowlander today when he comes to the mountains for the first time suffers from a hypersensitive condition and is afflicted with a mild attack of mountain sickness caused by a rarer air than he has been accustomed to. This is not pronounced enough to endanger his health but it does cause a feeling of discomfort and he is inclined to be critical of what he sees. It is the provincialism and the malaria working out, aggravated by the jumbled masses that tower over him. He never realizes that the mountaineers actually prize their mountains and that they despise the dead level of the plains. The mountaineer especially cherishes a noisy stream. He does not like the still waters so highly spoken of in the twenty-third Psalm.

There must be something in common between mountain sickness and sea sickness, for when a man with imagination finds himself upon the vast ocean for the first time and realizes the awe of the mighty deep, he generally tries to throw up his toe nails. And they say that is caused by the pitching of the boat. It is more apt to be the hypersensitive condition of being confronted by nature in an awe-inspiring form.

If it is the pitching of the boat why is it that little children, and aged persons, and the blind do not show the same symptoms? One of the remedies for sea sickness is to blindfold the patient.

Charles Kingsley said: "My first feeling on entering the high woods was helplessness, confusion, awe, all but terror."

Percy Bysshe Shelley said: "I never knew—I never imagined what mountains were before. The immensity of these aurial summits excited, when they suddenly burst upon the sight, a sentiment of ecstatic wonder, not unallied to madness."

And the gentleman from Chicago in the mountains disapproved of the scenery as "ungodly," and the experience of his traveling companion whose stomach departed from him.

It is the intention in this article to relate how Cheat Mountain got the collective goat of an army in war time and changed the history of the country.

A few years ago as the wilderness of Cheat Mountain was being timbered off the workmen would come upon old muskets, sabers, and bayonets lost in these uplands of hell by a lost army of demoralized men who had been sent into those tangled thickets to turn the position of a fortified camp at White's Top. These men suffered peril and privation and no one ever knew how many of them left their bones to whiten in the forest.

At the beginning of the Civil War which was to be ended in ninety days the prophets all thought that it would be fought out in the mountains of West Virginia. When Virginia wrenched loose from the constitution a part of the great corner stone of the Republic adhered to the Union and both north and south rushed armies to hold the fragment.

McClellan swept everything before him for he had railroad transportation into the center of the state, while the Confederates were gathering from the Cotton States and from Virginia by slow marching and wagon trains over the endless mountains. By the middle of the summer McClellan had a large army in Tygarts Valley just below where the Elkwater Creek comes in from the west. Here the valley had narrowed and that army dug one of the biggest trenches and bunkers of the war to hold the road. To keep the fort from being flanked and surprised from behind, another army had made a most elaborate fortified camp at White's Top of Cheat on the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike. This place also lent itself to easy defense. The road here passes through a gap between two beautiful hills, and the soldiers fortified both sides of it. To capture the forts would require a charge up the steep hillsides, and to pass between them would invite a sudden and complete destruction to an army.

The Confederate forces took all of the Greenbrier Valley, the next valley east of Tygart's Valley. They had armies at Bartow, and at Huntersville (Camp Northwest), and at Marlinton. These troops came from all over the south. They had been rushed there owing to the fact that it soon became apparent that West Virginia west of the great divide was not going to put many troops in the field to aid secession.

And as there was no one in command of the several armies, that is, no commander in chief, enter the great Robert E. Lee, as fine a Virginian gentleman as ever broadened an a. Graduated in 1829 first in his class at West Point. Head of that institution later. A colonel in the army. Resident at Arlington on the Potomac. He resigned from the service of the Union with regret to cast his fortunes with Virginia. He was made major general of Virginia and commander in chief of Virginia's troops in April, 1861, but on the formation of the Confederacy, his rank was fixed as brigadier general and he was ordered to the Greenbrier Valley to take command of the units here. At Camp Northwest, there was General Loring, a North Carolinian, who outranked Lee. At Marlinton Col. Henry R. Jackson, of Georgia, was in command.

He was in charge of green troops in the wettest summer that this county ever saw. We had thirteen inches of rain in August this year and seven inches in December with wet weather at other times, and it has been compared to the year 1861 for genuine wetness.

His troops were volunteers and amateurs in the art of war. They were destined to become seasoned troops later in the war but there was a lot of sickness in the camps that summer. Lee made his main camp on the Seneca Trail twenty miles north of Marlinton. All the histories say that he rested on Valley Mountain. That is true in part for that was the pass that his forefront watched, but his main camp was south of the pass through Middle Mountain, the next mountain south of Valley Mountain, and the signs there today show the greatest amount of work.

The two armies faced each other on the pike for upwards of two months both waiting to give battle.

Speaking about green troops, many years after the war some city men came to this county to hunt and were the guests of one of the leading men of the county at his plantation. The topic of the war came up and something brought to mind the 808th Virginia regiment. One of the city men told a tale: "Headquarters sent an inspector to report on the 808th and 809th regiments. The letter that he got said that headquarters had heard that the 808th and 809th were nothing but bands of organized horse thieves. Investigate and report. The inspector replied that he had looked them over and that the report was not exactly correct. That the 808th was an organized gang of horse thieves, but that the 809th was an unorganized gang of horse thieves."

A glimmer of a smile appeared on the face of one or two in the room but as for the host, fierce he broke forth: "It's a damned lie—I belonged to the 809th!" And it was one of the most embarrassing moments the witty man ever knew.

But there were not many mountain men in the armies. Henry A. Wise of the Horse Pistol, wrote from Bungers Mill, four miles west of Lewisburg, August 1, 1861, that West Virginia was gone so far as the Confederacy was concerned and that the people of the western waters were submitting, debased and subdued in the belief that the Confederacy could never retake the northwestern part of the State, and that he had fallen back from Kanawha not a minute too soon.

The most of the troops who honored this county with their presence that summer were lowlanders from the cotton country and that is why the mountain got them.

Valley Mountain as soon as it crosses the turnpike and commences to tower in the air is called Cheat Mountain and it is as bold a rampart as is to be found in the State. It curves around away from the pass like a horseshoe and the eastern side is Back Allegheny, and the side that looks down on Elkwater and Huttonsville is Cheat. In this horseshoe the main fork of Cheat River heads and by the time it gets to where the Staunton and Parkersburg road crosses it about twenty miles in an air line, it is a considerable stream. Up against the outer rim of the horseshoe the Ohio River heads as the Tygarts Valley River. Lee must have felt that summer that he was biting on granite. Sickness in the camp, and nothing going right. He planned to attack the fortification at Elkwater about the middle of September. The army at Bartow was to cross the wilderness and fall in behind the forces at White's Top on the pike, and while a part of the troops held the army on White's Top, the rest would drop down into Tygarts Valley and march up stream and attack the fortification in the rear, while Lee marched down stream and gave them what-for in their front. Never was a battle better planned and never was one worse executed, but to one who knows what the spruce woods on top of Cheat are like, it is apparent that Lee could not have known the character of the country, or he would not have required it of them.

Lee had not seen any of the spruce woods. His camps were all in hardwood territory where a man may walk with some degree of comfort and speed. But to take an army in the night time through the jungles of Cheat was an unheard of project. The evergreens are as thick as wheat in a field. There are great patches of laurel a bear could hardly penetrate. The dense growth of something like a hundred thousand board feet to the acre means that the ground is covered with decaying trunks. There are plants there that are called hobblerod that make a passage painful and difficult. And there are windfalls that cannot be negotiated in the night time.

And realizing that the pike was sealed, the orders were on the night of September 13, to climb the mountain and parallel the pike on both sides and silently pass over the mountains and fall in behind the enemy at White's Top.

You will remember that after topping Back Allegheny Mountain it is some miles across a boggy, swampy country, so covered with fir that the sun could hardly light it in the daytime, and once across that, Cheat Mountain was to be climbed.

To add to the horrors of those southern boys from a warm climate, the first snow of the winter began to fall that night and when the men got into that dank morass through which Cheat River winds its murky way, they scattered. All sense of direction was lost and the soldiers were cold and freezing, lost and bewildered. Few shots were exchanged with the enemy. It is to be supposed that a few of the soldiers would drift out that way but as it was uphill, not very many. Under circumstances like this men throw away their arms and engage in a mad scramble to get somewhere, or else sit down under a tree and stay there until they die.

Of course, the greater number found their way back to camp or to the Valley Mountain camp, but it was days before the army was in shape to present a warlike front. The attack of September 14 had failed because the mountains took a hand in the business and it was destined that these troops should not make a battle field out of the smiling meadows near the Elkwater.

To give you some idea of how dense the growth may be in Cheat, sometime ago a party of us in that difficult country came on a growth of young fir trees covering a great acreage that we estimated to grow forty-five thousand trees to the acre. The top of this forest looks as closely woven as carpet.

Loring had charge of this flanking movement. Putting one and one together, we find that the army was lost in the wilderness on the night of the 13th of September, and that on the next day Lee sent down from his Valley Mountain camp a reconnoitering party under the command of Maj. John A. Washington and that this party approaching the Federal breastworks were fired upon and Major Washington was killed. There can be little doubt but that Lee sent that party down the valley to ascertain, if he could, whether the army had got across Cheat, and was in the valley north of and below the Elkwater fort.

In the meantime Lee was bedeviled with the troubles of two contending rivals, those roosters, General Floyd and General Wise who were quarreling in the Kanawha Valley as to which was in supreme command, both calling on Lee to support their contentions, as Lee was the highest officer of Virginia, though only a brigadier general of the Confederacy. What is a surprise to most people is to hear that Gen. Robert E. Lee did not become commander-in-chief of all the Confederate forces until 1865, just before the war closed.

Lee evidently decided not to attack the strongly fortified Federals at either of their impregnable forts. Anyway there was no more fighting that year on the Randolph and Pocahontas line near Mingo Flats nor yet at White's Top.

After that Lee evidently decided to remain on the defensive. And the Federals had been on the defensive the whole time.

Now here is a bit of history that will not be found in any of the books or dispatches, but I got it from eye-witnesses, most reliable men, and while it was still fresh in their minds. I taught a school at Big Spring on the site of Lee's encampment. The old men told me that the wet summer of 1861 terminated in one of the biggest rains that ever fell in these mountains producing one of the greatest flood ever known in these streams, and that the big rain of all rains culminated in a downpour that lasted all night, and that by daylight next morning, both armies, Federal and Confederate, had broken camp in the night and the tempest, and that both were in headlong retreat. The Confederates fled south up the Old Field Fork of Elk and cut a timber barricade at Crooked Fork at the foot of Elk Mountain. I have seen this barricade myself. The Federal forces retreated down Tygarts River, and it was the case with both armies that a number of men were drowned in the fordings of the creeks.

The Union forces turned east at Huttonsville and marched towards Staunton and fought the battle of Greenbrier, the battle of the Top of Allegheny, the battle of Monterey, and the Battle of McDowell, all on the Staunton and Parkersburg Pike. Stonewall Jackson turned them at McDowell and they went by Franklin.

Lee having extricated his army went to Richmond, and soon after that he was sent to take charge of the coast defenses of South Carolina and Georgia and he spent the first winter of the war in the far South.

The passway on top of Valley Mountain is the southeastern corner of the district of West Augusta, and when the troops in the night time reached the summit of Back Allegheny Mountain looking down on the Greenbrier River they crossed over the eastern line of West Augusta, and that dreadful night they passed in the spruce woods was on West Augusta territory.

I can find no evidence of Lee having gone into southern West Virginia that fall. Wise and Floyd fought it out down there with more or less success but their armies marched east across the mountains before winter. And to the north the Confederates fell back to the top of the Allegheny practically evacuating all of the western waters at the end of the first year's campaign.

Last summer the new highway over Middle Mountain and Valley

Mountain was being graded as Route 24, or Seneca Trail, and at one place the excavation uncovered a great army dump pile in which all sorts of war trophies were to be found ranging from muskets to parts of cannon. This was left by Lee's first command in the civil war.

The only luck that the Federal forces had in 1861 was in West Virginia, and I will always believe that the mountains won that for them.

Ambrose Bierce was a Union soldier in camp at White's Top, at the time of the movement on September 14. He was a seasoned trooper, having served his first three months and beginning on his second enlistment. He does not know that an attack was made or contemplated.

He says: "It was a strange country. Nine in ten of us had never seen a mountain, nor a hill, as high as a church spire, until we had crossed the Ohio River. In power upon the emotions nothing, I think, is comparable to a first sight of mountains. To a member of a plains tribe, born and reared on the flats of Ohio or Indiana, a mountain region was a perpetual miracle. Space seemed to have taken on a new dimension; areas to have not only length and breadth, but thickness. Modern literature is full of evidence that our great grandfathers looked upon mountains with aversion and horrors."

He was speaking of the time that he guarded a pass on the summit of Cheat Mountain through which no one wanted to go, and on a road that led from nowhere to the southeast.

As for Robert E. Lee when he found his summer's work reduced to nothing by this great mishap of the jungle, he was inclined to believe the report that the mountaineer guide had misled his troops and lost them in the fen, and for a time it looked like he was about ready to hang a certain young Pocahontas County man who had undertaken to guide the army. But Lee must have found out that he had been at fault himself in ordering his men to penetrate the Cheat Bottom in the night time, for nobody was executed and the guide lived to be an old man and a respected citizen of this county.

CHAPTER XIII

Battle of Elkwater. When General R. E. Lee gave up the northwestern part of Virginia as a bad job.

The battle of Elkwater was the Civil War battle that was never fought. There was some slaughter but both sides drew back without going on with the great conflict that was staged. Both sides were on the defensive. The Federal forces were dug in in Tygarts Valley, Randolph County, below the mouth of the considerable creek called Elkwater, for the purpose of holding the Confederates from marching into the northwestern part of West Virginia, and the Confederates were entrenched on Middle Mountain to hold the Federal army from marching through Marlinton, Huntersville, and Warm Springs, and taking possession of the Virginia Central Railroad at Millboro. That is the reason that both armies were content to face each other for eight weeks during the summer months of 1861.

Robert E. Lee to the end of the war shone more as a dfeensive strategist than he did in his offensive movements. In this he was the antithesis of Stonewall Jackson, who came down on them like a wolf on the fold. Note Lee's failure in the Gettysburg campaign.

The Federal forces were flushed with the victories of Philippi, Rich Mountain and Carrick's Ford. McClellan had won these and it made him commander-in-chief, so he went to Washington to take charge of the far-flung battle lines, and left General Reynolds to make a fortified camp at Elkwater, while General Rosecrans marched on to Kanawha.

The road from Marlinton to Elkwater, now called the Seneca Trail is almost due north and south. From Marlinton it is more or less up hill for seven miles until it tops Elk Mountain. Then it descends a short distance to the upper waters of Elk River and follows the Old Field Fork down for about nine miles to the forks, crossing Slaty Fork near its mouth; there to the Big Spring of Elk Fork. The pike follows this stream to the post office Linwood, four miles, and then continues north ascending Middle Mountain two miles, then across a head of a hollow about a mile to the top of Valley Mountain, the line between Randolph County and Pocahontas County, and thence about ten miles to the Elkwater fort. It was an important pike at the beginning of the Civil War, being one of the Commonwealth's highways, under the internal improvement schemes that Virginia had engaged in so heavily for thirty-odd years immediately prior to the war.

The country is, and was at that time nearly all cleared and the road lined with fine farms between Marlinton and Elkwater.

The Union army had won signal victories in Randolph and Tucker counties July 11, 12 and 13, 1861, and the news had just time to spread over the nation for a general rejoicing, when on July 21st, the Confederates won a big battle at Bull Run and convinced the North that there was serious trouble ahead.

McClellan was ordered to leave some one in command in the mountains and get the war going again.

He arranged to hold the Confederates back. The immense size of the ditch and bank at Elkwater is still to be noticed. So it is not surprising to find an order to the effect that this was to be an extra big barrier, as well as the one on Cheat Mountain. That is evidence enough that the Federals did not propose to advance any farther into the enemy's country that summer but would hold what they had won in the northern part of West Virginia and concentrate on driving Wise and Floyd out of the Kanawha Valley.

Reynolds made the fort at Elkwater, and Kimball of the Fourteenth Indiana Regiment, made the one at Cheat Summit generally referred to as White Top, where a man by the name of White lived. The Cheat Summit camp was on the Staunton and Parkersburg turnpike and this road ran southeast from Huttonsville, gradually leaving the pike from that place to Marlinton. Cheat Summit is almost due east from Elkwater where the camp was and a trail led down the mountain making a short cut seven miles long between the two places. The wagon roads around by Huttonsville between the camps covered a distance of eighteen miles.

These camps were formed on or about the 13th or 14th of July. The first troops of the Confederates to arrive at Middle Mountain were the Bath Cavalry on July 28th, followed by Col. Stephen Lee, with the Sixth North Carolina Regiment. The plan of fortifying Valley Mountain and Middle Mountain was the result of a report made by William Skeen, an attorney of Huntersville, who furnished a map of the country, and who pointed out that the Virginia Central Railway was exposed to an attack at Millboro as much as it was at Staunton, and that the distance by turnpike was much less than to Staunton.

In the meantime troops had been pouring into Staunton from all over the South and had been routed by way of Monterey on the Staunton and Parkersburg Pike. The information furnished by Skeen was seized upon immediately by Robert E. Lee at Richmond, and he had a good deal of trouble getting the officers at Staunton to cease to send troops by Monterey and to detrain them at Millboro. His preemptory orders finally resulted in long columns of men being marched by the southern route by Warm Springs, Huntersville, Marlinton and Edray. William Skeen was a prominent man in the history of Pocahontas County. He had been clerk of the courts before the war, and then practiced law. He was noted for his fine penmanship and his flights of oratory. The Commonwealth was referred to by him as the "virgin daughter of a virgin queen," and he was fighting for the idea of states' rights.

These troops gathered at Monterey, Bartow, Huntersville, and Marlinton, were called the Northwestern Army, and General Loring was placed in command of this army by an order from General Lee dated July 20th. This was the officer who had outranked Robert E. Lee but who took his orders from Lee. But it was not long until Lee himself came to the mountains and took over the command. He arrived at Valley Mountain August 8th, and from that time to September 14th, that was Headquarters of the Forces, that title traveling with Lee from Richmond to the Big Spring.

Here is a list of the headquarters in West Virginia during the wet summer of 1861. Lee was at Valley Mountain from August 8 to August 15; at Meadow Bluff on September 24; and at Sewell Mountain on October 20. During 1861, all of Robert E. Lee's activities in camp were confined to West Virginia, the rest of the time being spent at Richmond.

At Clarksburg was another West Virginia lawyer who was willing to advise the war department from the Federal side. John S. Carlile on August 15, 1861, wrote to Simeon Cameron, Secretary of War, for God's sake to send more troops and a general to command them or they would be whipped in ten days; that four Confederate armies were marching on the northwest by Mingo Flats, and that the Mingo Flats road was not guarded. Here was the original Godsaker about whom we heard so much in the World War. He was mistaken about the Mingo Flats road not being guarded for the Elkwater fort was there for that very purpose.

And about this time another defender was brought to light. It was a bushwhacker. By a letter dated July 19, 1861, Gen. H. R. Jackson wrote to headquarters that he had recruited home guards to the number of one hundred and eighty men, and that as all of them had corn to work, he had agreed that if they left eighty of their best riflemen, the rest might return to their crops. These eighty riflemen were familiar with the country and were to "annoy the enemy from the hills and bushes."

So the mountain armies filled the passes and watched each other during the weeks of August and the first part of September. In the Federal camp at Elkwater were two companies from Indiana who were in gray uniform and these men mingled with the Confederates in their big camp at Valley Mountain. On Sunday the 8th of September a scouting party got as far as Mingo from the Elkwater and had a skirmish at four o'clock in the morning of the 9th in which they reported having killed fifteen secessionists and wounded as many more. And they learned that a general advance was to take place that day and they fell back with the news. And it is now seen that Lee made a general order to advance dated September 9.

There is in this series a chapter telling of the way the Confederate forces got lost in the Cheat River jungles about Cheat Bridge and thereby prevented Lee from having a pitched battle at Elkwater. These troops were from the army at Bartow and they were to pass through the laurel and the hobblerod in the night time to the south of the camp at Cheat Summit and after much suffering and many hardships they came straggling back, defeated, weary and discouraged. In studying the evidence that is left of the Elkwater affair, I have found out something more about that lost legion. They attempted to go through the wilderness on the night of the 11th of September. None of the pickets or sentinels of the Federal camp on the mountain knew that any such movement was taking place. This is conclusive that they did not top the mountain on the pike. And early in the morning there were parts of three regiments that had passed by the camp and gotten to the pike in the rear, for early that morning, the 12th, three army wagons started from Cheat Summit for supplies, and they rolled into the Confederate army about a mile west of the encampment and were captured. The number of Confederate soldiers on the pike west and in the rear were estimated by the Federal officers to be twenty-five hundred men. They took the horses and men and disappeared in thick forest.

From this time on the skirmishing in the big forests of Cheat assumed the character of Indian fighting. Later in the day a company of Indiana troops caught sight of some Confederates four miles west of the camp at the summit and had a battle with them, the Federal troops remaining in the road and the Confederates disappearing in the timber.

It now appears that these Indiana troops had been camped in the dense spruce for full two months and the active young soldiers had nothing better to do than to become thoroughly acquainted with the wonders of such a wilderness. Few of them had ever seen a mountain or a forest of any great extent before. They had roamed in the mountains hunting and fishing and having as good a time as they could under the circumstances, and in the battle in the woods they had the soldiers who had come from Arkansas and other Southern States at a great disadvantage. The object of the Confederate flanking movement was to get in behind the Summit camp and take another place which was a small camp and supply point known as Cheat Mountain Pass ten miles west of the summit at the northern base of Cheat Mountain, and the skirmish in the afternoon of the 12th, interfered with this movement.

On the 12th the big army on Valley Mountain moved forward. About half way between the Valley Mountain camp and Elkwater fort, is the town of Valley Head. This is the point that the Webster County road, the Point Mountain pike joins the Seneca Trail and the Federal forces had been maintaining an advance guard at that point.

The Confederate army at this point was about nine thousand strong, and after a battle at the forks of the road at Valley Head, the Federals fell back and the Confederates did not advance. Along the road that follows the river bottom the land was cleared, but between that strip of settled country and the great Cheat Mountain there is a great stretch of broken wooded country through which many streams flow down from Cheat Mountain to the Valley River. Some of these are small runs and others are considerable creeks. At Valley Head, Lee sent three regiments north along the base of Cheat Mountain through the woods to join the flanking army that was to cross from Bartow. These regiments marched all day and came to the Staunton and Parkersburg Pike to the west of the Summit and cut the telegraph wire between the two Federal camps, and effected a junction with part of the Bartow troops.

General Reynolds found by nightfall on the 12th, that he was in a precarious position. Both roads to the Summit camp were in possession of the enemy. The wagon train had been captured, and his own wagon train loaded with supplies for the Summit camp and which were badly needed, had no chance to get through.

So about three in the morning of Friday, the thirteenth, he sent one army to open up the wagon road, and another army to open the bridle path.

As a matter of fact, it would appear that the Confederates had about fifty-five hundred men in the woods around Cheat Summit and that they were literally scattered all over a rugged country like a band of sheep that had lost their shepherd. It was the second night in bad weather and there was no way to form a cohesive force out of them. In the meantime those Indiana boys who had been loafing there all summer and probably knew every trout up there by its given name, were ready to harry the strangers out of there, and at break of day on Friday, the thirteenth, they commenced to hunt the Confederates. About this time some Confederates appeared on the pike about a mile east of the summit and surrounded a picket post and a lieutenant and a private of the Federals were killed.

Learning that a whip chase was under way to the west and that the Confederates were working out towards the Greenbrier River, with the Indiana boys driving them, the commander at the Summit sent some companies of soldiers east over the pike and had them line Cheat River above the bridge, and a battle was fought on that river about two miles above that bridge at a point near where the Cheat Mountain Clubhouse now stands.

The Confederate reports are missing as to this encounter, but the Federal reports are very positive. They are sure that all the regiments, both from Valley Mountain and from Camp Bartow had been rounded up and were being driven toward the Greenbrier, and that when they were stopped by three hundred men at some point on the river near the clubhouse, the Confederates numbered fifty-five hundred men. These men were driven back in to the wilderness and it was not until about ten o'clock that night that they got back to Camp Bartow. Kimball says that the result of the panic in the Confederate ranks was that the woods were literally covered with the baggage, coats, haversacks, and other articles abandoned by the enemy.

Now if this is true, it is not to be wondered that Lee looked in vain for his proud regiments to come stepping up the broad fields of Tygart's Valley, with flags flying and drums beating to take the Federals in the rear, while he marched his victorious legions down the valley to storm the Federal works and take West Virginia into the Confederacy.

It is no wonder that Col. John A. Washington rode down by the mouth of Elkwater with a squad of men to get around the bend so that he could see the Confederate columns advancing up the river to support the attack. And that not seeing such an army that he should have ventured nearer and nearer the fortification so that the could make a thorough search, until so close that he was shot and killed.

Col. Rust was ordered out of Cheat Mountain with his command to get to Bartow as soon as he could and send a dispatch to General Loring by the "near way," Loring was no doubt that day at Valley Mountain. "Get Mr. Arbogast to take the dispatch, if possible." Probably J. H. Arbogast, whose plantation was on the site of the town of Durbin. He is described as the postmaster.

In the meantime on Friday, the thirteenth, Lee's army edged down the stream from Valley Head to a point as low down as the mouth of Elkwater some miles above the Elkwater fort. They did not give battle, waiting no doubt for the flanking army that never came, but the Federals had a rifled gun that shot a ten-pound ball that they ran out about three-quarters of a mile, and fired a few rounds at the Confederates who withdrew a short distance. That Confederate army lay about the mouth of Elkwater Creek all day on the 13th and on the 14th they were still there. Reynolds said that on the 14th another Confederate force was chased by the Summit camp. And that on the 15th there was another Confederate army on top of Cheat, on the pike, that was driven back.

Anyway in the afternoon of the 14th the Confederates went back to their camp on Valley Mountain and Middle Mountain. So Lee's orders to advance dated September 9, 1861, were in force until September 14, when Lee called them back and said good-by.

Lee went down to the Kanawha Valley to see what Wise and Floyd were fussing with each other about. They point out the tree on the Midland Trail where he camped. The first day's travel from Valley Mountain set him thirty-three miles on his way, and he made camp under an oak tree on Stamping Creek just above Mill Point, on Richard McNeel's farm. Mrs. Mary McNeel, now aged ninety-six years, the lady of the manor was a Southern sympathizer. She prepared a fine breakfast and sent it to the general and he refused to eat it. He evidently was not going to risk any strange cooking in a land that appeared to be hostile to secession. As they put it baldly at the time, he was apprehensive of being poisoned.

CHAPTER XIV

Carrick's Ford. An Address Prepared for the Celebration There. To Which is Added some New History about Rich Mountain.

We are met here today to commemorate an incident of the most heroic and stirring events in the history of the world. Owing to the fact that in the year 1861 the State of Virginia was rent in twain by the passions and prejudices of its people, the chain of events leading up to the action on the part of the mountaineers has been a difficult subject to deal with for the reason that neighbors and families were divided upon the issue. Father against son, and brother against brother—and these matters in difference were carried even to the extreme limits of life.

But time cures all things, and I believe that the time has come when it is possible to interpret the action of those splendid times in such a way that it will not only redound to the glory of the victor, but also to the courage and high romance of his noble adversary.

I feel that it is incumbent upon us, who espoused the Confederate cause and who suffered the adverse decision of an all-wise Providence, to be the first and the frankest to admit that we were wrong. It comes with more graciousness from us who were bound to submit that any other result would have meant the end of the United States and a long farewell to all our glory.

We Confederates fought long and well, and we regard with affection and esteem the tender grace of a day that is dead that can never come back to us.

To the student of the history of the men of the mist, the mountaineers, it becomes more and more apparent that in every great crisis in American history the men of these endless mountains are to be relied upon to save the country from dissolution. Bred into super-men by the fierce thirty years' warfare with the aborigines in the winning of the West, we find in 1774 the mountain men asserting their independence and putting an independent army in the field to win the first battle of the Revolutionary War at Point Pleasant. In the years that followed the Minute Men from Valley Forge to King's Mountain were the main reliance for the success of the American arms, and it was companies of mountain men that drove Cornwallis to the sea and forced him to surrender.

But above and over all was the action of the northwestern counties in 1861 that reorganized the government of Virginia and nullified the act of secession at Richmond on April 17, 1861. It will be remembered that when the greatest Civil War ever known in the history of the world broke out in the United States that the first movement on the part of the troops of the North and on the part of the troops of the South converged upon the mountain counties of the western waters of Virginia and within a few weeks after the action at Richmond these counties were as completely overrun and invested by the opposing armies as was Belgium in the late great World War. A part of that movement of troops was the battle of Carrick's Ford which we are met to commemorate today. The first troops to reach the northwest were two companies from Highland County, Virginia, marched thither in such great haste that there was not a gun or other weapon of offense amongst them. Each man bore a tin cup which constituted his sole uniform and accoutrement. They reported to Grafton where Colonel Porterfield, a diplomatic Virginia officer, had preceded them upon the mission to induce the local companies of militia to remain true to the falling fortunes of Virginia. Colonel Porterfield wrote home that it was as though he were in a foreign country, so fruitless had been his mission to enlist soldiers for the Confederacy.

In the meantime, General McClellan, lying on the borders of Ohio, was ordered to invest West Virginia with Federal troops and then followed the hurry and mad haste on the part of both armies to possess these mountain counties. General McClellan poured his troops into Grafton over the B. & O. Railway from Parkersburg and Wheeling and the handful of Confederate troops retired before his advance guard by a matter of minutes only, and rested at Philippi.

In the meantime the Confederate forces, without waiting for a vote on the ordinance of secession, bitterly disappointed by the failure of the mountain counties to respond favorably to the secession movement, rushed every available company across the mountains on foot, on horseback and by wagon train, and in a few days had considerable armies at three points on the western waters—that is to say, at Camp Northwest near Huntersville, at Marlinton, and at Beverly.

The leaders in the Northwest, having been sent back from Richmond overwhelmed and defeated, had been busy calling a convention to meet in Wheeling on May 13, 1861, to offset the result of the Secession Convention of April 17th. And while the armies were gathering by every road that point to the height of land, the place where the waters head, this Wheeling Convention was groping its way through the devious roads of parliamentary procedure to depose Governor Letcher, the Governor of Virginia, who had gone Confederate, and to set up in his place an able Fairmont lawyer by the name of Pierpoint to reign in his stead, thereby creating a dual government of the State of Virginia that was to endure for the four long weary years of the war. It took Pierpoint four years to reach the Governor's Mansion in Richmond, but, by the grace of God and the unfaltering support of Abraham Lincoln, he did eventually reach the banks of the James River. The formation of the new State of West Virginia was to be a part of the decrees of Providence and was perhaps the only logical solution of the quandary that Virginia found herself in when she went adrift and was wrecked by the storm and the conflict between the Cottom States, drunk with power and pride, and the loyalty that she owed to the Union she had created.

In the Secession Convention the delegate district composed of Randolph and Tucker was represented by Jonathan N. Hughes, who had voted for secession and who had come home from that convention to find a solemn and a very much divided constituency. It is said that he had gone to Richmond as a Union man and that he had changed his sentiments during the long weary months devoted to practicing upon the minds of Union men to change them to be supporters of the Cotton States' bolt for freedom. Mr. Hughes did not survive his return home many weeks. By a strange act of circumstances he became one of the first victim of the war. At the battle of Rich Mountain he was riding horseback along the road in citizens' clothing. It is supposed that the sudden appearance of a troop of cavalry confused him. He rode rapidly towards them, crying out for Lincoln and was shot dead, receiving seventeen balls in his body.

Randolph and Tucker appear to have had no representatives at Wheeling in the May Convention, but upon the assembling of the Convention of June 11, 1861, at which time Pierpoint was made governor, the district had as its representative Solomon Parsons, and at the third convention which met in Wheeling, November 26, 1861, to frame the constitution of the new State of West Virginia, James W. Parsons appeared for Tucker County. It should be noted, too, that at the June Convention Samuel Crane was also admitted as a delegate from Tucker County, who served with Solomon Parsons.

It will be observed that the month of May, 1861, was a most trying and eventful period for the harassed people of the mountains. Greater armies than had ever been known to our people filled every road and avenue while the thinkers of the mountains, such men as Daniel Lamb, A. W. Campbell, Chester D. Hubbard, J. D. Nichols, Campbell Tarr, Daniel Polsley, George R. Latham, James W. Paxton and other leaders, most earnestly sought a way to extricate Virginia from the curse that had come upon her. Some said one thing and some said another, and the solution did not come like a flash of light, but was rather evolved in long and painful conferences extending over many days and nights. We know now that the plan that worked so well was to treat the elective offices of Virginia as vacant on account of Letcher's adherence, with all his train to the Confederate States of America, and to set up a provisional government by the election of Pierpoint as Governor. The Pierpoint government having been recognized in Washington by the Federal government by the seating of the Senators and Congressmen, enabled the provisional government to agree to the formation of the new State of West Virginia which resulted in the rending of the State both as a war measure and a logical result of the secession of Virginia.

The credit for the idea and the thread of thought that led to this mementous result belong to John D. Nichols, a young lawyer of Wellsburg, who voiced the idea in a conference one evening with some of the older delegates and from that time the way was made plain before the conventions without variableness, nor shadow of turning.

About this time, on the twenty-second day of May, 1861, the first man was killed in the Civil War. T. Bailey Brown, a member of Capt. Daniel Wilson's company, was returning with Captain Wilson from Pruntytown where they had organized a Union Company. As they came to the eastern end of Grafton, they were halted by a Confederate picket by the name of W. S. Knight. Brown fired at the picket, clipping a piece out of his ear, and Knight returned the fire with a smooth-bore musket, loaded with slugs, killing Brown instantly.

Before daylight on the morning of June 3rd the armies clashed at Philippi and the Confederates withdrew in great haste to Beverly. McClellan moved slowly up Tygart's Valley, having at his command some twenty thousand troops, nearly all from Ohio and Pennsylvania.

On the Confederate side Staunton, Augusta County, had been made a depot of supplies and from all over the South regiment after regiment detrained at Staunton and marched west and northwest over the Harrisonburg and Warm Springs Turnpike and the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike. These troops were accompanied by interminable wagon trains and the people of the mountains in that summer of 1861 were presented with a spectacle of all the glory and gallantry of war. Money became exceedingly plentiful and the Confederate States appeared to be carrying all before them. As a matter of fact the only failure from which the Confederate States suffered during the first year of the war was the repulse in West Virginia. The scene at Beverly by July was that of an all-powerful army in camp. Colonel Porterfield, the urbane diplomat to West Virginia, had been called home and Gen. W. H. Garnett had been placed in charge of the advance army in the Northwest at Beverly. He had under him the flower and the chivalry of the South. General Garnett was a West Pointer and a noted acquisition to the Southern armies. His encampment at Beverly at the junction of the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike and the Beverly and Philippi Turnpike blocked the advance of General McClellan's army. But Garnett decided that he should fortify the two roads in the rugged pass where the Tygarts Valley River breaks through and forms the gorge separating Rich Mountain from Laurel Hill. The latter day tourist is still presented at Beverly with his choice of the two roads into the Northwest. He can either climb Rich Mountain on the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, or he can go the broader and smoother State highway by the way of Elkins, Belington, Philippi and Grafton.

Garnett decided to fortify the Buckhannon road on the brow of the mountain overlooking its western declivity. In this he made a fatal error. He seems to have ignored the long flat top of Rich Mountain which invited a flank movement. He should have fortified the eastern top where the battle was actually fought. On the other road Garnett took about six thousand troops and went with them himself to fortify the road on Laurel Hill between Elkins and Belington. Pegram was placed in charge of the Rich Mountain blockade. Colonel Scott was left in charge of the base of supplies at Beverly with one large regiment and other companies and wagon trains coming in daily. It would appear that Garnett had detached himself both on the Rich Mountain road and on the Belington road from his base of supplies.

McClellan with his much larger army, was scattered across the valley from Buckhannon to Webster and seemed to be on the point of playing Garnett's game and storming the fortifications. But on the evening of the tenth of July a young man by the name of Hart, whose home was on the crest of Rich Mountain, agreed to lead a detachment around the mountain to fall in behind Pegram and in this way the plans of battle were worked out in a way different from that expected by Garnett. Pegram was not wholly surprised. A messenger had fallen into the hands of the Confederates and they were advised of the flanking movement. Perhaps it would have been better if he had been surprised. He rushed three hundred men back to the east brow of Rich Mountain and there met and fought the Federal troops and was defeated. The cannon roared over the mountains there all the afternoon and it seems to have brought consternation to every division of the Confederate forces. Presently came a rain and a stormy night and Pegram withdrew from his position and marched down into the rough canyon of the Tygart's Valley River and up the river to about where Elkins now is, and finding himself without provisions and no chance to get any, sent in his surrender papers.

The battle at Rich Mountain was so sudden and unexpected that there seems to have been no chance to send a courier to Colonel Scott, who lay with such a rich base at Beverly. The Colonel and his staff listened for hours to the cannonading on Rich Mountain, undecided whether to retreat or advance. He finally called for a volunteer to carry a flag of truce to Rich Mountain to obtain some word, and for this service my father, the late Rev. Dr. William T. Price, offered. His offer was not accepted and pretty soon Colonel Scott and the supplies were on their way east.

Garnett abandoned his fort on Laurel Hill on the night of the eleventh, being pursued by McClellan's forces. Learning that Beverly was in possession of Union forces, he turned to the northeast, hoping to escape into the valley of Virginia by Cheat River. Morris' troops overtook the Confederates about noon on July 13, 1861, and followed them for two hours skirmishing all the way until Carrick's Ford was reached, where a pitched battle ensued in which General Garnett and a number of his command were slain.

The result of these operations left the Union forces in full control of West Virginia's western flowing waters in the northwest with the exception of Greenbrier River.

McClellan fortified at Elkwater near the head of the Ohio River and the Confederates were gradually driven back by force and pressure to Staunton within about a year from the time that they had sent their proud armies forth from that place. The retreat was marked by the battle of Greenbrier, the battle of the Top of Allegheny, and the battle of McDowell, all Confederate victories, but all losing victories.

And this is a short story of how the wisdom of the elder statesman and the firing of the younger soldiers in the year 1861 brought forth that great State of West Virginia, the child of the storm.

And on that day no loving arms
Reached forth the newborn child to take,
'Mid cannons' roar, and war's alarms,
Did West Virginia's soul awake;

Behold her face is stern and wild.
The beetling crag, the darkling fen,
Mark deep her mien, the war-born child,
Grim mothers of hard mountain men;
We hail the day, we pledge anew
Our hearts, our hands, our lives to you.

The first year of the Civil War the Confederates assembled a considerable army at Beverly in a short time and from there awaited the coming of the Federal troops under McClellan. Garnett was the general in charge of the Confederates and the middle of July found Garnett shot to death by exposing himself upon the firing line, and his clans scattered in flight or captured.

One of the Virginia regiments under Col. William C. Scott played a part in the debacle of Rich Mountain, Laurel Hill, and Carrick's Ford, and I never could make head or tail of the doings of that regiment until lately when I came upon some indications in the records that throw considerable light upon the mental confusion and anguish of that officer.

He was from down east somewhere and he was elected colonel of the 44th Virginia Infantry. He was either from Cumberland or Powhatan county, as he represented that district in the secession convention at Richmond, in 1861.

The battle of Rich Mountain was fought on the 11th day of July. The 44th left Staunton for Beverly on the 5th day of July and arrived in Beverly the evening of the 10th, the day before the battle, and encamped there that night. Garnett was with the main part of the army at Laurel Hill, the big mountain between Elkins and Belington. He had posted Pegram with a large force on the west brow of Rich Mountain, eight miles from Beverly on the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, between Beverly and Buckhannon. There was a command at Leadsville church, in the neighborhood of the place where the city of Elkins stands now.

The Federals had some twenty thousand troops on the two roads and a battle was expected hourly. The main force of the Federals was on the Buckhannon road in front of Pegram's hastily erected fortifications. Between Pegram and Garnett was the canyon through which the Tygarts Valley River forces a turbulent passage. It is a very deep and wild and rugged gorge.

Most of the wagons and supplies were left at Beverly as a convenient base for the Confederate forces.

Scott's 44th was on the loose, so to speak, his arrival being more or less unexpected, and like all the troops on both sides he was in command of amateurs in the art and science of war.

There has been so much said of Scott's maneuvers at this time that I have been at considerable pains to ferret out as near as possible the truth of the reports. One reason that I was so much interested was that my father, a chaplain, was with Scott on that occasion and by staying with him escaped capture and injury and was extricated from a very perilous position, in which so many green soldiers were killed, wounded or captured. I never heard my father say much about the retreat from Beverly.

One favorite lie in regard to the gallant 44th was that Scott had cut such a big timber barricade across the pike between Beverly and Laurel Hill that Garnett could not withdraw his troops in the direction of Beverly but was forced to march through Tucker County to meet defeat, disaster, and death at Carrick's Ford. There could be nothing farther from the truth than this for Scott had not been anywhere on that road to cut a barricade and all the defense that he needs on that charge is his perfect alibi.

At Beverly, Scott received an order from Garnett to join him with his regiment at his fort on Laurel Hill, and early that morning he had gotten his weary and footsore troops together and had marched them about two miles towards Elkins, when he was overtaken by a courier with a dispatch from Pegram, who was on the other road on top of Rich Mountain. Pegram asked him to disregard the orders to march to Laurel Hill and to return by way of Beverly and take a position a mile and a half from Beverly on the Buckhannon road, at a place where a county road came in from the north and joined the pike. The reason for this was that Pegram who was guarding the pike had found out that at a point west of his fortification an old road or path branched off on the north side of the pike, dipped down across the Roaring Creek Valley, and climbed Rich Mountain and passed through a gap north of the pass that Pegram was holding, and swung south and joined the county road that led to the pike at the place that Scott was to place his regiment. Pegram had heard that a large force of Federals were already marching on that old road to pass on his right, and Scott's was the only force that could reach the place in time to be of any service. It was apparent that if the Federals took Beverly all the Confederate forces would be cut off from their supplies. Torn from their base, so to speak.

Scott did not hesitate. He about-faced and marched his army back and held the mouth of the county road.

Later in the day, Pegram discovered his error, for the Federals marched around him on his left, and some three hundred of Pegram's men with one cannon hastily detached from the Pegram fort engaged them at the eastern summit and there is where one of the decisive battles of the war was fought, a battle that was discussed and debated to the ends of the world, for right there is where the Union won the war by retaining the territory that was afterwards to be West Virginia.

Pegram was in dreadful straits. His three hundred men held the field for hours against five thousand. Every man belonging to Garnett was in sound of the guns, but none knew that it was not an attack on Pegram's fort except those in that fort. In the light of other days it has become the great unexplained mystery why Pegram did not reinforce his heroes that day.

The noise of the battle was heard by Scott and his troops, but they could not know that it was a battle half way between him and Pegram, and there has never been a time since Casabianca stood on the burning deck when such a distressing alternative was put to a soldier. Scott could not leave the road unguarded. Pegram had not said that the enemy might come that roundabout way. He had said that they were then moving on that road, and Garnett had endorsed and supplemented Pegram's order, and so he was held by express orders at the foot of a mountain while the cannon roared at the top of that mountain.

When Scott, the night before had arrived at Beverly, he found a very near and dear friend living there. Hon. John N. Hughes the delegate to the convention from the district composed of Randolph and Tucker counties. The two men had served during the long strenuous sessions of the conventions that had voted at Richmond for secession.

Hughes had been sent there as a Union man by an overwhelming vote. At Richmond he had roomed with two strong Union members, Hon. John S. Burdette, the member from Taylor County, and Hon. James Burley, of Marshall. The three were great friends and agreed to stay in the Union for many weeks, until Hughes came to the room one day and announced that he had decided to vote for secession. Then there was a great quarrel. Burdette and Hughes were about to have a fist fight there and then, but Burley prevented them from coming to blows. But before they parted they put a curse upon him, a good old political curse, that he would never prosper either in this world nor in the world to come, and the three inseparables parted in anger. Hughes voted for secession between the vote of James P. Holcombe, of Albermarle, and Eppa Hutton, of Prince William. And Burley and Burdette voted together against secession between the votes of William G. Brown, of Preston, and Benjamin W. Byrne, of Braxton, Nicholas and Clay.

The two convention members, Hughes and Scott, were delighted to be together again and Hughes went with the colonel and his regiment. These two statesmen had voted for secession a few weeks before, having been convinced by a season of false reasoning that it was the only way to prevent war, relying on a fixed idea that the seceding sisters would be allowed to depart in peace. And here they were in the mountains facing an overwhelming army of Federals who refused to accept their interpretation of the constitution.

A new song had run through the South since they had parted at Richmond. It started off strong. It said that the despot's heel was on our shore, his torch was at our temple door. And here was the despot's heel on Rich Mountain. The song was called "Maryland, my Maryland" and we still beller forth its martial strains. They made up a song here the other day on it, called "Marlinton, my Marlinton." It may be of some historical interest to know who was the gentleman designated as a despot and fixed to burn a church. It was no other than Col. Edward F. Jones, of the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment, marching through Baltimore, April 19, 1861, where they were attacked by rioters and three soldiers killed and many wounded. The mayor of Baltimore marched with the regiment to protect them and begged the soldiers not to fire, but before the mayor left them he was compelled to grab a gun himself and kill a man in the mob. The song was written by a college professor on hearing of the riot, and the music is from the German song, "Tannebaum, Oh Tannebaum," which being loosely translated means, "Hemlock Tree, Oh Hemlock Tree."

Hughes and Scott were on horseback. At that time the troops had no distinctive uniform on either side. There was no way to tell a friend from an enemy. Not even a badge. The armies had materialized so quickly that so far as the fighting was concerned it was almost impossible to tell whether a company belonged to the North or to the South.

About one o'clock in the afternoon, Scott and his regiment resting easily at the fork of the road, heard the firing begin at the Hart place on top of the mountain. He thought it was an attack on the fort as he had had no intimation of any change of plans. As a matter of fact, Pegram, hearing that the Federals were marching around him on his left had sent three hundred men, under Captain DeLagnel to occupy the pass at Hart's Mountain, the farm house on one side and the log barn on the other. There was a log barn there. Maybe not the barn that is there today, but a log barn. These troops were from Rockingham, Rockbridge and Powhatan counties, largely. They were not acquainted with John N. Hughes.

There was a powerful lot of cannonading going on and Scott was bound to find out about it, even if he could not leave his post, so he prepared to send a scout. He designated John N. Hughes, a non-combatant, who volunteered for the duty. I take it that Hughes was the logical candidate for the honor for he may have been the only local man present. He knew the country and the roads. He was not in uniform. That did not cut any figure that early in the war. The road winds by easy grades for miles up the mountain. Hughes dashed off on his horse and never returned. By the time he reached the top of the mountain, the battle was going at full blast. He evidently came to the conclusion that the troops that he found holding the road at a summit were Federals who had gotten to the rear of the Pegram fortifications, for he cried out, "Lincoln." And rode towards the soldiers. No doubt the soldiers had until that time held their fire to ascertain whether he came as a friend or a foe, but the moment he shouted "Lincoln," they fired a volley and he fell dead with seventeen bullet holes in his body. He was shot by Confederate soldiers.

The next thing that occurred was the arrival of Lieut.James Cochrane, of Augusta County. He had been in the battle. Owing to the difficulty that the troops had to tell friend from foe, the Confederates had fired on some Confederate cavalry advancing from Beverly, and these cavalry had withdrawn. De Lagnel had detailed Cochrane with a squad of six men to overtake these men and bring them up, but he could not find them, but as he traveled to the foot of the mountain he found Scott and his regiment and reported to them the fact that an engagement was going on and that they were badly needed on top of the hill.

Scott then formed his men and faced them towards the fight and they started off at double quick time, which was soon brought down to quick time when they realized the number of uphill miles they had to climb. When they got within about a mile of the top, the firing ceased and there was great cheering, Huzzas, as the accepted word was at that time. The huzzaing caused Scott to halt his army and consider. He and Cochrane took counsel together and decided that the fight was over, and that if the Confederates had won it was not necessary to go farther, and if the Federals had won it was not at all safe. They would be cut to pieces by firing from the top of the ridge. So volunteers being called for, one R. I. Lipford volunteered on the condition that he be provided with a pistol and a horse. He was equipped and rode forward rapidly to the top of the mountain, and a short time after he was gone, his regiment heard loud shouts of "Halt!" "Shoot him!" And that was the last that they heard from Lipford for several days.

Scott does not seem to worry about Lipford, so I went on a hunt the other day for him, and found out about him. When he got to the battle field and found himself surrounded by four or five thousand soldiers, he decided that discretion was the better part of valor, and surrendered to superior force. Here he made a tactical error. Thinking no doubt that he would be better treated and sooner exchanged he informed the Federal commander that his rank was that of lieutenant when he was in truth and in fact a private soldier. But the Federals took to him and of all the prisoners, he was the one that was chosen to bear a sweet, kindly letter from General McClellan to Gen. H. R. Jackson. McClellan was a gentleman. He mentioned that he had found Lieutenant Lipford, of the 44th Virginia, the most available for courier purposes from among the officers captured. This incidental mention had the effect of causing General Jackson to arrest Lipford for misrepresenting his rank, and Lipford seems to have had the distinction of being twice captured and imprisoned within a week by both armies.

Scott not liking the looks of things on the mountain retreated from them huzzas and got back to Beverly that night. James Cochrane went with him. This must be the same red-headed colonel who played such an important part in the war and who was separated from his regiment at Droop Mountain in after years.

He seems to have about taken charge as a visiting brother to the 44th. He marched them up the mountain and marched them down again, and when they got to Beverly, while Scott was conferring with Judge Camden, a member of the Confederate congress, and other citizens, Cochrane seems to have had the quick wit and the ability to act. He knew that the Confederate troops were scattered and that there was no use waiting for orders, so he had Scott, as the ranking officer, to authorize him to load the wagons and take them out of there, and this was done and a retreat to the Grenbrier River was commenced that went on all through the night and the next day. In this way most of the stores were saved, and on the 12th Scott reached Greenbrier River, having marched about thirty-two miles. He burned the bridge at Huttonsville over the Tygarts Valley River on the 12th.

Captain Lilley and his Augusta Lee Rifles came escaping out of the net and they found the bridge burning, and lay at the foot of Cheat on the Randolph side that night. When they got to Beverly they saw Captain Stofer, of the Pocahontas company, sitting on the hotel porch. That is one thing he did well. I remember seeing him sit on a hotel porch after the war many times. The captain was a veteran of the Mexican war and was no amateur. He seems to have been one of the cool ones at the battle of Rich Mountain and side fights. He waved them on, and when they got over to Yeager's they found Governor Letcher there, who had come to the head of the waters to see how the war was going.

It will be seen by this, Scott and his 44th made a hasty trip to West Virginia. In all it was only nine days that it took him to march his regiment on foot from Staunton to the top of Rich Mountain and back to the Greenbrier River, something like a hundred and fifty miles.

I can see no just cause of criticism. He seems to have acted with courage and discretion and brought his men off safe, and saved the wagon trains for his side. He delivered his command to Gen. H. R. Jackson on Saturday the 13th, and they rested at Monterey.

Pegram had an unhappy experience. He took command in an arbitrary way of Camp Garnett as it was called, and he has been criticized for not coming to the relief of the three hundred who made as brave a fight as was ever recorded in history. And then he surrendered by sending a messenger seven miles with a petition asking to be allowed to yield. Captain Moorman, of Pendleton County, asked him if he was going to do that why did he not march out towards Pendleton County and go until he met a Federal force and surrender then. It would be easier, and there was a good chance to escape. But Pegram overruled him. Moorman knew the mountains but Pegram was overawed by them. Pegram's men were paroled. One of them came in my office last summer and told about being paroled by a man on horseback in the street in Beverly. "What did you do about it?" I asked him. "I broke it," said the old Confed.

CHAPTER XV

The Battle of Philippi, the First Battle of the Civil War.

The battle of Philippi is important because it was the first battle of the Civil War. It is not in the number of troops engaged, the number killed or wounded, or in the strategy displayed, that it owes its fame. It was the first blow that was struck. And it assumes all the dignity and importance of the opening blow. That is no doubt the reason that the Legislature of 1927 saw fit to appoint a commission to report as to the proper way in which to commemorate that action of the armies and to preserve its history.

The date of the battle was June 3, 1861, at the break of day. Prior to that time it was not known whether there would be a war between the North and the South. The North had not been invaded, and there were indications that led the most hopeful to believe that the sections would content themselves with guarding the border to repel any effort to invade on the part of the enemy. Thus McClellan had been appointed commander of the Department of the Ohio to guard the line of the States bordering on the Ohio River with headquarters at Cincinnati.

In this day and generation it is taken for granted that when the States seceded that it was an act of war tantamount to declaring war on the United States. It was so regarded by many of the wisest men on both sides, those who had the power of judging the future by the past, and who were able to construe the signs of the times. As a matter of fact, the secession of Virginia, was the result of false reasoning on the part of the convention that the only way to avoid civil war within the boundaries of Virginia, was to secede, arguing as they did, that if a majority forced the State to remain in the Union, that the eastern part or slave part of the State, would rise in arms and assert its right to secede. The convention drunk with words and oratory and other things, seems never to have apprehended that the Federal power would be exercised to keep Virginia in the Union. The idea that armies from other States might invade Virginia, was not worthy of considering. On the 4th of February, 1861, six of the States had met and formed the Confederate States of America, and on the 8th had elected Jefferson Davis as its president, and there had been no definite policy determined upon by the Federal government, and the Virginia convention to avoid war decided to secede.

April 12, the firing began on Fort Sumter. April 19, a mob attacked Union soldiers marching through Baltimore. May 9 shots were exchanged between the United States steamer Yankee, and the batteries at Gloucester Point, Virginia. May 20 shots were exchanged between the United States steamer Monticello and the battery at Sewell's Point, Virginia. May 24 the Union army took possession of Alexandria, Virginia, and that night Colonel Ellsworth, of the First Zouaves, New York Militia, was killed in a hotel by some person unknown. Captain Ball and a company of thirty-five Confederate soldiers were captured. May 26, Union troops were ordered to occupy Grafton, and McClellan addressed his proclamation to the Union men of western Virginia.

The occupation of Alexandria by the Federal troops does not seem to have occasioned much stir in Virginia, as that town is not much more than a suburb of Washington, but the invasion of Federal troops on Virginia soil to Grafton, more than a hundred miles by the railroad from the border at Parkersburg, was a serious matter.

The proclamation of May 26 states that the general government of the United States had abstained from sending troops across the Ohio River, or even posting them on the bank of that stream on the Virginia line. But the result of the late election in the western counties showed that the people west of the mountain did not indorse the secession movement, and that the general government could not longer close its ears to the demands that had been made by loyal western Virginians for assistance. "I have ordered troops to cross the river."

These were the words of McClellan, an able executive. He was a West Point graduate. He had distinguished himself in the Mexican War. He was a commissioner to study the military movements in the Crimean War. At the outbreak of the Civil War he was chief engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad. He was appointed a major general in 1861, and owing to his successes in West Virginia, he was made commander-in-chief of the Union forces after the disaster at Bull Run.

To the clear mind of McClellan the crossing of the Ohio was as definite a step admitting of no retreat or withdrawal as was the action of Caesar in crossing the Rubicon, the river that separated Cisalpine Gaul from ancient Italy. It proved to be a crossing of a Rubicon.

McClellan has never been properly appreciated. He ran afoul of the departments in Washington and some bitter words passed between him and Stanton. In 1864, he was the Democratic nominee for President against Lincoln, but received the electoral vote of but three States, Kentucky, Delaware and New Jersey. But he acted with great power and wisdom in the early days of the great conflict and his support undoubtedly had much to do with the formation of the State of West Virginia, and he deserves a monument in this State.

The significance of the determination to cross the Ohio River, is shown in his opening lines in his general order: "Soldiers: You are ordered to cross the frontier and enter upon the soil of Virginia. Your mission is to restore peace and confidence, to promote the majesty of the law, and to rescue our brethren from the grasp of armed traitors." This address was dated the same day that the proclamation to the people of West Virginia was made. It took four days to make the occupation of Grafton complete, moving from Cincinnati and Indianapolis through Parkersburg and Wheeling over the B. & O. Railway. On the 30th of May, McClellan reported that he held Grafton without the loss of a single life.

News traveled slower in those days except where the event was directly upon a telegraph station. Owing to this the Commonwealth of Virginia as constituted at Richmond, does not seem to have grasped the extent of the disaffection in the northwestern counties. General Lee was in command, and he took the precaution to send three trained officers to these counties to muster in the militia. Loring at Wheeling, Boykin at Parkersburg, and Porterfield at Grafton. These were the strategic points owing to the B. & O. Railroad, whose trunk line extended from Baltimore to Grafton, there to branch into two divisions, one to go into the State of Ohio at Wheeling, and the other at Parkersburg.

Lee had no idea but that these counties would accept in the main the action of the Virginian convention. For generations they had complained and expostulated at coming out at a disadvantage over every vote and measure, and no doubt it was considered a congenital defect in the mountaineer, to grumble and submit. It is evidenced by his message and his instructions to Porterfield.

He wrote to Porterfield, Col. George A. Porterfield, then at Harpers Ferry, to repair to Grafton and to act in conjunction with Boykin and Loring, and accept for service nine regiments, three to protect the Parkersburg branch of the railway, three the Wheeling branch, with three regiments to be held at the junction point at Grafton in reserve. Loring and Boykin seem to have returned without recruiting any companies, and with Porterfield it was not much better. Captain Thompson, at Fairmont, had a company that was ready to be mustered into the Confederate service but Grafton did not seem to be a safe place for such a company. One of Porterfield's reports has a line in it that indicates the state of sentiment around Grafton. He says to address his letters to Fetterman, a post office near Grafton, as that was the only office in the county where he could depend upon receiving letters.

Porterfield got some troops together and succeeded in burning three small bridges on the railroad but they were quickly replaced when the troop trains came in from the west.

Another indication of the meager support that he got from the northwest counties is the tradition of the committee of citizens who waited upon him at Grafton, and who politely and firmly told him that they desired him to leave their town, but that they did not wish him hurried or inconvenienced, and that it would be all right for him to wait until the next train left for elsewhere. This invitation was complied with, and I think that it must have been the time that Porterfield moved to Fetterman, at no great distance, as that place is now a part of the city of Grafton. Porterfield was still writing letters from Grafton as late as May 16, 1861, and according to the best evidence that I can find, the Confederate forces took their stand at Philippi on the 27th day of May, just about the time that the Union troops started from the western posts to occupy Grafton.

It will be observed that the Confederate officers sent to the northwestern counties to mobilize an army had met with such scant success that they did not consider it advisable to try to hold the railroad at any point on it, and that they had not been able to effect any but a temporary damage to it. South of Fetterman and Grafton, some fifteen miles distant, was the town of Philippi, the county seat of Barbour County, situate in a narrow valley on the banks of Tygarts Valley River. This was a position well suited to a defensive campaign. Two roads came to the river at that place, one from Grafton that crossed a wooden covered bridge into the town. This bridge is still standing and in constant use. That the Confederate forces withdrew to Philippi is a confession of weakness.

The reason of this movement was that it was the only opening left to Porterfield from which he could receive reinforcements and supplies. The Union forces held control of both ends of the B. & O. Railroad. There was no way in which troops could reach him over that road, and the only turnpike open to him was the Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike.

Great delay was experienced in getting arms to the Confederates. Before the battle they were begging for flintlock rifles. The Virginia troops that had marched to join Porterefild from Virginia had reached Fetterman, but the only equipment either in arms or accoutrements was one tin cup per man. It was long known as the tin cup brigade. They clamored for arms. Two companies from Pocahontas County, under Captain McNeel and Captain Stofer, rode horseback to Philippi and had to be sent back on account of no arms or supplies. It was about this time that the long lines of men and wagons and artillery commenced to move west from Staunton over the Staunton and Parkersburg Tunrpike. From all over the South these forces were coming, but they did not arrive in time to afford any relief to the beleaguered Confederates at Philippi, and they failed to stem the victorious advance of the Federal armies at Rich Mountain and at Laurel Hill and Carricks Ford. Not until the middle of the summer did they block the way and that was in the Greenbrier Valley.

It was a campaign of wagons against railway cars.

On the 3rd day of June, 1861, the Confederates had a force of about eight hundred men in Philippi, waiting on men and arms. The strength of this little army was placed by the Union Commander, Gen. T. A. Morris, at Grafton, as being two thousand men, which were being rapidly reinforced.

He planned a quick attack on the enemy at Philippi. The main highway, now Road 56, connects Grafton and Philippi. The distance in 1861 was fifteen miles. This road lies on the west side of Tygarts Valley River. Both towns are on that river. There was another road traversing the counties of Taylor and Barbour lying to the east of that road made up of certain county roads. By leaving the cars at a point east of Grafton, it left a march of about twenty-five miles to Philippi.

Col. B. F. Kelly was given command of one column to march on Philippi, and Col. Dumont of the other.

Believing that word of the attack would be carried to the Confederate camp, an order was made public that a detachment of troops would go by rail from Grafton to Harper's Ferry, and at 9 a. m. June 2, Col. B. F. Kelly's command, consisting of six companies of the First Virginia, nine companies of Milroy's Ninth Indiana, and six companies of Irvine's Sixteenth Ohio, took trains and were carried six miles east on the railroad where they got off the train and marched slowly during the day and the early part of the night, and rested so that they could arrive at Philippi exactly at 4 in the morning of June 3.

The other column consisting of Dumont's Seventh Indiana, five companies of Steedman's Fourteenth Ohio, with two field guns, and six companies of Crittenden's Sixth Indiana, left Grafton at 8:30 p. m. June 2 for the more direct route to Philippi.

The two columns combined consisted of something over three thousand men, and they believed that they were going into a battle with a desperate army of Confederates.

The Dumont column took the trains on the railroad that runs towards Clarksburg (west), and got off the trains at Webster station, a point nearer Philippi, and marched through the night.

Then came the big rain. It poured down all night and with it was a driving wind. The raw troops suffered in that campaign not from the enemy but from the weather. Both columns were due to meet without fail at Philippi at four o'clock in the morning. The troops that had gone the long way round were very much more comfortable than the ones who had marched the short distance. There was a most dreadful time had by the young soldiers plodding along a muddy road all through the night of the tempest, and some of them threw away blankets and knapsacks in order to keep up.

But the rain had also drowned out the Confederate pickets and scouts and sentinels. Not an outpost was found. Not a challenge given by any Confederate soldier, and the first thing that the Confederates knew the enemy was upon them in the rain and the storm and the darkness, and all over them and about them and there was nothing to do but to run. And run they did and that in a helter-skelter, every-man-for-himself fashion, and as there was but one road open, and that up the river, they could not get lost or stray, so later in the day, with the exception of a gentleman that got his leg broken contending with the Federal army, all of the Confederate soldiers assembled at Beverly, thirty miles distant, at which place they were speedily heavily reinforced, and from which point they got ready to fight the Rich Mountain battle five weeks later.

The most serious accident that happened was when a Confederate quartermaster shot Colonel Kelley in the vest. The warlike quartermaster was captured at once and the officers had hard work keeping him from being summarily lynched by the soldiers of Colonel Kelley's command. Happily this wound turned out to be a slight affair and Colonel Kelley having managed the battle so well was promoted to the rank of Brigadier General and served throughout the war with great ability and distinction.

It is very indefinite as to what the Confederates did. The Federal army of some three thousand armed men poured into a town of about five hundred population firing as they came, and routing Confederate troops from every house, barn, and other building where there was a roof to keep off the rain. My father, who was with the Highland County troops, was stopping for the night with some relatives in Philippi and he got safely away in the cold gray dawn of a rainy morning.

The fact of the matter is the Confederates never realized they had been in an action and that they had been badly defeated. I do not know the rules of scoring but the Confederates evidently considered they had been happily delivered from a position of some danger. The Federal troops pleased with the gallantry and endurance of themselves and the easy victory, were not disposed to find fault with success. They attributed their failure to capture more prisoners to the confusion occasioned by the violent storm. And they did take an immense amount of odds and ends in the way of supplies.

This started the war. It may have been more or less amateurish, but remember that it was the first great news the country had and for a few days the name of Philippi was known to every civilized land.

There was something in the air, however, for Porterfield at Beverly requested that a court-martial be convened to inquire into his conduct on June 3. Then it developed that the first intimation that the Confederates had was the firing of the enemy's artillery within four hundred yards of the town; that a main and picket guard had been regularly maintained every night, but that scouting parties of the Confederates had come in on the night of June 2nd, without being challenged as shown by written reports of mounted officers.

It is a fair conjecture that the sentinels had been rained on and had taken shelter.

Further it was found that in a conference of officers the night before a retreat was determined upon, and that but for the weather this retreat would have begun before daylight and the disaster averted. And that while there was confusion in some quarters that a portion of the command moved out of town in good order, and that nearly the whole force after passing some distance from town, was reformed and proceeded in order.

That outside of dilatory tactics in retreating, and want of vigilance, and failure to extend and strengthen his picket line, that the commanding officer acted with coolness, self-possession, and personal courage.

The court-martial found that the Confederate force consisted of some six hundred effective infantry and one hundred and seventy-five cavalry.

The commanding general, Lee, having reviewed the findings of the court of inquiry, concurred therein, but censures Porterfield for not sending back his baggage as soon as he determined to evacuate the town, for not arranging his plan of defense, and for not securing information of the advancement of the enemy. Also for the fact that the troops retired without orders. Yet, Lee says, in consideration of all the circumstances of the case, he considers that nothing more is needed than to express his hope that it will be a lesson to be remembered throughout the war.

It should be mentioned here that the last battle of the Civil War was fought on West Virginia soil, at Brandy Hollow, near Huntersville, Pocahontas County, on the site of Camp Northwest on the 18th day of April, 1865. This engagement was between the Eighth Ohio Cavalry and a portion of Gen. W. L. Jackson's army returning to their homes after the surrender.

CHAPTER XVI

Meshach Browning, the Great Hunter, Hunted all Along the Seneca Trail in Tucker and Preston Counties.

One of the books that the boys of western Maryland and the northern part of West Virginia are raised upon is the four hundred page book entitled 'Forty-four Years of a Hunter's Life," by Meshach Browning. A recent edition has been published by Lippincott's, Philadelphia, and it is a copy of that edition that a friend sent me.

The hunter was a well to do citizen of Maryland and has hundreds of descendants all proud to trace their line of ascent to him. His activities seem to have been laid largely in Garrett County, Maryland, and in Preston County, West Virginia, in the Terra Alta Country.

Meshach Browning was born in Frederick County, Maryland, in the year 1781, the son of Joshua and Nancy Browning. When Meshach was two weeks old his father died. At the age of eleven years, his family moved to some point in Monongalia County, Virginia. Shortly after, Meshach went to live with his uncle where he continued until he was fifteen years old when having had a fight with his aunt who tried to beat him into submission he went to seek his fortune and arrived at Wheeling. There he worked for John Caldwell and killed his first bear in what must be now the city.

That must have been about the year 1796, and the recollection of the famous seige of Fort Henry was clear in the minds of the people of Wheeling. In the book is an account of the battle. It occurred in 1777.

That outside of dilatory tactics in retreating, and want of vigilance, and failure to extend and strengthen his picket line, that the commanding officer acted with coolness, self-possession, and personal courage.

The court-martial found that the Confederate force consisted of some six hundred effective infantry and one hundred and seventy-five cavalry.

The commanding general, Lee, having reviewed the findings of the court of inquiry, concurred therein, but censures Porterfield for not sending back his baggage as soon as he determined to evacuate the town, for not arranging his plan of defense, and for not securing information of the advancement of the enemy. Also for the fact that the troops retired without orders. Yet, Lee says, in consideration of all the circumstances of the case, he considers that nothing more is needed than to express his hope that it will be a lesson to be remembered throughout the war.

It should be mentioned here that the last battle of the Civil War was fought on West Virginia soil, at Brandy Hollow, near Huntersville, Pocahontas County, on the site of Camp Northwest on the 18th day of April, 1865. This engagement was between the Eighth Ohio Cavalry and a portion of Gen. W. L. Jackson's army returning to their homes after the surrender.

CHAPTER XVI

Meshach Browning, the Great Hunter, Hunted all Along the Seneca Trail in Tucker and Preston Counties.

One of the books that the boys of western Maryland and the northern part of West Virginia are raised upon is the four hundred page book entitled 'Forty-four Years of a Hunter's Life," by Meshach Browning. A recent edition has been published by Lippincott's, Philadelphia, and it is a copy of that edition that a friend sent me.

The hunter was a well to do citizen of Maryland and has hundreds of descendants all proud to trace their line of ascent to him. His activities seem to have been laid largely in Garrett County, Maryland, and in Preston County, West Virginia, in the Terra Alta Country.

Meshach Browning was born in Frederick County, Maryland, in the year 1781, the son of Joshua and Nancy Browning. When Meshach was two weeks old his father died. At the age of eleven years, his family moved to some point in Monongalia County, Virginia. Shortly after, Meshach went to live with his uncle where he continued until he was fifteen years old when having had a fight with his aunt who tried to beat him into submission he went to seek his fortune and arrived at Wheeling. There he worked for John Caldwell and killed his first bear in what must be now the city.

That must have been about the year 1796, and the recollection of the famous seige of Fort Henry was clear in the minds of the people of Wheeling. In the book is an account of the battle. It occurred in 1777. According to that account John Caldwell was one of the three men of Captain Mason's company who escaped. Browning's account of it is identified by the incident of Elizabeth Zane who went through the fire line to get a supply of powder for the soldiers in the fort.

The seige of Fort Henry was one of the important engagements of the Revolutionary War and it was the most important battle waged against the white settlers by the Iroquois Indians, allies of Great Britain. Thirty-three men held the fort against 386 Indian warriors. The casualties on the part of the white settlers consisted of the slaughter of 23 of the 26 soldiers who went out of the fort in the early morning the 2nd day of September, and fell into ambush. The accepted history of that engagement has not been very satisfactory or convincing as to why the settlers who had taken shelter in the fort against the Indians should have been lured to leave the safety of the fort by the Indians. Browning gives this account as being the one told to him by the Caldwell's:

Two Indians made their appearance on the high hill above the town. This hill runs from north to south. Wheeling Creek runs from east to west, passing this elevation about a mile north of town, and then turns south, coursing along the foot of the hill until it arrives at a point a little south of the fort, where it empties into the river; thus leaving the hill a mile north of the creek. Whenever the river is a little high, the water is backed up the creek to the depth of ten or twelve feet. On this hill, opposite the fort those two Indians showed themselves, fired a shot or two at the fort, and then went off slowly slapping their hands behind them in token of derision and contempt of those within the fortification.

Fired with such an insult, our men commenced running out, and would have all gone, had not the commanding officer stood in the gate and stopped them; though not till twenty-four men were running up the steep hill after the Indians, who were to be seen still retreating, as if they did not intend to make battle. When the whites reached the top of the hill to their great dismay, they found themselves between two galling fires. They could not cross the creek if they ran that way.

They endeavored to break through the north line of the enemy and escape down the river to the fort. The loss as given by Browning was twenty-one men.

He says that John Caldwell was one of the three to escape with his life, and that as he ran he encountered a white man who had left the settlement some years before and whom he recognized at first sight. This white Indian carried a spear mounted on a handle like that of a fork, and he ran before all the Indians. He was close at the heels of John Caldwell when he arrived at the break of the hill next the fort. There the white Indian made a furious lunge just as Caldwell tripped and fell. The spear missed the man and embedded itself in a tree so fast that the white savage could not withdraw it before Caldwell slipped out of his position and reached the fort in safety.

I have not time to go into this question at any great length. The accepted history indicates a hopeless confusion as to whether the date was September 1st or September 2nd. And whether the Indians were perceived from the fort or discovered by young Andrew Zane who was hunting Dr. McMechen's horse. Zane is said to have leaped down a precipice of seventy feet. Then it is said that Captain Mason led out fourteen men against the Indians, and that Captain Ogal went to his relief with twelve scouts. And that all were killed except the two captains and three men.

There is something convincing in Browning's account of the pioneers running out after the Indians, for that was just like the minute men, who never knew discipline of any kind.

The histories agree that three men escaped with their lives, two of whom were wounded. If there is any desire to work on a quod libet as to the identity of the unwounded man, Browning gives a clew by showing that it was John Caldwell. Another had his thigh broken, and the third had an arm broken.

The white savage that John Caldwell saw was no doubt Simon Girty, who was with the Indians in that battle and held a long parley with the fort and read to them the proclamation of General Hamilton, of Fort Detroit, offering the frontier inhabitants immunity if they would come in and surrender at Detroit. But doubters have arisen to say that Girty was not at Fort Henry.

Browning also tells about the effort the Indians made to make a cannon out of a hollow log wound about with chains, and how it burst and destroyed a number of Indians.

Browning left Wheeling to return to the wilderness to marry at the age of eighteen, Mary McMullen. The young couple built a home in the woods in the pioneer style and cleared out a farm. Browning's hunting was his sport and largely his living. He settled near the Deep Creek country made up of mountain lands, and valleys, and great stretches of glades where the deer waded in grass above their backs.

He estimated that during his lifetime he had killed from eighteen hundred to two thousand deer; from three to four hundred bears; about fifty panthers; and many wolves and wildcats, and any amount of other game. Passing allusions indicate that he was in a fine trout country, but he only took them as needed and fishing was no more an incident with him than digging potatoes. His young wife Mary seems to have been more of a fisherman than he himself.

Dr. Wilson, Mayor of Marlinton, comes from the same community in which Browning lived, and his ancestors lived there from the very earliest period of the pioneer.

The Wilsons are all familiar with the Browning book. The one question that is usually asked is whether the Browning book is reliable. I think so. I believe it from kiver to kiver. My main reason for believing it is because I have heard countless old hunters relate the intimate circumstances attending the tragedy of the big game animal, and I see no particular difference between the histories except that in one case they are written down with meticulous precision and in the other case they were related by word of mouth. And in all the cases the old hunters found the supreme emotions of life in the occasions.

I was on the train the other day with the Hon. George Wilson and he referred to the occasion of the old man Browning waking up and finding himself fast to a tree as being rather extraordinary, but I do not recall that he doubted it. I will set down here that incident:

I and my two sons John and James prepared for a hunt on the North

Branch of the Potomac. We loaded one horse with provisions, and two others with articles, such as an axe, a pot, a small griddle, potatoes, apples, etc.; when all being ready to take up the line of march, after breakfast we set out for the Potomac.

We had traveled but a few miles, when rain commenced falling slowly, and continued all day. As we returned from the previous trip we had found a fine sugar camp at the foot of the Great Back Bone and there we sheltered for the night. A hooting owl awoke me and we prepared for breakfast.

I did not eat any breakfast and we packed as much provision over the mountain as we could carry as the horses could not go any farther. The horses were sent back and we hid the rest of the provisions behind a log, covering it with puncheons and hiding it with pine and laurel bushes. We saw different herds of deer but being encumbered with our loads, we did not get a shot at them.

Finding a situation for a camp, and it clouding up and threatening rain, I went to work in great haste to construct a shelter for our provision; and we worked with all our energy until the boys said they were hungry and would eat dinner, camp or no camp. I told them I would look for a suitable tree to split into puncheons, and I soon found it and we commenced to cover the cabin. It had commenced to rain slowly. Though I had not eaten anything since the morning of the previous day, and night was near at hand, yet I determined not to eat until I had a little sport; so I took my gun, told the boys that I would go up the bottom, shoot a deer, and have a roast for my supper.

I had thrown off all my clothes in order to be at full liberty to work, and had on only a thin linsey hunting shirt together with a pair of new buckskin moccasons without stockings; and in order that I should see my game more clearly, I left off my hat, as was always my practice when the sun did not shine. I intended to return in an hour or two at the farthest. I hunted with care and judgment and soon found the tracks of a large herd of deer which had so recently passed that I expected to see them every moment. I soon found that it was where several old bucks had been chasing a lot of small deer and that the little ones were afraid of being overtaken by their pursuers."

Browning relates that it came on to rain and he got lost and night overtook him and had to lay out all night.

"I went in search of some place for shelter, but could find nothing better than crooked old hemlock, which had been injured many years previously, and which the bears had gnawed so much that there was a great quantity of rosin plastered over the whole side of the tree, which was much flattened by the injury it had received in the years gone by. I chose that tree for shelter and set about building a fire.

The rain having ceased to fall so fast, I rested against the tree, and fell asleep. Being tired, I slept soundly, until it ceased to rain, and commenced snowing and freezing; when the cold becoming severe, and the fire having died away, I grew chilly, and, awakening, attempted to mend the fire, but found the hair on one side of my head sticking fast to the tree.

At first, my temper being pretty well tried and my patience having failed me, I was as mad as a bear shot through the belly, and bawled out, as if twenty persons had been looking on: "What other curse is on me now?" I soon calmed, and putting my hand up to find what held me, I discovered my hair fast in the pitch that had been heated by the fire. I had laid my head in it when it was soft and running, and had slept until the cold had chilled the pitch with my hair deep into it.

I then began to try to release my head, but not one lock would come out, except by pulling off the pitch, or pulling the hair out of my scalp; so I sometimes took the one, and sometimes the other plan, as it happened, until at last I got my liberty. I then mended the fire.

After that I reasoned thus: "Now I have not eaten one mouthful since the day before yesterday, and it was nothing but a foolish desire for sport that brought me here."

At last daylight appeared, when everything being covered and bent down with the snow, I hunted for bushes that had leaves on, which I dried over the fire, and, putting some in my moccasins, I put my feet in on the leaves, crammed in leaves around them until I could get no more in, then tied them up, and was ready for the snow.

I started out from my warm fire into the snow. I soon scared up four deer, but did not see them until they ran off. Moving on I saw a deer standing looking at me and thought it was a long shot and a bad chance, I cracked away at him. The snow was falling so fast that it was difficult to see any distance, and as I could not discover the deer after my gun was discharged, I went to examine what damage had been done. It seemed as if there had been twenty deer there, all running and fighting, for there was blood after several of the bucks, and so much hair torn off I could not arrive at any certain conclusion.

They all went off together, and as the fun fever began to rise high, I started off in a long trot after them, and had gone but a short distance when my dog wheeled suddenly to my left, which told me that one was in shooting distance. I viewed the ground and found that it must be behind a very large fallen tree, but to see it was impossible. I looked around for means of raising me up high enough to see over the log, when I discovered a tree which had fallen into the form of another and was considerably elevated. I went to it and crawled up its sideways until I saw the horns of an old buck.

"Well, my fellow," said I, "you are my meat or I am no judge of shooting."

Still though I did not see his head, I could see very near to it; and I thought if the snow was off the log his head would be a fair mark. So I guessed at his position, shot at him through the snow, and down fell the horns. I leaped off the tree like a panther, and with one jump was on him, cut his throat in the crack of a thumb, and commenced skinning him. If ever I skinned a deer quickly, then was the time, for the sight of all those deer in one gang had set my pulse up so high for sport, that I thought every minute was an hour, as I was sure that if I could only overtake them in good ground, I could kill half a dozen of them before night.

The buck skinned, I cut off one whole side of the ribs, tied the meat up in the skin, and started off on the trail of the others.

I had not gone more than half a mile, when hearing a halloo, I turned around and saw my two sons, who had heard me shoot, and finding my tracks in the snow were in full chase to overtake me. I could not prevail on them to follow my big gang of deer, as they were afraid I would faint with hunger, but I knew I could have gone until dark if I had once got a shot at those deer. They turned me toward camp, and as we passed by the place I had killed the buck we took his carcass with us. John Lynn baked buckwheat cakes, besides stewing a fat turkey hen with potatoes and turnips. I really thought it was the best meal I ever tasted in my life.

We had commenced the hunt too late so we closed the hunt with the slaughter of five deer. To such as are not accustomed to wilderness life this fast of three days seems to want some explanation. In reference to it, I will only say that a man will live a long time under the stimulus of a high fever, and I know of no higher fever than which may be excited by the prospect of a bear fight, or of securing half a dozen fine fat bucks."

It is evident that the late Mr. Browning was a hunter from away back, hankering after things which others idle by. He describes the events with great particularity and knows the ways of the woods.

He belonged to a great day and generation. He helped to conquer the wilderness. Men like him bred a restless race. It is finding some little surcease from sorrow in the game of golf: "Golf! Slow back, don't press, keep your eye on the ball! Hooray!" But the woods are tame compared to the time when Meshach Browning slept against that tree.

CHAPTER XVII

The Lost Colony of Westsylvania. The Seneca Trail Runs for 198 Miles Through It.

The motto of the United States is E pluribus unum—one out of many, but in the beginning all of the English possessions in North America were included in one dominion under the name of Virginia. In the days of Queen Elizabeth, Virginia was known as the fourth kingdom. Spencer's Faerie Queene, published in 1590, was dedicated to "Elizabeth, Queen of England, France, Ireland, and Virginia." After the crowning of the Scotch king, James I, Scotland was added to the title, and Virginia became the fifth kingdom of the realm. This was in 1603.

In 1649, Cromwell having conquered Charles I, and beheaded him, William Berkeley, governor of Virginia, proclaimed Charles II, king of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Virginia, and from this action on the part of the colonial governor, the title of Old Dominion was applied to Virginia. In Virginia as late as 1773, coins were struck showing the four quarterings. And it was the year 1649 that the Fairfax grant was dated conveying the land in the 22 counties of the Northern Neck to Culpeper and his associates. Culpeper bought out his partners, had the title confirmed to him, and left it to his daughter, Catharine, the Baroness Fairfax, who left it to her son, Lord Thomas Fairfax. This was for all the land between the Potomac and Rappahannock rivers.

Numerous colonization schemes were projected of the public domain in the New World by the English government.* Thirteen of the colonies lived to join in the Declaration of Independence. Something like thirty-seven colonies failed to materialize or endured for a season and passed away. There lived to join the Republic: The Province of Maine, New Sweden, or Delaware, and Westsylvania, now West Virginia.

It is not too much to say that West Virginia should be included in the last named class, and claim for Westsylvania that vision of those pioneers who demanded that Westsylvania be recognized as the fourteenth colony under the Declaration of Independence. That in West Virginia that vision splendid and whole arose and carried out the plans of the men of 1776.

It will be remembered that Virginia's first grant was to the company composed of George Summers and others and was dated April 10, 1606. Pennsylvania was granted to William Penn in payment of a debt, by a grant dated March 4th, 1681. The boundaries were very indefinite. It is fairly certain that for the first hundred years that Pennsylvania acted as though it had no possessions west of the Alleghany mountains, no title to any land drained by the western waters. As late as 1763, the colony of Pennsylvania was engaged in driving back the squatters on the Ohio waters, in obedience to the proclamation of the King of England, for all settlers west of the mountains to return. Virginia took no notice of the proclamation either officially or individually, but Pennsylvania assisted in clearing the reservation.

When Great Britain imported an army under General Braddock, in 1755, to drive back the French from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania sent three hundred men to help cut a road but it had no soldiers in the fight. Virginia contributed a very considerable force, and the Six Nations offered warriors to assist in the movement.

Probably the best evidence that Pennsylvania claimed no territorial right on the waters of the Ohio is shown by the grant of the lord commissioners to the Ohio Company, in the year 1749. That company had the right to take up 500,000 acres on the Ohio river. It was to have no civil jurisdiction but it did have the right to build forts and conduct trade with the Indians. It seems to have been something like the grant of the same year to the Greenbrier Company, to take up 100,000 acres north and west of the Cowpasture river. The right to survey seemed to be perfect but no grants issued until after the Revolutionary War, and then they did not have any greater rights than the settlers on tomahawk claims. The Ohio Company did build a fort at the mouth of Wills Creek on the Potomac and another at Redstone, on the Monongahela river, but there is no evidence that in either instance did these adventurers return to Pennsylvania.

*Among such colonies are listed: Acadia, Albemarle, Alexander's Charter, Avalon, Clarendon, Carolana, Dorchester, Fenwick, Frankland, Indiana, Laconia, New Albion, New Amstel, New France, New Haven, New Ireland, New Netherlands, New Sometshire, North Virginia, Norumbega, Northern Neck, Nova Scotia, Ohio Company, Old Dominion, Pavonia, Pittsylvania, Plough Patent, Plymouth, Rensselaerswyck, Roanoke, Sagadahoc, Swaanendael, Transylvania, Vandalia, Walpole Grant, and District of Columbia.

The treaty of 1722 had confirmed the lands on the western waters to the Indians. Great Britain took the view that it was paramount lord to the Indians, a policy that has been faithfully followed by the government of the United States. Here is the way that Great Britain got title. They made a gold crown and crowned Powhatan, King of Virginia, that is of all the lands left for Great Britain, which included the lands from ocean to ocean and from the great lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and having thus made him King of Virginia, or as we would now say, King of America, they entered into a treaty with him by which Great Britain took title to all America. That was a stroke of diplomacy.

It was apparent that about the time that the king closed the land office at Williamsburg before the Revolution, that the many bright minds of Virginia, were exercised over the problem as to the best way to grab the lands on the western waters, and that Pennsylvania was stirring in her sleep, also. The great tide of immigration came through the port of Philadelphia, and the boldest and the bravest, the Scotch Irish would not settle down with the Quakers and the Menonites, but pushed over the mountains where the hunting was good and where there was danger from Indians, for the Irish dearly loved the fight. Up to the date of the Declaration of Independence, however, Virginia had full and complete possession of the Pittsburg district, in that it maintained a garrison at the forks of the Ohio. There was a good deal of bitterness between the colonies of Penssylvania and Virginia about this. There were some very ugly fights and quarrels, about such places as Catfish Camp, now the city of Washington, Pennsylvania, and at Brownsville and Uniontown.

The French and Indian war breaking out in the seventeen fifties put a damper on the Ohio Company, and when Bouquet, from Staunton, got the Indians quieted, the crown took a hand in the western water shed and got the Indians together at Fort Stanwix, (now Rome, N. Y.) and there the Six Nations entered into two deeds. Twenty-four Indian traders, mostly Pennsylvanias, claimed that in Pontiac's war the Indians had stolen their goods to the value of 950 pounds, sixteen shillings and sixpence. For this they agreed to take a sizable state including practically all of the Pittsburg district and call it square. The rest of the land between the Ohio river and the Tennessee river the Six Nations ceded to George III for love and affection. These paper titles gave offense to Virginia. The traders sought to form a colony with their acres and called it Indiana. The House of Burgesses of Virginia passed a law that all deeds from Indians were null and void. This afterwards disposed of the Henderson grant from the Cherokees, and the colony that he proposed to call Transylvania. As a consolation prize, however, Virginia gave Henderson 144 square miles of land on the Ohio at the mouth of Green river.

The Pennsylvanians were very much disappointed in not being able to hold the Pittsburg district, their state of Indiana, and they began to lobby through a scheme to get that land back and a lot more under the Vandalia project. This has been represented as a popular uprising and some years ago a petition was found signed by seventy-two citizens of the Greenbrier Valley, asking the king to form a new colony west of the mountains. To read this petition one would think that it represented a ground swell from the people, but that is not the case. The petition was propaganda pure and simple. It was to back up the land scheme. Virginia opposed it as strongly as she knew how. It did not fit in with the plans of Washington or the other Virginians seeking to plant settlements on the west side of the mountains. It was rejected at first in London. It was heard before the Board of Trade and Plantations. It was meant to include most of West Virginia, the eastern part of Kentucky, and a part of Pennsylvania. Lord Hillsborough opposed it and Benjamin Franklin supported it before the board. The petition was finally granted in 1775, but it came too late, as the king's writ was not honored in Virginia after the battle at Point Pleasant. Vandalia was never more than a land grabbing scheme. They first asked for 2,500,000 acres. The prime minister suggested that they ask for more so they suggested twenty-five million acres. The colony of Vandalia existed on paper from 1772, but it does not appear that any of the soldiers in Dunmore's war had ever heard of the name even. For years after the Revolution claimants to land under the Vandalia settlement were advanced in Congress and elsewhere, but they were absolutely ignored.

No sooner had the Declaration of Independence been promulgated, however, when a real colony was proposed by the backbone of the Revolution. The Irish on the western waters, now historically known as the people of West Augusta demanded of Congress that they be recognized as the fourteenth colony, under the name of Westsylvania. If these people instead of asking permission of Congress had asserted their right and organized a government, it would have been instantly recognized and a great state formed and the Civil War would have been averted.

The bounds of Westsylvania are as follows: Beginning on the Ohio river at the mouth of the Scioto river, thence southerly a straight line to the pass in the Quasito mountains (Cumberland Gap), thence along the side of said mountains northwesterly to the point where the Great Kanawha river is formed by the junction of the New river and the Greenbrier river, thence along the Greenbrier river to the head of the northeastern branch, then from there to the top of the Alleghany mountain, thence along the said mountain to Fairfax's line, then with it to the head of the north branch of the Potomac river, thence with the line of the Province of Maryland, thence with the southern and western lines of the Province of Pennsylvania to the head of the Ohio river, and with that river to the point of beginning.

This motion was made the 9th day of August, 1776, a little over a month after this country cut loose from England. It was estimated that 25,000 families lived in that boundary. The boundary had been at war for a generation with the Indians. It was the hot bed of the Revolution. There were more riflemen in that boundary than in all the rest of the dominions. It was where the fighters lived.

Virginia did not approve of the fourteenth colony and that commonwealth was all powerful at that time. On June 12th, 1776, the Virginia convention adopted its Bill of Rights. On June 29th, 1776, its constitution was adopted. Col. John Evans, of Monongalia county, was a member of that convention. He was afterwards colonel of a regiment in the Revolution. Virginia assembled its legislature in October, 1776, going on its way to independence and directing the continental congress at the same time. Its answer to the movement to establish the colony of Westsylvania, was to grant the wishes of those people by creating the District of West Augusta, creating at the same time its subdivisions of the three counties of Yogogania, Ohio, and Monongalia, appointing a board of commissioners to visit it and confirm the titles of the settlers in possession. Some 1197 tomahawk grants, or squatter rights, were speedily confirmed and the demand for a new state was quieted so far as Virginia was concerned. Later Virginia gave up most of Yogogania county to Pennsylvania, reserving a narrow strip called the panhandle above Cross creek, Brooke county. Then Pennsylvania passed a law that if any person ever proposed to diminish her boundaries by talking about new states that he should be guilty of high treason and be punished by death. This ought to settle the question whether treason can be committed against one of the sovereign states.

The answer to the demand for the formation of a fourteenth colony was the creation of the District of West Augusta, now sometimes referred to in business circles as the Pittsburg District. It is said to be the richest boundary in the world, all things considered.

At the time the mountaineers declared for Westsylvania and estimated the population to be 25,000 families, there was no town or city within its borders. Then as now, Pittsburg was the most populous place, but it had only thirty houses. Probably the next largest settlement was Frankfort, in Greenbrier county. A settlement in those days was a community of families surrounding a stockade fort. The fort at Lewisburg is said to have accommodated as many as five hundred persons. In 1776, a large number of persons lived within reach of the fort at the mouth of Wheeling creek, first called Fort Fincastle but later named Fort Henry. Large settlements centered around Brownsville and Catfish Camp in Pennsylvania.

There was not a single county seat or court house in the bounds of Westsylvania. Indian raids had been constant for about twenty-five years. The inhabitants grew up and flourished in the shadow of death by torture. The proposed state consisted of a large number of communities loosely bound together and united only by common danger. None held title to lands other than that they had cleared it with an axe and held it with a rifle.

As a matter of fact a new race sprang into existence at that period consisting of a sort of supermanhood produced by careful selection and environment. In after years they had given the name of Scotch-Irish, but that does not do them justice. A better name was one of spontaneous growth and belonged to them exclusively, and that was Backwoodsmen. It is a name that we do not share with any other class or race. Recently there is a motion to refer to them as the Tallmen. I am in favor of glorifying them under the classification of Backwoodsmen.

They were the heroes who sifted through the luxurious and prosperous colonies on the lower levels stepping downward to the sea. Nine out of ten of them were Irish Presbyterians, and the odd man was fully as daring and resolute. The great numbers of them came through the centers of the Quaker and Pennsylvanian Dutch to the mountains and from the north poured down the parallel, though like valleys of the Alleghanies. Others entered through the Potomac gap, the Narrows of Knapps Creek, the Midland Trace, and the New River country. They were sorted twice. In the first place they had the nerve to leave the old country and brave the dangers of the stormy deep, and in the second place, the lure of danger from the Indians attracted with an irresistible force and so they crossed the mountains.

Tired of the monotony of the sheltered homes of low lands, it was the custom of these men to take a rifle, an axe, and an augur and walk westward. On arriving at the place where the mountains changed and the streams flowed towards the west, each pioneer set about looking over the vast wooded domain for a place to make a home. Everything was open to him. He wandered from stream to stream and observed the character of the land, the kinds of trees, and the presence of springs. Finding an ideal place he marked some trees nearest the spring, and set to work to clear a field for a corn crop. This being done the corn was planted, and he set to building a house out of logs, and with his axe and with an augur he built and roofed a one-room house with clapboard roof without the use of a single nail or other iron. The floor was the earth. There were no windows. A puncheon door swung on wooden hinges and was secured by a bar and a latch with a string.

By this time the corn was raised and ready to leave to ripen, the pioneer walked back to the lowlands to get his family and they trailed back with a cow or two, rarely a horse, and took up their abode in the new home.

Hundreds and thousands of Backwoodsmen came across the mountains in this way, and it was soon apparent that their environment had affected their carriage and their conduct so that they were foreign to the people of the east. It showed in thought, speech, stature, dress, and accomplishments.

One of the most remarkable incidents in the founding of this new race of Backswoodsmen was immediate increase in weight and height, accomplished in a single generation, so much so that a man six feet tall was of ordinary stature. It has been observed by historians but so far as I have heard no satisfactory theory has been advanced for this striking change. My theory, based on my observation of domestic animals is, that this giant race responded instantly to a diet of corn bread, by which is meant Indian corn, which was the only bread that the pioneer used. It depends upon feeding with other vertebrates, may it not be true as to the man animal?

Another striking difference was in the dress. In the mountains every family did their own weaving and spinning and the character of cloth from flax and from wool has never been exceeded for the use for which it was designed. The men wore a distinctive dress. It was as distinctive as the kilts of the Highlanders, and far more useful. Someday when we really appreciate the noble qualities of our ancestors, we will go on dress parade in the hunter's dress, referred to in those days as the wammus. It was of universal wear in Westsylvania. A pioneer might not wear any more trousers than a Scottish chief but he lived in his wammus. It was belted and in that belt the hunter carried his woods axe and hunting knife. It accentuated the appearance of height in the wearer.

The Backwoodsmen were self-sustaining. You cannot mention a thing they could not produce on their own farms and hills that was necessary to the comforts of their lives. They made their own weapons, cloth, sugar, leather, implements, salt, gunpowder, lights, dishes, and ovens. They lived on the fat of the land.

But for the dreadful danger of the Indian raids, they might have become soft and tame. To this day their descendants, even though they live in palaces in cities, are never easy about their homes when they are absent. It is a hangover from that time when a man might return from a hunting trip to find his house burned, some of his people dead and scalped, and others carried into captivity. There are a lot of things that we cannot understand that are bred in the bone.

The ethnical effect upon the women in the backwoods was equally remarkable, of course. A finer breed of women never lived. They were equal to any emergency. Take the case of Mary Bozart on Dunkard Creek in Monongalia county in 1778. The Indians approached her house. There were two men there and both were shot, one being killed and the other disabled by a wound. In the time that it took, some three minutes, to herd the young children into the house before the Indians could enter, Mrs. Bozart killed three of them with an axe and then held the door against the rest of the raiders until soldiers could come from Prickett's fort.

One of my grandmothers was married at eighteen years. In the last year of her single life she had seventeen proposals of marriage. She was the mother of fourteen children.

Martha McNeel, the wife of John McNeel, was left at home alone while her husband and every other able bodied man in the Little Levels of Pocahontas county marched to the battle at Point Pleasant in 1774. During his absence on this campaign a child was born to her and soon afterwards died, and the mother prepared the coffin and dug the grave and buried it unaided.

Mary Vance Warwick, while her husband was in the army of the Revolution, went from the stockade alone to her home four miles away through the forest. She discovered a large Indian war party and was able to take the word to the fort and prevent its surprise.

Ann Bailey rode from Fort Young at Covington to Point Pleasant over the Indian trace time and again and carried powder and lead to the garrison.

Betty Zane carried powder from one fort to the other at Wheeling under the fire of hundreds of Indian warriors.

Hannah Dennis, captured by Cornstalk, became the wise woman of his nation, and when she escaped walked three hundred miles through the wilderness and survived.

Physically these pioneer women were nearly perfect. They could undergo the perils of maternity and never lose a day from their household work. They were deeply religious and trained up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. The changing scenes of their lives had the effect of making them ready to accept the bright and vivid radiance of the Methodism of Wesley in place of the gloomy and austere faith of the Covenanters. This in itself is in keeping with the renascence resulting from a super-race of mortals being set down in a fruitful wilderness, there to found a race and give color to a people to be known to the ends of the earth as Americans.

At the time we had decided to be Westsylvania, the heroes of the backwoods were woodsmen who were skilled in the art of Indian warfare and in wilderness life generally. Such men as Boone, Cresap, Clarke, Wetzels, McDonald, Crawford, David Williamson, Robertson, Sevier, Shelby, Brady, McCulloch, and the like.

They had perfected a rifle that was superior to any thing known before that time. A long rifled gun made of soft iron, shooting a ball that ran as small as seventy to the pound, but which was precise and deadly. Reports of British officers in the Revolution were to the effect that their wounded were negligible in numbers, but that many of their soldiers were killed instantly by a shot in the forehead between the eyes.

During the Revolution the Backwoodsmen were never menaced or raided by the British troops. It was the most dangerous ground known in that war on account of the Indian allies who were induced by the British to side with them. In all of Westsylvania there is no record of a Tory. But in some colonies it was sometimes hard to tell whether there were more king's men or more congress men. And the price of scalps paid by the British had the strange effect of bringing Tory scalps just the same as Whigs. This reacted most woefully on Tory sentiment when they found that Great Britain was buying their hair.

It was about this time that the people of Westsylvania commenced to put Indian hides in their tanning vats in their yards.

The prompt action on the part of the first assembly to meet after the Declaration of Independence in establishing the district of West Augusta, and in perfecting the title to the lands on the western waters, satisfied the Virginians, but it did not satisfy the fighters who lived in what is now Pennsylvania. The same spirit of independence caused a revolt in that part of Westsylvania in 1794, when Congress laid a tax on whiskey, which constituted the main money income of that part of the country. Westsylvania saw a bigger army of white men at that time than she saw during the Revolution, and about a thousand of them were Virginians from Westsylvania. David Bradford headed that strike.

But a thing is never settled until it is settled right. And the failure to form the Fourteenth Colony was the direct cause of the Civil War, and the belated formation of the State of West Virginia.

It is possible that if quick transportation and the modern cities had come sooner that the people of Virginia could have continued to live together, but as time went on the mountain people found it more and more irksome to live and do business under the domination of a race of people with whom they had so little in common. Then and now to be a citizen of West Virginia is greater than to me a king. They can brook no restraint upon their actions. They are as wild as the eagle.

"He clasps the crag with hooked hands,
Close to the sun in lonely lands,
Ringed with the azure wohld he stands.
The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls,
He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunder bolt he falls."

The rending of Virginia was bound to come sooner or later, on account of the diversity of the creatures. If the good Lord had seen fit to let the colony of Westsylvania live, it is the opinion of those who are able to interpret history, that the Civil War would never have been. With a powerful state reaching from the Great Lakes to Tennessee, of great wealth and population, and inclined to the free soil policies, the great tragedy of the United States would have been averted.

That we are different from the teeming millions of the great centers of population, we would be the last to deny. It has brought its problems and its perplexities. If we are quick on the trigger, they are quick on the uptake, and they find the loose joints in our armor, and many is the sly dig that their kept scribes give us.

In the meantime we do very well, thank you, and someday the song of Westsylvania will be the song of Roland and the pine.

"God's ways seem dark, but, soon or late,
They touch the shining hills of day;
The evil cannot brook delay,
The good can well afford to wait.
Give ermined knaves their hour of crime;
Ye have the future grand and great,
The safe appeal of Truth to Time!"

comfort, and the ideal of his endeavors was to have a home of his own amid fields and meadows. Of such homes an eloquent writer says: "The homes of our land are its havens of peace, its sanctuaries of strength and happiness. Hence come those principles of probity and integrity that are the safeguards of our nation."

ANDREW EDMISTON.

Andrew Edmiston, Esq., of Scotch-Irish ancestry, late of the lower Levels, is the subject of this biographic memoir. The immediate ancestry of the Edmiston relationship is traceable to Matthew Edmiston, who came to Augusta County, Va., from Chester County, Pa., among the earliest settlers of Augusta County, about 1740, or very soon thereafter.

James Edmiston, a son of Matthew the ancestor, was one of six children and was born in Augusta County, October 7, 1746, and died October 7, 1817. James Edmiston's wife was Jane Smith, from Ireland, who was born October 17th, 1746, and died May 20th, 1837, aged 91 years. Andrew Edmiston, son of James, was born July 22d, 1777.

Soon after his marriage with Mary (Polly) Gilliland, January 8th, 1807, Mr Edmiston settled near Locust, on lands now owned by George Callison. In reference to Mrs Polly Edmiston, let it be noticed here that she was a daughter of the first Mrs James Gilliland,—

Digitized by Google

Lydia Armstrong, born October 17th, 1755, and deceased July 23d, 1817. Mrs Polly Edmiston was born July 4th, 1790, and was a bride at 17 years of age. Her death occurred January 2, 1877, surviving her husband thirteen years. James Gilliland, her father, was born in Augusta County, March 16th, 1749, and died February 14th, 1844, near Falling Spring, Greenbrier County, aged 95 years. He married for his second wife Mrs Jane Smith Edmiston, the widowed mother of Andrew Edmiston, in February, 1819. By this marriage Mr Gilliland became Andrew Edmiston's step-father, as well as father-in-law, a relationship so unique as to challenge a parallel in the history of Pocahontas marriage relationships.

This James Gilliland's father was named Nathan Gilliland, about whom we have no particulars. By the first marriage there were six sons, Robert, James, Nathan, William, Samuel, and George; and six daughters, Jane, Sarah, Elizabeth, Nancy, Lydia, and Mary (Polly), the last named the wife of Andrew Edmiston.

What lends interest to what has just been said about James Gilliland's first family is the fact that there are cogent reasons for believing that Hon. Mark Hanna, of Ohio, is a descendant of one of the above named sisters.

It is also interesting to mention that Andrew Edmiston was a lineal descendant of Sir David Edmiston, cup-bearer to James 1st of Scotland; also of Sir James Edmiston, standard bearer of the royal colors in the battle of Sheriffmuir, (1715). In the Revolutionary war Mr Edmiston's ancestors were distinguished, and nota bly at the battle of King's Mountain. Several of his grandsons were good Confederate soldiers in the late war between the States.

Digitized by Google

Mr and Mrs Edmiston were the parents of five sons and five daughters: Lydia, Elizabeth, Jane, Martha, Mary, James, George, Matthew, Andrew Jackson, and William.

Lydia Edmiston was married to Richard McNeel, grandson of John McNeel the original settler of the Levels, and lived near Millpoint.

Elizabeth Edmiston became Mrs James Gilliland, of James, Senior, and settled in Davies County, Mo. Jamesport, a town of 1200 population, was located on his farm, and hence was called Jamesport.

Jane Edmiston became Mrs Abram Jordan, mentioned elsewhere as having gone west. So far as known to the writer, she is now living in Kansas with her daughter, Mrs William Renick.

Martha Edmiston married Franklin Jordan, and settled in Missouri, where she died leaving no surviving children.

Mary Edmiston was an invalid all her life and never married. She went with her brother George Edmiston to Missouri.

Matthew Edmiston married Minerva Bland, in Weston, and settled there. His name appears in the history of our State as one of the most distinguished of our native born public characters. In Lewis' History and Government of West Virginia, mention is made of this distinguished man as follows:

Digitized by Google

"Judge Edmiston was born September 9, 1814, at Little Levels, Pocahontas County, where after receiving a common school education, he was admitted to the bar in 1835. Four years after he removed to Lewis County, which later he represented in both branches of the General Assembly of Virginia. In 1852 he was chosen a judge of the circuit court, in which position he continued until 1860. He was elected to a seat in the Constitutional Convention of 1872, but because of ill health did not qualify. He was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Appeals in 1886, but one year before his death. Judge Edmiston died June 29th, 1887, at his home in Weston, Lewis County."

Judge Matthew Edmiston reared a large family. Of his five sons, four became physicians and one a lawyer. Each distinguished himself with marked credit in both private and professional life. One by one they fulfilled the destiny of their career and answered the final summons of life, until to-day but one survives. He possesses the distinction of having been named for the subject of this sketch. Hon. Andrew Edmiston resides at Weston, Lewis County. Of him well may it be said, "His has been a life of great influence and usefulness." Possessing in a marked degree those sturdy elements and attributes of manhood which have always characterized the Edmiston family, he has brought added lustre to the name. Electing to follow in the footsteps of his eminent father, he has graced and dignified the high calling of the law. Prominent in politics and state-craft, he has steadily advanced in the esteem of the public until he has erected for himself a monument of honor and influence that will testify in all future time to his worth and greatness. Whether engaged in the discharge of the duties incident to political office or in the less prominent walks of life, he has always served his constituency alike with the same unfaltering fidelity. The name of Andrew Edmiston, of Weston, is conspicuously identified with the political history of West Virginia. To few men is given such wide power and influence.

Digitized by Google

James Edmiston married Mary Hill, daughter of Thomas Hill. He lived a number of years near Mill-point, on the farm now held by C. Edgar Beard. Mr Edmiston was a member of the Pocahontas Court, and for years was prominent in county affairs. Late in life he went west. Mrs Minerva Beard, of Lewisburg, is his daughter.

George Edmiston married Mrs Nancy Callison, relict of Isaac Callison, and a daughter of John Jordan, and lived many years at the homestead. He was a busy, enterprising man, and was engaged in many business enterprises with the late Colonel Paul McNeel. He finally moved to Missouri, where his family resides.

Andrew Jackson Edmiston married Rebecca Edmiston, a daughter of James Edmiston, son of William Edmiston, brother of Andrew Edmiston. After the decease of her husband, Mrs Edmiston became the wife of Jackson Jones, of Nicholas County.

William Edmiston, the youngest of Andrew Edmis-

Digitized by Google

ton's sons, spent some time with Judge Edmiston at Weston, where he attended school. He then went several terms to Rev Dunlap, principal of the Pocahontas Academy at Hillsboro. When he attained his majority he started to Missouri with Anthony C. Jordan. While on a steamer in Missouri waters he was seized with cholera and died on the boat. The towns were quarantined in a very rigid manner, and all landing was prohibited. Hence the crew were compelled to bury their passenger at a lonely, uninhabited spot, not very remote from St. Charles, Mo. His friend Jordan went ashore to assist in the burial, but would not return to the boat, and finished his journey to Davies County on foot, after successfully eluding the quarantine guards by keeping away from the public routes of travel.

In his youth and early manhood Andrew Edmiston seems to have had a consuming passion for athletic exercises, boxing, wrestling, and feats of muscular endurance. There was living at the time one Thomas Johnson, near the head of Stony Creek, who claimed to be the champion hard hitter of all that region. He heard of young Edmiston's exploits as an athlete, and these exploits created some doubt as to which was the "best man"; and to settle the question the ambitious Stony Creek champion sent a challenge to the champion of the lower Levels, that if he would meet him he would find out that though he might be the best the Levels could show, that he would soon find himself nowhere on Stony Creek if he just dared to show himself up there. This fired young Edmiston, and made him as hot as the furnace we read of in Daniel. He may have sought rest but he did not find any that night, and so he set out by the light of the morning stars for West Union.

Digitized by Google

He walked from his home near Locust to John Smith's, head of Stony Creek—fifteen or more miles—before breakfast to dispute the question of "best man" with Tom Johnson on his own Stony Creek ground. Without stopping for rest or breakfart he sailed into Johnson, tooth, fist, and toenail. In the first round Johnson landed a terrific blow on Edmiston's shoulder that dislocated Edmiston's arm, and yet he continued the contest until he saw his opportunity, and overpowered Johnson until he called out enough.

John Smith then took charge of the victor, the now best man of Stony Creek and the Levels, and gave him his breakfast, and by noon he was back at Locust. He felt the effects of that dislocation all of his subsequent life. Slight exertion would ever after make his injured arm fly out of place at the shoulder.

In his later years he professed a change of heart and became a member of the M. E. Church. His sincerity was respected by all who knew him best, and regarded genuine. Mr Edmiston died April 15th, 1864, aged 87 years. When the dying day came, when he was to pass over to the bright forever, it was found that he had nothing to do but to die. God had not cast him off in the time of old age, nor forsaken him when his strength failed. At evening time it was light with this venerable man, and he could realize the power of words like these: "I will go in the strength of the Lord God; I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only."

Digitized by Google

JEREMIAH FRIEL.

The Friel relationship trace their ancestry to one Daniel O'Friel, a native of Ireland, who probably came to Augusta county with the Lewises, 1740. He settled on Middle River, between Churchville and Staunton. His children were James, William, Jeremiah, and Anna. James O'Friel went to Maryland, Eastern Shore. William settled in Highland County. Anna became a Mrs Crawford and lived in Augusta.

Daniel O'Friel seems to have been a person of considerable means. He sold his property for Continental money, with a view of settling in Kentucky. The money being repudiated, he was unable to carry out his plans. Upon Jacob Warwick's invitation, Jeremiah O'Friel came to Clover Lick. Mr Warwick gave him land on Carrich Ridge. This land was exchanged with Sampson Matthews, Senior, for lands on Greenbrier, now occupied in part by his descendants.

Jeremiah Friel's wife was Anna Brown, daughter of Joseph Brown, who was living at the time on Greenbrier River. Their first home was on Carrich Ridge, then afterwards they lived on the river. Their children were Joseph, Daniel, Josiah, John, Catherine, Hannah, Ellen, Mary, and Jennie.

Digitized by Google

original Pocahontas secessionists. so intense his devotion to State rights had become.

His second marriage was with Margaret Poage, daughter of George W. Poage, of the Little Levels.

ANDREW WARWICK.

One of the best known names in our pionee. annais was that of the Warwicks. John Warwick; the ancestor of the Greenbank branch of the connexion, was of English descent. It is believed he came to upper Pocahontas previously to the Revolution, and opened up a settlement on Deer Creek, at the place now in the possession of Peter H. Warwick and John R. Warwick. Mrs Warwick, whose given name can not be certainly recalled, was a member of the Martin family in the Valley of Virginia.

John Warwick seems to have been a person of great enterprise, and braved the dangers of pioneer life with more than ordinary courage and devotion to duty. He had a fort raised upon his premises, to which himself and nelghbors would resort when threatened by Indian incursions or raids Being so near to Clover Lick, whose facilities for hunting and fishing were so much prized by the Indians, its erection seems to have been very exasperating to them, and were very troublesome to the settlers living in reach of the Warwick fort.

The only Indian Major Jacob Warwick was ever certain of killing was shot from a tree not far from this fort. The warrior had climbed the tree to reconoitre the fort, and it is more than probable that the death of the scout interfered with the Indian plans and intentions of attack.

Digitized by Google

In reference to John Warwick's children we have the following particulars: Their names were William, John, Andrew, Elizabeth—of whom special mention was made in the Slaven sketches: Mary, who was probaly the first lady teacher of schools in our county; Margaret, who became Mrs James Gay and went west; Ann, who became Mrs Ingram and lived in Ohio.

As the Warwick relationship is so extended, it will be treated in groups in these biographic notes. In this paper the descendants of Andrew Warwick will be mainly considered and their history illustrated, concluding with a fragmentary reference.

Andrew Warwick went to Richlands, in Greenbrier, for a wife and married Elizabeth Craig, and then opened up a home on Deer Creek. This property is now occupied by Major J. C. Arbogast. Their children were Jane, who was married to James Wooddell, near Greenbank; Margaret became Mas Samuel Sutton, first wife; Nancy was married to Jacob Hartman, north of Greenbank, and went to the far west. Her children were Sarah Lucretia, Virginia, William; and James. Mary Warwick became the second wife of Isaac Hartman, and lived on property now held by Joseph Riley. Elizabeth Warwick was kicked in the face by a horse about the time she was grown to womanhood, and lingered for years in great suffering and finally died of the injury. Sally Warwick became Mrs George Burner, of Travelers Repose. Anna Warwick was married to Rev Henry Arbogast, and lived near Gladehill.

Digitized by Google

Jacob Warwick, son of Andrew Warwick, married Elizabeth Hull, of Virginia, and settled on the Deer Creek homestead; moved thence to Indiana, and finally to Missouri. His children were Mathew Patton, Amos, Andrew Jackson, William Craig, Caroline, who became Mrs George Tallman; and Rachel, who was the youngest. They all went with their parents to the western states.

This paper will be closed by a fragmentary reference to John Warwick, of John the elder.

In the winter of 1861 there was an officer with the Ohio troops in the Cheat Mountain garrison by the name of Warwick. The writer has been informed that he claimed descent from the Pocahontas Warwicks, and made some inquiry concerning the Warwick relationship.

The tradition is that John Warwick. Junior, married Margaret Poage of Augusta County. It is believed James Poage, her father, lived awhile on Knapps Creek, and afterwards moved to Kentucky.

Upon his marriage John Warwick, Junior, settled on the lower end of the farm now owned by Captain G. W. Siple. Parties yet living remember seeing traces of the cabin he had built and dwelt in. He remained here but a short time however, and moved to Ohio about 1790.

There were three little boys, one of them named John- The Union officer claimed to be a descendant of a John Warwick from West Virginia, a grandson, and was a son, doubtless, of one of those little boys that went to Ohio with their parents from their cabin home on Deer Creek. This Federal officer became a member of Congress, and achieved a national reputation by defeating William McKinley in a Congressional contest. Many no doubt will readily recall this interesting event in the history of Ohio politics.

Digitized by Google

WILLIAM WARWICK.

The group of the Warwick relationship treated of in this paper includes the descendants of William Warwick, son of John Warwick, the early pioneer.

Like his brother Andrew, William Warwick lost his heart in the Richlands of Greenbrier, and married Nancy Craig, a sister of Mrs Andrew Warwick. They settled on Deer Creek, where Peter H. Warwick now lives, and were the parents of three children: Robert Craig, Elizabeth. who became Mrs Benjamin Tallman; Margaret, who became Mrs John Hull, and lived on the head of Jacksons River.

Robert Craig Warwick, the only son, at one time crossed the Alleghany to pay his sister a visit. One result of the visit was that he and Esther Hull were soon married, and the happy young people settled on the Deer Creek homestead. They were the parents of three sons and six daughters. In reference to their children the following items are recorded:

Catherine Hidy Warwick is now Mrs William Bird. Her children Elvira Louisa, now Mrs William McClune, near Millpoint; Robert Craig Bird, at Clifton Forge; John Henry Bird, Covington; George Newton

Digitized by Google

Anne Bailey in West Virginia Tradition

GRACE McCARTNEY HALL

I

Meet Anne Bailey

"Israel had her Deborah; Spain delights to dwell upon the memory of Isabella; while France glories in the names of Joan of Arc and Lavalette. . . . But the Western heroines of our own land . . . displayed more true courage than any examples in ancient times or in modern history beyond our own land."[1] Thus wrote Virgil A. Lewis, chief biographer of the border heroine, Anne Bailey. Lewis continued: "England gave her birth; Virginia, a field of action; Ohio has her dust."[2]

More specifically Anne Bailey is known as the "Pioneer Heroine of the Great Kanawha Valley."[3] But this modest and reasonable title seems almost prim amidst an array of extravagant and colorful phrases. Rare indeed are simple homey terms such as the "Mother Ann" of one early writer.[4] More to the nineteenth-century taste are literary and classical allusions such as: "She was a veritable Meg Merriles . . . a thorough gypsy in look, habit and vagabondage."[5] The genius of Sir Walter Scott has immortalized Meg Merriles but "in the Ohio Valley there arose a woman, if such she might be called, more remarkable in career, more strange and wild in character than Jean Gordon [original from whom Scott drew Meg Merriles of Guy Mannering] ever was."[6]

Writers delved deeper into history and folk lore and Anne became the Semiramis of America.[7] Now Semiramis was hardly motherly, nor was she gypsy-like in character, being an

---

[1] Virgil A. Lewis, Life and Times of Anne Bailey (Charleston, W. Va.: The Butler Printing Company, 1891), p. 2.

[2] Ibid., p. 87.

[3] Virgil A. Lewis, "Anne Bailey," The State Gazette [Point Pleasant, West Virginia], October 10, 1901, p. 6.

[4] "Mad Ann the Huntress," United States Magazine, III (September, 1856), p. 227.

[5] Charles McKnight, Our Western Border (Philadelphia: J. C. McCurdy and Company, 1875), p. 709.

[6] Augustus Lynch Mason, The Romance and Tragedy of Pioneer Life (Cincinnati: Ohio, Jones Brothers and Company, 1883), p. 401.

[7] Hardesty's Historical and Geographical Encyclopaedia, Mason County, West Virginia, Putnam County, West Virginia, Northwestern Ohio, Lawrence County [Chicago: H. H. Hardesty and Company, 1883], p. 9.

ancient Assyrian queen, famous for her administrative skill and military prowess.[8]

Tributes, classical or otherwise, continued to pour from nineteenth-century pens and were often more enthusiastic than fitting. ". . . I would see a figure blazoned there more clearly with that of Jean d'Arc or Boadica; Isabella or Daronardla; Theodosea or Martin Luther; it is that of Ann Bailey."[9] The excessive admiration overflows a few paragraphs later: "Sir Galahad on his white charger adventuring forth in search of the Holy Grail does not lay stronger hold upon our imagination than does this lone woman . . . riding . . . in the holy cause of freedom."[10]

But Anne's admirers kept abreast of the times. The turning away of the American literary mind from romantic and classical themes to the American scene is reflected in the tributes paid to Anne Bailey. At the turning of the century, homespun heroes were in vogue, and Anne's admirers kept apace: ". . . this woman's courage and bravery is of the same stuff and ranks with . . . the hero Crockett of the Alamo fame."[11] ". . . she exhibited the loyalty of a Paul Revere and the courage of a Betty Zane."[12] "She hunted, rode alone through the wilderness, and fought the Indian like a Boone or a Kenton."[13] . . . Anne Bailey was herself a Daughter of the Revolution.[14]

In 1953, Julius de Gruyter made Anne's story as modern as tomorrow's television set. She became "the original girl scout"[15] and "one of our early 'career women'."[16]

Who was this woman of whom such extravagant things were written? What is the most effective manner in which to review the large but scattered body of printed matter concerning her?

---

[8] Charles Mills Gayley, The Classic Myths (New York: Ginn and Company, 1911), p. 508.

[9] Mrs. James R. Hopley, "Anne Sargent Bailey," Ohio Archaeological and Historical Publications, VI (1907), p. 341.

[10] Ibid., pp. 344-345.

[11] Lillian Rozell Messenger, "Anne Bailey," Ann Bailey, Thrilling Adventures of the Heroine of the Great Kanawha Valley, Mrs. Livia Poffenbarger, editor and publisher (Point Pleasant, West Virginia, 1907), p. 5.

[12] Samuel Harden Stille, Ohio Builds a Nation (Lower Salem, Ohio: The Arlen-Gale Book House, 1939), p. 66.

[13] Judah Hughes, Pioneer West Virginia (Charleston, West Virginia: Published by the author, 1923), p. 69.

[14] Virgil A. Lewis, "Some Notes About Anne Bailey," The State Gazette [Point Pleasant, West Virginia], October 24, 1901, p. 1.

[15] Julius A. de Gruyter, The Kanawha Spectator (Charleston, West Virginia: Jarvis Printing Company, 1953), p. 128.

[16] Ibid., p. 128.

II

The Plan for this Study

The story of Anne Bailey, as it has come down to us by word of mouth and in print, affords an interesting study of a legend-in-the-making. Since her death in 1825, the events of her simple, yet heroic, life have been told and retold in poetry and in prose, in drama, and on the radio. Road markers and memorials in three states attest the fact that Anne Bailey passed this way. School children read about her career as a scout and about her alleged ride to save Fort Lee (now Charleston, West Virginia) from the Indians.[17]

As far as documentary evidence is concerned, little is actually known about Anne Bailey, but a wealth of incident, factual or otherwise, has attached itself to the story of her life. Magazines, newspaper files, history books, and the publications of historical societies preserve for us the few known facts of her career. They preserve for us, also, the accumulation of embellishment that has exaggerated her story to fantastic proportions. It is the purpose of this study to sift the probable elements from the improbable and by so doing to demonstrate how the tradition grew.

In preparing the study, it seemed expedient first to give briefly the most reasonable and acceptable account of Anne's life and use this as a basis from which to present the varied and colorful versions that have appeared in the one hundred twenty-nine years since her death. This "most acceptable account" was found to be a composite story as told by Virgil A. Lewis and amended by Roy Bird Cook.[18]

The reasonable and acceptable account of Anne's life is followed by variations of the story. The variations fall naturally into seven divisions, or chapters: first, stories of her early life to the death of her first husband; second, eleven years of scouting; third, marriage to her second husband; fourth, the ride upon which her fame rests; fifth, the period following the Indian wars; sixth, her last years; and seventh, description and personality. With each division, the matter treated is arranged in chronological order, insofar as the nature of the material would permit. Each departure from the accepted account is given but once, the huge bulk of printed matter precluding the tracing of each variant through the years from its first appearance in print to its last.

---

[17] As concerns the telling of the story for school children, the reader is referred to the following: Sylvia Boupart, Stories of West Virginia for Boys and Girls (Charleston, West Virginia: West Virginia University, Jarrett Printing Company, 1934), pp. 33-34; Charles Henry Ambler, West Virginia Stories and Biographies (New York: Rand McNally and Company, 1937), p. 109; Virginia DuBois, Notes on West Virginia History (Charleston, West Virginia: Kanawha County Schools, 1942), p. 38. The telling and retelling of the story comprise the burden of this writing and the many versions will be fully established and documented in the course of the study.

[18] Virgil A. Lewis, Life and Times: Virgil A. Lewis, "Anne Bailey, the Pioneer Heroine of the Great Kanawha Valley," The State Gazette (Point Pleasant, West Virginia), October 18, 1901; Roy Bird Cook, The Annals of Fort Lee (Charleston, West Virginia: The West Virginia Review Press, 1935).

The eleventh chapter deals with markers and memorials dedicated to Anne's memory. Included in this chapter are accounts of two instances of dramatization of the story, one being a radio presentation, the other, one episode of an historical pageant.

Also included in chapter eleven is some mention of Anne's descendants. This, however, is restricted to those who are engaged in literary pursuits.

Virgil A. Lewis, whose account of Anne's life is used as a basis for this study, was admirably equipped to tell the Anne Bailey story. He was born in Mason County, then a part of Virginia, in 1848, only twenty-three years after Anne Bailey's death.[19] His childhood and youth were spent in the vicinity of Point Pleasant where tales of Anne's heroic deeds and eccentric ways were on every tongue. Lewis wrote: "As a child the incidents of her life . . . thrilled my childish heart and forty years ago I learned and jotted down the recitals which I then heard of her."[20]

Lewis studied law and was admitted to the West Virginia bar, but found history and literature more to his liking than the practice of law.[21] In 1890 he organized the West Virginia Historical and Antiquarian Society.[22] Later he prepared the bill creating the Department of Archives and History,[23] and in due time became the first Archivist of West Virginia.[24] These [19] Thomas Condit Miller and Hu Maxwell, West Virginia and Its People (New York: Lewis Historical Publishing Company, 1913), II, p. 165.

[20] Lewis, "Anne Bailey," p. 6.
[21] Miller, p. 165.
[22] Ibid.
[23] Ibid., p. 166.
[24] Ibid.

facts are given as evidence of Lewis's qualifications as historian and biographer.

There are three reasons for accepting the Lewis-Cook version of Anne's life as the most authentic. First, Lewis's interest was life long, and his published material about Anne covered a period of nineteen years. The story varies little, however, from his first published version in 1891 to his last account in 1910.[25] Lewis included in his Life and Times of Anne Bailey statements of several persons who remembered Anne from their childhood days. A partial listing of these includes Dr. C. C. Forbes,[26] Mr. James H. Holloway,[27] Mrs. Mary McCulloch,[28] and Mrs. Mary Irion, granddaughter of Anne Bailey.[29] This listing is not complete and is presented only as evidence of the fact that Lewis was closer, over a long period of time, to the scene of Anne's exploits than were other writers in the field and hence was better equipped to tell her story than many who preceded him, as well as those who followed him. It must be noted, however, that Lewis wrote prior to Roy Bird Cook's investigation of the pay-rolls of Fort Lee; official state records left by George and William Clendenin, pertaining to Fort Lee,[30] and the large collection of manuscripts, pertaining to the Kanawha Valley area, now preserved by the Wisconsin Historical Society in Madison, Wisconsin.[31]

A second reason for accepting the Lewis account as basic is the fact that Dr. Cook, after the search of manuscripts noted above, stated: "The best general account, however, is to be found in the Life and Times of Anne Bailey by the late V. A. Lewis, one-time State Historian and Archivist."[32] Other prominent historians who follow, generally, the Lewis version are Morris P. Shawkey,[33] Phil Conley,[34] and Charles Henry Ambler.[35]

---

[25] The last article published by Lewis was a sketch entitled "Anne Bailey." This appeared in The Magazine of History, March 10, 1910, pp. 126-128. Reprints of Lewis' articles appeared after his death.
[26] Lewis, Life and Times, pp. 69-70.
[27] Ibid., p. 73.
[28] Ibid.
[29] Ibid., p. 76.
[30] Cook, Annals, pp. 83, 84, 90.
[31] Ibid., p. 85.
[32] Ibid., p. 94.
[33] Morris P. Shawkey, West Virginia (Chicago and New York: The Lewis Publishing Company, 1928), I, pp. 38-42; II, pp. 166, 317.
[34] Phil Conley, Beacon Lights of West Virginia History (Charleston, West Virginia: West Virginia Publishing Company, 1933), pp. 98-99, 116.
[35] Charles Henry Ambler, West Virginia, the Mountain State (New York: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1940), p. 163.

A third reason for considering the Lewis account as the most reliable is that Mr. Harry S. Irion, great-great-grandson of Anne, has worked since 1951 collecting and sifting all information relating to her. Mr. Irion says: "After a wide and rather thorough examination of practically every thing that has been written about her I am persuaded to believe that the most reliable information is found among the older writers. . . . Personally I place greatest weight in the writings of Mr. Lewis."[36]

III

The Lewis-Cook Version

Anne Bailey was born Anne Hennis in Liverpool, England.[37] She was not sure of the exact date, but remembered being taken to London when she was five years old. While there she saw the execution of Lord Lovat. This event occurred in 1747, which places Anne's birthdate in the year 1742. Her father was a soldier in Queen Anne's wars and, according to Lewis, Anne Hennis was named for Queen Anne.

The tradition popular in Virginia and most acceptable to Mr. Lewis was that Anne learned to read and write in Liverpool and that her parents died while she was yet in her teens. She thought of friends in America and came, in 1761, to Staunton, Virginia, where she lived with a family named Bell. She was then nineteen years of age.

Soon after her arrival in America, Anne met Richard Trotter, a young frontiersman and survivor of Braddock's campaign. Anne and Richard were married in 1765, and established their home in Augusta County, Virginia. They had one child, a son named William, who was born in 1767.

It was in the year 1774, when the savages were threatening the frontier, that Anne embarked upon her strange career by encouraging the men to enlist to fight the Indians.

Richard Trotter enlisted in the army to continue the struggle against the Indians. He fought in the battle of Point Pleasant and was killed in that encounter. Anne had married at the age of twenty-three, was widowed at thirty-two, and remained a widow for eleven years.

[36] Harry S. Irion, letter to the author, Dec. 7, 1953.
[37] In this chapter, unless otherwise noted, the facts are taken from Lewis, Life and Times of Anne Bailey, pp. 7-8, 9, passim.

Anne left William with a neighbor, Mrs. Moses Mann, and started in earnest her recruiting of soldiers—soldiers to fight the Indians and the British. "Clad in buckskin pants, with petticoat, heavy brogan shoes, a man's coat and hat, a belt about the waist in which was worn the hunting knife, and with rifle on her shoulder, she went from one recruiting station to another. . . ." The country from the Potomac to the Roanoke was her field of action and before the Revolution ended she was famous along the border.

After the Revolution, she carried messages from Staunton to the distant pioneer forts; and when Fort Savannah (now Lewisburg, West Virginia) was established, she carried messages to that station. From Lewisburg to Point Pleasant was a distance of one hundred sixty miles. Soon Anne had pushed westward to Point Pleasant, the scene of her husband's death.

On November 3, 1785, Anne married John Bailey at Lewisburg. According to Lewis, Bailey was a well-known border soldier and scout. The Reverend John McCue performed the ceremony. Anne was then forty-three years of age.

George Clendenin acquired land on the Kanawha River, at the present site of Charleston, West Virginia, and in 1788 erected a blockhouse which was called Fort Lee. "Here then was another fort to be garrisoned and to it John Bailey went on duty, taking with him to reside therein, his now famous bride." Anne became a messenger from Fort Randolph (Point Pleasant) to Fort Lee.

In 1790 Colonel George Clendenin received a warning from Point Pleasant that the savages were expected momentarily to attack the settlements on the Kanawha. And in January, 1791, Colonel Clendenin addressed a letter to Governor Randolph of Virginia asking for four scouts "to alarm the inhabitants of the approach of the enemy so as to collect together to secure themselves from savage cruelty."

Then Colonel Clendenin received the information that a large body of savages were approaching the fort. While preparing for the defense of the fort, Colonel Clendenin discovered that the supply of powder was almost exhausted. He informed the garrison of the situation and asked for volunteers to go to Lewisburg for powder. The men gazed at each other in dismay. Anne said, "I will go."

She rode to Lewisburg and brought back the powder in time to save the fort. She was then forty-nine years of age. As a token of gratitude, the soldiers of the garrison gave her the black horse she had ridden and she named him "Liverpool" in honor of her birthplace.

It is interesting to note and of importance in the unfolding of the Anne Bailey tradition that a road had been completed in 1786 from Lewisburg to Charleston.

Indian hostilities in the Kanawha Valley area ceased with the signing of the Treaty of Greenville in 1795,[38] and Anne's services as a scout were no longer needed.

"After her famous ride from Fort Lee to Lewisburg, Anne Bailey appears to have abandoned all thought of fixed habitation, and thenceforth, mounted on her favorite horse, 'Liverpool', she ranged all the country from Point Pleasant to Staunton." She became a kind of express agency, taking orders along the Kanawha and as far west as Gallipolis and bringing from Staunton or Lewisburg the goods ordered. She drove hogs and cattle from the Shenandoah and is said to have brought the first tame geese, nineteen of them, from the Greenbrier region into the Kanawha Valley for Captain William Clendenin. Anne was shrewd and when Captain Clendenin refused to pay for the geese, having ordered twenty, Anne drew a dead goose from a bag, threw it on the ground, and received her money. In connection with this story, it is well to remember that Lewis was writing from stories which he had heard as a boy, stories which were part of an oral tradition. It is difficult to conceive of twenty geese being driven on foot, across rugged mountains and unbridged streams for a hundred miles, that being the approximate distance from Lewisburg, Greenbrier County, to the Kanawha area.

It was while Anne was engaged in this express business that her second husband died. The exact time of his death is not known. Lewis states simply that his death is believed to have occurred in 1802.

[38] Andrew, West Virginia, p. 187.

In the years following Bailey's death, Anne continued her wanderings, bringing goods to the settlers, visiting with friends, hunting, and fishing. But Lewis tells little of a concrete nature concerning this period of Anne's life. One incident, however, deserves special mention. That is the occasion of Anne's last visit to Charleston—a visit which was made in the summer of 1817. Lewis quoted two witnesses, both of whom claimed to have seen Anne walking from Point Pleasant to Charleston, a distance of approximately seventy miles. Anne was at that time seventy-five years old.

Anne's son, William, had grown to manhood and had married. Anne lived with him at Point Pleasant for three years. In 1818, William bought land in Harrison Township, Gallia County, Ohio. When William selected a home site back from the Ohio River, about six miles from the present site of Clipper's Mills, Anne refused to go with him. Instead, she went to Gallipolis and built with her own hands a hut of fence rails. She lived here for a short time, William finally inducing her to go to his farm, where he built a separate house for her.

On the night of November 22, 1825, Anne died in her sleep. Two of her granddaughters were with her. She was buried in the Trotter graveyard.

On October 24, 1901, an article by Lewis was published in The State Gazette at Point Pleasant. In this article Lewis told of the reinterment, under the auspices of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of Anne's remains in Tu-Endie-Wei State Park at Point Pleasant in 1901. This was on the one hundred twenty-seventh anniversary of the Battle of Point Pleasant."

Lewis wrote at length of Anne's personal qualities. She was skilled with the rifle, rode well, and cared for the sick. In her later years, she was a favorite of the French at Gallipolis. She "was 'Grandma' of all the children round about. Many of these she taught to read and to lisp the prayers of childhood for she was a noble, virtuous, Christian woman."[6]

[5] Lewis, "Some Notes," p. 1.
[6] Lewis, "Anne Bailey," p. 6.

Anne has been accused by many writers of being over-fond of alcoholic drink and of being exceedingly profane in her speech. Lewis stated that he made "careful inquiry of more than a dozen persons," all of whom had known Anne, and found no evidence of her ever having been intoxicated, although he admits that she would "take a drink." Neither did he find any evidence of profanity.

In her years of scouting, Anne had many adventures. Lewis relates two of these stories. At one time, while riding through the wilderness she came across a band of Indians. She dismounted and crawled into a hollow log. The Indians took her horse. When night fell, she trailed the Indians to their camp, took Liverpool, sprang to his back, and uttering a yell of defiance, dashed away to safety.

On another occasion, Anne was caught in a snowstorm in the Allegheny Mountains. She crept into a hollow tree and "held her horse so that he constantly blew his breath upon her, and was thus saved from freezing."

The Indians considered Anne to be insane. Believing anyone afflicted with insanity to be under the special care of the Great Spirit, they had great respect for Anne. They called her the "White Squaw of the Kanawha."

Lewis died in 1912.[41] This was before Dr. Roy Bird Cook published his studies of Anne Bailey and Fort Lee. In 1934 Dr. Cook published an article on Anne Bailey in the West Virginia Review. In this article he added some pertinent information to the Lewis story.[42]

Dr. Cook located the home of Anne and Richard Trotter as being on Mad Anne's Ridge, near Barber, in what is now Alleghany County, Virginia.[43]

John Bailey and Anne Trotter were both in the vicinity of Lewisburg prior to their marriage in 1785. The tradition is that after their marriage they remained (supposedly) in that locality until the erection of Fort Lee in 1788, at which time they

---

[41] Miller, p. 346.
[42] Roy Bird Cook, "Mad Anne Bailey at Fort Lee," West Virginia Review, XI (1934), 265-266.
[43] Ibid., p. 262.

came to the Kanawha area as a part of the garrison of Fort Lee. Yet the pay-rolls of Fort Lee do not carry the name of either John or Anne Bailey. John Bailey's name does appear, however, in the records of Kelly's Fort, present site of Cedar Grove. Later, he was transferred to a company of rangers under the command of Captain Hugh Caperton.[44]

Bailey is believed to have died in 1802. Court records show that Anne Bailey, widow of John Bailey, appeared before the County Court on November 3, 1794 with the "will of the said John Bailey." Thus the court entries show that Bailey died in or about October, 1794.[45]

Dr. Cook maintains that a vast amount of papers and documents relating to the Kanawha area do not mention a siege at Fort Lee, nor do they mention Anne Bailey. The papers studied include the records of Fort Lee, and the large collection of manuscripts at Madison, Wisconsin.[46] The papers, however, do carry the notation that the fort was twice menaced by the Indians, "but from the opposite side of the Kanawha River."[47]

The reader should be reminded that of the material in the foregoing pages, little is of a factual nature, supported by documentary evidence. Rather, this material represents that which has been selected as the most reasonable and believable of a large body of oral tradition and of a considerable amount of printed matter. It should be remembered also that this sifting and selecting of acceptable matter was done by a man of legal training, well equipped to differentiate between what is spurious and what is sound. It seems safe, therefore, to conclude that there was an Anne Bailey, that she did serve as a scout in the Kanawha Valley area, that Fort Lee was threatened by the Indians, and that, quite possibly, Anne did bring powder from Lewisburg. Upon this meager foundation, the whole structure of the Anne Bailey tradition is built. As has been stated, it is the purpose of this study to show how that tradition grew.

---

[44] Roy Bird Cook, The Annals of Fort Lee (Charleston, West Virginia: West Virginia Review Press, 1935), pp. 82-83.
[45] Cook, "Mad Anne," p. 283.
[46] Cook, Annals, pp. 84-85.
[47] Ibid., p. 86.

IV

Anne's Early Life to Death of Trotter

The earliest known literary mention of Anne Bailey occurred in December, 1825, eleven days after her death, when her obituary was published in the Gallia Free Press, Gallia County, Ohio. The obituary was preserved in Henry Howe's Historical Collections of Ohio. James Harper, son of the publisher of the Gallia Free Press, found a copy of the obituary hidden away in family papers and gave it to Howe.[48]

Concerning Anne's early life, the writer of the obituary had little to say. He mentioned only that Anne went with her mother from Liverpool to London in 1714, at which time she saw Lord Lovett [sic: correct spelling "Lovat"] beheaded.[49] Lewis, as has been noted, mentioned this trip to London, giving, however, the correct date of the execution as 1747.

Anne next appeared in print in 1826, this time in a book written by Mrs. Anne Royall. Mrs. Royall's book was entitled Sketches of History, Life and Manners in the United States. The book was a series of descriptions of places Mrs. Royall had visited in travels about the United States, plus sketches of a descriptive and biographical nature of interesting people whom she had met. The word pictures are brief and Anne is given approximately one and one-half pages. Concerning Anne's origin Mrs. Royall had nothing to say beyond a brief "This female is a Welch woman . . . ."[50]

Thirty-three years after the publication of Mrs. Royall's book, Anne's birthplace was mentioned in print, this time in a book by Emerson Bennett, which bore the colorful title of Wild Scenes on the Frontier. In this account Anne's birthplace was given. "She was a native of Liverpool, England, and in her younger, and perhaps better, days had been the wife of a British soldier."[51]

George W. Atkinson, in his History of Kanawha County, first mentioned the time of Anne's birth, placing it as "about the [48] Henry Howe, Historical Collections of Ohio (Cincinnati, Ohio: C. J. Krehbiel and Company, 1908), I, p. 478.

---

[49] Ibid.

[50] Anne Royall, Sketches of History, Life and Manners in the United States (New Haven: Printed for the author, 1826), p. 65.

[51] Emerson Bennett, Wild Scenes on the Frontier (Philadelphia: Hamelin and Company, 1852), p. 105.

middle of the last century."[52] More significant, from a literary point of view, than the approximation of the birthdate is the fact that Anne's story is gaining in stature and dignity. Her deeds are now recorded in a book of history.

Augustus Lyncy Mason, in his Romance and Tragedy of Pioneer Life, was specific (if not accurate) about Anne's birthdate. Mason gave also her maiden name as Hennis and added: "The creature of whom we write was born in Liverpool, England, about 1750."[53]

In 1885 Anne's story was told by William P. Buell in the Magazine of Western History. Anne had been described at length in a magazine article in 1856, but this earliest mention in a magazine contained little of a biographical nature. Buell's account, however, was biographical and influenced later writers greatly. It did much to build the Anne Bailey tradition, especially as concerns her unusually long life. Buell wrote: "Anne Bailey was born . . . in the year 1700, and was named in honor of Queen Anne, and was present at her coronation in 1705 [sic: Queen Anne was actually crowned in 1702]. She was of good family, and her parents, whose name was Sargent, were people of some means.[54]

By 1885 Anne's maiden name had been given as Hennis and Sargent. Two other names were to be bestowed upon her, Anne Dennis in 1902,[55] and Anne Hannis in 1927.[56]

Writers agreed, almost unanimously, that Anne was born in Liverpool, England, the one exception being caused, perhaps, by a typographical error. Samuel Harden Stille, in his Ohio Builds a Nation, wrote: "She was born in Liverpool, London."[57]

And how did Anne get to America? As has been shown, Lewis wrote that she came to America at the age of nineteen years—after the death of her parents. But earlier and more romantic writers were not content with such simple facts. It

---

[52] George W. Atkinson, History of Kanawha County (Charleston, West Virginia: Printed at the Office of the West Virginia Journal, 1876), p. 134.

[53] Mason, p. 491.

[54] William P. Buell, "Ann Bailey," Magazine of Western History, March, 1885, p. 564.

[55] W. A. McAllister, "Pioneer Days in Allegheny County," Virginia Magazine of History and Biography, X (January, 1903), p. 256.

[56] News Item in the Herald-Advertiser [Huntington, West Virginia], September 23, 1927.

[57] Stille, p. 61.

would seem almost that the early writers vied with each other as to which could produce the most colorful tale. Perhaps none tops the very earliest version, the account given in the magazine article of 1856, "Mad Anne, the Huntress." In this article it was written: "Of her antecedents little is known, except that she was the wife of a dissipated fellow [by the name of Bailey] who, while under the influence of liquor . . . enlisted in H.B.M.'s 7th foot and was immediately sent to America. . . ."[58] A specified number of wives were permitted to join their soldier husbands serving in the colonies, the selection was made by lottery. Bailey drew a lucky ticket, and Anne came to Virginia.[59]

According to the second woman who wrote about Anne, Elizabeth F. Ellet, the trip to America was made under entirely different circumstances. Anne, at the age of thirty, married Richard Trotter and they came to the new world together, selling out as indentured servants to pay their passage.[60]

The tales grew apace: "Her parents settled in the vicinity of Jamestown, where Anne, two brothers, and three sisters, grew up, having been educated and drilled from the cradle in the manners, customs, and hardships of frontier life. . . . at the age of nineteen, she packed her knapsack and started alone for the western frontier. After many days of laborious travel she reached Fort Union, at which place she took up her abode. Shortly after her arrival at Lewisburg, the fort was attacked by Indians and she displayed so much bravery and such remarkable generalship, that she was at once looked up to as a leader and commander."[61] And further: "When powder and lead were to be brought from Point Pleasant, Williamsburg, or Chillicothe, Anne Bailey was generally sent."[62]

Buell, who gave Anne's birthdate as 1700, also had a tale concerning her arrival in the Virginias. At the age of nineteen, Anne, while on her way home from school, was kidnapped, books and all, and brought to Virginia, on the James, at which place she was sold to defray her expenses. "After some years

---

[58] "Mad Anne," p. 236.
[59] Ibid.
[60] Elizabeth F. Ellet, The Pioneer Women of the West (Philadelphia: Porter and Coates, 1873), pp. 248-249.
[61] Atkinson, p. 134.
[62] Ibid., p. 135.

of search her parents found her whereabouts, and offered to send her means to return home, but she preferred the new world to the old, in which she figured conspicuously and heroically during a certain portion of her life."[53] Another statement by Buell which differs from the Lewis-Cook account, both as to the name of her first husband and as concerns her age at the time of her marriage, is that "At the age of thirty she married a man by the name of John Trotter . . . ."[54]

Twenty-two years after Buell's article appeared, the kidnapping story was repeated with embellishments. This version of the story, written by Mrs. James R. Hopley in an extravagant and bombastic style, was published in the Ohio Archeological and Historical Society Publications in 1907. Anne's story was gaining in prestige—if not in plausibility. Mrs. Hopley's addition to the kidnapping story was that Anne's grieving parents came to America in search of their long lost daughter, but that she "demonstrated her love for America by choosing this, rather than England, for her home, so that the Sargents returned without her."[55]

Anne's story had already been recognized as matter suitable for inclusion in an historical publication when, in 1902, W. A. McAllister's "Pioneer Days in Allegheny County" was printed in The Virginia Magazine of History and Biography. McAllister gave her age, at the time of her coming to America, as thirteen. Also he wrote that at the age of twenty-three she married John Bailey.[56]

Two other variations, concerning Anne's age at the time of her arrival in America and as concerns the name of her first husband, should be noted. In 1923 it was written that, at the age of twenty-three, Anne, married James Trotter.[57] And in 1931 her age on arriving in America was changed for the last time (to date) when it was written that she was eighteen years old when she came to this country.[58]

The results of this study indicate that the newspapers did not become greatly interested in the Anne Bailey story until [53] Buell, pp. 554-555.

[54] Ibid., p. 555.
[55] Hopley, pp. 361-365.
[56] McAllister, p. 356.
[57] C. F. Morton, A Centennial History of Allegheny County, Virginia (Dayton, [illegible]), p. 761.
[58] Ruth Kincaid Bedford, Ohio Valley Pioneers (New York: Rand McNally [illegible]), p. 196.

the late twenties. This is, of course, excepting the article by Lewis which appeared in The State Gazette in 1901. However, in 1927, the Herald-Advertiser, Huntington, West Virginia, carried a news story to the effect that Charleston needed an actress to play the part of Mad Anne Bailey in an historical pageant. In this article a suggestion was made to the effect that Anne came to America as a stowaway.[69]

The stowaway hint was too rich in romantic possibilities to long lie dormant, and in 1935 George W. Summers wrote boldly that "After the death of her parents while she was still of school girl age, Anne shipped from Liverpool as a stowaway and came to America in search of relatives by the name of Bell who lived somewhere in the Virginia colony."[70]

Writers were strangely reticent concerning Anne's only child, a brief sentence usually serving to dispose of the son. Buell, however, in 1885, remembered him: "They had but one child, a boy named William, who was born to them in their advanced age."[71] Later this was rewritten by Mrs. Hopley: "They had one son, who was named William, to whom she was deeply attached, as was Sarah to Isaac, for he was born of her old age."[72] Mrs. Hopley, influenced by Buell, had given Anne's birthdate as 1700. Lewis gave the date of William's birth as 1767, thus making Anne, according to Hopley, sixty-seven years old at the birth of her only child.

The death of Anne's first husband was generally accepted as having occurred on October 10, 1774 in the battle of Point Pleasant. Deviations were few. The 1856 story, however, related that Anne's first husband, the dissipated soldier named Bailey, was killed near the close of the campaign of 1870.[73] Another writer stated that James Trotter, Anne's husband, was with Andrew Lewis's army at Point Pleasant and was killed. This writer added that, judging from bar-room carvings, Lewis's army was believed to have stood almost to a man over six feet two inches tall.[74]

---

[69] News item in the Herald-Advertiser [Huntington, West Virginia], September 25, 1927.
[70] George W. Summers, Pages from the Past (Charleston, West Virginia: Published by The Charleston Journal, 1935), p. 26.
[71] Buell, p. 995.
[72] Hopley, p. 342.
[73] "Mad Ann," p. 236.
[74] Theresa D. McClintic, "Mad Anne Bailey, Woman Scout of Virginia," The Sunday Star, Washington, D. C., January 10, 1932, Magazine Section, p. 4.

One further quotation concerning the death of Anne's first husband is of interest, first, because of the recent publication date which shows that Anne's story is still growing; and second, because the quotation may be considered as an attempt to explain Anne's extreme bitterness and desire for revenge. In December, 1953, Ruth Scott, writing in the Richmond Times Dispatch, had the following to say about Trotter's death: "Anne, who had followed her husband along the line of march, saw the massacre at Point Pleasant and witnessed the brutal slaying of Trotter."[75]

A brief restatement of the variations occurring in the story of Anne's early life and a comparison of these variants with the Lewis story seems in order. It will be recalled that Lewis gave Anne's maiden name as Hennis. Other writers have given her name as Dennis, Hannis, and even Sargent.

That Anne was born in Liverpool, England, was almost unanimously accepted, but the identity of her first husband is a matter of considerable difference of opinion. The first mention of him is a vague statement that he was a British soldier. Then he becomes a dissipated soldier named Bailey. Other names followed, including Richard Trotter, John Trotter, John Bailey, and James Trotter.

The place of Anne's first marriage is indefinite, some stating that she was married in Liverpool, some in America.

Stories concerning the manner of Anne's coming to the colonies vary greatly from the reasonable statement by Lewis that, her parents having died, she came to Virginia to live with relatives. Romanticized versions relate that she came to America as the result of a lottery, that she was kidnapped and brought to America, that she came as a stowaway, and that she sold out as a bond-servant to pay her passage.

Lastly, the element of revenge is introduced into the story. This revenge motif is strong and will be encountered again and again as the story develops.

---

[75] Ruth B. Scott, "'Mad Anne' Saved the Settlers from the Indians," Richmond [Virginia] Times Dispatch, October 18, 1953, Section A, p. 13.

V

Eleven Years of Scouting

As has been noted by Lewis, after the death of her first husband, Anne turned to scouting and recruiting soldiers to fight the Indians and British. The reporting of Anne's career as a wilderness scout and one-woman ammunition train was started with zest by Mrs. Anne Royall in Sketches of History, Life, and Manners in the United States, a book which has already been discussed. Mrs. Royall wrote:

> At the time Gen. Lewis's army lay at the Point, a station on Kenhawa river, Ann would shoulder her rifle, hang her shot-pouch over her shoulder, and lead a horse laden with ammunition to the army, two hundred miles distant, when not a man could be found to undertake the perilous task—the way thither being perfect wilderness, and infested with Indians. I asked her if she was not afraid—she replied, 'No, she was not; she trusted the Almighty—she knew she could only be killed, and she had to die sometime.' I asked her if she never met with Indians in her various journeys, (for she went several times) 'Yes, she once met with two, and one of them said to the other, let us kill her, (as she supposed, from the answer of the other) no, said his companion, God dam, too good a soger, and let her pass;' 'but how,' said I, 'did you find the way'—'Steered by the trace of Lewis's army, and I had a pocket compass too.' 'Well, but how did you get over the water courses?'—Some she forded, and some she swam, on others she made a raft: she 'Halways carried a hax and a hauger, and she could chop as well as hany man; . . . .'"[76]

It seems well to point out at this time that this is the only account of Anne's scouting activities which connects her directly with the army of General Andrew Lewis. In 1953, Ruth B. Scott, as has been mentioned, related that Anne had followed her husband to Point Pleasant where she witnessed his death. However, Scott did not suggest that Anne served General Lewis as a scout.

Roving the wilderness as she did, Anne must have been skilled at making camp, and perhaps unique in her methods. At least it was so written.

When making camp at night, Anne would find a likely spot, ride half a mile beyond it, turn her pony loose, hide her saddle, [76] Royall, pp. 46-48.

and retrace her steps "to the spot selected which is the foot of a large tree, whose roots afford a sort of niche in which she can recline and sleep. She then digs a hole about eighteen inches deep, and large enough to contain a small fire and allow room for her legs on either side of it. Striking a light, she builds a fire with dead twigs, which she carefuly covers up. . . ."[77]

Anne then takes her place between the roots of the tree, her back resting against the trunk. She places her legs in the trough she has dug, one leg on either side of the fire which is carefully covered with her petticoats, only a small opening for draught being left. She is now ready for her evening meal. Anne is fond of alcoholic beverages and as she eats, she drinks copiously from a flask which is her constant companion. ". . . in fact, it is doubtful if she ever parts with it."[78]

Anne slept in the peculiar position described above. When morning dawned she called her "nag" with a peculiar whistle and was soon off on her errand through the wilderness.[79]

As concerns the stories relating to Anne's overfondness for alcoholic drink, it is significant that in 1826, Mrs. Royall had written that Anne "begged a dram" of her.[80] In this brief phrase the tradition of Anne, as a hard-drinking woman, had its inception. When, thirty years later, in 1856, the story quoted above was published, Anne's reputation as a hard-drinker was firmly established. Interesting also is the fact that the first note of Anne's drinking was made by a woman. In no other instance is this phase of Anne's life mentioned by a woman writer.

During the Indian wars, Anne performed efficient services, carrying messages from Fort Young [near Covington, Virginia] to Point Pleasant, riding over steep mountains, through dense forests, and over rushing streams.[81]

The folklore motif of revenge occurs early in the development of the tradition and, as has been suggested, continues throughout the many versions of the tale. In 1873 Mrs. Ellet

---

77 "Mad Ann," p. 236.
78 Ibid.
79 Ibid.
80 Royall, p. 49.
81 Butterfield, p. 102.

wrote that Anne's life was dedicated to avenging her husband's death. To this end she gave up household concerns and female dress and rode about the country attending every muster of soldiers.[82] So imbued was she with the idea of revenge that it was written of her: "From the period of his death she became possessed with a strange savage spirit of revenge against the Indians."[83] She went among the Indians at will, spoke Shawnee fluently, and "told the savages that she was endowed by the Great Spirit with wonderful powers, and that if they interfered with her undertakings she would cause them to be swept from the face of the earth."[84]

According to Atkinson, bad weather did not keep Anne from her duties as a scout, but it did present a problem which she had to solve. Gunpowder must be kept dry, Atkinson, in 1876, wrote, and in bad weather Anne kept her ammunition dry by putting it in caves and hollow logs.[85]

Writers, intent on glorifying Anne, continued to stress her devotion to the cause she had espoused and to exaggerate her success as a scout. In his colorful Romance and Tragedy of Pioneer Life, published in 1883, Mason stressed Anne's devotion to "that strange career which spread her name far and wide through the border settlements, and which will perpetuate it so long as the stories of the border struggles are read among men."[86]

Another phase of the glorification of Anne concerns her loyalty to the settlers and her willingness, even eagerness, to serve them in any capacity. Mason ties this will-to-service with her desire for revenge: "No service in behalf of the settlers was too arduous, no mode of injury to the savages too cruel or bloody for her fierce zeal."[87]

Anne's enthusiasm for killing Indians was matched by Buell's enthusiasm for superlatives as concerned Anne: "As soon as she heard of the death of her husband (a presentiment of which she said she had before he was killed by the Indians), and became a widow, a furious, wild, strange fancy possessed her, [82] Elliot, p. 248.

---

[83] McKnight, p. 709.
[84] Atkinson, pp. 134-135.
[85] Ibid., p. 135.
[86] Mason, p. 402.
[87] Ibid.

and with a deep seated spirit of revenge rankling in her bosom, she swore eternal vengeance upon the entire savage race."[88] ". . . she armed herself with a rifle, bullet-pouch, power-horn, tomahawk and scalping-knife, attired herself like a man, in hat, hunting-shirt, leggings and moccasins, rode astride like the male sex, and went about the country on horseback, attending every muster of the soldiers, where she commanded universal attention. . . . She conveyed information to the commandants of forts, a service in which she took universal delight. . . ."[89]

According to Buell the Indians considered Anne to be insane, and, being insane, under the special care of the Great Spirit. Hence she roamed unmolested through the wilderness from Point Pleasant to the James and Potomac Rivers. So successful was she in her military endeavors that she was called the "Semiramis of America."[90]

Perhaps a hunting knife and a butcher knife are one and the same thing, but butcher knife is certainly a more colorful term. And Anne rode about the country "mounted on a favorite horse of great sagacity and rode like a man, with rifle over her shoulder and a tomahawk and butcher knife in her belt."[91]

As has been mentioned, Anne rendered aid to the settlers in any capacity where her services were needed. She was skilled at nursing and became almost as well loved for her unselfish devotion as a nurse as she was admired for her success as a scout and ". . . for eleven years she fearlessly dashed along the whole western border, going wherever her services required. . . ."[92]

Writers, men and women alike, were agreed that Anne was a woman of determination. "No mountain was too steep for her unfaltering steed; no winter so severe, no summer so hot, no enemy so cunning as to prevent her fulfillment of a once formed purpose."[93] "The murderers of the husband of her youth, were to be hunted, harried, exterminated if possible.

---

[88] Buell, p. 555.
[89] Ibid.
[90] Ibid.
[91] Brown, p. 678.
[92] "Anne Bailey's Ride," Southern Historical Magazine, II (July, 1892), p. 90.
[93] Mackintosh, p. 238.

And avenging his death she furthered the cause of freedom, made way for liberty, life, and good order in the new world."[94]

One of the trips that Anne took many times in the service of the settlers was from Fort Lee (Charleston) to Point Pleasant. The distance was sixty miles, and it took Anne two days and one night to make the trip. She usually slept in a cave when going to Fort Randolph (Point Pleasant).[95] It is also reported that Anne slept in hollow logs when carrying messages.[96]

Anne often outwitted the Indians, often left them utterly astonished. When the Indians saw her coming, they would "make off and raise the alarm, shouting 'The White Squaw!' to their companions."[97] They believed their bullets could not harm her.

Since the Indians joined the British in the Revolutionary War, Anne not only fought the Indians, but the British as well. She carried messages, powder, and supplies until the Revolution was over. After the Revolution she went to Fort Savannah (Lewisburg, W. Va.) and volunteered in the task of "winning the West" from the savages.[98]

One report of Anne's activities said that she lived for a time in "a hut built with her own hands on the ridge of a mountain which bears her name and high above the spot where the tablet now stands in her memory [Mad Ann's Ridge, Allegheny County, Virginia]. Here, from her point of vantage, she kept watch over the surrounding country and at first sight of the enemy she would mount her black horse, which she called 'Liverpool' and fly to warn the settlers."[99]

It should be recalled that, according to Cook, Anne and Richard Trotter established their home in Allegheny County, Virginia. According to Lewis, the rail cabin built by Anne's own hands was located near Gallipolis, Ohio, and was built during Anne's last years—and not in the early part of her career.

---

[94] Bagley, p. 363.
[95] Laidley, p. 82.
[96] James Morton Callahan, History of West Virginia (Chicago and New York: American Historical Society, Inc., 1923), p. 226.
[97] Dunford, pp. 116-118.
[98] Ibid., pp. 118-119.
[99] McClintic, p. 4.

By 1935, one hundred ten years after Anne's death, her admirers and enthusiasts had expanded considerably her field of action, as well as the scope of her activities. "She ranged along the Allegheny mountains from North Carolina to Maryland recruiting the best soldiers Washington ever commanded in the Revolutionary War. . . . And she kept the officers of the Continental Army advised of conditions throughout the vast territory through which she rode while recruiting them."[100]

Anne was equipped for and capable of meeting any emergency. As a part of her equipment she carried a small axe. "When she needed a canoe she chopped down a tree, hollowed out the trunk and made one. . . ." When she needed food she shot game and cooked it on a stick.[101]

In 1953 superlatives were still employed when writing of Anne's scouting activities. The following quotation is from Ruth B. Scott's story in The Richmond Times Dispatch: "She was the best scout in all Virginia, especially in the Shenandoah and Kanawha valleys."[102] Again the activating motive was stressed as revenge. "She had seen her husband tortured and killed at the Battle of Point Pleasant."[103]

One 1953 writer suggested that her success was owing not only to her zeal but also to the strange awe in which she was held by the Indians. "Early in her career, evidently, she had mesmerized the Indians into believing that she possessed supernatural powers, or else they believed she was mentally queer, which was just as effective as having occult powers."[104] In this quotation the romantic tendency to the strange and occult is self evident. The surprising thing is that it was written in 1953.

As this study develops, Anne's eccentric ways will continue to be demonstrated, but in no place will a more singular habit be found than in the manner of making camp herein described.

Other points to be noted in this section are as follows: Anne's habit of drinking intoxicating liquors; the attitude of

---

[100] Summers, p. 36.
[101] Ruth Woods Dayton, Pioneers and Their Homes on Upper Kanawha (Charleston, West Virginia: West Virginia Publishing Company, 1947), p. 39.
[102] Scott, p. 18.
[103] Ibid., p. 18.
[104] de Graytor, p. 136.

the Indians toward her; the introduction of the supernatural element; and the re-occurrence of the revenge motif.

Of special interest is the extension of the territory and scope of Anne's scouting activities which have grown to include not only the Kanawha-Greenbrier area but the entire border from Maryland to Staunton. Of even greater importance is the dual suggestion of her attachment to Washington's army as a recruiting agent, and, at the same time, of her employment as informant for other officers of the Revolutionary Army. As a Revolutionary scout, Anne, according to her admirers, reached the highest possible distinction—that of service to Washington and his staff.

VI

Anne's Marriage to Bailey

There was nothing of special interest in the marriage of Anne Hennis and Richard Trotter and it was given small notice by Anne's biographers and enthusiasts. The marriage of Anne to John Bailey was a different matter, and writers capitalized upon the strange and romantic aspects of the union.

For eleven years Anne had followed pursuits almost exclusively masculine—pursuits which must, of necessity, have left their imprint upon her character, personality, and appearance. And writers speculated concerning the marriage of John and Anne.

One of the first attempts to explain the strange mating was made by Charles McKnight in Our Western Border. In 1875, McKnight wrote: "Strange that such an odd, rugged, intractable character should ever even for a day, allow the soft passion of love to usurp the place of her fierce and cruel revenge! Stranger still, that any mortal man could be found who would be attracted by such a wild, stormy, riotous spirit. He must have 'wooed her as the lion woes his bride,' where the mutual caresses and encounters of love pass amid savage roars and growls and rude buffetings. But a man did woo, and win her, too, and his name it was Bailey, and so she became Mrs. Ann Bailey."[10]

[10] McKnight, p. 718.

McKnight continued his speculation concerning the success of the marriage: "Whether he ever 'tamed this shrew' history sayeth not, but we read that her unquenchable spirit and audacity, in spite of her many eccentricities, greatly endeared her to the whole border."[104]

Interest in Anne's love life continued and, in 1883, Mason contributed the following: "At some period in her career, this strange, unsexed creature, with her disordered intellect, was actually wooed and won by a man named Bailey, but this marriage made no change in her life, except that, instead of being known as 'Mad Ann' she was thereafter 'Mad Ann Bailey.'"[107]

The date of Anne's second marriage remained more constant than of the first, but variations did occur: "About the year 1777, she married a man named Bailey, and shortly after accompanied him to Clendenin Fort . . .in which her husband had been assigned to garrison duty."[108]

Writers disagreed not only on the date of Anne's second marriage but also on the duration of her widowhood and her age at the time of the second marriage. Buell contributed the following account of the marriage: "After sixteen years of widowhood the gentle influence of love pervaded her bosom, and in 1790 she married a man by the name of John Bailey, a soldier with whose name her checkered and eventful career is linked."[109] May we recall for the reader that Buell had given Anne's birthdate as 1700?

Bailey's name was an inconstant factor in the story of Anne's romance. According to Messenger, Anne's second husband was Robert Bailey. She "went with him to old Fort Union, thence to Fort Lee, leaving her little son in the care of protecting friends."[110] It will be recalled that, according to Lewis, William Trotter was born in 1767, and also, according to Lewis, that the date of Anne's second marriage was 1785. Therefore, the little son referred to by Messenger was, at the time of this marriage, eighteen years of age.

Bailey was reported to be a distinguished frontiersman and

---

[104] Ibid.
[107] Mason, p. 44.
[108] Kirkwood, p. 9.
[109] Buell, pp. 146-48.
[110] Messenger, p. 7.

brave scout, but only once was it reported that he became commander of a fort: "In 1785 she was married in Greenbrier County to a brave scout named John Bailey who soon after became the commandant at Fort Clendenin [Fort Lee] and took his bride with him to his new post."[111] Cook's assertion that John Bailey's name cannot be found in the documents relating to Fort Lee is of interest at this point.

The marriage date was changed once again, in 1923, when it was written that Anne married Bailey in 1780.[112]

Writers continued to speculate on reasons for the strange marriage: "Companionship and the interchange of free talk with a sturdy fellow creature after a long day of hazardous activity probably led her into this union."[113] In this quotation the influence of realism and plain common sense may be observed, which, to this writer at least, is refreshing.

A last speculation concerning the marriage occurred in 1938, when a Charleston Gazette writer volunteered the following: "His services to the army were similar to Anne's; his bitterness equal to that of the young widow."[114] This, it will be noted, is the first suggestion of bitterness on the part of John Bailey. Possibly the writer felt the need of explaining Bailey's action in marrying so strange a creature as Anne. It is known that the feeling of bitterness and hatred for the Indians was strong along the border. It would seem that the writer in question has simply attributed to one individual an excess measure of what was a general attitude, and in so doing he has explained, to his own satisfaction at least, this strange marriage.

From a literary point of view, the chief interest to be found in the accounts of this phase of Anne's career is the extreme romanticism of the writers who tell the story. Also of interest is the attempt to explain, psychologically, the reasons for the marriage. The one instance of realism in writing about the marriage has already been mentioned.

---

[111] Callahan, p. 120.

[112] Pearl Pollock Stringfellow, "Know of Ann Bailey? You Should for Her Story Is a Queer One," Huntington [West Virginia] Herald Dispatch, December 6, 1925. Clipping located in the Poffenbarger scrapbooks. Page not given.

[113] MacMaster, p. 4.

[114] Feature article in The Charleston [West Virginia] Gazette, February 6, 1938.

VII

The Siege and Ride

Anne Bailey's chief claim to glory rests on the account of her heroic ride to Lewisburg for powder when Fort Lee was under siege by the Indians. As has been shown, through the investigations of Dr. Cook, there is no evidence of a documentary nature to support the story of the siege and ride. The question naturally arises as to the origin of the oft repeated and highly decorative tale.

It is well to point out that there are two other instances, in the pioneer history of West Virginia, of daring efforts to procure ammunition. Fleming Cobbs, when Fort Lee was a second time (reputedly) out of powder, made a canoe trip to Point Pleasant, a distance of sixty-four miles, and brought back the needed ammunition. The popular story concerning this feat is that the trip up the river from Point Pleasant to Charleston was "a race with a band of Indians bent upon his destruction." However, Cobbs escaped the Indians and reached Fort Lee in safety.[115]

The deed which most nearly parallels Anne Bailey's ride is the dash for powder made by Betty Zane when Fort Henry (present site of Wheeling, West Virginia) was under attack by the Indians. Colonel Ebenezer Zane's house, a short distance from the fort, was used as a store house for ammunition. When the Indian attack became imminent, Colonel Zane determined to remain in his house, enough powder being transferred to the fort to withstand the siege. However, the siege was of longer duration than had been anticipated and the supply of powder ran low. Elizabeth Zane, younger sister of Colonel Zane, volunteered to go for the powder. The Indians, amazed to see a woman issue boldly from the fort, made no attempt to harm her, "only exclaiming 'a squaw, a squaw' . . ." Betty reached the cabin, Colonel Zane tied a table cloth around her waist, and emptied a keg of powder into it. Betty sprang from the cabin and raced in safety to the fort, this time braving the fire of the Indians.[116] This attack on Fort Henry took place on September 10, 1782.[117] This was several years prior to the alleged siege of Fort Lee.

[115] Cook, Annals, p. 76.
[116] Alexander Scott Withers, Chronicles of Border Warfare (Clarksburg, Virginia: J. Israel, 1831), pp. 353-359.

It should be stated, before continuing further, that Withers does not mention a siege at Fort Lee, nor does he mention Anne Bailey. Another of the early historians of this period, Willis DeHass,[118] also fails to mention Anne or the siege at Fort Lee.

The first published account of Anne's ride for powder occurred in the obituary, previously mentioned. In this account William Clendenin is reported as saying that an Indian attack was expected, that the powder was low, and that Anne rode to Lewisburg and brought back the needed ammunition. If the expected siege materialized, it was not recorded in the obituary.[119]

The first account which told fully the story of the ride was an idealized version, a long poem, "A Legend of the Kanawha", written in close imitation of Sir Walter Scott. Lewis and Cook agree that the poem was written by a Civil War soldier by the name of Charles Robb. They disagree, however, concerning the publication date of the poem. Lewis stated: "Charles Robb, of the United States Army was at Gauley Bridge, in 1861, and having heard the story of Anne Bailey wrote the following [the poem], which appeared at the time in the Clearmont [Ohio] Courier."[120]

Dr. Cook wrote that "on November 7, 1861, he [Robb] completed a twenty-four stanza story of A Legend of the Kanawha. After the war, he removed to Clearmont County, Ohio, and this story was published in The Courier of Clearmont."[121]

Early in the poem Robb gave the source of his material, stating plainly that he got the story from a mountaineer:

> Then spake a hardy mountaineer
> (His beard was long, his eye was clear;
> And clear his voice, of metal tone,
> Just such as all would wish to own)—
> "I've heard a legend old," he said,

---

[117] Charles Henry Ambler, West Virginia, the Mountain State (New York: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1940), p. 128.

[118] Willis DeHass, History of Early Settlements and Indian Wars of Western Virginia. Wheeling [Virginia]: H. Hoblitzell; Philadelphia: Printed by King and Baird, 1851.

[119] Bowyer, p. 412.

[120] Lewis, Life and Times, p. 42.

[121] Cook, Annals, p. 86.

It is interesting to note, and to speculate upon, the fact that this full story of the ride was of a creative rather than historical nature. It is interesting also to consider the fact that the poem was written seventy years after the alleged ride took place.

In reflecting upon the possible origin of the story, assuming for the moment that Cook is right and the ride did not occur, it is well to notice the similarity between one incident of the Betty Zane story, as told by Withers, and one incident in the poem by Robb. The Indians indifferent to Betty Zane's leaving the fort, and yelling "a squaw, a squaw," let her go unmolested to her brother's cabin. Robb, in describing Anne's issuance from Fort Lee, uses the same words:

> 'A squaw! a squaw!' the chieftain cries,
> ('A squaw! a squaw!' the host replies:)

Robb, however, does not follow through and permit Anne to depart in peace.

> 'To horse! to horse! the chieftain cried,
> They mount in haste and madly ride.
> Along the rough, uneven way,
> The pathway of the lady lay;

Whatever the source of Robb's material, his colorful account of Anne's heroic ride changed the character of written matter concerning her. Prior to this time writers had been concerned with her eccentricities, peculiarities, and activities as a scout. From this time on, the story of the ride formed the basic part of any written matter concerning her.

An 1873 version of the ride tells us that a runner was sent from Point Pleasant to warn the inhabitants of the Charleston area that one hundred warriors had crossed the Ohio and were heading in the direction of Fort Lee or Greenbrier County. The settlers gathered in. Powder was low and Anne volunteered to ride to Lewisburg. "A good horse was furnished her, with a stock of jerked venison and johnny-cake." Anne crossed mountains and swam rivers. At night she made a bed by driving forked sticks, three feet high, into the ground and laying boards on stakes across them. There she slept amid the buzzing of insects and the howling of wolves. The day after Anne's return with the powder, the attack came. Anne fought bravely and killed one Indian, thereby accomplishing her revenge.[122]

As in the stories of Anne's scouting activities, this version of the siege and ride ends on the revenge motif. May we again point out to the reader that this theme is of regular recurrence in the story?

Robb, in his poetical version of the tale, described only the perils of the first half of Anne's journey, either assuming that the reader would take for granted the dangers of the return trip, or being prevented by his artistic sense from repeating himself—the dangers obviously being the same. It was not long, however, until the return trip was being described as vividly as the "dash" to Lewisburg. One who led the way in this was Charles McKnight: "With a led horse weighted down with ammunition, she resolutely commenced her return; her trail followed by packs of ravenous wolves or still more dangerous redskins, sleeping by night amid the profound solitudes of the wilderness and on spreads of boughs raised high on stakes to protect her from venomous snakes or savage beasts; crossing raging torrents, breasting craggy heights; ever watching for Indian sign, but ever avoiding Indian attacks, until she heroically delivered her powder and saved the fort."[123]

Wide variations occurred as to the time of the Indian attack on Fort Lee. Did the assault come before Anne left for powder, during her absence, or after her return? Some writers followed Robb and maintained there had been a long siege. Mason, in his colorful account, wrote: "Unable to subdue it [Fort Lee] by force, the besiegers undertook to reduce it by famine."[124]

Mason was concerned with the terrain over which Anne rode and with the route she followed: "The way led through dense forests, bottomless morasses, vast ranges of mountains, terrific precipices, and rushing rivers. . . . Avoiding all trails, roads, and regular passes, she took her way directly across the mountains of West Virginia for more than a hundred miles."[125]

And Mason added to the perils of the return trip. The venomous snakes, which, according to McKnight, had made [122] Elliott, pp. 350-351.

[123] McKnight, p. 536.
[124] Mason, p. 405.
[125] Ibid., p. 405.

sleep dangerous for Anne became, in Mason's imagination, equally dangerous by day, and he wrote: "At every step beset by hissing serpents which still infest the mountains of Virginia . . . ."[126]

There was considerable difference of opinion concerning the distance from Fort Lee (Charleston, West Virginia) to Lewisburg. It would seem that the longer the ride, the greater Anne's glory and the generally accepted hundred miles increased to one hundred forty[127] and soon thereafter to one hundred fifty miles.[128] Two days and nights were all the time required for Anne to cover this distance.[129]

"I will go." These three words uttered in a ringing voice by Anne and quoted repeatedly by subsequent writers, were, strangely enough, not added to printed versions of the story until 1892. At the same time Anne's feelings and emotions on the trip received some attention: "Darkness and day were one to her. It was a ride for life and there could be no stop." This same scribe continued creative and Anne's entrance into the fort is described: "The garrison in Fort Lee welcomed her return, and she entered it, as she had left it, under a shower of balls." The men then sallied forth and broke the siege.[130]

Robb clearly indicated in 1861 that the men were afraid to go for powder. A woman, in 1907, took up the theme: "Brave men paled and looked at each other in dismay that appalled them. A dead silence fell."[131] Then Anne bravely volunteered to ride for the powder.

The manner of Anne's leaving Fort Lee and of her entrance into the fort upon her return from Lewisburg are matters of conjecture. Mrs. Messenger described Anne's entry into the Fort as triumphal: ". . . and at last nearly exhausted, but animated by the hope of saving the garrison, she reached Fort Lee amid shouts, the echoes of which died among the wild hills around . . . ." Almost as an afterthought was added: "In addition, the latter part of her long, lonely, perilous journey was under savage fire."[132]

---

[126] Ibid.
[127] Hardesty, p. 9.
[128] Hall, p. 356.
[129] Hardesty, p. 9.
[130] "Anne Bailey's Ride," p. 90.
[131] Messenger, pp. 7-8.
[132] Ibid., p. 8.

Anne's route is another point on which there has been much conjecture: "History has preserved sufficient records of the journey to enable us to trace it on the map."[133] Was there a road from Charleston to Lewisburg in 1791? ". . . and the way lay . . . along trackless ways, across deep rivers, and over the mountains through a region where thitherto only the wild animal, the wilder Indian, or the frontier warrior, had made their way."[134] Was it, indeed, a trackless forest? "On she goes over the well known road. With steady hand she guides the steed."[135]

Subsequent writers did not always agree with Mr. Robb that on leaving Fort Lee, Anne dashed gallantly through the "op'ning portal." William Alexander MacCorkle, ex-governor of West Virginia, writing in 1916, added a welcome touch of realism to the story of the ride. Knowing full well the necessity of absolute quiet if Anne were to escape detection, MacCorkle wrote: ". . . the door was opened and she went forth like a wraith into the trackless forest . . . ."[136] and MacCorkle was consistent about the manner of Anne's return: "After the darkness of the night, when hope died away in the heart of the garrison, a quite knocking was heard at the gates of Fort Lee, and . . . Anne Bailey was admitted to the fort . . . ."[137]

In 1926, a weak effort at defining Anne's mental attitude was made by Percy Reniers. According to Reniers, Anne had no misgivings concerning the trip: "She was the first eager volunteer for this enterprise and under cover of night she stole out of the fort on her black pony Liverpool and through the Indian lines."[138]

An account of the ride, which rivaled Robb's poem as far as colorful detail is concerned, appeared in 1931—written by Harry Edmond Danford. Danford's version was pure fiction and included incidents heretofore unmentioned by any of the writers surveyed in this study. A brief synopsis of Danford's account follows:

According to this story, the Indians planned to destroy Fort

[133] Hooker, p. 247.
[134] William Alexander MacCorkle, The White Sulphur Springs (New York: The Neale Publishing Company, 1916), pp. 30-31.
[135] Hooker, p. 32.
[136] MacCorkle, p. 31.
[137] Ibid., p. 32.
[138] Percival Reniers, The Midland Trail (New York: The Midland Publications Company, 1926), p. 36.

Lee and scalp every paleface who had dared to trespass upon their prized hunting grounds. The attack came on an April night—amid a severe thunderstorm, the darkness being so deep the defenders could see the Indians only by the intermittent flashes of lightning. Belatedly, the commander of the fort realized that the powder was low. Anne volunteered to go to Lewisburg for powder and, when her husband forbade her going, reminded him that the word obey had been stricken from their marriage vows. In ten minutes she was on her way.

At the mouth of Campbell's Creek, a few miles up the Kanawha River from Fort Lee, Anne saw, by the light of a full moon, the storm presumably having passed, a canoe tied up on the opposite side of the river. She recognized the canoe as belonging to Daniel Boone and, wishing to speak with him, she screamed like a panther. Boone recognized Anne's scream and paddled across the river. Anne told him her story, then was off into the forest for Lewisburg and the powder. Danford brings Anne back to Fort Lee, but does not mention Boone again.[139]

Another purely fictitious account of Anne's ride, written by Grace M. Hall, was published in the West Virginia Review, in 1942. The author inserted a notation to the effect that she had made no effort to be historically correct. The story was written in a realistic manner, the author attempting to follow Anne on her hazardous journey, recording her thoughts and reactions as she rode through the wilderness. Anne's rough language, her tobacco, and her rum were neither minimized nor exaggerated. A grim sense of humor was attributed to Anne, when she is quoted as saying to herself, " 'Devil of a lookin' bride I'd made without my scalp lock.' "[140]

Anne's services at Fort Lee expanded with the telling and retelling of the tale. In one instance, not only did Anne go for powder, it was she who had ridden through the settlements warning the settlers of their danger. It was she who had herded them into the fort for protection.[141]

Then the chroniclers suffered a change of mind as concerned

---

[139] Danford, pp. 115-116.

[140] Grace M. Hall, "Under Cover of Darkness," West Virginia Review, XVIII-XIX (June, 1941), p. 186.

[141] McClintic, p. 4.

the weather. There was no April storm on that fateful night in 1791. It was a calm mid-summer night, all peaceful. The men were sleeping peacefully within the stockade—all but one lone sentry. The sentry heard the "whoo" of an owl and in the dimness saw dark forms. "Indians!" When the fact was disclosed that ammunition was low, Anne, "with shining eyes," volunteered to go for powder.[142]

Did Anne travel at night, or by day, or night and day? "Alone on her horse, with rifle across her saddle, fireless at night creeping through underbrush by day to avoid the open trail, Anne Bailey reached the fort at Lewisburg, rested her horse overnight, and then with all the munitions another horse could carry she started back to the relief of Fort Clendenin."[143]

One writer, in 1928, in describing Anne's daring action in riding for the powder reports that Anne ". . . rode alone from Fort Lee to Lewisburg to secure powder, a journey successfully accomplished not only once, but several times."[144]

Again, in 1928, Anne's story was told in verse, the poet this time being a woman, or more probably a girl scout. The title of the poem was "A Girl Scout of 1791," and the publication date coincided (approximately) with the date of the dedication of Camp Ann Bailey, Kanawha County Girl Scout Camp, near Lewisburg, West Virginia. The poem follows:[145]

At Charleston in the days of old,
Clendenin stood, a fortress bold.
A woman saved it once, I'm told:
Ann Bailey.

For Wester chiefs, (so said a spy),
Were vowing: 'Every white must die!'
But one kept watch with eagle eye:
Ann Bailey.

So when they reached Kanawha's flood,-
All thirsty for the white man's blood-
Who found it out and brought the word?
Ann Bailey.

---

[142] Sheppard, p. 88.
[143] Summers, p. 38.
[144] Ruth Woods Dayton, Greenbrier Pioneers and Their Homes (Charleston, West Virginia: West Virginia Publishing Company, 1942), p. 226.
[145] Anne Wells Sherwin, "A Girl Scout of 1791," West Virginia Review, V (August, 1928), p. 626.

Then swore the colonel and his crew,
(Tho' Ann was standing by, 'tis true),
'The powder's spent! What shall we do,
Ann Bailey?'

I'll bring the shot! and she was gone
To Lewisburg, to ride alone
A hundred miles o'er brake and stone:
Ann Bailey.

All day she braved the forest dark
At night her bed the branches stark
Nor quailed at e'en the wolf's wild bark:
Ann Bailey.

Next day to Lewisburg she came,
Asked but the powder, wheeled again
And only stopped to give her name:-
Ann Bailey.

Brave girl! Did bird nor beast affright-
(Your only bed the mountain height,
Your only canopy the night,)-
Ann Bailey?

Yet in the morn there skimmed the ground
And reached the fort with leap and bound
Just as broke forth the war whoop's sound
Ann Bailey!

And with the Pale Face beat that day,
Though only Men were in the fray,
Who REALLY saved the country? Say!
Ann Bailey.

What inferences, of a literary nature, can be drawn from the story of the siege and ride?

In the first place, according to Cook, there was no siege at Fort Lee; and further, there is no documentary evidence that Anne was ever connected with that fort. What, then, are the possible sources of the story?

Two parallel stories, historically acceptable, may be cited in West Virginia history—the stories of Fleming Cobbs and Betty Zane. There is a possibility that, in seventy years of telling and re-telling the Zane, Cobbs, and Bailey stories, the incidents may have become mixed, and the bringing of powder was borrowed from the Zane or Cobbs story and added to the accounts of Anne's scouting activities. The fact that Robb's poem did not appear until seventy years after the alleged ride, and fact that he mentions his source as being a mountaineer seems to strengthen this view. However, it must not be assumed that the story of Anne's ride is entirely fictitious. In Anne's obituary, William Clendenin is reported to have said that Anne did bring powder from Lewisburg at a time when the Indians were threatening Fort Lee.

In the unfolding of the tradition of the ride it should be remembered that the account of the ride to Lewisburg came, fullfledged, from the pen of Charles Robb. Writers then seized upon the story and added details concerning the return trip, the trail over which she rode, how she left the fort, how she entered it upon her return, and what her thoughts were while riding through the forest.

Most of the versions are highly romantic but a bit of realism creeps into the story in MacCorkle's common-sense version of how Anne left and re-entered Fort Lee. The story by Grace M. Hall was definitely written in a realistic vein, with some attempt at psychological analysis.

It should also be mentioned that in killing an Indian after her return to Fort Lee, Anne "accomplished her revenge."

VIII

After the Indian Wars

After the Indians had been driven from the Kanawha Valley, Anne's services as a scout were obviously no longer needed, but she continued her eccentric ways, spending much time in the forest, fishing and hunting; and it is said that she seldom wasted a shot.[46]

As has been shown in several instances, the tendency of most of the writers who have told Anne's story is toward romanticism. With the romantic emphasis upon nature and the extolling of the simple and natural mode of life as the noblest and the best, it was inevitable that some writer should portray Anne as a nature lover—regardless of whether Anne's years of roving the wilderness were for love of nature or for the purpose of inflicting vengeance upon her savage foes. It was Mrs. Messenger who added this further touch of romanticism to the Anne Bailey tradition: ". . . and to the last she retained her exceptional devotion to nature and primitive forms of life in country and forest."[147]

[46] "Mad Anne," p. 228.

Anne's eccentricity is demonstrated in the fact that even though her days as an Indian scout were over, she continued to wear an assortment of male and female dress. Ellet wrote that Anne was usually clad in buckskin leggings, a skirt, and a man's coat. She is reputed to have visited widely in the homes along the border, always returning to her own cabin laden with gifts.[148]

How long John Bailey lived after Anne's gallant ride is a matter of question, and only Buell has made any statement as to the cause of his death: "After the death of her husband, who was murdered and buried not far from Kanawha Falls, in West Virginia . . . she lived with her son, William Trotter . . . ."[149]

Anne did more than hunt, fish, and visit. She engaged in a kind of express business from Staunton to Gallipolis, bringing to the border settlements medicines, small packages, ". . . anything that could be carried on a horse . . . ."[150] "But she did not always ride. Many times Anne Bailey made the long, hard journey on foot, bearing on her back heavy packs of great bulk."[151] The tradition that Anne was possessed of unusual physical strength and endurance is suggested in the stories of her repeated trips from Staunton to Gallipolis, either on foot or on horseback.

According to our writers, Anne not only brought goods to the settlers but livestock also. "She was known as a drover of hogs and cattle from the Shenandoah and there is a tradition that she introduced the first game geese in the Kanawha Valley."[152] And further—"When she brought cattle, she did it afoot."[153]

[147] Messenger, p. 8.
[148] Ellet, p. 251.
[149] Buell, p. 358.
[150] Lanier, p. 88.
[151] Shepherd, pp. 116-117.
[152] Callahan, p. 226.
[153] Sargent, p. 88.

It is interesting to note that when Anne drove livestock from the Shenandoah Valley to the Kanawha, she was following approximately the route now known as U. S. 60. Much of this route is over difficult terrain. It might be suggested that Anne's activities as a driver of livestock may have been confined to lesser distances than those assigned to her. Having brought powder from Lewisburg, and other supplies from Staunton, Anne is credited with having driven the livestock from the Shenandoah also.

As in every other aspect of Anne's life, there was disagreement concerning her life after the ride. "We have not heard of Anne's existence after the hazardous trip which won for her an undying memory in all West Virginia. It is enough that her career, as far as history is concerned, ends with the dramatic ride which assured us of our present civilization."[154]

What could be more romatic than the conception that Anne rose to the occasion, met the desperate need of those imperiled at Fort Lee, then, her task performed, disappeared completely from public view! The point is that whatever Anne's occupation after the Indian wars—in the minds of writers it was dramatized and enlarged upon. Thus a tradition grows—a tradition of Anne as a nature lover, as a welcome visitor in the homes along the border, as a carrier of much needed goods to the pioneers, as a drover of livestock, as more than all of these—a tradition of a woman of extra-ordinary physical vigor and stamina.

IX

Anne's Last Years

Anne's last years were spent in Ohio, in or near Gallipolis. Stories about her last years, and especially concerning her age at the time of her death, vary greatly.

One early writer was content to say that she moved later to Ohio and died on the frontier, deeply lamented by all those whom she had served.[155] The reporting soon became specific. Anne went with her son to Ohio, near Gallipolis.[156] Then the [154] The Charleston [West Virginia] Gazette, February 6, 1938.

[155] Bennett, pp. 213-214.
[156] Elliot, p. 222.

date was added. She went to Gallia County in 1802 and lived there nearly twenty-three years.[157]

Anne remained strong and active unto the end. "She made her last visit to Charleston in the summer of 1817, walking 75 miles when she was 75 years of age."[158] This statement quite obviously follows Lewis's 1891 story of Anne's life. In 1907, however, Miss Evelyn Sterrett, in a letter to Lewis, questioned his statement concerning the last trip to Charleston: "I doubted the correctness for this reason. The stopping point for travellers between Charleston and Point Pleasant was Samuel Alexander's. His daughter, my grandmother, was born in 1818, yet she could tell us much of interest about Ann Bailey. Although she was very young when Ann ceased to make her trips, she was greatly impressed by Ann's masculine dress, appearance and behavior. She could remember how Ann cared for the horses, the stories she would tell . . . . I fell quite sure Ann must have taken a few rides as late as 1822 or 1823 or my grandmother could not have remembered her so distinctly . . . ."[159] Perhaps Anne was even more hale and hearty than published accounts gave her credit for being.

Anne's age at the time of her death was controversial. She lived beyond one hundred years.[160] She died at the age of one hundred fourteen.[161] "She died in 1825, said then to be in the one hundred twentieth year of her age."[162] On the evening of November 23 Anne went to bed, being in extra good health. About ten o'clock she was found dead in her bed. Her age was one hundred twenty-five years.[163]

Anne's death was sentimentalized. "The spirit of this eccentric yet fearless character, was wafted to its final home on the twenty-second of November, 1825, and left the pulseless corpse in a rail shanty—the product of her own hands—on the Ohio River, just below Point Pleasant."[164] And more of the same kind of sentimentality: "She was never ill. She only ceased to breathe. Having heard a great voice saying, 'Come up higher', her soul answered swiftly and silently."[165]

[157] Hardesty, p. 9.
[158] Caldwell, p. 120.
[159] Evelyn Sterrett, letter to Virgil A. Lewis, July 18, 1907.
[160] Ellet, p. 302.
[161] Atkinson, p. 136.
[162] Hardesty, p. 9.
[163] Buell, p. 304.
[164] McAllister, p. 207.
[165] Hogan, p. 262.

"Eccentric to the last, she refused to live in his [her son William's] comfortable house, and built herself a cabin out of fence rails, living in it with a granddaughter."[166] She died in 1825 at the age of eighty-three years.[167]

As late as 1953 a daughter was bestowed upon Anne. In writing of the rail cabin in which Anne lived for a short time, Julius de Gruyter wrote, "She lived there with her daughter until her death, November 22, 1825."[168]

Anne's obituary was published in The Gallia Free Press on December 3, 1825. It was published under the caption "Longevity". The obituary was preserved by Henry Howe, for whom it was copied by James Harper. James Harper's father was the publisher of The Gallia Free Press.[169]

> Died, in Harrison township, Gallia County, Ohio, on Tuesday, November 22, 1825, the celebrated Ann Bailey. From the best account we have she must have been at least 125 years of age. According to her own story her father was a soldier in Queen Anne's wars; that on getting a furlough to go home he found his wife with a fine daughter in her arms, whom he called Ann after the Queen as a token of respect. In 1714 she went from Liverpool to London with her mother on a visit to her brother—while there, she saw Lord Lovett beheaded.
>
> She came to the United States the year after Braddock's defeat, aged then forty-six years. Her husband was killed at the battle of Point Pleasant in 1774; after that, to avenge his death, she joined the garrison, under the command of Col. Wm. Clendenin, where she remained until the final departure of the Indians from the country. Col. Wm. Clendenin says, while he was commander of the garrison where Charleston, Kanawha, is now located, an attack by Indians was hourly expected. On examination it was believed that ammunition on hand was insufficient to hold out a siege of any length; to send even two, three or four men to Lewisburg, the nearest place it could be had, a distance of 100 miles, was like sending men to be slaughtered; and sending a larger force was weakening the garrison. While in this state Ann Bailey volunteered to leave the fort in the night and go to Lewisburg. She did so—and traveled the wilderness, where not a vestige of a house was to be seen—arrived safe at Lewisburg, delivered her orders, received the ammunition, and returned safe to her post, amidst the plaudits of a grateful people.

[166] Morton, p. 316.
[167] Ibid.
[168] de Gruyter, p. 221.
[169] Howe, pp. 403-404.

X

Description and Personality

What did Anne Bailey look like? What were her personal characteristics?

Here again the accounts vary widely, according to the inclination of the author. The romantic influence of the nineteenth century is strong in the idealized descriptions in which Anne is possessed of perfect womanly beauty and grace.

And again the romantic tendency is shown by writers who picture Anne as strange and bizarre, as well as by those who describe in detail the matted grizzled locks of hair and the strange clothing which she wore.

The realistic point of view is represented in word pictures in which the hardships of Anne's life as wilderness scout are reflected in her coarse, roughened countenance and in her uncouth ways.

But, romantic or realistic as the case may be, in no phase of the Anne Bailey tradition is there greater evidence of conjecture, imagination and personal bias than in description of Anne and in the stories about her which illustrate her personal qualities. As has been mentioned, this emphasis upon description was especially true of writers prior to 1861 when Robb's story of the ride provided a new point of emphasis, and gave new direction to the development of the tradition.

Anne Royall, writing in 1826, only a few months after Anne's death, claimed to have seen Anne and talked with her. Mrs. Royall was realistic about Anne and in this respect was somewhat unique, most women writers having a tendency to extol Anne's virtues.

Mrs. Royall wrote: "I have seen the celebrated heroine, Ann Bailey. . . . She was quite a low woman in height, but very strongly made, and had the most pleasing countenance I ever saw, and for her, very affable. . . . When I saw the poor creature, she was almost naked; she begged a dram, which I gave to her and also some other trifle. I shall never forget Ann Bailey."[10]

[10] Royall, pp. 42-43.

Anne was not always referred to as a "poor creature." More often, as has been indicated, she was pictured as a bizarre one. "The dress of this individual was of a mongrel character, and a close observer might have been undecided which of the two sexes should claim our subject for its own. The head was bound round with a flaming red bandana handkerchief, from beneath whose folds there fell, and fluttered on the breeze, long grizzled locks of coarse matted hair, which gave a wild and savage appearance. . . . In the belt which encompassed the waist of this personage was a tomahawk and a scalping knife; and another belt sustained a short but very serviceable rifle which was strapped to the shoulders. . . ."[171]

The descriptive phrases quoted above were written in 1856. The writer continued his account by writing that this strange creature wore buckskin leggings "which reached from the hips to the feet. The feet were covered with a pair of beautiful Indian moccasins. Around the waist and depending two-thirds of the way to the feet, was a petticoat. . . ."[172]

She, for eventually the personage was revealed as a woman, was short, thick-set, coarse, and masculine. Her face was bronzed by exposure and showed "the unmistakable outline of care and passion."[173] She hunted, fought, rode like a man, and delighted in the excitement and adventure of the border. She became known as "Mad Ann" but no one dared call her that to her face.[174]

"She was very profane and often intoxicated . . . and could box with the skill of one of the fancy men of her native country. . . ."[175] She was pugnacious and often fought.

Anne had other accomplishments. She "possessed a considerable amount of intelligence . . ." and could read and write. She was skilled at story telling and "it was her delight to gather round her a group of listeners, and relate the adventures, trials and difficulties she had met with in her checkered career; and often the sympathetic tear would gather in the eyes and course down the cheeks of her audience."[176]

171 "Mad Ann," pp. 235-236.
172 Ibid., p. 236.
173 Ibid.
174 Ibid.
175 Ibid.
176 Ibid.

Anne continued to be painted in eccentric colors, and, according to Bennett, writing in 1859, "She was a short, dumpy woman, with large muscular limbs and a full, bluff, coarse, masculine countenance; and her dress was an odd mixture of the two sexes. . . ." Bennett followed the 1856 writer and Anne's hair was allowed to remain coarse, bushy, and uncombed, but it "was surmounted by a raccoon cap."[177] The raccoon cap was perhaps inevitable and it is interesting that no other writer has followed Bennett's lead in this respect.

Bennett continued to follow the 1856 author, repeating the idea and strengthening the tradition of Anne as rough and masculine, swearing, drinking, fighting, "holding her own" with the strongest men on the border. "She could swear like a trooper, drink whiskey like a bar-room lounger, and box with the skill of a pugilist."[178]

One of the oft repeated stories concerning Anne told how she appeared late one night at Fort Young, bearing two Indian scalps. "As she came into the light of the fire, however, there arose several quick exclamations of surprise and alarm . . . for it was immediately discovered that her face (and most of her person) was covered with blood, which was even then slowly oozing and dripping down from a long ugly gash that crossed the upper portion of the temple and extended from her forehead to her ear."[179]

Anne was taciturn. Two big draughts of whiskey, one being nearly half a pint, were brought. "Mad Ann seized the cup, looked steadily at its contents for a few moments, and then poured it down her throat as if it was so much water." Then she pulled from her bosom "two Indian scalps, from which the fresh blood was yet dripping."[180] She defied the men to beat that ". . . you big, robust, blustering male fellows, who call yourselves the lords of creation."[181]

She took another big drink and told her story. She was riding through the forest when she received warnings "from t'other world." She rode on "and then something came and touched me—something from t'other world—and I knew the [177] Bennett, p. 104.

[178] Ibid.
[179] Ibid., p. 105.
[180] Ibid., p. 106.
[181] Ibid., p. 107.

danger was nigh and great—a last warning of death."[162] Anne rode on and came upon some Indians, camped and eating. Then the voice told Anne to kill the Indians or they would kill her. Anne answered the spirit voice, "Yes, Lord!" She promised to "kill or die,"[163] She killed the Indians and the next day led the settlers to where the bodies lay.[164]

Through all the literature concerning Anne Bailey, her hatred of Indians and desire for revenge is stressed, and this story is repeated, but in no other writing is she portrayed as being as blood-thirsty as in this account.

It was only two years after this story was published that Robb wrote his poem in which he described Anne as possessing all the beauty and grace that any woman could desire.

> But one who stood amidst the rest
> The bravest, fairest and the best
> Of all that graced the cabin hall,
> First broke the spell of terror's thrall.
> Her step was firm, her features fine,
> Of mortal mould, the most divine;
> But why describe her graces fair,
> Her form, her mein, her stately air?
> Nay, hold! my pen, I will not dare!
> 'Twas Heaven's image mirrored there.[165]

Elizabeth F. Ellet followed Robb as the next writer, chronologically, to be concerned with Anne Bailey. Ellet described Anne in her later years. It is immediately obvious that Anne is considerably mellowed by time, and perhaps by the influence of Robb's poem on Mrs. Ellet. However, Anne retained enough of her fierce qualities to be "a terror to refractory urchins."[166] "She often took it upon herself to enforce the keeping of the Sabbath by taking up such boys as she found wandering about that day, and compelling them to sit around her in a cabin, while she opened school exercises for their instruction, greatly to the terror of the delinquents."[167] Anne won prizes at shooting matches,[168] and called not only her horse but also her canoe and gun "Liverpool."[169]

---

[162] Ibid., p. 338.
[163] Ibid., pp. 346-348.
[164] Ibid., p. 351.
[165] Lewis, Life and Times, p. 42.
[166] Ellet, p. 340.
[167] Ibid., p. 341.

"It is said that 'Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned.' Neither hath it any like a woman wronged and thoroughly imbued with the spirit of vengeance. There was a wild unnatural brightness in her sharp, gray eyes, and a mocking jeer in her loud, grating laugh."[190] And it was admitted that "She was somewhat disordered in her intellect."[191]

Anne's efficiency in the use of invective was illustrated by the story of her meeting with a straggling Indian on Sewell Mountain. Tying her horse's bridle around her ankle, she crawled into a hollow log. When the Indian tried to steal the horse, Anne crawled out of the log and abused the Indian so roundly that he ran off, fearing she would bring down upon him the anger of the Great Spirit.[192]

Even the earliest writers disagreed about Anne's appearance: "She was small, round-shouldered, fleet of foot and dressed in black."[193] She was a good hunter "and as frequently as any of them, killed a deer off hand, while it was running at full speed. She asked odds of no man at running, jumping, shooting, or hunting."[194]

Anne rode a powerful black horse called Liverpool. "It was the only living creature she loved. Her horse and her rifle were her constant companions. . . . Amid storms of rain and sleet, beset by the rigors of winter, followed by wild beasts, or pursued by Indians, her immense frame of iron strength knew no fatigue, her restless rancor no slumber."[195]

It was Buell who first related how Anne had been kidnapped, with her books in her arms and brought to America. Buell was consistent. He wrote that she loved her books, and, after moving to Ohio in 1818, she taught school.[196] At this time Anne was, if the birthdate assigned to her by Buell is to be accepted, one hundred eighteen years of age.

Buell described Anne as a protector of women. At a husking bee a settler by the name of Hazlett got too much whiskey

---

[190] McKnight, p. 598.
[191] Ibid., p. 598.
[192] Atkinson, p. 138.
[193] Ibid., p. 140.
[194] Ibid., pp. 138-139.
[195] Mason, p. 405.
[196] Buell, pp. 484-485.

and was going to beat his wife. Anne drew her trusty scalping knife and freightened the ruffian into behaving.[197]

Another story, frequently told, relates how Anne had gone to Mann's powder-house for ammunition. While she was crossing Mad Ann's Ridge, snow started to fall. Anne dismounted and fell asleep. Liverpool went back to Mann's. The next morning Anne was located by the holes made in the snow by her warm breath.[198]

Evelyn Sterrett, in letters to Virgil A. Lewis, volunteered the following information concerning Anne. While on her way from Charleston to Point Pleasant, Anne frequently stopped at a place called Alexander's. The children were frightened of her, "yet filled with curiosity." Anne was usually silent. "However, sometimes she would rouse from silence and try to entertain them by hooting like an owl and saying, 'I shot an howl across Helk out of a helm tree,' then with another hoot relapse into silence."[199]

While stopping at Alexander's, Anne cared for her own horses, especially if Liverpool was one of them. "After seeing them comfortably fed and sheltered, she would box and wrestle with the stable boys for amusement using the same coarse profane language, smoking, chewing and drinking."[200]

When Anne was carrying ammunition, she wore men's attire, but when carrying messages or other commissions, she wore women's clothing, a linsey-woolsey dress. She occasionally wore a hat "over her unkept gray hair, but usually it was covered by a large handkerchief folded three-cornered and tied under her chin."[201]

That Anne enjoyed a joke is suggested in the following incident told by Miss Sterrett. This anecdote was found only in the Sterrett letter of 1908. A young man once hallooed impudently to her as she turned her canoe toward the shore near Fort Randolph (Point Pleasant). Retorting that she would kiss him, Anne sprang from the canoe, caught the young man, threw him, and kissed him.[202]

---

197 Ibid., p. 388.
198 McAllister, p. 397.
199 Sterrett, loc. cit.
200 Miss Evelyn Sterrett, letter to Mr. Virgil A. Lewis, January 9, 1908, preserved in the Sterrett [illegible].
201 Ibid.
202 Ibid.

The settlers were devoted to Anne and she to them: "For this became her passion and her services to the settlers as scout, soldier, provisioner of forts and as teacher of their children, were hooks of steel, by which, her devotion having been tried, they bound her to themselves and themselves to her."[203] "The people fairly idolized her. She was loaded with gifts of every sort and treated with the greatest respect and kindness."[204]

Writers continued to describe Anne's appearance and personality: ". . . a fair complexion, hazel eyes, a rather undersized but perfect form, a sweet disposition, and a mind strong and rigorous. . . ."[205] She was honest to the last penny and while "perhaps no church member she was a good woman and observed the Sabbath day and said her prayers and was received and welcomed into all the families."[206]

Anne's gentle qualities are challenged in still another tale of her horse being stolen by an Indian. Anne trailed the Indian and found him swimming New River with the animal. "The thief was shot in the back. After an outburst of scurrilous profanity directed at her dead foe, Mrs. Bailey called to the horse and 'Jennie Mann' swam back to her."[207]

"There was nothing gentle or religious about Anne, but she rendered more valuable service to the building of the frontier than half a dozen ordinary men of her time."[208] "Often she disappeared for weeks at a time . . . but when she returned she always brought the scalps of several Indians, and it is said that the savages grew to fear her greatly."[209] And yet it was written three years later: "In case of sickness Anne was known as the gentlest and best of all the nurses. . . ."[210]

What kind of person was Anne? Her great-great-grandson, Harry Irion, summed up her personal characteristics: "The statement about her boxing and wrestling with the stable boys for sheer amusement illustrates to me a robust, roguish sense of backwoods humor as well as an opportunity to demonstrate her physical prowess, of which she was justly proud. I doubt that she was profane within the strict meaning of that term. My reason for questioning her alleged profanity is due to the tradition in my own family that Anne read her Bible, taught her grandchildren on Sunday, and had strong faith in a protecting and loving God. No doubt she used tobacco and drank alcoholic liquors, for that was common practice among our frontiersmen. . . ."[211]

The reader's attention has already been called to the fact that writers before 1861 concentrated on descriptions of Anne, pointing out her strange and bizarre qualities. It was these early writers who started the tradition of Anne as a boisterous, hard-drinking, fighting, swearing woman, the equal in physical strength and skill at the masculine accomplishments of shooting, wrestling, boxing and hunting of any man on the border.

These early writers were also responsible for the tradition of Anne's bloodthirstiness and extreme hatred of the Indians. The element of superstition was also introduced into the story early in its development.

Beginning with Robb in 1861, writers have portrayed a different Anne—Anne the heroine, still, in most cases, physically strong and vigorous, excelling in the masculine pursuits of hunting, wrestling, and boxing, but taking on characteristics of a gentler and nobler nature. She loved books and taught school, was religious, and enjoyed a practical joke. Her passion for service to the settlers supplanted, to some degree, her desire for revenge. The extreme devotion of the settlers to Anne is evidence of her noble qualities.

However, it must not be assumed that all writers immediately began, after 1861, to portray only a noble and virtuous Anne. Writers in the mid-nineteen thirties were still writing of Anne as rough and irreligious but even they admitted her value to the settlers she served.

One other contrast in description of Anne's personality should be mentioned. She was sometimes portrayed as extremely taciturn, sometimes as friendly and garrulous—much given to story telling in which she was adept. It would seem that Anne was all things to all writers.

[211] Harry S. Irion, letter to the author, December 1, 1953.

XI

Memorials and Descendants

The demand for a memorial commemorating the deeds of Anne Bailey was voiced by Augustus Lincy Mason, in 1883, when he wrote: "Virginia and Ohio should build a monument of enduring marble upon the spot."[212] Two years later the demand was repeated by William P. Buell: "Especially should the memory of Ann Bailey, the heroic woman who risked her life so often for these she loved, be remembered and her name, fame, and heroic deeds should find a resting place upon the bosom of affectionate memory."[213]

However, nothing was done toward establishing a memorial until 1901 when the Colonel Charles Lewis Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, was organized at Point Pleasant. Under the direction of the D.A.R.: "The ashes of Anne Bailey, the scout, who belonged to General Andrew Lewis's Army were also taken up from where they had long been buried, in an obscure spot near Clippers Mills, Ohio, and placed alongside the soldiers she had so faithfully served, many times at the risk of her own life."[214] Re-interment was made "just as the sun was sinking down behind the western hills, being the closing ceremonies of the day."[215]

Anne's remains were now properly interred in the ground dedicated to the memory of those brave soldiers, including Anne's first husband, who had lost their lives in the Battle of Point Pleasant, October 10, 1774. But still her grave was unmarked. Writers, however, retained their interest in a monument for Anne. In 1907, Delia McCulloch wrote: "When the monument is erected, Ann Bailey, the Heroine of the Kanawha Valley will not be forgotten."[216]

It was not until 1925 that the desired monument was erected. At this time Anne's grave was "covered with a large boulder, placed there by Capt. C. C. Bowyer, President of the Merchants

---

[212] Mason, p. 8. "The spot"—Anne's first burial place.
[213] Buell, p. 801.
[214] Seventh Report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution (Washington, D. C.: Government Printing Office, 1901), p. 230.
[215] Delia A. McCulloch, "Burial of Point Pleasant," American Historical Magazine, II (September, 1907), p. 336.
[216] Ibid., p. 336.

National Bank of that city [Point Pleasant] with a bronze table telling the passing stranger the simple fact of her heroic career."[217] The inscription reads:

Ann Hennis Trotter Bailey
Revolutionary Scout
Born in Liverpool, Eng., 1742
Died 1825
Col. Chas. Lewis Chapter, D.A.R.
1925[218]

Testimonials to Anne's heroic life and deeds may be found along the route over which she rode, from Covington, Virginia, to Gallipolis, Ohio. A description of these follows:

"A mile above Barber [Virginia] may be seen, a little way off at the right, the long foot-hill elevation known as Mad Ann's Ridge, because it is associated with the exploits of Ann Bailey."[219] "This ridge lies at right angles to Warm Springs Mountain and on the north side of Falling Spring Branch."[220] On June 14, 1926 a tablet was placed on the highway between Hot Springs in Bath County and Covington, Allegheny County by the Rainbow Ridge Chapter of Allegheny County Daughters of the American Revolution.[221] The inscription on the tablet reads: "Near this spot stood the rude hut in which 'Mad' Anne Bailey spent the last years of her life as a scout and Indian fighter. She rendered valuable services to the first settlers of this section. Placed by the Rainbow Ridge Chapter, D.A.R."[222]

Another marker, placed by the D.A.R., is located on Kanawha Boulevard, Charleston, West Virginia. This marker, a large boulder with bronze plates, is located on the site of Fort Lee. There are two inscriptions, one facing the river, and one, on the opposite side of the stone, facing toward downtown Charleston. The inscription facing the river reads:

---

[217] F. F. Well, "Powder Horn of the Revolution," The Gallia Times [Gallipolis, Ohio], February 25, 1926. [Found in the Puffenbarger Scrapbooks. Page not given].

[218] Lewis, Historical Figures, p. 21.

[219] Paul Pollock Strongfellow, "Know Ann Bailey?" Huntington [West Virginia] Herald Dispatch, December 6, 1925, p. 5.

[220] McClintic, p. 256.

[221] Milton C. Russel, letter to the author, March 3, 1954.

[222] McClintic, p. 4.

FORT CLENDENIN
1778 Saved by two historic rides for powder
Ann Bailey
On horseback through wilderness to Lewisburg and return
Fleming Cobbs
Poled down Kanawha River to Point Pleasant and return
Kan. Valley Chapt. 1930[223]

Road markers mentioning Anne Bailey have been placed by the West Virginia State Road Commission in Charleston and at Point Pleasant. The Charleston marker is on the corner of Virginia and Court Streets, on U.S. highway Routes 21, 60, 119. The marker reads: "Founded by George Clendenin and named for his father. Established, 1794. Fort Lee, built 1788, stood on Kanawha River. 'Mad' Anne Bailey, the border heroine, and Daniel Boone and Simon Kenton, noted scouts, once lived here."[224]

The marker at Point Pleasant is located on U.S. route 35 and West Virginia routes 2 and 5. The inscription: "Fort Blair was built here in 1774 and later Fort Randolph, center of Indian activities, 1777-1778. Here are graves of 'Mad Anne' Bailey, border scout, and Cornstalk, Shawnee chief, held as hostage and killed at Fort Randolph in 1777."[225]

Richard W. Workman, an official of the West Virginia Conservation Commission, Division of Education, informed the author that in Watoga State Park, Pocahontas County, there is a wooden tower, built on a point known as Workman's Ridge, from which place Anne Bailey is said to have kept watch over the Greenbrier Valley. On a park road, four miles from the lookout, is a wooden sign indicating the side road which leads to the tower. A few of the generally accepted facts concerning Anne's career are carved on this sign.

When Anne was making her rides between Charleston and Point Pleasant, she spent her nights in a cave and this cave

---

[224] This inscription copied from the marker by the author.
[225] West Virginia Historic and Scenic Highway Markers (Charleston, West Virginia: State Road Commission of West Virginia in cooperation with the Works Projects Administration, 1937) p. 22.
[223] Ibid., p. 16.

became known as Anne Bailey's Cave. Dr. C. C. Forbes of Leon, West Virginia, told Mr. Virgil Lewis of this cave and added that the cave had been ruined by workmen quarrying rock."[225] This cave was "in the lower part" of the county and "in the upper end of the county there is a branch known as Anne's Branch."[227] In 1953, The Richmond Times-Dispatch carried an article locating a cave between Staunton and Lewisburg, accompanied by a picture with this caption: "Anne Bailey lived in this cave in Western Virginia while scouting between Staunton and Lewisburg."[228]

A unique testimonial to Anne Bailey's memory was the ferry boat, the "Ann Bailey," which plied the Ohio from Point Pleasant to Kenauga, on the Ohio side, from approximately the first decade of 1900 to 1928. The clipping quoted below was found in the scrapbooks of Mrs. Livia Poffenbarger who was editor of The State Gazette around 1900-1910. "On Monday morning Capt. Ulysses Grant Hayes let the contract to the Kanawha Dock Company for a new ferry boat to be much longer than that now plying between here and Kanauga, on the Ohio side. . . . The new ferry is to be completed before October 7th and will be called for the Heroine of the Kanawha Valley, Ann Bailey."[229] The Ann Bailey carried passengers and traffic across the Ohio until it was replaced in 1928 by "The Silver Bridge."[230]

Near Gallipolis there is a small church known as Bailey Chapel Church. "Bailey Chapel Church, built on the site given to its congregation, by the descendants of William Trotter, the son of Anne Bailey, was named in her honor, and is about 200 yards from her first burial place, along State Route 218, and is nine miles south of Gallipolis. It is affiliated with the Christian Order Denomination. . . ."[231]

Perhaps the most fitting of all the memorials to Anne Bailey is the Kanawha County Girl Scout camp. Camp Ann Bailey is built on a sixty-eight acre reservation in the mountains of

---

[225] Lewis, Life and Times, pp. 69-70.
[227] Laidley, I, 66.
[228] Scott, p. 18.
[229] "Contract for New Boat," The State Gazette [Point Pleasant, West Virginia], (The Poffenbarger Scrapbooks, n.d.).
[230] Jessica Clifton, "Destruction of Silver Bridge Over Ohio Wednesday Will Create New Link in Relations Between States of Ohio and West Virginia," The Charleston [West Virginia] Gazette, May 27, 1928, sec. 2, p. 2.
[231] Elmer Caldwell, letter to the author, February 16, 1954.

Greenbrier County. "Ann Bailey is the property of the Kanawha County Girl Scouts, built two years ago (1927) . . ."[232] It was named for the pioneer mountain heroine.[233]

Anne's story has been told, not only in poetry and prose, but in drama as well. On October 7, 1927 a pageant was presented at the Kanawha Exposition (Kanawha County Fair) at Dunbar, West Virginia. "The character of Anne Bailey will be one of the most important in the pageant. . . ."[234] The pageant consisted of ten episodes. Anne's ride comes at the conclusion of Episode IV: "Lying flat upon her horse, she rides successfully through them (the Indians) without being hurt, and reaches the inside of the fort in safety."[235]

And Anne has been on radio. On May 10, 1947, Point Pleasant celebrated the opening of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad bridge over the Kanawha at that place.[236] Climaxing the celebration was Station WLW's presentation of Anne's story on their Builders of Destiny series of programs. Peter Grant was the narrator.[237]

Anne Bailey continues to capture the imagination of those who read her story, that strange, ridiculous, heroic tale which is even yet being told and retold. The Ruth B. Scott version appeared late in 1953 in The Richmond Times-Dispatch and Julius de Gruyter's book, The Kanawha Spectator, was released in December, 1953. de Gruyter gave approximately five pages to Anne's story.

This present study may be considered as further evidence that Anne still lives in the memory of West Virginians. But of greater importance is the research which is now being done by Harry S. Irion of Washington, D. C. Mr. Irion is a great-great-grandson of Anne, who, since his retirement in 1951 from the U.S. Forest Service, has been working on a biography of his illustrious grandparent.

Interest is not confined to the locale where Anne trod nor is it limited to those who are numbered among her descend-

---

[232] Ohley, Mind, "Camp Ann Bailey Girl Scout Paradise," The Charleston [West Virginia] Gazette, August 11, 1929, sec. 3, p. 5.

[233] The Charleston [West Virginia] Gazette, May 15, 1932.

[234] The Kanawha Exposition [Huntington, West Virginia], September 25, 1927.

[235] The Charleston [West Virginia] Daily Mail, October 8, 1927.

[236] Rollin Swint, "Thousands Pack City for Bridge Opening," The Point Pleasant [West Virginia] Register, May 10, 1947, p. 1.

[237] Edward Swint, "The View," The Point Pleasant [West Virginia] Register, May 15, 1947, p. 2.

ants. "The following request was taken from a letter we received from Mr. Sigmund A. Lavine, Curator, 65 Stratton St., Dorchester, Mass.: 'I am the author of a juvenile biography of Gilbert and Sullivan which is to be issued this fall by Dodd, Mead and Company of New York City. At present I am under contract to furnish the same organization a teen-aged biography of Charles Proteus Steinmetz, the electrical wizard. This book is almost finished and shortly I will be free to begin another. I have chosen the heroine of the frontier, Anne Bailey, as my subject.'"[238]

Anne Trotter Bailey lives on in her descendants. Her only child, William Trotter, was the father of ten children, one of whom, a daughter, Mary, married James Irion, by whom she had twelve children. One of these, a son named John, was the father of five children, among whom were Brooks and Harry Irion.[239]

Brooks Irion inherited the physical stamina and vigor of his famous grandparent. "He was a long distance runner during his early life, having remarkable powers of endurance . . . . The greatest distance he ever ran in a single race was 50 miles."[240]

Mr. Harry S. Irion was born in Gallipolis but has spent most of his adult life in Washington, D. C., where he served as an attorney in the U. S. Forest Service until his retirement in 1951.[241]

Gifford Irion, son of Harry S. Irion, is a trial examiner in the Federal Communication Commission. He is the author of several short articles and plays. His novel, Windward of Reason, was released by The Dial Press in May, 1954. Mr. Gifford Irion has two children, great-great-great-great-grandchildren of Anne Bailey.[242]

Another of Anne's descendants who is interested in literature is Louis A. Sheets, graduate student in English at Marshall College. Mr. Sheets is a great-great-great-great-grandson of Anne, descended through her granddaughter, Sarah Trotter.

---

[238] Ben Cheatham, letter to the Department of Archives and History (Charleston, West Virginia), April 7, 1954.

[239] Harry S. Irion, "Genealogical Outline," written for the author, December 7, 1953.

[240] Ibid.

[241] Ibid.

[242] Ibid.

A rather impressive number of markers and memorials to Anne Bailey attest the value of her services to the pioneers along the Virginia border. That memorials may be found in three states is evidence of the extent of the territory covered by Anne in her scouting activities. While not exactly of a literary nature, these memorials have been featured in written matter concerning her career. They, therefore, become a natural and important part of this study.

The tracing of Anne's descendants affords another field of research concerning her. It seemed appropriate, however, to include herein some mention of those descendants who are interested in matters of a literary nature, and the one great-great-grandson, Brooks Irion, the distance runner, whose physical stamina and endurance rivaled even that of his famous ancestress, Anne Bailey.

XII

Summary and Conclusions

It was stated in Chapter II that the purpose of this study is to demonstrate how the Anne Bailey tradition grew. A large body of material, both published and unpublished, concerning her has been analyzed, and the printed matter covering several phases of her life has been reviewed.

In the early stages the growth of the tradition was largely oral. As has been demonstrated, little evidence of a documentary nature exists concerning Anne. The Lewis-Cook story, which, for reasons already shown, was accepted as a basic and reasonable account with which to compare other versions, is largely traditional in nature.

Every item of published matter concerning Anne has been printed since her death in 1825, almost all of it since 1861. Although every phase of Anne's life has been subject to exaggeration, speculation, and exaggeration by writers, the main body of the material falls naturally into two major divisions, first, writings, largely descriptive in nature, concerning Anne and her activities as a scout; and second, narration and description, both in poetry and in prose, concerning the ride for powder which saved Fort Lee from destruction by the Indians.

In making the above divisions, it was not intended to discount the divergencies and exaggerations which occur in other phases of the story and which have added some of the most colorful tales to the tradition. For example, in no place is there evidence of greater invention than in the stories of how Anne came to America. And further, the difference of half a century in her birthdate has given rise to stories concerning her that are delightful, but highly improbable, if not ridiculous, as, for example, giving birth to an only son at sixty-seven years of age, falling in love at ninety, and teaching school at the ripe old age of one hundred eighteen years.

And yet, it is our considered opinion that the material does fall into the two divisions suggested above and that the source, immediate or remote, for most of it can be found in Richard Trotter's death. Richard's death was the cause of Anne's extreme bitterness and hatred for the Indians. Because of his death she turned to recruiting soldiers, scouting, carrying messages, in short, to that strange career which made her famous.

Only four printed items concerning Anne occurred prior to 1861 and two of these, the obituary and the Anne Royall sketch, were very short. The other two, "Mad Ann, the Huntress" and the passage in Emerson Bennett's Wild Scenes on the Frontier, were highly imaginative and romatic descriptions of Anne and her activities as a scout. From these two articles, has come the tradition of Anne as a boisterous, fighting, wrestling, swearing, hard-drinking, Indian-hating, blood-thirsty virago, intent only on killing Indians. This version of the story has persisted through the years, side by side with the softer nobler turn which was given to the story by Robb in 1861.

It seems a safe assumption that in the minds of Anne's contemporaries there must have been many questions concerning her. How does a woman scout dress, make camp, secure food? Above all, how does she escape the tomahawk of the redman? From question to conjecture, through oral repetition, the story is finally repeated to a writer possessed of imagination and skill, and a legend is born—or perhaps, preserved.

gave a different turn to the Anne Bailey tradition. Not only did the story of the ride open a new and fertile field for imaginative writers, it also became necessary to fabricate for Anne a new personality—a personality suited to the role of heroine. And Anne became a gentler and nobler person. True, the desire for revenge persisted, but it was balanced by a passion for serving the settlers. Anne was described as adept at nursing and so devoted was she to the Kanawha Valley pioneers that she carried heavy packs of supplies to them from as far east as Staunton, Virginia.

The source of Robb's material was a story, told by a mountaineer. Remembering that the Indians were threatening Fort Lee and recalling also William Clendenin's statement that Anne brought powder from Lewisburg, it is only one easy step for the imagination to bridge the gulf between fact and fancy and have Anne bring the powder when the fort was under siege and in desperate need. Association with the Betty Zane story may well have assisted in building up the tradition of the siege and ride.

Many literary influences can be detected in the telling and retelling of the tale. The decadent Romantic tendency to concentrate upon the occult, the strange, and the bizarre, has perhaps exerted the strongest single influence upon the story.

A minor classical strain, weak, but still evident, can be found in the names of the persons with whom Anne, in Chapter I, is compared. In this chapter also may be noted the early efforts of American writers to throw off the yoke of European domination of American literature, and Anne is compared, not to some queen of classical antiquity, but to Daniel Boone, and Davy Crockett of the Alamo.

Realism has played a part in the development of the tradition. Dr. Roy Bird Cook's work on the story is realistic to the point of iconoclasm. Some minor efforts at psychoanalysis has been found, some of fairly early date, and some more recent.

Women writers, while in a minority as to number, have exerted strong influence in the building of the tradition of Anne as a noble, religious woman whose strange career was motivated not so much by revenge as by a desire to be of service to the settlers.

In recent years, generally speaking, the tendency has been to consider Anne as a valuable border scout, using the term "alleged" when referring to the siege and ride. There are notable examples, however, of the tendency to glorify Anne, as the Ruth B. Scott story in The Richmond Times-Dispatch, 1953.

Also worthy of note is the growth of newspaper interest in the story in the last three decades. This reflects the continuing popular interest in, as well as the broadening of the scope of interest in materials covered by newspapers.

Literary interest in Anne is still strong. Published materials of a recent date may be cited as evidence of this fact. The work of Harry S. Irion on the story, and the plans of Sigmund A. Lavine to write a biography of Anne for juveniles may be offered as further proof that Anne Bailey still captures the minds and imagination of those who hear and read her story.

APPENDIX

ANNE BAILEY'S RIDE

A LEGEND OF THE KANAWHA

By Charles Robb, U. S. A.

(Copied from Life and Times of Anne Bailey, the Pioneer Heroine of the Great Kanawha Valley by Virgil A. Lewis. Charleston, West Virginia: The Butler Printing Company, 1891.)

The Army lay at Gauley Bridge,
At Mountain Cove and Sewell Ridge;
Our tents were pitched on hill and dell
From Charleston Height to Cross Lane fell;
Our camp-fires blazed on every route,
From Red House point to Camp Lookout;
On every rock our sentries stood,
Our scouts held post in every wood,
And every path was stained with blood
From Scarey creek to Gauley flood.

'Twas on a bleak autumnal day,
When not a single sunbeam's ray
Could struggle through the dripping skies
To cheer our melancholy eyes—
Whilst heavy clouds, like funeral palls,
Hung o'er Kanawha's foaming falls,
And shrouded all the mountain green
With dark, foreboding, misty screen.

All through the weary livelong day
Our troops had marched the mountain way;
And in the gloomy eventide
Had pitched their tents by the river's side;
And as the darkness settled o'er
The hill and vale and river shore,
We gathered round the camp-fire bright,
That threw its glare on the misty night;

And each some tale or legend told
To while away the rain and cold.
Thus, one a tale of horror told
That made the very blood run cold;
One spoke of suff'ring and of wrong;
Another sang a mountain song;
One spoke of home, and happy years,
Till down his swarthy cheek the tears
Slow dripping, glistened in the light
That glared upon the misty night;
While others sat in silence deep,
Too sad for mirth, yet scorned to weep.

Then spake a hardy mountaineer—
(His beard was long, his eye was clear;
And clear his voice, of metal tone,
Just such as all would wish to own)—

"I've heard a legend old," he said,
"Of one who used these paths to tread
Long years ago, when fearful strife
Sad havoc made of human life;
A deed of daring bravely done,
A feat of honor nobly won;
And what in story's most uncommon,
An army saved by gentle woman.

" 'Twas in that dark and bloody time (1791)
When savage craft and tory crime
From Northern lake to Southern flood,
Had drenched the western world with blood.
And in this wild, romantic glen
Encamped a host of savage men,
Whose mad'ning war-whoop, loud and high,
Was answered by the panther's cry.

"The pale-faced settlers all had fled,
Or murdered were in lonely bed;
Whilst hut and cabin, blazing high,
With crimson decked the midnight sky.

"I said the settlers all had fled—
Their pathway down the valley led
To where the Elk's bright crystal waves
On dark Kanawha's bosom laves,
There safety sought, and respite brief,
And in Fort Charleston found relief;
Awhile they bravely met their woes,
And kept at bay their savage foes.

"Thus days and weeks the warfare waged,
In fury still the conflict raged;
Still fierce and bitter grew the strife
Where every foeman fought for life.
Thus day by day the siege went on,
Till three long, weary weeks were gone;
And then the mournful word was passed
That every day might be their last;
The word was whispered soft and slow,
The magazine was getting low.
They loaded their rifles one by one,
And then—the powder all was gone!
They stood like men in calm despair,
No friendly aid could reach them there;

Their doom was sealed, the scalping knife
And burning stake must end the strife.
One forlorn hope alone remained,
That distant aid might yet be gained
If trusty messenger should go
Through forest wild, and savage foe,
And safely there should bear report,
And succor bring from distant Fort.

But who should go—the venture dare?
The woodsmen quailed in mute despair,
In vain the call to volunteer;
The bravest blenched with silent fear.
Each gloomy brow and labored breath,
Proclaimed the venture worse than death.
Not long the fatal fact was kept;
But through the Fort the secret crept
Until it reached the ladies' hall,
There like a thunderbolt to fall.
Each in terror stood amazed,
And silent on the other gazed;
No word escaped—there fell no tear—
But all was hushed in mortal fear;
All hope of life at once had fled,
And filled each soul with nameless dread.
But one (Anne Bailey) who stood amid the rest,
The bravest, fairest, and the best
Of all that graced the cabin hall,
First broke the spell of terror's thrall.
Her step was firm, her features fine,
Of Mortal mould the most divine;
But why describe her graces fair,
Her form her mien, her stately air?
Nay, hold! my pen, I will not dare!
'Twas Heaven's image mirrored there.
She spoke no word, of fear, or boast,
But smiling, passed the sentry post;
And half in hope, and half in fear,
She whispered in her husband's ear,
The sacrifice her soul would make
Her friends to save from brand and stake.
A noble charger standing nigh,
Of spirit fine, and metal high,
Was saddled well, and girted strong,
With cord, and loop, and leathern thong.
For her was led in haste from stall,
Upon whose life depended all.
Her friends she gave a parting brief,
No time was there for idle grief;

Her husband's hand a moment wrung,
Then lightly to the saddle sprung;
And followed by the prayers and tears,
The kindling hopes, and boding fears
Of those who seemed the sport of fate,
She dashed beyond the op'ning gate;
Like birdling free, on pinion light,
Commenced her long and weary flight.

"The foemen saw the op'ning gate,
And thought with victory elate
To rush within the portal rude,
And in his dark and savage mood
To end the sanguinary strife
With tomahawk and scalping-knife.
But lo! a lady! fair and bright,
And seated on a charger light,
Bold—and free—as one immortal—
Bounded o'er the op'ning portal.
Each savage paused in mute surprise,
And gazed with wonder-staring eyes;
'A squaw! a squaw!, the chieftain cries,
('A squaw! a squaw!' the host replies;)'
Then order gave to 'cross the lawn
With lightning speed and catch the fawn.'
Her pathway up the valley led,
Like frightened deer the charger fled,
And urged along by whip and rein,
The quick pursuit was all in vain,
A hundred bended bows were sprung,
A thousand savage echoes rung—
But far too short the arrows fell
All harmless in the mountain dell;
'To horse! to horse!' the chieftain cried,
They mount in haste and madly ride.
Along the rough, uneven way,
The pathway of the lady lay;
Whilst long and loud the savage yell
Re-echoed through the mountain fell.

She heeded not the danger rife,
But rode as one who rides for life;
Still onward in her course she bore
Along the dark Kanawha's shore,
Through tangled wood and rocky way,
Nor paused to rest at close of day.
Like skimming cloud before the wind
Soon left the rabble far behind.
From bended tree above the road
The flying charger wildly broke,

Amid the evening's gath'ring gloom,
The panther's shriek, the voice of doom
In terror fell upon the ear,
And quickened every pulse with fear.
But e'en the subtle panther's bound,
To reach his aim too slow was found;
And headlong falling on the rock,
Lay crushed and mangled in the shock.
The prowling wolf then scents his prey,
And rushing on with angry bay,
With savage growl and quickening bound
He clears the rough and rugged ground;
And closing fast the lessening space
That all too soon must end the race,
With sharpened teeth that glittered white
As stars amid the gloomy night—
With foaming jaws had almost grasped
The lovely hand that firmly clasped,
And well had used the whip and rein,
But further effort now were vain;
Another bound—a moment more—
And then the struggle all were o'er.

'Twas in a steep and rocky gorge
Along the river's winding verge,
Just where the foaming torrent falls
Far down through adamantine halls.
And then comes circling round and round,
As loath to leave the enchanted ground.
Just there a band of wand'ring braves
Had pitched their tents beside the waves.
The sun long since had sunk to rest,
And long the light had faded west—
When all were startled by the sound
Of howling wolf and courser's bound,
That onward came, with fearful clang,
Whose echoes round the mountain rang;
The frightened wolf in wild surprise
A moment paused—with glaring eyes
In terror gazed upon the flame,
Then backward fled the way he came.
Each wondering savage saw with fear
The charger come like frightened deer;
With weary gait, and heavy tramp,
The foaming steed dashed through the camp
And onward up the valley bear
His queenly rider, brave and fair.
Still on, and on, through pathless wood—
They swim the Gauley's swollen flood,

And climb Mount Tompkins' lofty brow,
More wild and rugged far than now,
Still onward held their weary flight
Beyond the Hawk's Nest's Giddy Height;
And often chased through lonely glen
By savage beast or savage men—
Thus like some weary, hunted dove
The woman sped through 'Mountain Cove,'
The torrent crossed without a bridge,
And scaled the heights of Sewell Ridge,
And still the wild, beleaguered road
With heavy tramp the charger trode,
Nor paused amid his weary flight
Throughout the long and dreary night.
And bravely rode the woman there,
Where few would venture, few would dare
Amid the cheering light of day
To tread the wild beleaguered way;
And as the morning sunbeams fall
O'er hill and dale, and sylvan hall,
Far in the distance, dim and blue,
The friendly Fort (Lewisburg) arose to view,
Whose portal soon the maiden gains
With slackened speed and loosened reins
And voice whose trembling accents tell,
Of journey ridden long and well.

"The succor thus so nobly sought,
To Charleston Fort was timely brought;
Whilst Justice, on the scroll of fame,
In letters bold, engraved her name."

Gauley Bridge, Va., Nov. 7, 1861.

Anne Bailey's Ride—A Legend of the Kanawha

By CHARLES ROBB, U. S. A.

The army lay at Gauley Bridge,
At Mountain Cove and Sewell Ridge;
Our tents were pitched on hill and dell
From Charleston Heights to Cross Lane Fell;
Our camp-fires blazed on every route,
From Red House point to Camp Lookout;
On every rock our sentinels stood,
Our scouts held posts in every wood
And every path was stained with blood
From Scary Creek to Gauley Flood.

'Twas on a bleak autumnal day,
When not a single sunbeam's ray
Could struggle through the dripping skies
To cheer our melancholy eyes,
Whilst heavy clouds like funeral palls,
Hung o'er Kanawha's foaming falls,
And shrouded all the mountains green
With dark foreboding's misty screen.

All through the weary livelong day
Our troops had marched the mountain way;
And in the gloomy eventide
Had perched their tents by the river side;
And as the darkness settled o'er
The hill and vale and river shore,
We gathered 'round the camp-fire bright
That threw its glare on the misty night.

And each some tale or legend told
To while away the rain and cold,
One spoke of suffering and of wrong,
Another sang a mountain song!
One spoke of home and happy years,
Till down his swarthy cheeks the tears
Slow dripping, glistened in the light
That glared upon the misty night.

One a tale of horror told
That made your very blood run cold;
While others sat in silence deep,
Too sad for mirth, yet scorned to weep.
Then spoke a hardy mountaineer,
(His beard was long, his eye was clear,
And clear his voice of metal tone,
Just such as all would wish to own).

I've heard a legend old, he said,
Of one who used these paths to tread,
Long years ago when fearful strife
Sad havoc made of human life;
A deed of daring brave'y done,
A feat of honor nobly won;
And what in story's most uncommon
An army saved by gentle woman.

The settlers, pale faced, all had fled
Or murdered were in lonely bed!
Whilst hut and cabin, blazing high,
With crimson decked the mid-night sky.
And day by day the siege went on,
Till three weary weeks were gone.
The word was whispered soft and slow,
The "magazine was getting low."
They loaded their rifles one by one,
And then—"the powder was all gone!"

They stood like men in calm dispair,
No friendly aid could reach them there;
One forlorn hope yet still remained
And distant aid might yet be gained,
If trusty messenger should go,
Through forest wild and savage foe,
And safely there should bear report
And succor bring from distant fort?

And who should go—the venture dare?
The woodsman quailed in mute despair,
But one who stood amid the rest,
The bravest, fairest, and the best
Of all that graced the cabin hall,
First broke the spell of terror's thrall.
The sacrifice her soul would make
Her friends to save from brand and stake.

A noble charger standing nigh,
Of spirit fine and mettle high,
Was saddled well, and girded strong
With cord and loop, and leathern thong.
Her pathway up the valley led,
Like frightened deer the charger fled,
Still on and on through pathless wood,
And swim the Gauley's swollen flood.

Still onward held their weary flight
Beyond the Hawk's-nest dizzy height:
And bravely rode the woman there,
Where few would venture, few would dare.
Far in the distance, dim and blue,
The friendly fort arose in view.
The succor then so nobly sought,
To Charleston Fort was timely brought.
Whilst Justice on the scroll of fame,
In letters bold, inscribed her name.

(A Fragment from the History of Anne Bailey by Hon. Virgil A. Lewis.)

Gauley Bridge, Virginia, Nov. 7, 1861.

A scene f
given on the s

They were
November
John McCue
After th
and his bri joined th Clendenin, l site of Char
there were
Point Pleas
and few,
Charleston a
the year discovered
Indian attac settlements.
threat was m
the letters commander
Col. George C
Boone, lie
Kanawha Co assistance. Fin were discover about Fort C planning a seig
An inspec intelligence th not

Association of University Women. – Glenn A. Witherspoon, Jr.

AUNT SALLY LOWERY, said to be a witch in Wyoming County, had no home of her own, but traveled from house to house expecting to be fed. On one occasion, according to Virgil A. Cook, she visited the house of his grandmother, Mrs. Julia Ann Laxton. She complained that the coffee which she had been served was weak and was told, "anyone who goes from house to house; like you do, should be satisfied with what they get." This so riled Aunt Sally that she walked out of the house. As she passed the family cow she waved her cane over its head and tapped her on the horns. The poor animal immediately dropped lifeless to the ground.

BAILEY, Anne (1742-1825) was born in Liverpool, England, about 1742. There is no certainty about the identity of her mother. Her father was an English soldier by the name of Hennis, who fought at the battle of Blenheim under the banner of Queen Anne for whom he expressed his devotion in the name of his heroic daughter.

Apparently Anne was the only member of the family who found her way to the New World. How Anne made the transfer from the old world to the new is not clearly known. A new world is always appealing to the adventurous. The girl of dreams and action determined that she would reach a family of friends or distant relatives who lived in the Staunton, Virginia, neighborhood. By some means she secured passage on a Virginia bound vessel and after the usual tedious ocean journey of those days she reached the Virginia shores. The final lap of her journey is not described in the fragmentary records that exist, but she probably walked a good part of the route from the coast to the inland settlement at Staunton. In her new conditions she found a challenge, and to that challenge she reacted in such a way as to develop the powers of her latent personality. There were neither libraries nor drawing rooms in the new country, but there was an unspoiled creating and a nascent civilization, both of which offered obstacles and opportunities. She ignored the obstacles and accepted the opportunities as far as she could understand them. She developed a character that was crude but capable. She was ready to undertake the best life circumstances permitted.

ANNE BAILEY

A sketch from an artist's portrait, one of the most familiar of the likenesses of the Border heroine.

Not long after taking up her residence with the Bells in the new Virginia she came in contact with a rugged young frontiersman by the name of Richard Trotter, who had just returned from

CAST OF THE WHITE SQUAW

The cast of Richard Scott Russell and Jack Zierold's West Virginia folk musical, The White Squaw, based on the life of Anne Bailey, included Paul Clark as John Bailey, Anne's second husband; Karen Bowen as Anne herself; Jim Stone as Richard Trotter, Anne's first husband; and Susan Morton (in back) as Ida Man, Anne's friend and companion.

Braddock's ill-fated expedition against the French. A courtship followed and a little later there was a "backwoods" wedding. This union of two aggressive lives continued from 1765 till terminated by death on October 10, 1774, when the husband fell a victim of an Indian bullet in the bloody battle of Point Pleasant. The fall of her husband fired the fighting blood in her veins, and she resolved to fill the place made vacant by his death as far as possible. Lodging her seven year old son with a neighbor, Mrs. Moses Mann, she took up the duties of a scout and extended her service among the rangers all the way from the Potomac on the north to Roanoke on the south. Then, in 1778, Fort Savanah, situated where Lewisburg now stands, was built as a western outpost. She became a messenger between the upper Shenandoah settlements and Fort Savanah. Finally she extended her expeditions to Fort Randolph, at Point Pleasant, the scene of her husband's last fight.

In her scout duty she became acquainted with John Bailey, a ranger, who wooed and won her.

A SCENE FROM THE WHITE SQUAW
A scene from the folk musical which told the story of Anne Bailey's life as given on the stage of the Abbott Theatre in Huntington.

They were married at Lewisburg, November 3, 1785, by the Rev. John McCue.

After their marriage, Bailey and his bride traveled west and joined the colony at Fort Clendenin, located on the present site of Charleston. At that time there were no settlers between Point Pleasant and Charleston, and few, if any, between Charleston and Lewisburg. During the year 1791, the scouts discovered signs of a general Indian attack on the Kanawha settlements. How serious the threat was may be reckoned from the letters of Thomas Lewis, commander of Fort Randolph, Col. George Clendenin, and Daniel Boone, lieutenant-colonel of Kanawha County, begging for assistance. Finally lurking Indians were discovered among the hills about Fort Clendenin, evidently planning a seige.

An inspection revealed the intelligence that the fort could not muster enough powder to withstand a siege. Colonel Clendenin proclaimed the gravity of the situation and asked for volunteers to make the trip to Fort Savanah, their source of supplies, a hundred miles distant. The men of the garrison hesitated but Anne Bailey stepped forward and offered her services. She was provided with the best riding horse in the stockade and promptly set out on her perilous journey. Riding all day and through the night she reached her destination in record time. Her stay was short. She was given an extra horse with a supply of powder and started on her return trip which was equally successful. Her signal achievement thrilled the men of the garrison who went forth the next day after her return, and drove the Indians out of the community. In appreciation of her gallant services at a critical time, she was given the horse on which she made the trip. She was proud of her gift and fondly kept and cared for the animal for many years. In loving memory of her old world birthplace, she named her horse "Liverpool."

Anne Bailey maintained her residence in the Kanawha Valley some twenty-seven years, then at the earnest solicitation of her son who had moved to Ohio, she took up her residence in that state where she died in the year 1825. She was buried in what is known as the Trotter graveyard near Gallipolis. In later years the remains were re-buried in Point Pleasant. See "White Squaw," in West Virginia Songbag.

BALDWIN, Ann E., widow of Rev. Charles R. Baldwin, was one of the leaders in organizing the West Virginia Conference of the Methodist Church. At the General Conference of the Church in 1848 in Pittsburgh, the question of creating a West Virginia conference was hotly debated. Mrs. Baldwin, who was in favor of the move, persuaded Henry Logan, of Parkersburg, a man of weight and influence in the church, to accompany her to the Conference. Mrs. Baldwin was a fluent speaker, and she did most of the arguing in favor of the new Conference, with Mr. Logan's prestige behind her to add force to her words. They were successful and on July 4, 1848, the West Virginia Conference was inaugurated, although Wheeling District was left in the Pittsburgh Conference for a time. Mrs. Baldwin is sometimes referred to as "Mother Baldwin," because she was the "mother" of the West Virginia Conference.

BARTLETT, Anna Latham, a world-famous, prize-winning sculptress, was born in Grafton, the daughter of General George Robert Latham, one of the founders of West Virginia and a U.S. Congressman.

She began sculpting at the age of 57, after her only son, Frank, was killed in a World War I battle in France. She entered the Maryland Institute of Art in Baltimore and began her artistic career. For materials Mrs. Bartlett used clay which she dug from a ditch near her home. Many of her subjects were famous West Virginians, or caricatures of "typical" West Virginia people: The Mountain Madonna, The Moonshiner, The Woman at the Churn, etc.

In his book Handicraft of the Southern Mountains, Allen Eaton wrote of her: "A unique and individual product . . . often the appearance of majolica . . . completely original . . . reminds one sometimes of the craftsmanship of the Swiss and Germans a century ago."

She won a gold medal from the Maryland Institute of Art, First Prize at the Arts and Crafts Exhibition in Pittsburgh, where her ranking made West Virginia second among the 48 states; gave exhibitions at White Sulphur Springs and at the New York World's Fair in 1939.

Mrs. Bartlett died in 1948 in Buckhannon, where she had lived much of her life. Her figurines have become collectors' items and are sought everywhere, (picture on next page.)

BATEMAN, Mildred M., Director of the West Virginia Department of Mental Health, was born in Georgia.

She received her undergraduate degree from Johnson C. Smith University in Charlotte, North Carolina, and her M.D. in 1946 from the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania. In 1955 she completed a three-year psychiatric residency and fellowship at the Menninger School of Psychiatry at Topeka, Kansas. She received a Distinguished Alumna Award from the Menninger School

ANNE BAILEY

A sketch from an artist's portrait, one of the most familiar of the likenesses of the Border heroine.

the fragmentary records that

ANNE BAILEY'S RIDE.

Of all the celebrated characters of Pioneer Times, there were none more remarkable than Anne Bailey, the Pioneer Heroine of the Great Kanawha Valley. Her maiden name was Hennis and she was born in Liverpool, England, in the year 1742. When she was in her nineteenth year, her parents both having died. she crossed the ocean to find relatives of the name of Bell, then (1761) residing near Staunton, Virginia. Here soon after (1765) she wedded Richard Trotter, a distiuguished frontiersman and a survivor of Braddock's Defeat.

A cabin was reared near where Swope's Depot on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway now stands, and there in 1767 a son, William, was born. The year 1774, brought with it Dunmore's War and Richard Trotter enlisted in General Lewis' army and at the battle of Point Pleasant, October 10, 1774, yielded up his life in an attempt to plant civilization on the banks of the Ohio.

From the moment the widow heard of her husband's death, a strange, wild fancy seemed to possess her, and she resolved to avenge his death. Leaving her little son to the care of a neighbor, Mrs. Moses Mann, she at once entered upon a career which has no parallel in Virginia annals. Clad in the costume of the border, she hastened away to the recruiting stations, where she urged enlistments with all the earnestness which her zeal and heroism inspired. Then she became a nurse, a messenger, a scout, and for eleven years she fearlessly dashed along the whole western border, going wherever her services required, and thus the wilderness road from Staunton to Point Pleasant was all familiar to her.

November 3, 1785, at Lewisburg, in Greenbrier county; she was married a second time, her husband being John Bailey, a distinguished frontiersman from the Roanoke river. Fort Lee, was erected by the Clendenins on the present site of the city of Charleston in 1788–9, and to it John Bailey and his heroic bride at once removed.

In 1791 the fort was besieged by a large body of Indians, and to the terror of the garrison, it was found that the supply of powder in the magazine was almost exhausted. A hundred miles of wilderness lay between Fort Lee and Lewisburg, the only place from which a supply of powder could come. Colonel George Clendenin, the commandant at Fort Lee, asked for volunteers to go to Lewisburg, but not a soldier in that garrison would brave the task. Then was heard in a female voice the words "I WILL GO," and every inmate of the fort recognized the voice of Anne Bailey.

The fleetest horse in the stockade was brought out and the daring rider mounted and disappeared in the forest. Onward she sped. Darkness and day were one to her. It was a ride for life and there could be no stop. Lewisburg was reached; [illegible] with two horses laden with powder. The garrison in Fort Lee welcomed her return, and she entered it, as she had left it, under a shower of balls. The men thus supplied, sallied forth and forced the savages to raise the siege.

That ride has been commemorated in song as well as story. Charles Robb, of the United States Army, was at Gauley Bridge, in 1861, and having learned the story from the mountaineers, wrote the following, which at the time, appeared in the Clermont, (Ohio) Courier:

ANNE BAILEY'S RIDE—A LEGEND OF THE KANAWHA.

BY CHARLES ROBB, U. S. A.

The Army lay at Gauley Bridge,
At Mountain Cove and Sewell Ridge;
Our tents were pitched on hill and dell
From Charleston Height to Cross Lane fell;
Our camp-fires blazed on every route
From Red House point to Camp Lookout;
On every rock our sentries stood,
Our scouts held post in every wood,
And every path was stained with blood,
From Scary creek to Gauley flood.

'Twas on a bleak autumnal day,
When not a single sunbeam's ray
Could struggle through the dripping skies
To cheer our melancholy eyes—
Whilst heavy clouds, like funeral palls,
Hung o'er Kanawha's foaming falls,
And shrouded all the mountain green
With dark, foreboding, misty screen.

All through the weary livelong day
Our troops had marched the mountain way;
And in the gloomy eventide
Had pitched their tents by the river's side;
And as the darkness settled o'er
The hill and vale and river shore,
We gathered around the camp-fire bright,
That threw its glare on the misty night;
And each some tale or legend told
To while away the rain and cold.
Thus, one a tale of horror told
That made the very blood run cold;
One spoke of suffering and of wrong;
Another sang a mountain

One spoke of home and happy years,
Till down his swarthy cheek the tears
Slow dripping, glistened in the light
That glared upon misty night;
While others sat in silence deep,
Too sad for mirth, yet scorned to weep.

Then spake a hardy mountaineer—
(His beard was long, his eye was clear;
And clear his voice, of metal tone,
Just such as all would wish to own)—

"I've heard a legend old," he said,
"Of one who used these paths to tread
Long years ago, when fearful strife
Sad havoc made of human life;
A deed of daring bravely done,
A feat of honor nobly won;
And what in story's most uncommon,
An army saved by gentle woman.

"'Twas in that dark and bloody time*
When savage craft and tory crime
From Northern lake to Southern flood
Had drenched the western world with blood.
Aud in this wild, romantic glen
Encamped a host of savage men,
Whose mad'ning war-whoop, loud and high,
Was answered by the panther's cry.
"The pale-faced settlers all had fled,
Or murdered were in lonely bed;
Whilst hut and cabin blazing high,
With crimson decked the midnight sky.

"I said the settlers all had fled—
Their pathway down the valley led
To where the Elk's bright crystal waves
On dark Kanawha's bosom laves,
There safety sought and re-pite brief,
And in Fort Charleston found relief;
Awhile they bravely met their woes,
And kept at bay their savage foes.

"Thus days and weeks the warfare waged,

The word was whispered soft and slow,
The magazine was getting low.
They loaded their rifles one by one,
And then—the powder was all gone!
They stood like men in calm despair,
No friendly aid could reach them there,
Their doom was sealed, the scalping knife
And burning stake must end the strife.
One forlorn hope alone remained,
That distant aid might yet be gained
If trusty messenger should go
Through forest wild, and savage foe,
And safely there should bear report,
And succor bring from distant fort.
But who should go—the venture dare?
The woodsmen quailed in mute despair,
In vain the call to volunteer;
The bravest blanched with silent fear.
Each gloomy brow with labored breath,
Proclaimed the venture worse than death.
Not long the fatal fact was kept;
But through the Fort the secret crept
Until it reached the ladies' hall,
There like a thunderbolt to fall.
Each in terror stood amazed,
And silent on the other gazed;
No word escaped—there fell no tear—
But all was hushed in mortal fear;
All hope of life at once had fled,
And filled each soul with nameless dread.
*But one who stood amid the rest,

And half in hope and half in fear,
She whispered in her husband's ear,
The sacrifice her soul would make
Her friends to save from brand and stake.
A noble charger standing nigh,
Of spirit fine, and metal high,
Was saddled well, and girted strong,
With cord, and loop, and leathern thong,
For her was led in haste from stall,
Upon whose life depended all.
Her friends she gave a parting brief,
No time was there for idle grief;
Her husband's hand a moment wrung,
Then lightly to the saddle sprung;
And followed by the prayers and tears,
The kindling hopes, and boding fears
Of those who seemed the sport of fate,
She dashed beyond the op'ning gate;
Like birdling free, on pinion light,
Commenced her long and weary flight.

"The foemen saw the op'ning gate,
And thought with victory elate
To rush within the portal rude,
And in his dark and savage mood
To end the sanguinary strife
With tomahawk and scalping knife.
But lo! a lady! fair and bright,
And seated an a charger light,
Bold—and free—as one immortal—
Bounded o'er the op'ning portal.
Each savage paused in mute surprise,
And gazed with wonder-staring eyes,
'A squaw! a squaw!' the chieftain cries,
('A squaw! a squaw!' the host replies:)
Then order gave to 'cross the lawn
With lightning speed and catch the fawn.'

Along the rough, uneven way,
The pathway of the lady lay;
Whilst long and loud the savage yell
Re-echoed through the mountain fell.
She heeded not the dangers rife,
But rode as one who rides for life;
Still onward in her course she bore
Along the dark Kanawha's shore,
Through tangled wood and rocky way,
Nor paused to rest at close of day.
Like skimming cloud before the wind
Soon left the rabble far behind.
From bended tree above the road
The flying charger wildly trode,
Amid the evening's gath'ring gloom,
The panther's shriek, the voice of doom
In terror fell upon the ear,
And quickened every pulse with fear.
But e'en the subtle panther's bound,
To reach his aim to slow was found,
And headlong falling on the rock,
Lay crushed and mangled in the shock.
The prowling wolf then scents his prey,
And rushing on with angry bay,
With savage growl and quickening bound
He clears the rough and rugged ground;
And closing fast the lessening space
That all to soon must end the race,
With sharpened teeth that glittered white
As stars amid the gloomy night—
With foaming jaws had almost grasped
The lovely hand that firmly clasped,
And well had used the whip and rein,
But further effort now were vain;
Another bound—a moment more—
And then the struggle all were o'er.
'Twas in a steep and rocky gorge

That onward came, with fearful clang,
Whose echoes round the mountain rang;
The frightened wolf in wild surprise
A moment paused—with glaring eyes
In terror gazed upon the flame,
Then backward fled the way he came.
Each wondering savage saw with fear
The charger come like frightened deer;
With weary gait, and heavy tramp,
The foaming steed dashed through the camp
And onward up the valley bear
His queenly rider, brave and fair.
Still on, and on, through pathless wood—
They swim the Gauley's swollen flood,
And climb Mount Tompkins' lofty brow,
More wild and rugged far than now,
Still onward held their weary flight
Beyond the Hawk's Nest's giddy Height;
And often chased through lonely glen
By savage beast or savage me—
Thus like some weary, hunted dove
The woman sped through 'mountain Cove,'
The torrent crossed without a bridge,
And the heights of Sewell Ridge,
And still the wild, beleaguered road
With heavy tramp the charger trode,
Nor paused amid his weary flight
Throughout the long and dreary night.
And bravely rode the woman there,
Where few would venture, few would dare
Amid the cheering light of day
To tread the wild beleaguered way;

"The succor thus so nobly sought,
To Charleston Fort was timely brought;
Whilst Justice, on the scroll of fame,
In letters bold, engraved her name."

Gauley Bridge, Va., Nov. 7, 1861.

THE ALAMO; OR THE THERMOPYLÆ OF AMERICA.

Alamo, the Spanish for "poplar" tree, was the name of a celebrated fort at San Antonio, Texas. A small body of Texans, mostly from the United States, here bravely, and we might say hopelessly, resisted a Mexican force of many times their number, from February 11th to March 5th, 1836. Their only choice was to die in arms or as prisoners. One finally surrendered and was murdered. A Mrs. Dickinson, her child and a negro woman were all that survived.

Among the dead were Cols. Wm. B. Travis, David Crockett, and Bowie. Travis was wounded on the wall, and killed the Mexican that killed him. Crockett's body was found surrounded by dead Mexicans. Bowie, who was was sick, was murdered in bed.

In consequence of their heroic defense, Alamo is styled "The Thermopylæ of America." It was the war-cry of Gen. Sam Houston's men at San Jacinto, fought the month after the massacre at Alamo. When Santa Anna was brought a prisoner to Houston's headquarters, the Texas soldiers, burning with revenge for his atrocities at Alamo, clamored for his life. But on his promise to use his influence for the recognition of Texan independence, his parole was taken. However, the cry of "Remember the Alamo," in the charges made by Taylor and Scott's men, long afterwards grated on his ears till he perhaps wished there had never been an Alamo.

"REMEMBER THE ALAMO."

BY LARRY CHITTENDEN.

(From August No. of SOUTHERN LITERATURE.)

Fair Greece and Rome brave heroes knew,
But Texas has her heroes, too,
The men of Alamo!
That brave, courageous, noble band
Of Rangers in the Border Land

assumed airs of superiority. When persons called him Major, it seemed to displease him, and he would remonstrate: "Don't call me Major, I am nothing but Jake Warwick."

He was jovial in his disposition and extremely fond of innocent merriment. He delighted much in the society of young people, and even children. His pleasant words and kindly deeds to young people are vividly and affectionately remembered by all who ever knew him.

After the decease of his wife most of his time he passed at the home of Major Charles Cameron. He died at the breakfast table. When apoplexy came upon him he was merrily twitting Miss Phœbe Woods about her beau, young Mr. Beale. This occurred January, 1826, when he was nearing his eighty-third year. They carried his venerable remains about a mile up the west bank of the Jackson's River, and in a spot reserved for family burial, he was buried. When the writer visited his grave several years since, the place seemed to be in danger of forgetfulness. A locust tree stood near it and marked the place. Since then it has been nicely and substantially enclosed, and the grave marked by a neatly sculptured marble. In that lonely, but beautiful, valley retreat, the strong, busy man has found repose, and there,

"Unheeded o'er his silent dust,
The storms of life may beat."

WM. T. PRICE.

Marlinton, West Va.,
July 28th, 1892.

HISTORY OF THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD IN CALIFORNIA.—No. III.

BY HENRY W. BIGLER.

At last Governor Ford sent General John J. Harding with 400 militia to Nauvoo, but instead of making any arrests and assisting the sheriff, he dismissed him and informed our people that nothing could be done to protect them, for the mob were determined to drive them from the State, and therefore they must go.

Our people appealed to almost every governor in the United States, and to the President, to use their influence to stop the mob and establish us in our civil and religious rights, but I have yet to learn that there was a single invitation given for "Mormons" to remain within the States.

The work on the temple continued and was so far completed that on Monday, 6th October, a general conference was held in it and continued for three days, when it was agreed that the Church should leave and go to a country where they could enjoy the fruits of their labors, and to leave as soon as possible. As soon as conference closed, the whole Church began to make preparations to leave the country, not knowing where they were going; neither did we care much, only that it might be where we could worship Almighty God according to the dictates of our conscience without being mobbed for it, for I knew of no law the church had

THE POCAHONTAS TIMES

Entered at the Postoffice at Marlin on, W. Va., as second class matter

CALVIN W. PRICE, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1927

What was Glade Hill has troubled the thinkers of this county for many years. It is a ridge on the bottom of Galford's Creek near Dunmore in sight of the er than univers come i and pre or leave

And underst a man t about about a their wa
the form
they live

Farmer

old reliable ertilize this etch, Tim-r, Salt and attractive

Service Co.

PAINT
Zinc Paint
TRATION

ANTHONY

THE WHITE MAN'S FRIEND

By Prof. Milton W. Humphreys
(From The Fayette Tribune)

The object of this paper is to record what is known about an Indian, called "Anthony" by the white people, who was friendly to the colonists during and after the Revolutionary War. His Indian name is not now known nor has tradition preserved the name of his tribe. It may be that during the war he belonged to an organization formed by the colonists to act as interpreter and to supply needful information concerning the Indians. It was in this way that he rendered very useful service, and such organizations existed.

To make this narrative intelligible is necessary to give the geography and briefly describe the topography of the region concerned; and as the facts have been handed down only by tradition, it is necessary also to give some account of those through whom the tradition was transmitted, in order that the reader may intelligently judge of the trustworthiness of the narrative.

The region concerned is situated in Anthonys Creek District of Greenbrier County in West Virginia. This district forms the northeastern portion of the county, and the locality of special interest is about twenty miles from Lewisburg by the old road either by way of the White Sulphur or by Frankford.

Anthonys creek is a stream that in some regions would be called a river, rises in the northeast corner of the county and flows through a valley in a southwesterly direction between the Allegheny Mountains on the southeast and a range of high hills or mountains on the northwest. [illegible]

tile Indians, about ten or mor on the hunt for Anthony, and ed him so closely that he took in a large mouthed cave, and watch all night. Anthony was with a double barrelled sh which was given him by an I man he had befriended. H and tomahawk were all the a had at that time. Early t morning he made a dash for and shot the sentry on wat fired at the others as he can
This so frightened them th did not pursue him at once.
point there are two mountai a large creek flowing between which was subsequently call thonys Creek. As he left th which was in one of the mo
mentioned, he made a dash
water, which was very deep point. His pursuers followed shot or two, but missed hi stayed with his body under th until they quit shooting, and gun in the middle of the creek emerging from the water he the steep and rocky mountain was covered with a thick gr weeds and vines. After goin a distance he cut his foot on rock, causing the blood to flow
He then turned back till he place of concealment. In the time the alarm had been giv
the settlers collected and follo Indians a short distance. O return they found Anthony.
tired and hungry, and his fo bleeding profusely. After his gun, he went to Samuel phreys' home and remained until his foot got well. He req great grandfather to name th and the creek "Anthony," a promise of a present. So they them after him, and Anthon them a present.

ur, Salt and attractive
u Service Co.

nists to act as interpreter and to supply needful information concerning the Indians. It was in this way that he rendered very useful service, and such organizations existed.

To make this narrative intelligible is necessary to give the geography and briefly describe the topography of the region concerned; and as the facts have been handed down only by tradition, it is necessary also to give some account of those through whom the tradition was transmitted, in order that the reader may intelligently judge of the trustworthiness of the narrative.

The region concerned is situated in Anthonys Creek District of Greenbrier County in West Virginia. This district forms the northeastern portion of the county, and the locality of special interest is about twenty miles from Lewisburg by the old road either by way of the White Sulphur or by Frankford.

Anthonys creek is a stream that in some regions would be called a river, rises in the northeast corner of the county and flows through a valley in a southwesterly direction between the Allegheny Mountains on the southeast and a range of high hills or mountains on the northwest. Seven or eight miles before it reaches the Greenbrier River the valley terminates and the stream turning to the right, passes through a gap known locally as "the Narrows," and turning to the left and flows into the river through mountains and hills. At its exit from the gap it receives Little Creek from the north. The mountain between Little Creek and the main stream, often locally known as the "Big Hill" though its name is "Gregg's Ridge," consists of a blue limestone covered with a rich soil and to a great extent still is, densely wooded. There are several caverns in it, one of which is in the end of the gap and is known as "Anthony's Cave." Some six or seven miles up stream from this cave the creek receives two tributaries at the same point near Neola, one called Meadow Creek, from the east, and one from the north called North Fork.

which was subsequ thonys Creek. As he left which was in one of the mentioned, he made a dash
water, which was very deep point. His pursuers followe shot or two, but missed stayed with his body under until they quit shooting, an gun in the middle of the cre emerging from the water h
the steep and rocky mounta was covered with a thick weeds and vines. After go a distance he cut his foot o rock, causing the blood to fl
He then turned back till h place of concealment. In time the alarm had been the settlers collected and fo
Indians a short distance.
return they found Anthony tired and hungry, and hi bleeding profusely. Afte his gun, he went to Samu phreys' home and remain until his foot got well. He great grandfather to name and the creek "Anthony," promise of a present. So th them after him, and Anth them a present of two dre smoked deer-skins."

As the stream today is opposite the cave, it is state that in the writer's the deep "hole" that now low the cave began far abov
the water of a large sprin supplies the White Sulphur
nishes what is known as water") flows into the creek

Cavet W. Humphreys
1922 as follows:

"This letter will be made
ly of my recollections co
Anthony, 'the white man's

1. "Anthony's Cave' known by that name by credit because he escaped the hands of his people thro use of that cave, the stor which I shall relate later letter.

2. "Anthony was last seen on a log in a field on the

E PAINT
ite Zinc Paint
LUSTRATION

pply adding Linseed
Semi-Paste Paint.
Saves you Money.
ithout repainting
ing more surface
orth
e Latest gns

hite Zinc Paint
ILLUSTRATION

simply adding Linseed
M Semi-Paste Paint.
one. Saves you Money.

without repainting
nting more surface

vorth

ne Latest igns should be glad

NITE WORKS

Anthonys creek is a stream that in some regions would be called a river, rises in the northeast corner of the county and flows through a valley in a southwesterly direction between the Allegheny Mountains on the southeast and a range of high hills or mountains on the northwest. Seven or eight miles before it reaches the Greenbrier River the valley terminates and the stream turning to the right, passes through a gap known locally as "the Narrows," and turning to the left and flows into the river through mountains and hills. At its exit from the gap it receives Little Creek from the north. The mountain between Little Creek and the main stream, often locally known as the "Big Hill" though its name is "Gregg's Ridge," consists of a blue limestone covered with a rich soil and to a great extent still is, densely wooded. There are several caverns in it, one of which is in the end of the gap and is known as "Anthony's Cave." Some six or seven miles up stream from this cave the creek receives two tributaries at the same point near Neola, one called Meadow Creek, from the east, and one from the north called North Fork.

The tradition of the facts to be narrated came down through descendants of Samuel Humphreys, who was born April 15, 1741, in Londonderry, Ireland, and died July 22, 1821, on Anthonys Creek. He migrated to this country before the Revolutionary War, and married Grazilla Donaldson through whom he became the father of several children of whom only the eldest, William, and the second, Robert, are mentioned in this narrative.

Robert, the second son of Samuel Humphreys married Jane Wylie and reared a large family. His second son Andrew Cayet, was born March 13, 1810, married Mary McQuain Hefner, who bore him eight sons and four daughters, all of whom except one daughter (fatally burned in her ninth year) grew up and reared large families. The eldest was Caroline Jane, born December 13, 1833, and the second was Samuel Alexander, born January 1, 1836, and lived till phreys' home and ... until his foot got well. He re... great grandfather to name ... and the creek "Anthony," ... promise of a present. So the... them after him, and Antho... them a present of two dress... smoked deer-skins."

As the stream today is n... opposite the cave, it is p... state that in the writer's ... the d ep "hole" that now b... low the cave began far above ... the water of a large spring ... supplies the White Sulphur ... nishes what is known as ... water") flows into the creek.

Cavet W. Humphreys w... 1922 as follows:

"This letter will be made u... ly of my recollections co... Anthony, 'the white man's...

1. "Anthony's Cave' ... known by that name by ... credit because he escaped ... the hands of his people thro... use of that cave, the stor... which I shall relate later ... letter.

2. "Anthony was last see... on a log in a field on the n... side of Jake Dysart (or Dysar... (in the angle between Nor... and the main creek below ... fluence). He was recognized ... not visit any white family. ... ed to be absorbed in his own t... from visiting the changed s... his early life and adventures.

3 "On several occasions h... ed the white people of im... massacre and enabled them ... gregate and assemble their st... thus to escape a dreadful do... descendants of those then ... there owe their existence ... friendly intervention of Anth...

4. "His people ultimately ... out that it was through him t... white people were warned, an... ned to kill him. Anthony fled ... vicinity of his white frien... bunch of savages followed him. ... knew his haunts, went there ... use a hunter's expression 'ju... him' somewhere about a mile ... the Dysard home. They pu...

TUXEDO FEEDS
Look for the Tuxedo BULL'S EYE worth

he Latest signs
e should be glad

ANITE WORKS

me ers dozen e after it pays hrough makes intains brings as well
gmash

"Gregg's Ridge," consists of a blue limestone covered with a rich soil and to a great extent still is, densely wooded. There are several caverns in it, one of which is in the end of the gap and is known as "Anthony's Cave." Some six or seven miles up stream from this cave the creek receives two tributaries at the same point near Neola, one called Meadow Creek, from the east, and one from the north called North Fork.

The tradition of the facts to be narrated came down through descendants of Samuel Humphreys, who was born April 15, 1741, in Londonderry, Ireland, and died July 22, 1821, on Anthonys Creek. He migrated to this country before the Revolutionary War, and married Grazilla Donaldson through whom he became the father of several children of whom only the eldest, William, and the second, Robert, are mentioned in this narrative.

Robert, the second son of Samuel Humphreys married Jane Wylie and reared a large family. His second son Andrew Cavet, was born March 13, 1810, married Mary McQuain Hefner, who bore him eight sons and four daughters, all of whom except one daughter (fatally burned in her ninth year) grew up and reared large families. The eldest was Caroline Jane, born December 13, 1833, and the second was Samuel Alexander, born January 1, 1836, and lived till October 3, 1926. The writer of this narative, the seventh member of the family, was born September 15, 1844, and remembers his grandfather, Robert Humphreys.

From an examination of the above data it will be seen that there was ample opportunity for the transmission of interesting facts from Samuel Humphreys, the immigrant, to the members of the family of Dr. Andrew C. Humphreys and other descendanes. Among the latter is Rev Cavet Wylie Humphreys, D. D., now living at Bagdad, Florida, who is a son of Robert Wylie Humphreys, a younger brother of Dr. A. C. Humphreys, and is a little older than the writer. Also the mother of Dr. A. C. Humphreys, who was a mature woman when Samuel Humphreys died in 1821 lived till late in

Anthony, 'the white man's
1. "Anthony's Cave' be known by that name by po credit because he escaped deat
the hands of his people throug use of that cave, the story which I shall relate later in letter.

2. "Anthony was last seen s on a log in a field on the nort side of Jake Dysart (or Dysard) (in the angle between North and the main creek below th fluence). He was recognized b not visit any white family. H ed to be absorbed in his own th from visiting the changed sce
his early life and adventures.

3 "On several occasions he ed the white people of imp massacre and enabled them gregate and assemble their sto descendants of those then there owe their existence friendly intervention of Anth

4. "His people ultimately out that it was through him th white people were warned, an ned to kill him. Anthony fled vicinity of his white frien bunch of savages followed him.
knew his haunts, went there use a hunter's expression 'ju him' somewhere about a mile the Dysard home. They pu him by his tracks practically a day from point to point in the al direction of 'the cave,' into he entered. His pursuers a just before dark, ascertained th was in there, built a fire and be siege. He concealed from their was watching them. They laid their accoutrements, lit their wrapped themselves up in blankets, became careless and
One, however, was to keep Anthony, seeing that they had careless in throwing aside their watched the sentinel until he his chance, quietly moved t mouth of the cave and then c out and down the steep hill t creek, which at that point deep, plunged into it and across. In running down the he cut his foot on a sharp rock

TUXEDO FEEDS
k for the Tuxedo
BULL'S EYE

the father of several children of whom only the eldest, William, and the second, Robert, are mentioned in this narrative.

Robert, the second son of Samuel Humphreys married Jane Wylie and reared a large family. His second son Andrew Cayet, was born March 13, 1810, married Mary McQuain Hefner, who bore him eight sons and four daughters, all of whom except one daughter (fatally burned in her ninth year) grew up and reared large families. The eldest was Caroline Jane, born December 13, 1833, and the second was Samuel Alexander, born January 1, 1836, and lived till October 3, 1926. The writer of this narative, the seventh member of the family, was born September 15, 1844, and remembers his grandfather, Robert Humphreys.

From an examination of the above data it will be seen that there was ample opportunity for the transmission of interesting facts from Samuel Humphreys, the immigrant, to the members of the family of Dr. Andrew C. Humphreys and other descendanes. Among the latter is Rev Cavet Wylie Humphreys, D. D., now living at Bagdad, Florida, who is a son of Robert Wylie Humphreys, a younger brother of Dr. A. C. Humphreys, and is a little older than the writer. Also the mother of Dr. A. C. Humphreys, who was a mature woman when Samuel Humphreys died in 1821 lived till late in 1863 when the writer, aged 19, was sergeant of artillery in the Confederate army. She often related to the latter prominent events in the history of the family. Dr. A. C. Humphreys, a justice of the peace and lieutenant colonel of militia before the war, lived till September 15, 1866.

In lieu of a compilation of the details that have come down, the written accounts furnished by Samuel A. Humphreys four years before his death, and by Rev Cavet W. Humphreys, will be copied here verbatim. These two resided with their fathers on farms adjacent to (really parts of) their grandfather and great grandfather.

Samuel A Humphreys wrote as follows:

massacre and enabled them to con gregate and assemble their stock and descendants of those then there owe their existence to th friendly intervention of Anthony.

4. "His people ultimately foun out that it was through him that th white people were warned, and plan ned to kill him. Anthony fled to th vicinity of his white friends.
bunch of savages followed him. The knew his haunts, went there and,
use a hunter's expression 'jumpe him' somewhere about a mile fro the Dysard home. They pursue him by his tracks practically a who day from point to point in the gene al direction of 'the cave,' into whic he entered. His pursuers arrive just before dark, ascertained that was in there, built a fire and began siege. He concealed from their sigh was watching them. They laid asi their accoutrements, lit their pipe wrapped themselves up in the blankets, became careless and doze
One, however, was to keep watc
Anthony, seeing that they had be careless in throwing aside their gun watched the sentinel until he sa his chance, quietly moved to t mouth of the cave and then dash out and down the steep hill to t creek, which at that points w deep, plunged into it and swa across. In running down the hi he cut his foot on a sharp rock, a it bled freely. This saved his li
The savages, suddenly roused fro sleep, in a dazed conditions, we slow to take in the situation, b when they did, they seized their gu and fired at him as he crossed.
swam low and they all mis-ed. B upon finding so much blood in trail, they believed that he w fatally wounded, and ceased to follo him."

As this last statement is bas solely on conjecture, the discrepanci are no greater than could be expec ed between accounts written members of different families. Mo over, both accounts are necessari based on Anthony's own statemen which were very liable to becom distorted. The tradition that A members of the family of Dr. Andrew C. Humphreys and other descendanes. Among the latter is Rev Cavet Wylie Humphreys, D. D., now living at Bagdad, Florida, who is a son of Robert Wylie Humphreys, a younger brother of Dr. A. C. Humphreys, and is a little older than the writer. Also the mother of Dr. A. C. Humphreys, who was a mature woman when Samuel Humphreys died in 1821 lived till late in 1863 when the writer, aged 19, was sergeant of artillery in the Confederate army. She often related to the latter prominent events in the history of the family. Dr. A. C. Humphreys, a justice of the peace and lieutenant colonel of militia before the war, lived till September 15, 1866.

In lieu of a compilation of the details that have come down, the written accounts furnished by Samuel A. Humphreys four years before his death, and by Rev Cavet W. Humphreys, will be copied here verbatim. These two resided with their fathers on farms adjacent to (really parts of) their grandfather and great grandfather.

Samuel A. Humphreys wrote as follows:

"I only know of one instance of Anthony's friendship, at which time he was considered a spy and an enemy to his tribe. At that time he notified our great grandfather, Samuel Humphreys, that he was in danger of being visited by savages, as they believed he was harboring him (Anthony). Grandfather, his wife, two small children, and a bondman, fled that night to a fort 42 miles away. His wife carried the two babies, one two years old, and one ten months old, the entire distance. The two men carried an axe, two rifles, cooking utensils, blankets, and a good supply of food. After arriving at the fort they met a few more families who had been warned of danger, and had left their homes on account of threats that had been made by hostile Indians. In about two weeks' time the Humphreys family received word from Anthony that they could return home in safety, as there were blankets, became careless

One, however, was to k
Anthony, seeing that th careless in throwing aside watched the sentinel u
his chance, quietly mo mouth of the cave and t
out and down the steep creek, which at that deep, plunged into it across. In running dow
he cut his foot on a sha
it bled freely. This sa
The savages, suddenly r sleep, in a dazed condi
slow to take in the sit when they did, they seize and fired at him as he swam low and they all r upon finding so much trail, they believed t fatally wounded, and ce
him."

As this last stateme solely on conjecture, the are no greater than cou
ed between accounts
members of different fa
over, both accounts ar based on Anthony's own which were very liabl distorted. The traditi thony shot the sentine
garded as indubitably tr

The question may su
why Anthony did not ret
the cave instead of ma
when day approached is very simple; the s mouth of the cave is cavern contracts till it c to a point no great distan entrance. There is an the point or apex, too sm
in these days, for an av
man to crawl through.
time the entire cave can
from its mouth

The tradition is that
Indians found Anthony Mountain," the range ly
the North Fork and the above the confluence, an his flight, he crossed ove Creek and pursued a zig between this stream and Creek, his object evident

mbers a dozen
, you are after t's why it pays traight through ration makes lets; maintains
ns. It brings ighest, as well
ner.
xedo Eggmash
easy to digest;
age. Order a umber Co.

a.

gmash

Feeds:
ds Tuxedo Scratch
hes Tuxedo Developer
Tuxedo Poultry
Fattener
—and others

1.479

rd and Animal Refuge hunting or shooting on my and on Stony Creek. This land erved as a bird and animal e perpetually.
Norman R. Price

Winter Apples
e lot of sprayed, handpicked
r apples for sale.
Fred Gehauf
nton, W. Va.

NOTICE
y's Studio will be closed from ber 31st to Novewber 10th.

SALE:—Two good stock cows,
d 8 years old; be fresh in spring.
fords. Apply to R. W. Brock, sburg, W. Va.

ber Co.

mash

Tuxedo Scratch
Tuxedo Developer
Tuxedo Poultry
Fattener
—and others

1.479

and Animal Refuge

nting or shooting on my on Stony Creek. This land ed as a bird and animal rpetually.

Norman R. Price

Winter Apples

ot of sprayed, handpicked ples for sale.

Fred Gehauf

n, W. Va.

NOTICE

Studio will be closed from 31st to Novewber 10th.

LE:—Two good stock cows, ears old; be fresh in spring. s. Apply to R. W. Brock, . W. Va.

ot ball game that was played between E. D. H. S. and High School was a tie. The ng 7 7.

prominent events in the history of the family. Dr. A. C. Humphreys, a justice of the peace and lieutenant colonel of militia before the war, lived till September 15, 1866.

In lieu of a compilation of the details that have come down, the written accounts furnished by Samuel A. Humphreys four years before his death, and by Rev Cavet W. Humphreys, will be copied here verbatim. These two resided with their fathers on farms adjacent to (really parts of) their grandfather and great grandfather.

Samuel A. Humphreys wrote as follows:

"I only know of one instance of Anthony's friendship, at which time he was considered a spy and an enemy to his tribe. At that time he notified our great grandfather, Samuel Humphreys, that he was in danger of being visited by savages, as they believed he was harboring him (Anthony). Grandfather, his wife, two small children, and a bondman, fled that night to a fort 42 miles away. His wife carried the two babies, one two years old, and one ten months old, the entire distance. The two men carried an axe, two rifles, cooking utensils, blankets, and a good supply of food. After arriving at the fort they met a few more families who had been warned of danger, and had left their homes on account of threats that had been made by hostile Indians. In about two weeks' time the Humphreys family received word from Anthony that they could return home in safety, as there were no more Indians in that neighborhood. This all happened soon after the Revolutionary War had ended and peace had been declared. It was late in the fall.

"Early the next summer the hoswhen they did, they seized t and fired at him as he cro swam low and they all mis upon finding so much blo trail, they believed that fatally wounded, and ceased

him."

As this last statement solely on conjecture, the dis are no greater than could ed between accounts wr members of different famil over, both accounts are based on Anthony's own s which were very liable distorted. The tradition
thony shot the sentinel
garded as indubitably true

The question may sug
why Anthony did not retir
the cave instead of maki
when day approached T is very simple; the se mouth of the cave is lar cavern contracts till it con to a point no great distance entrance. There is an o
the point or apex, too sma in those days, for an ave
man to crawl through,
time the entire cave can
from its mouth

The tradition is that th
Indians found Anthony o Mountain," the range lyin the North Fork and the m above the confluence, and his flight, he crossed over Creek and pursued a zig z
between this stream and Creek, his object evidently let the settlers see what was He may even have planned at which he was to enter th and probably he did not k limited the space in it w may have counted on succou

THONY

MAN'S FRIEND

n W. Humphreys

yette Tribune)

is paper is to re-about an Indian,
by the white peo
ly to the colonists
he Revolutionary name is not now
dition preserved ribe. It may be r he belonged to ned by the colo-
reter and to sup-tion concerning in this way that ful service, and isted.

tive intelligible
the geography
e topography of d; and as the d down only by ry also to give through whom ansmitted, in ay intelligent worthiness of

is situated in rict of Green-Virginia. This hesstern por-
the locality about twenty the old road
hite Sulphur

tile Indians, about ten or more, were on the hunt for Anthony, and pursued him so closely that he took refuge in a large mouthed cave, and kept watch all night. Anthony was armed with a double barrelled shot-gun, which was given him by an Englishman he had befriended. His gun and tomahawk were all the arms he had at that time. Early the next morning he made a dash for liberty, and shot the sentry on watch and fired at the others as he came out. This so frightened them that they did not pursue him at once. At this point there are two mountains with a large creek flowing between them, which was subsequently called Anthonys Creek. As he left the cave, which was in one of the mountains mentioned, he made a dash into the water, which was very deep at that point. His pursuers followed, fired a shot or two, but missed him. He stayed with his body under the water until they quit shooting, and left his gun in the middle of the creek. After emerging from the water he fled up the steep and rocky mountain, which was covered with a thick growth of weeds and vines. After going quite a distance he cut his foot on a sharp rock, causing the blood to flow freely. He then turned back till he found a place of concealment. In the mean time the alarm had been given, and the settlers collected and followed the Indians a short distance. On their return they found Anthony. He was tired and hungry, and his foot was bleeding profusely. After finding his gun, he went to

ing him during the

One fact about ought to be omit never possible to tive of a historical has been decided mentioned.

Anthony was ord is, he did not regul was his custom to with a jug of wh Humphreys' and the whiskey was e becoming intoxica up all his arms and of the house on no have these arms ag spree; he became When he reached intoxication he wou the return of his ar riple threats as to when he got them, returned at once; came entirely sobe were returned, he people for taking ca specially for ref s drunken demand for return.

The older people surprise that they able to find any men in historical works. never seen any pri him except in some by himself (the wri in a college periodi ern Collegian, I, 9, 1869).

In Hardesty's

ns existed.
narrative intelligible
give the geography
be the topography of erned; and as the anded down only by cessary also to give ncse through whom s transmitted, in er may intelligent rustworthiness of

rned is situated in District of Green-
st Virginia. This northeastern por-
and the locality is about twenty
g by the old road
White Sulphur

a stream that in e called a river,
t corner of the
ugh a valley in ction between ntains on the
of high hills or thwest. Seven it reaches the valley termi-turning to the a gap known s," and turn-ows into the
ns and hills.
ap it receives north. The le Creek and locally known
h its name is sts of a blue
a rich soil
till is, densely veral caverns
the end of water, which was very [illegible] point. His pursuers followed, fired a shot or two, but missed him. He stayed with his body under the water until they quit shooting, and left his gun in the middle of the creek. After emerging from the water he fled up the steep and rocky mountain, which was covered with a thick growth of weeds and vines. After going quite a distance he cut his foot on a sharp rock, causing the blood to flow freely. He then turned back till he found a place of concealment. In the mean time the alarm had been given, and the settlers collected and followed the Indians a short distance. On their return they found Anthony. He was tired and hungry, and his foot was bleeding profusely. After finding his gun, he went to Samuel Humphreys' home and remained there until his foot got well. He requested great grandfather to name the cave and the creek "Anthony," with a promise of a present. So they named them after him, and Anthony made them a present of two dressed and smoked deer-skins."

As the stream today is not deep opposite the cave, it is proper to state that in the writer's boyhood the deep "hole" that now begins below the cave began far above it where the water of a large spring (which supplies the White Sulphur and furnishes what is known as "Alvon water") flows into the creek.

Cavet W. Humphreys wrote in 1922 as follows:

"This letter will be made up mostly of my recollections concerning Anthony, 'the white man's friend.'

1. "Anthony's Cave' became [illegible] threats as to w when he got them,

returned at once;
came entirely sobe
were returned, he people for taking ca
specially for ref s drunken demand fo
return.

The older people surprise that they able to find any me
in historical works.
never seen any pr
him except in some
by himself (the w in a college perio
ern Collegian, I, 1869).

In Hardesty's
Geographical Ency
History of the Virg
Histories of Pocah
and Monroe counti
purely fictitious ac of the name of A which account A man pursued by In

"WHO KNOWS WHEN

One question t timed at anyone co
automobile indust
drawn a fitting re
Warner Sayers, sale
Leyman-Buick Com
he received a letter
Detroit, in reply t
nad included in a p cation. The answe is self-explanatory.

"Absolute knowle
But my aunt's washe

ankford.
ays creek is a stream that in ons would be called a river, he northeast corner of the d flows through a valley in esterly direction between heny Mountains on the
and a range of high hills or on the northwest. Seven les before it reaches the River the valley termihe stream turning to the s through a gap known he Narrows," and turn-
eft and flows into the h mountains and hills.
rom the gap it receives from the north. The tween Little Creek and am, often locally known ill" though its name is ge," consists of a blue vered with a rich soil extent still is, densely re are several caverns hich is in the end of known as "Anthony's six or seven miles up is cave the creek re-butaries at the same
a, one called Meadow
e east, and one from North Fork.
n of the facts to be own through descen-el Humphreys, who
5, 1741, in London
and died July 22,
ys Creek. He migra
ry before the Revond married Grizilla
gh whom he became al children of whom William, and the e mentioned in this

nd son of Samuel ed Jane Wylie and mily. His second t, was born March ed Mary McQuain him eight sons and
all of whom except his gun, he went to phreys' home and remained there until his foot got well. He requested great grandfather to name the cave and the creek "Anthony," with a promise of a present. So they named them after him, and Anthony made them a present of two dressed and smoked deer-skins."

As the stream today is not deep opposite the cave, it is proper to state that in the writer's boyhood the deep "hole" that now begins below the cave began far above it where the water of a large spring (which supplies the White Sulphur and furnishes what is known as "Alvon water") flows into the creek.

Cavet W. Humphreys wrote in 1922 as follows:

"This letter will be made up mostly of my recollections concerning Anthony, 'the white man's friend.'

1. "Anthony's Cave' became known by that name by popular credit because he escaped death at the hands of his people through the use of that cave, the story about which I shall relate later in this letter.

2. "Anthony was last seen sitting on a log in a field on the northwest side of Jake Dysart (or Dysard) place, (in the angle between North Fork and the main creek below the confluence). He was recognized but did not visit any white family. He seemed to be absorbed in his own thoughts from visiting the changed scenes of his early life and adventures.

3 "On several occasions he warned the white people of impending massacre and enabled them to con gregate and assemble their stock and thus to escape a dreadful doom. The descendents of those men there owe their existence to the friendly intervention of Anthony.

4 "His people ultimately found out that it was through him that the white people were warned, and planned to kill him. Anthony fled to the

Geographical Encyclopedia
History of the Virginia's Histories of Pocahontas and Monroe counties, 18 purely fictitious account of the name of Anthon which account Anthon man pursued by Indians

"WHO KNOWS WHEN NEW FORD

One question that timed at anyone connec automobile industry drawn a fitting reply,
Warner Sayers, sales m Leyman-Buick Compan
he received a letter fr
Detroit, in reply to a nad included in a prev
cation. The answer p is self-explanatory. It

"Absolute knowledg
But my aunt's washer
son,
Heard a policeman on
Say to a laborer on th
That he had a letter
Written in the finest
From a Chinese coolie
Who said the negroes
Of a colored man in
Who got it straight clown,
That a man in the
the news,
From a gang of S
Jews,
About somebody in
Who heard a man
know,
Of a swell society fe
Whose-mother-in-la
To prove that her s
sister's place.
That she has a son
about,
Who knows when coming out."

—Cincinna

ed with a rich soi tent still is, densely are several caverns
h is in the end of own as "Anthony's x or seven miles up cave the creek re-
aries at the same
one called Meadow
ast, and one from orth Fork. of the facts to be n through descen-
Humphreys, who 1741, in London
d died July 22,
Creek. He migra
before the Revomarried Grazilla whom he became children of whom illiam, and the entioned in this son of Samuel Jane Wylie and

ly. His second was born March
Mary McQuain
m eight sons and of whom excep
y burned in her and reared large st was Caroline
er 13, 1833, and muel Alexander,
36, and lived till
he writer of this
h member of the ptember 15, 1844,
his grandfather.

tion of the above
that there was
for the transmis-acts from Samuel mmigrant, to the mily of Dr. Ans and other de
the latter is Rev

1. "Anthony's Cave
known by that name by popular credit because he escaped death at the hands of his people through the use of that cave, the story about which I shall relate later in this letter.

2. "Anthony was last seen sitting on a log in a field on the northwest side of Jake Dysart (or Dysard) place, (in the angle between North Fork and the main creek below the confluence). He was recognized but did not visit any white family. He seem ed to be absorbed in his own thoughts from visiting the changed scenes of his early life and adventures.

3 "On several occasions he warned the white people of impending massacre and enabled them to con gregate and assemble their stock and thus to escape a descendants of those then living there owe their existence to the friendly intervention of Anthony.

4. "His people ultimately found out that it was through him that the white people were warned, and planned to kill him. Anthony fled to the vicinity of his white friends. A bunch of savages followed him. They knew his haunts, went there and, to use a hunter's expression 'jumped him' somewhere about a mile from the Dysard home. They pursued him by his tracks practically a whole day from point to point in the general direction of 'the cave,' into which he entered. His pursuers arrived just before dark, ascertained that he was in there, built a fire and began a siege. He concealed from their sight was watching them. They laid aside their accoutrements, lit their pipes, wrapped themselves up in their blankets, became careless and dozed.
One, however, was to keep watch.
Anthony, seeing that they had been careless in throwing aside their guns,

Absolute knowledge I
But my aunt's washerwom
son,
Heard a policeman on his
Say to a laborer on the st
That he had a letter just Written in the finest Gre
From a Chinese coolie in
Who said the negroes in
Of a colored man in a T
Who got it straight f
clown,
That a man in the Kl
the news,
From a gang of Sou
Jews,
About somebody in Bo
Who heard a man w
know,
Of a swell society fem
Whose-mother-in-law
To prove that her se
slumber's sleep,
Has stated in a prin
That she has a son
about,
Who knows when t
coming out."
—Cincinna

Kiser and Hammer
800 ewes through M
last week, on the wa
in Crabbottom. H
These sheep were so
Edgar.

...am, and the ...

...n of Samuel
...ne Wylie and
His second
...s born March
...ary McQuain
...eight sons and whom excep
...burned in her
...d reared large was Caroline
13, 1833, and
...el Alexander,
and lived till
...writer of this
...ember of the
...nber 15, 1844,
grandfather,

of the above
...at there was
...he transmis-
from Samuel
...grant, to the
...y of Dr. An-
...nd other de latter is Rev
..., D. D., now
...lda, who is a
Humphreys, a
A. C. Hum-
...der than the
...er of Dr. A.
...as a mature
Humphreys
late in 1863
19, was ser
Confederate
...d to the latter
...he history of
Humphreys, a
...and lieutenant
...ore the war.
1866
...ion of the de-

...grate and assemble their stock and descendants of those then living there owe their existence to the friendly intervention of Anthony.

4. "His people ultimately found out that it was through him that the white people were warned, and planned to kill him. Anthony fled to the vicinity of his white friends. A bunch of savages followed him. They knew his haunts, went there and, to use a hunter's expression 'jumped him' somewhere about a mile from the Dysard home. They pursued him by his tracks practically a whole day from point to point in the general direction of 'the cave,' into which he entered. His pursuers arrived just before dark, ascertained that he was in there, built a fire and began a siege. He concealed from their sight was watching them. They laid aside their accoutrements, lit their pipes, wrapped themselves up in their blankets, became careless and dozed. One, however, was to keep watch. Anthony, seeing that they had been careless in throwing aside their guns, watched the sentinel until he saw his chance, quietly moved to the mouth of the cave and then dashed out and down the steep hill to the creek, which at that points was deep, plunged into it and swam across. In running down the hill, he cut his foot on a sharp rock, and it bled freely. This saved his life. The savages, suddenly roused from sleep, in a dazed conditions, were slow to take in the situation, but when they did, they seized their guns and fired at him as he crossed. He swam low and they all missed. But upon finding so much blood in his trail, they believed that he was

Whose-mother-in-law w...

Has stated in a printe...
That she has a son w...
about,
Who knows when the...
coming out."
—Cincinnati

Kiser and Hammer t...
800 ewes through Mar...
last week, on the way t... in Crabbottom, High...
These sheep were sold...
Edgar.

$5
Sa
B HILLS

grandfather,

of the above
t there was e transmisrom Samuel ant, to the
of Dr. Another de atter is Rev
D. D., now a, who is a mphreys, a
A. C. Hum-er than the
of Dr. A.
a mature Humphreys
ate in 1863
19, was ser-
Confederate
o the latter history of mphreys, a d lieutenant
the war.
66. n of the den, the writ-
y Samuel A.
before his et W. Hum-
re verbatim.
heir fathers ally parts of) great grand-gs wrote as instance of which time

and an enemy
se he notified
Samuel Hum-danger of bes they believ

just before dark, ascertained that he was in there, built a fire and began a siege. He concealed from their sight was watching them. They laid aside their accoutrements, lit their pipes, wrapped themselves up in their blankets, became careless and dozed. One, however, was to keep watch. Anthony, seeing that they had been careless in throwing aside their guns, watched the sentinel until he saw his chance, quietly moved to the mouth of the cave and then dashed out and down the steep hill to the creek, which at that points was deep, plunged into it and swam across. In running down the hill, he cut his foot on a sharp rock, and it bled freely. This saved his life. The savages, suddenly roused from sleep, in a dazed conditions, were slow to take in the situation, but when they did, they seized their guns and fired at him as he crossed. He swam low and they all missed. But upon finding so much blood in his trail, they believed that he was fatally wounded, and ceased to follow him."

As this last statement is based solely on conjecture, the discrepancies are no greater than could be expected between accounts written by members of different families. Moreover, both accounts are necessarily based on Anthony's own statements which were very liable to become distorted. The tradition that Anthony shot the sentinel may be regarded as indubitably true.

The question may suggest itself why Anthony did not retire far into the cave instead of making a dash when day approached. The answer is very simple; the semi-circular

$5
Sa
B HILLS
Pr

it bled freely. This saved his life. The savages, suddenly roused from sleep, in a dazed conditions, were slow to take in the situation, but when they did, they seized their guns and fired at him as he crossed. He swam low and they all missed. But upon finding so much blood in his trail, they believed that he was fatally wounded, and ceased to follow him."

As this last statement is based solely on conjecture, the discrepancies are no greater than could be expected between accounts written by members of different families. Moreover, both accounts are necessarily based on Anthony's own statements which were very liable to become distorted. The tradition that Anthony shot the sentinel may be regarded as indubitably true.

The question may suggest itself why Anthony did not retire far into the cave instead of making a dash when day approached. The answer is very simple; the semi-circular mouth of the cave is large and the cavern contracts till it comes nearly to a point no great distance from the entrance. There is an opening at the point or apex, too small, at least in those days, for an average sized man to crawl through. In the day time the entire cave can be viewed from its mouth

The tradition is that the hostile Indians found Anthony on "Middle Mountain," the range lying between the North Fork and the main creek above the confluence, and that, in his flight, he crossed over to Little based on Anthony's own statements which were very liable to become distorted. The tradition that Anthony shot the sentinel may be regarded as indubitably true.

The question may suggest itself why Anthony did not retire far into the cave instead of making a dash when day approached. The answer is very simple; the semi-circular mouth of the cave is large and the cavern contracts till it comes nearly to a point no great distance from the entrance. There is an opening at the point or apex, too small, at least in those days, for an average sized man to crawl through. In the day time the entire cave can be viewed from its mouth

The tradition is that the hostile Indians found Anthony on "Middle Mountain," the range lying between the North Fork and the main creek above the confluence, and that, in his flight, he crossed over to Little Creek and pursued a zig-zag course between this stream and Anthony's Creek, his object evidently being to let the settlers see what was occuring He may even have planned the time at which he was to enter the cavern, and probably he did not know how limited the space in it was, or he may have counted on succour reaching him during the night.

One fact about Anthony perhaps ought to be omitted, but as it is never possible to know that a narrative of a historical fact is useless, it has been decided to record the fact mentioned.

Anthony was ordinarily sober, that is, he did not regularly drink; but it was his custom to come occasionally with a jug of whiskey to Samuel Humphreys' and have a spree until the whiskey was exhausted. Before becoming intoxicated he would give up all his arms and charge the people of the house on no account to let him have these arms again until after his spree; he became perfectly sober. When he reached a certain stage of intoxication he would fiercely demand the return of his arms, uttering terrible threats as to what he would do when he got them, unless they were returned at once; but when he became entirely sober and his arms were returned, he would thank the people for taking care of his arms and specially for refusing to yield to his drunken demand for their immediate return.

The older people often expressed surprise that they had never been able to find any mention of Anthony in historical works. The writer has never seen any printed mention of him except in some verses, composed by himself (the writer) and printed in a college periodical. (The South-

Thous
daily
Motor shoul

Ability

never possible to know that a narrative of a historical fact is useless, it has been decided to record the fact mentioned.

Anthony was ordinarily sober, that is, he did not regularly drink; but it was his custom to come occasionally with a jug of whiskey to Samuel Humphreys' and have a spree until the whiskey was exhausted. Before becoming intoxicated he would give up all his arms and charge the people of the house on no account to let him have these arms again until after his spree; he became perfectly sober. When he reached a certain stage of intoxication he would fiercely demand the return of his arms, uttering terrible threats as to what he would do when he got them, unless they were returned at once; but when he became entirely sober and his arms were returned, he would thank the people for taking care of his arms and specially for refusing to yield to his drunken demand for their immediate return.

The older people often expressed surprise that they had never been able to find any mention of Anthony in historical works. The writer has never seen any printed mention of him except in some verses, composed by himself (the writer) and printed in a college periodical, (The Southern Collegian, I, 9, p. 6, April 3 1869).

In Hardesty's Historical and Geographical Encyclopedia, (Special History of the Virginia's: Maps and Histories of Pocahontas, Greenbrier and Monroe counties, 1883) there is a purely fictitious account of the origin of the name of Anthony's Creek, in which account Anthony is a white

Thous
daily
Motor shoul

*Abilit surfac these Moto
exper

Humphreys' and have a spree until the whiskey was exhausted. Before becoming intoxicated he would give up all his arms and charge the people of the house on no account to let him have these arms again until after his spree; he became perfectly sober. When he reached a certain stage of intoxication he would fiercely demand the return of his arms, uttering terrible threats as to what he would do when he got them, unless they were returned at once; but when he became entirely sober and his arms were returned, he would thank the people for taking care of his arms and specially for refusing to yield to his drunken demand for their immediate return.

The older people often expressed surprise that they had never been able to find any mention of Anthony in historical works. The writer has never seen any printed mention of him except in some verses, composed by himself (the writer) and printed in a college periodical, (The Southern Collegian, I, 9, p. 6, April 3 1869).

In Hardesty's Historical and Geographical Encyclopedia, (Special History of the Virginias: Maps and Histories of Pocahontas, Greenbrier and Monroe counties, 1883) there is a purely fictitious account of the origin of the name of Anthony's Creek, in which account Anthony is a white man pursued by Indians.

"WHO KNOWS WHEN NEW FORD IS COMING OUT"

One question that continually is timed at anyone connected with the automobile industry has, at last drawn a fitting reply, according to Warner Sayers, sales manager of the

Motor C should

Ability surface
these c
Moto
exper
M

him except in some verses, composed by himself (the writer) and printed in a college periodical, (The Southern Collegian, I, 9, p. 6, April 3 1869).

In Hardesty's Historical and Geographical Encyclopedia, (Special History of the Virginia's: Maps and Histories of Pocahontas, Greenbrier and Monroe counties, 1883) there is a purely fictitious account of the origin of the name of Anthony's Creek, in which account Anthony is a white man pursued by Indians.

"WHO KNOWS WHEN NEW FORD IS COMING OUT"

Times

IA: NOEMBER 3 1927 $1.00 A

ickens Couldn't See Into the Future

Dickens visited the United 1842. Of Pennsylvania he "We have passed, both in ins and elsewhere, a great new settlements and de- houses. Their utterly for- niserable appearance baf-

STOP! LO

Big Redu

Atwater Kent Dealers ha that on account of treme

West Virginia Writers' Project

RESEARCH IDENTIFICATION REPORT

Pocahontas County

Subject ~~County History, Chapter 6~~ Date December 6, 1940

Research Worker Juanita S. Dilley Date Research Taken December 2, 194
" 4, 1940

Typist Juanita S. Dilley Date Typed December 6, 1940

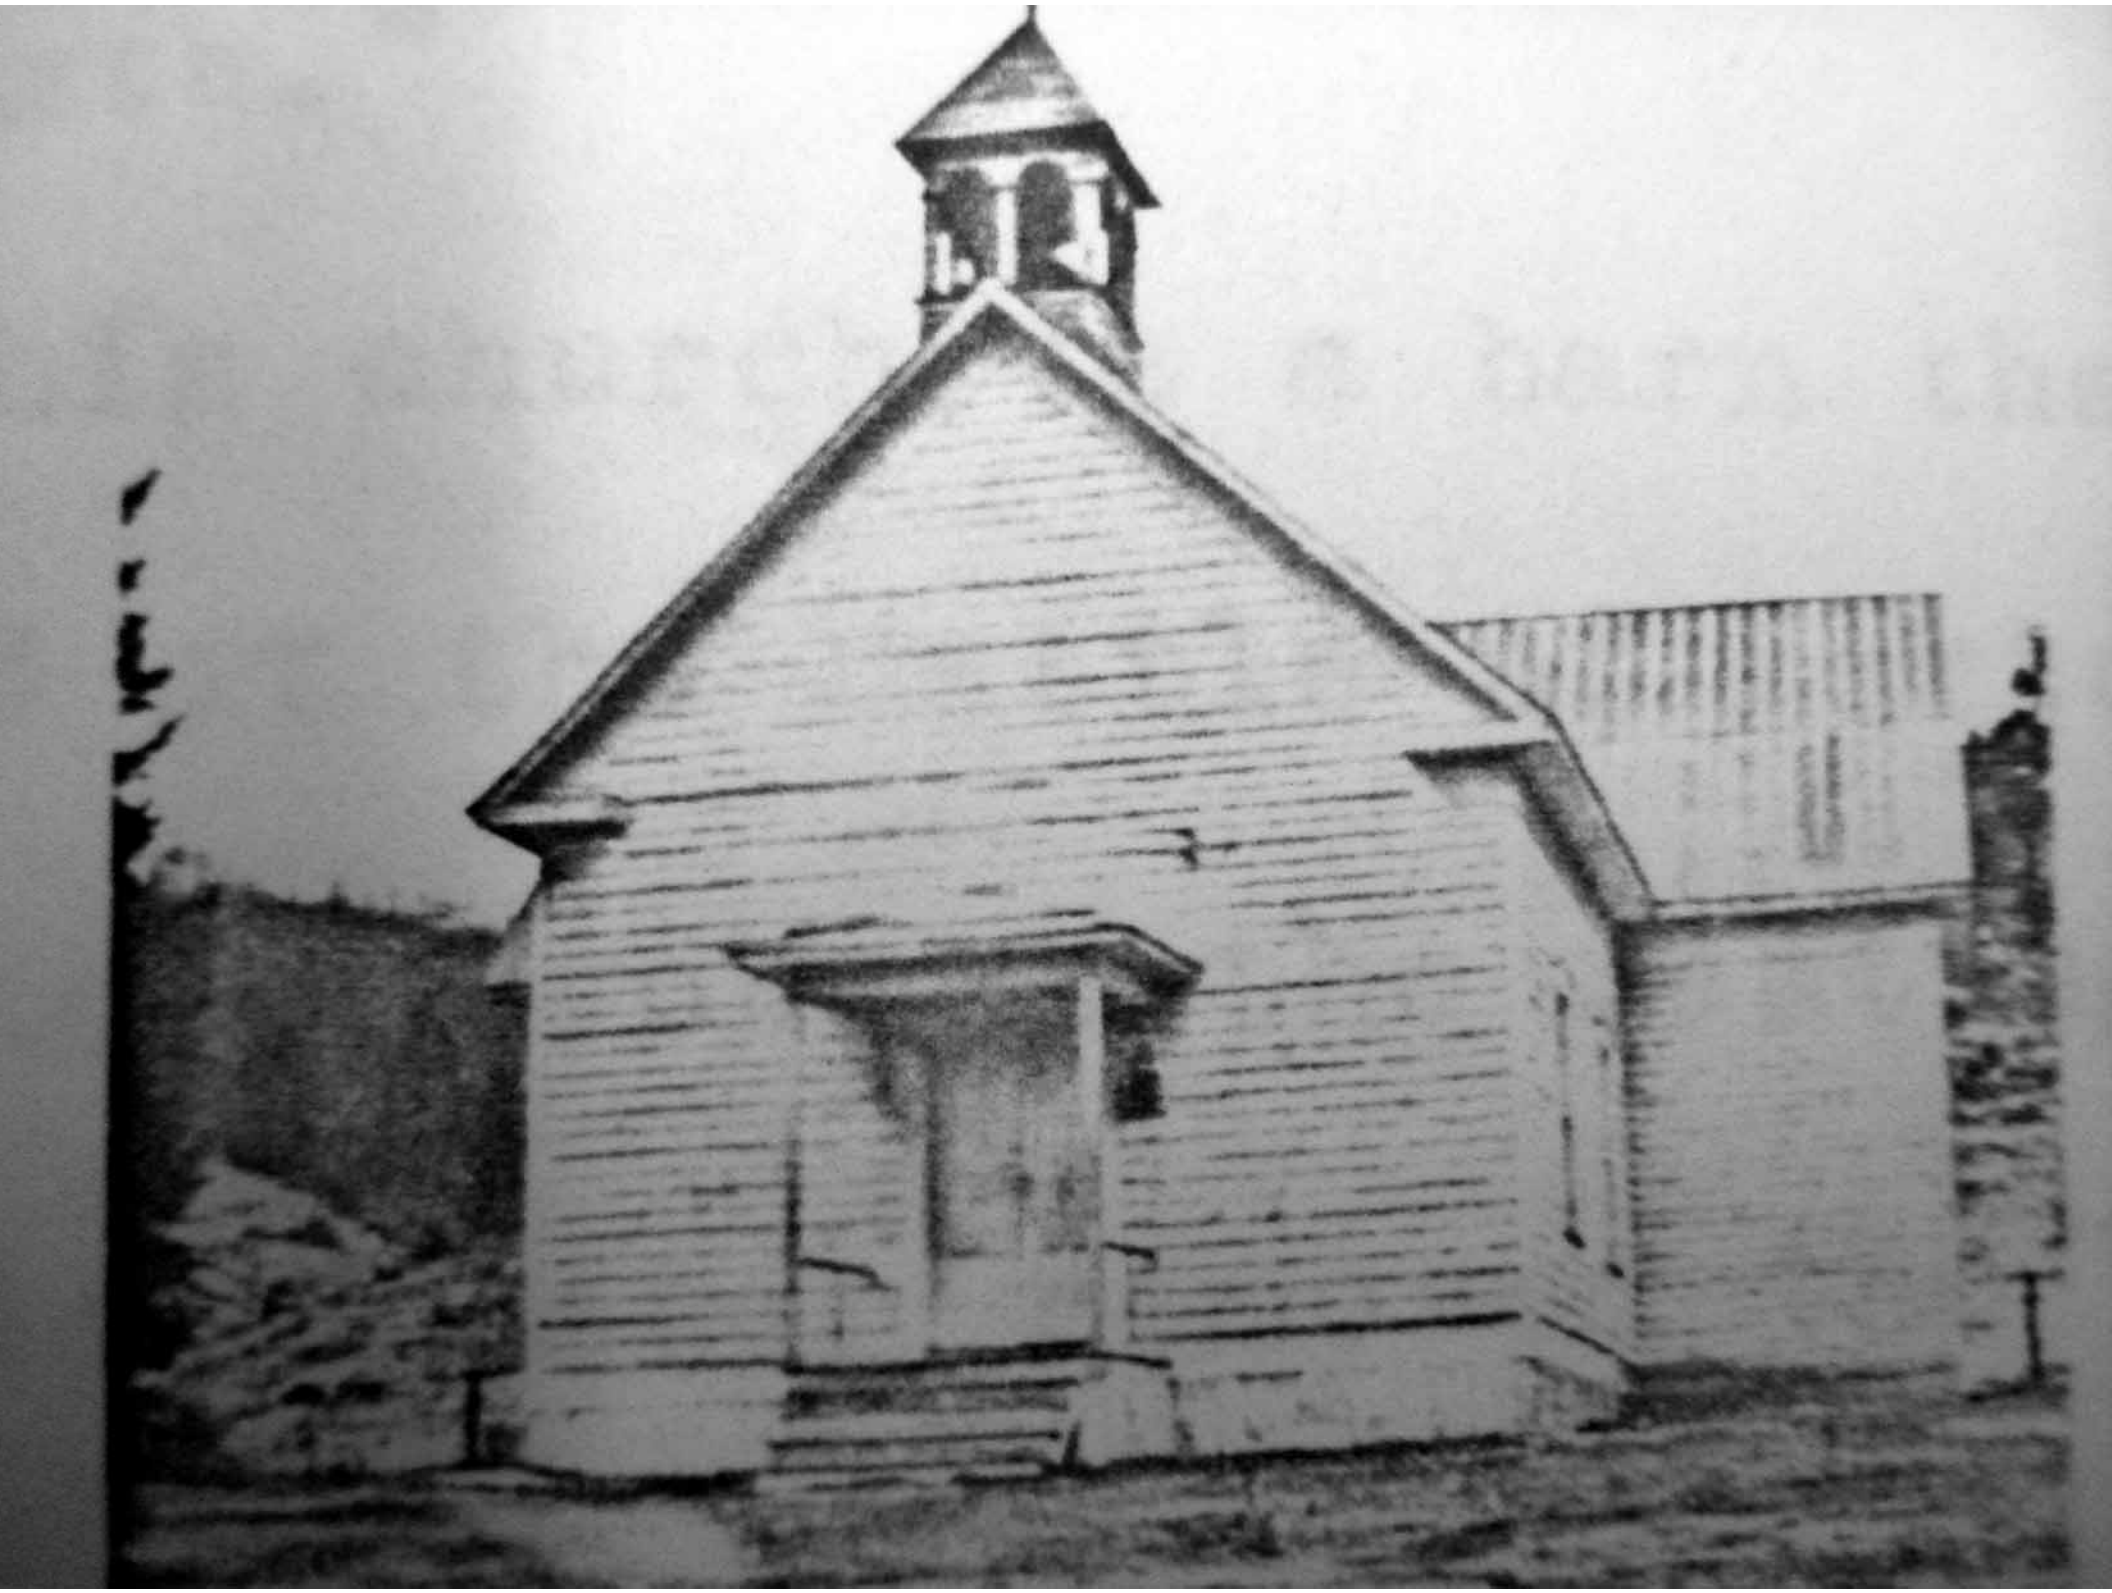
Source Deed Bookm 15 page 476 Date Filed

Mrs. G. D. Kincaid

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Burner

Church Records

History of Pocahontas-Price



Juanita S. Dilley
Clover Lick, W. Va.
Chapter 6-Religion

ARBOGAST MEMORIAL CHAPEL--BARTOW
M. E. Church, South

The first church services, so far as any one knows, were held in the school house. Arbogast Memorial chapel was built in the year of 1882 and dedicated in 1883. It was built near the site of an old cemetery on the lands of the pioneer Abram Burner, which later came into the posession of his son George W. Burner, thence to Charles Burner and Elizabeth Beard Burner, his wife who gave the deed for the church lot in 1883, to Peter D. Yeager, A. M. V. Arbogast, Josiah O. Beard and Lee Burner, trustees. "A certain lot of land in the neighborhood of Travelers Repose containing one half acre. For and in consideration of the love we bear for the cause of Christ and from an earnest desire to promote his heritage on earth."

Near this church is a barn that was used as a hospital for the wounded at the Battle of Bartow in 1861, and between the barn and the church is the resting place of many of the dead. The Union soldiers later removed the bodies of most of their dead, but many of the Confederates from the Southern states remained buried there. At one grave was a stone bearing the inscription "In this grave is the bodies of six unknown Confederate Soldiers." but when the state road was built, the men who gatheres rocks for the road base removed many of the stones from the graves and used them in building the road. The people of the community were greatly shocked when they learned what had happened and they demanded that no more of them be removed. (It does seem a pity that in a place where as many rocks are found as are in Pocahontas, that they would remove grave stones to build road)

There were no churches nearer Bartow than Top Allegheney, Arbovale or Greenbank, and all of these places were several miles away, so in 1882 the people decided to build a church. Lee Burner furnished the timber and he with the help of his neighbors the Arbogasts, Yeagers and Burners cut and skidded the logs to a saw mill in the neighborhood and had it sawed into lumber for the church. Charles Burner paid the saw bill, and contributed more money than any other one person. He also boarded the carpenter~~s~~ a Mr. Elliot who plained all of the lumber by hand. It took him almost a year.

For many years this church was open to all denominations, but of late years only the Methodists use it. It is now an appointment on the Arbovale circuit, but was formerly on the Durbin circuil.

Records show for 1940 a membership of 98, many of them young people who have been added to the class the past year. I was told by the former pastor Rev. Howard Wriston, that this was his best appointment. Other appointments on this circuit are Arbovale, Bethel on Back Mountain, Wanless, Boyer, New Hope, and Frost.

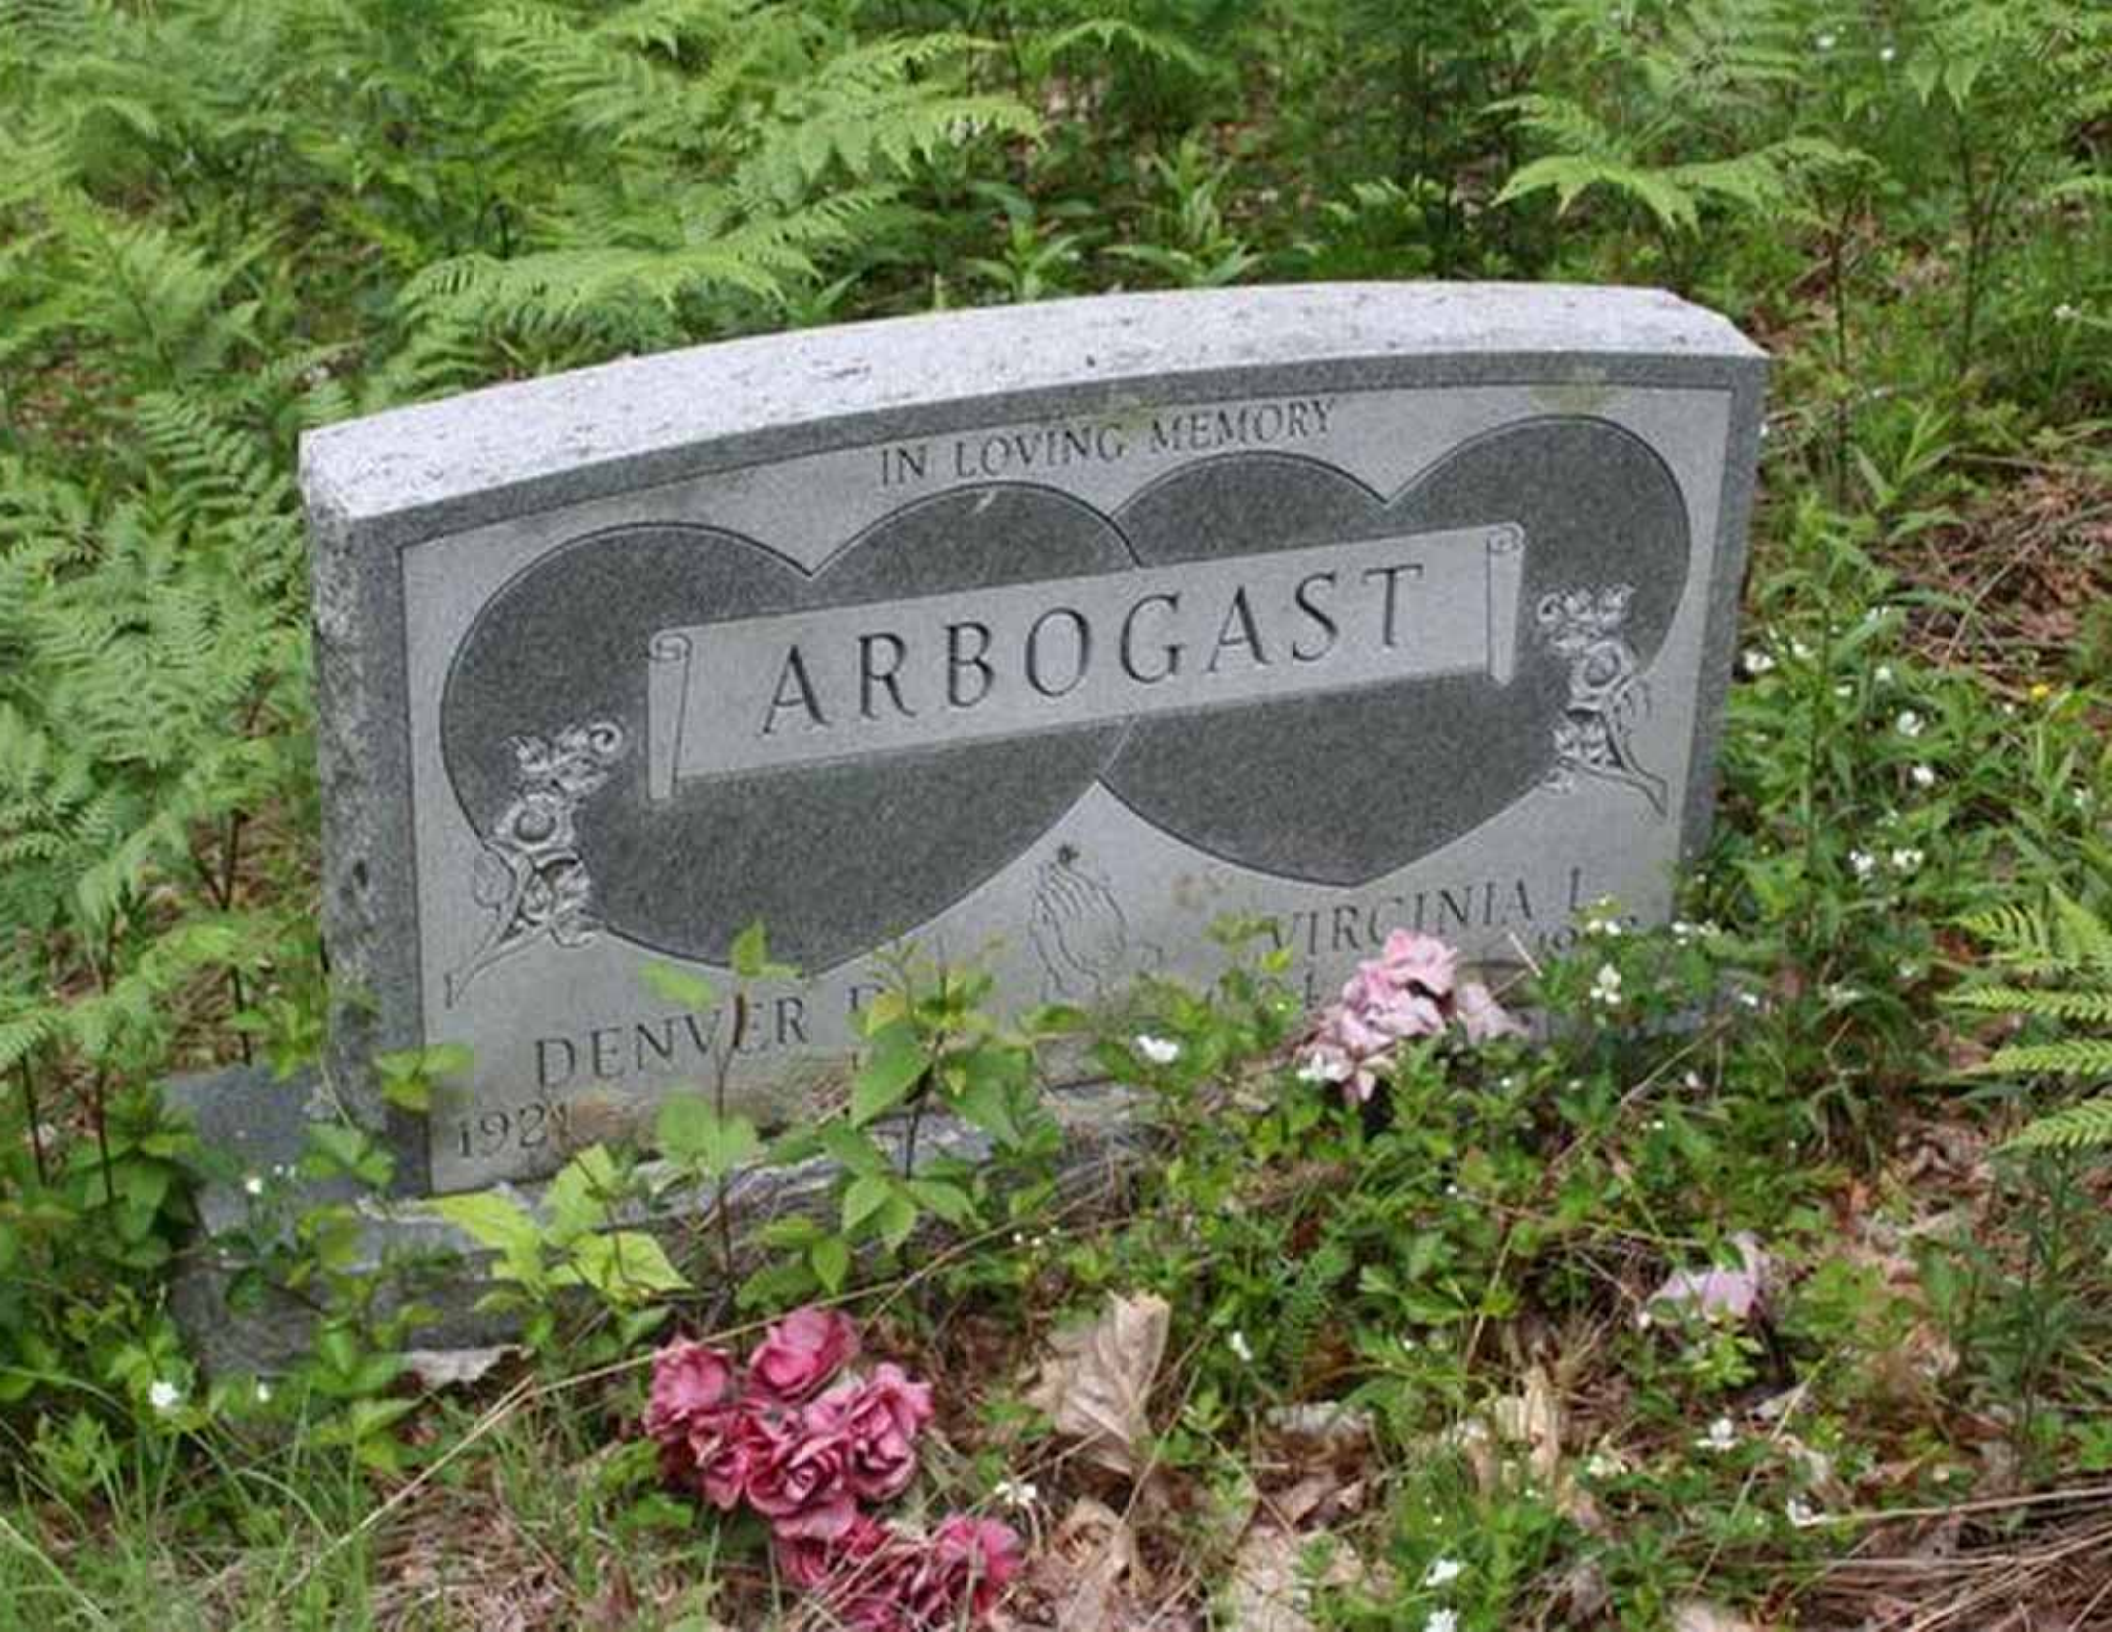
The present trustees are I. E. Methany, B. J. Snyder, Harper Beverage, Oscar Turner, and Howard Kreamer. The present stewards are Mrs. B. J. Snyder, Harper Beverage, Frank Gainor, and Edith Burner.

This church was named Arbogast Memorial in memory of the Rev. Benjamin Arbogast. He went to school a session or two to Academy(at Hillsboro) and then went to Dickinson College in Penn., and was graduated among the best in his class. In the meantime he entered the ministry and became a pulpit orator and one of the most distinguished teachers of the high school under the auspecies of the M. E. Church, South.

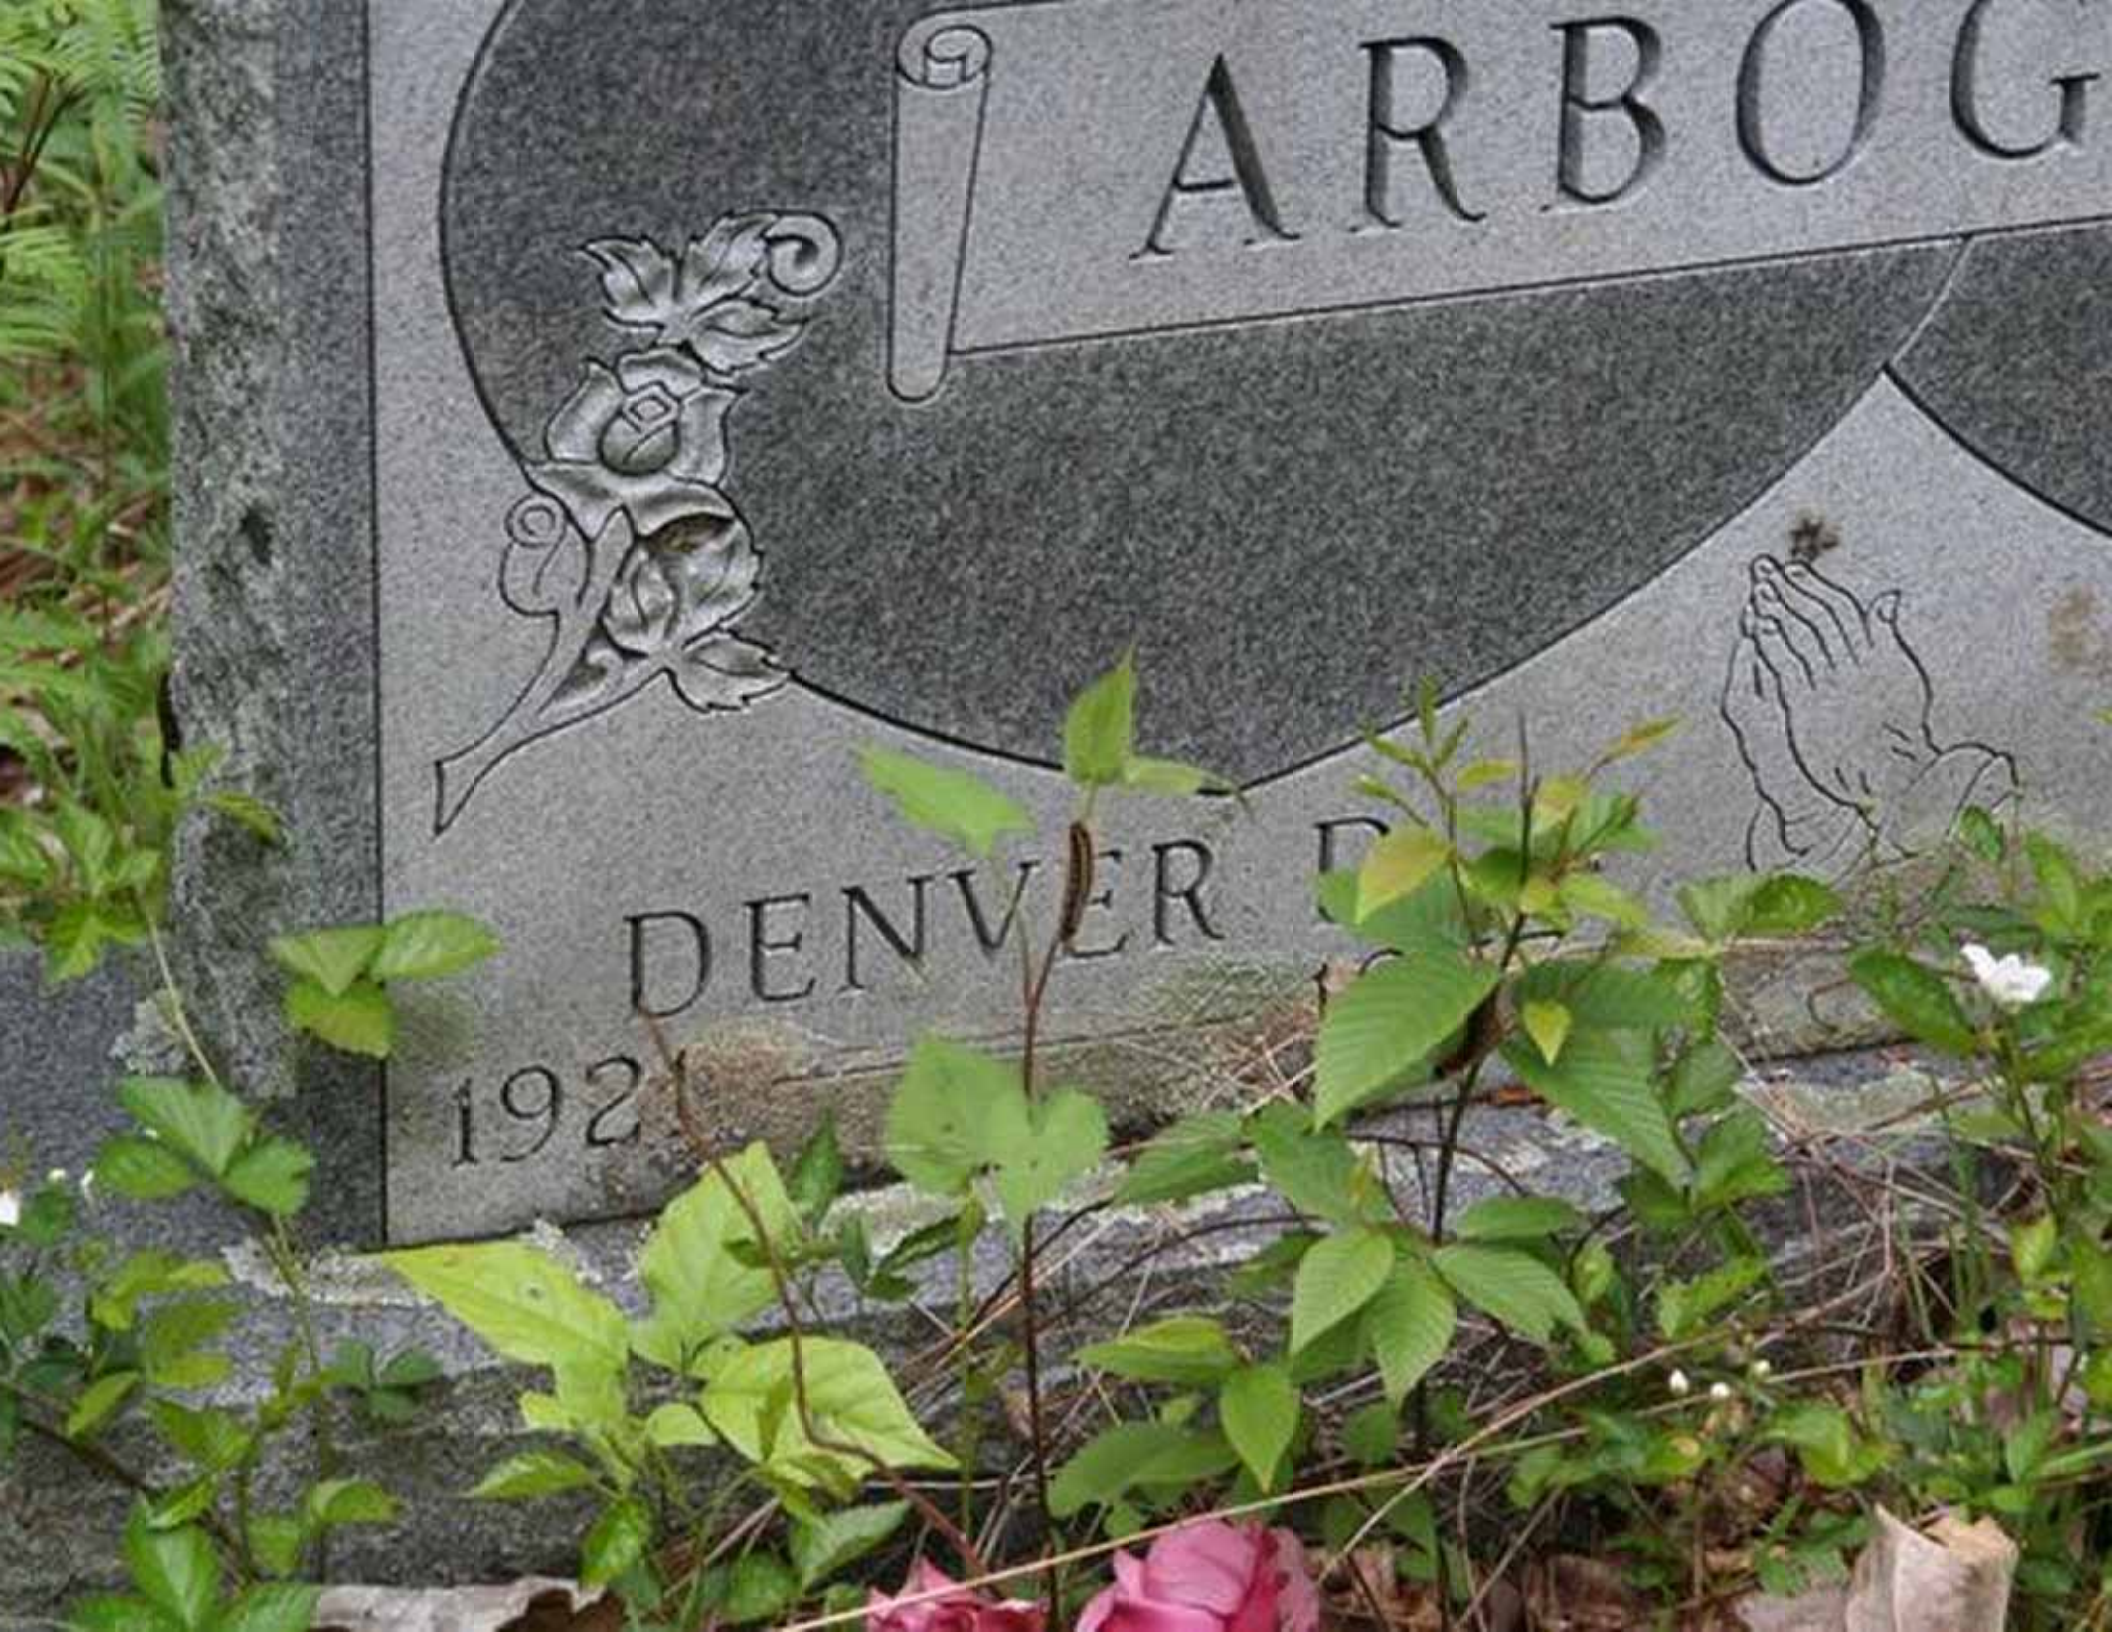
It seems that he never lived at Bartow, and that the church was named in honor of him more to satisfy a whim of one of the members. Many of the people of the community do not even know it is named Arbogast Memorial as they never call it anything but Bartow church.

came down on his neck and held him there helpless. He had to summons a neighbor to assist him in getting out. He afterwards said that was the last time he would ever lock a church on any one. The disagreement had been over building the Thornwood church. The southern members had wanted to build the church, but the President of the Lumber company was an M. E. and insisted on having it built by the M. E. branch.

JOHN CLARENCE
RYDER
FEB. 6, 1902
JULY 26, 1980
REST



IN LOVING MEMORY
ARBOGAST
DENVER
VIRGINIA



ARBOG
DENVER
192

BOGAST
VIRGINIA L

ARBOGAST
1892
1972
ANNIE 1902

ARBO
UNTIL WE ME
DIXIE
DEC. 25. 1892
NOV. 9. 1978

BOGAST
ANNIE
1902 1978

of age.

Charles and Jacob Kinnison, the pioneer brothers, were skillful workers in wood with the broad axe and whip saw. Some of the first carpenter work ever done in this county was by them and Richard Hill.

Charles Kinnison hewed the logs for John McNeel, pioneer. The building yet stands. He also prepared the logs for the house now dwelt in by Claiborne McNeil, near Buckeye. His services were greatly valued in planning and constructing forts.

Thus with assistance of J. B. Kinnison and Allan Kinnison, something has been attempted to embalm the memories of these good men and their worthy descendants. We believe it is the temper of many of the living Kinnisons to see that the lustre of the Kinnison name shall not be tarnished, but rendered more illustrious by all the facilities that may come to hand.

ARCHIBALD CLENDENNIN.

The Clendennin name has been familiar as a household word to our people for more than a hundred years.

They are the descendants of Archibald Clendennin, who was one of the pioneers of Greenbrier County, and lived in the Big Levels, not far from Lewisburg. The place has been long known as the Ballard Smith homestead.

Charles Clendennin was slain by the Indians in 1763 and was survived by two sons, George and Charles.

Digitized by Google

In regard to George Clendennin we have nothing authentic. Charles Clendennin was one of the pioneers of Kanawha County, and the city of Charleston is named for him. William Clendennin, a son of Charles, married Sallie Cochran, daughter of John Cochran, and settled on the Burgess place, near Hillsboro, now occupied by John Payne. This occurred about 1780. Their sons were William and John; their daughter Catherine became Mrs Jacob Kennison.

John Cochran was the person who brought in the slain bodies of the Bridger Brothers. His mother was a Miss Hogshead, of Augusta County, very pious person, and her granddaughter Sallie was a very rigid christian person and trained her children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. She was called a Jewess both "outward and inwardly," as she insisted upon her sons learning some trade. To gratify her conscientious wishes, her son William Clendennin was apprenticed to Bayliss G. Rapp, at Frankford, for seven years, seven months, and seven days. Upon his marriage with Jane Cochran, he settled at the Casebolt mill and finally located on the Seybert Place at the mouth of Stamping Creek. Their children were Mary Ann who became Mrs Buckhannon, and settled in Upshur.

John Clendennin married Rebecca Byrd, and lived at Byrd's Mill in upper Greenbrier.

James Clendennin died in youth.

Sally Clendennin cared for her parents, prospered, and bought the place where she now lives.

John Clendennin, of William the pioneer, learned his trade in a voluntary apprenticeship with Ralph

Digitized by Google

Wanless, as his mother wished. It is told of John that when a mere child he attended a preaching service at the Hawk Place, on Locust Creek, conducted by Dr McElhenney. When the minister inquired whether any children were to be baptized, John, in the absence of his mother, came forward and presented himself and was baptized, and named himself John McElhenney.

Upon his marriage with Catherine Seybert, he settled at Beard's Mill on Locust Creek, and after many years moved to Highland County. They were the parents of six sons:

William died at the age of eight years and lies in an unknown grave in the McNeel cemetery.

Jacob F. lives in Highland. His first marriage was with Elizabeth Bird, and has two sons. The second marriage was with Mary Bird.

George G. married Louella McNeel, and lives on a part of the old Seybert homestead.

Adam S. was a Confederate soldier from the first of the war, and died in the battle before Petersburg, April, 1865.

Charles R. married Mary Ann Tomlinson, and settled in Highland County. His sons John and Samuel went west.

Stewart died at the age of fourteen years.

In reference to these six sons of John Clendennin it may be noticed that George, Adam, and Charles learned the blacksmith trade, and Jacob tailoring.

Thus we have been able to give a few interesting items illustrating the Clendennin family history as far as identified with our Pocahontas citizenship. The most of this information was furnished by George G. Clendennin, of Mill Point, in a recent interview.

Digitized by Google

Since writing the preceding it has come to mind that the Andersons, on Hills Creek, are descendants of Archibald Clendennin by the third or fourth remove. Rev W. S. Anderson, Principal of the Alleghany Collegiate Institute; Rev C. M. Anderson, are among them.

This sketch will be closed by a historic reminiscence that has been widely published, and is perhaps already familiar to many.

A party of sixty or more Indians, led by Cornstalk, appeared very suddenly in west Greenbrier, in 1763, and came to the Clendennin home, where they found perhaps seventy-five persons, men, women, and children, to spend the day in social enjoyment and help their neighbor Clendennin feast on three fat elk he had just brought in. Though not invited or expected, the Indians upon their arrival were kindly received and bountifully feasted as welcome guests. While all this good cheer was going on, the people never dreaming of danger, as peace had been prevailing for the past two or three seasons, and the Indians had been coming and going in a most friendly manner, an aged person afflicted with a chronic sore, consulted with one of the older Indians and inquired if he knew of anything that would cure it. In a bland and assuring manner he told her that he thought he knew of the very thing that would cure her. Then drawing his tomahawk he killed her instantly, and before the people had time to think, nearly all the men in the house were killed by this single warrior medicine man.

Digitized by Google

Mrs Clendennin fought like a fury; reproached the Indians in terms of the severest invective, calling them cowards and all the mean names she could think of, while the warriors brandished their tomahawks and scalping knives over her head, and slapped her face with her husband's bloody scalp, threatening instant death if she did not hush up and behave herself.

The captives were taken at once to Muddy Creek in charge of a detachment, while the rest continued the raid as far as Kerrs Creek in Rockbridge County. Upon their return in a few days, preparations were hastily made to retreat to the Ohio. On the day they started from the foot of Keeneys Knob, Mrs Clendennin gave her infant to one of the captives to carry. The captives were placed in the centre of the line, with warriors for vanguard and rearguard. While crossing the mountain she slipped into a thicket of laurel and concealed herself in a hollow tree. The child soon became very fretful, and this led the Indians to suspect that the mother was missing. One of the warriors said he would "soon bring the cow to her calf." He caught the child by the feet and beat its brains out against a tree, threw it in the path, all marched over it, and its intestines were trampled out by the horses.

After nightfall Mrs Clendennin came out of her hiding place and returned to her home, ten miles away. She found her husband dead in the yard, with one of the children in his arms, where he had tried to escape over the fence. After covering the dead with rails she went into the cornfield near by and waited for day. During the night a great fear came upon her, as she imagined she saw a man standing within a few steps from her.

Digitized by Google

Mainly with her own hands she prepared a place under the porch for the last resting place of her beloved dead, and then soon after refugeed to Augusta County, where she remained a year or two. She finally returned to her home in Greenbrier, and was afterwards married to Ballard Smith, the ancestor of the distinguished family of that name, so prominent in the annals of the Greenbrier citizenship.

JOHN H. RUCKMAN.

Among the citizens of our county in later years from the forties to the sixties, that took a lively interest in everything that promised to promote the interests of education, morality, and the prosperity of the county generally, John Hartman Ruckman deserves more than a brief notice.

He traced his ancestry to one Samuel Ruckman, a native of England, and born in 1643. The Ruckmans had lived awhile in north east Wales, bordering England, and thence came to Long Island, New York, in 1682. Thomas Ruckman, son of Samuel Ruckman, the Welsh emigrant, was born on Long Island in 1682, and his son James Ruckman, another link in the ancestral chain, was born in New Jersey in 1716. James Ruckman's son, David Ruckman, was born in New Jersey in 1747. David Ruckman is the progenitor of the Ruckman relationship in Highland and Pocahontas Counties. He came to what is now south east High-

Digitized by Google

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

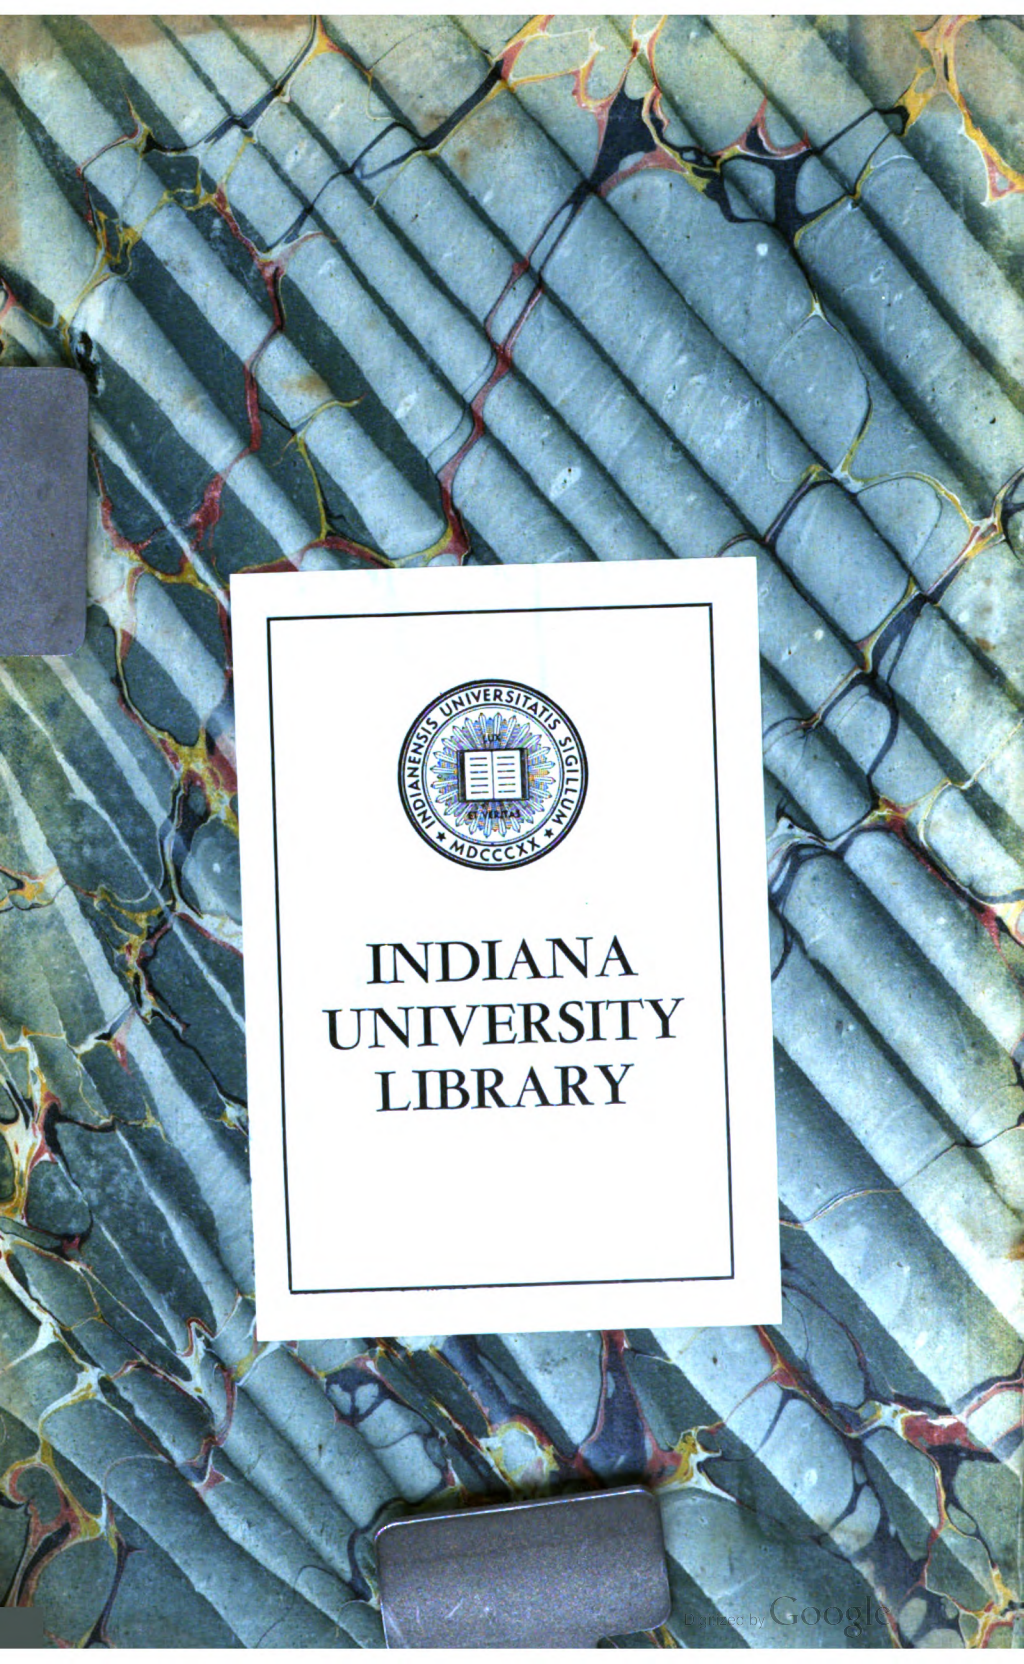
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

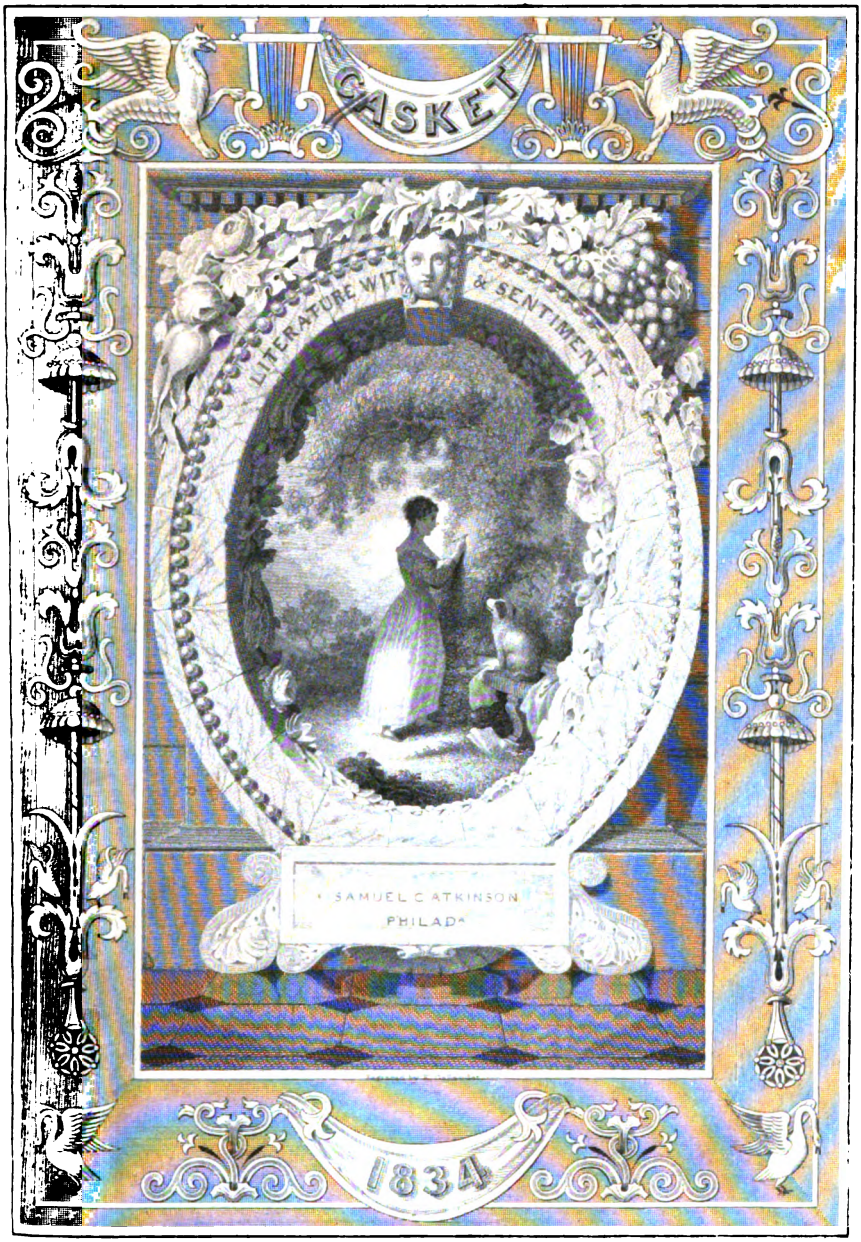
Jem

Child Church - Sleek St.
Cott. Wg.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



KN

Digitized by Google

AP2
.G8
1834

Digitized by Google

ATKINSON'S
CASKET
OR GEMS OF
LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

I am the same, without all diff'rence; when
You saw me last, I was as rich, as good;
Have no additions since of name, or blood;
Only because I wear a thread-bare suit,
I was not worthy of a poor salute.
A few good clothes put on with small ado,
Purchase your knowledge and your kindred too.

No. 1.] PHILADELPHIA.—JANUARY. [1834.

LATEST LONDON AND PARIS FASHIONS.

HABIT DE RECEPTION.—FIG. 1.—A redingote of lilac valentine, the fronts confined with large bows of ribbon (a deeper tint, and trimmed the whole way down from the throat with a triple ruche of white blond, this parts at the waist, en tablier, and gives to this simple dress a most graceful effect. The corsage is folded on the bosom en gerbe, and cut rather low for a morning dress; the sleeves are extremely full, en ballon, with cuffs of white tulle a la Marie Stuart. The coiffure is a small capote formed by three divisions of white tulle, en coques. The only ornament is a bunch of poppies placed under the brim on the right side, and long brides of white gauze ribbon edged with tulle; citron colour kid gloves, and black gros de Naples slippers.

FIG. 2.—An evening dress of white fleur d'Ange gauze tissue, the skirt adorned with a double border of "Forget-me-Not" flower; bouffant short sleeves; the corsage is formed a l'Amazone, the rich folds being divided by bands embroidered to correspond with the pattern on the skirt; round the throat, is carelessly tied a foulard scarf,—pale jonquil, embroidered with roses. The hair is dressed in full curls, on the temples parted in front with an aigrette of flowers, and the bows behind confined by a plaited band.

FIG. 3.—A fashionable bonnet of rice-straw, ornamented with interlaced bands of lilac satin ribbon, with three small bows placed behind, and a plume of drooping lilac ostrich feathers.

FIG. 4.—A bonnet of white gros d'Inde, with bands and bows of cherry-colour sarsenet ribbon—and a large bouquet of sweat peas. This bonnet is edged with white blond.

We are seriously threatened with the revival of hair-powder. In Paris, an effort was made to introduce it last season, but without effect; whether the forthcoming experiment will be more successful we do not pretend to decide. Whether hair-powder will ever again be generally worn is hardly doubtful. It is true we have revived the dresses of our grandmothers, and they have been rendered graceful by the modifications demanded by modern taste. But powder can never be rendered elegant. It may be adopted for a night, as a mere fantasie, but it can never again obtain the authority of general usage

There are some countenances to which powder may possibly be becoming. It is supposed to soften the features, and to impart lustre to the eyes. But, on the other hand, it has the disadvantage of spoiling a dress in the space of an hour, and even the most extravagant woman of fashion sometimes wishes to wear a dress oftener than once: and, at all events, it is desirable that it should not appear soiled before the termination of an evening party.

Crowns of plaited hair have now become so exceedingly common, that the most fashionable coiffeurs have laid them wholly aside. Bows, rather high, and frequently papillottes, are preferred.

The continuance of mild weather retards the general adoption of the colours and materials usually worn at the present season. Light hats of crape and silk, ornamented with flowers, are still as general as they were in the height of summer.

Dresses and pelisses of velvet and plain satin, are likely to be much worn, as soon as the autumnal weather shall fairly set in. They should be of some rich dark colour, with pelerines of the same material, trimmed with black lace.

The fichus-ceintures are likely to be much adopted this winter for ball dresses, to which they give an elegant finish. When adapted to low dresses, bows with long flowing ends may be placed on each shoulder.

In Paris, small scarfs of black lace or blonde are much worn for evening dress. These scarfs, which are very long and narrow, are lined with coloured silk or satin, and passed under the waistband.

Sashes with long ends promise this winter to supersede the bands which have so long been worn, simply pinned or buckled round the waist,

Digitized by Google

Written for the Casket.

THE BANIAN TREE.

Where Burampooter rolls his waves,
Through sultry India's wide domains,
Or silver Ganges proudly laves
The margins of his flowery plains;—
As stately as the Ganges flows,
And silent seeks the distant sea,
So silent seeks the skies, and grows
The beautious, stately Banian Tree.

Erect and firm the trunk ascends,
And widely spreads its branches round;
And many a bough it downward sends,
To seek again the genial ground:
Formed into trunks, they shoot above,
Bend down again, new trunks to be;
Till all united form a grove
Around the parent Banian Tree.

And thus may hearts of pious worth,
In peaceful, friendly union stand;
And spirits too, though tied to earth,
May still be joined in golden band.
How beautiful, when many a soul,
From discord and defilement free,
Unite to form one perfect whole,
Like thee, delightful Banian Tree.

THE BROTHERS.

From the German of Schiller.

Mr. Editor:—Annexed is a Translation of a narrative from the pen of the great German dramatist, Schiller, the insertion of which may gratify some of your readers. As I have rendered it into English through the medium of a French translation, it cannot be expected, in its present dress, to present any of the peculiar beauty of style which characterizes the original: but although divested of these, it is interesting, on account of the incidents which it contains.

Ed.

The following account of two young Germans, a narrative which I write with pride, presents one indisputable claim to attention: it is true: and that truth gives it more power to affect the heart, than all the letters of the Pamelas and the Grandisons.

Two brothers, Barons of Wermb, had become devotedly attached to a young girl in Werther, neither being aware of the passion of the other. Each loved with his whole soul; and with each it was a first attachment. She was beautiful, gentle and intelligent. The passion of both the young men was continually increasing in strength, while neither was aware of his misfortune in having a brother for a rival. Neither was induced to make an untimely declaration, and entirely unconscious of the state of the other's feelings, until the occurrence of an unexpected event suddenly revealed the secret attachment of both.

But before that period had arrived, love, that most overpowering of all the passions, whose victims are scarcely outnumbered by those of hatred, had gained so deep a mastery over the hearts of both, that neither thought it possible for himself to make a sacrifice of his own feelings, for the happiness of the other.

The object of this mutual attachment, keenly sensitive to the misery of their trying situation, and dreading to seal the unhappiness of either, could not compel herself to declare a preference, and submitted her fate to the decision of their brotherly affection.

At length, gaining command of his feelings, in struggle between passion and duty, a subject on which theorists often reason so erroneously, and on which the practical man frequently finds it so difficult to decide, the elder Baron of Wermb addressed his brother.

"I know that you deeply and truly love the object of my own devoted admiration. I inquire not in whose favor the claim would be decided, if it depended on the question, which of us had felt the earliest attachment. Remain here—I will flee from her—I will travel over the world, and endeavor to forget her. If I can accomplish this, my brother, let her be yours; and may God bless you both!—but if I fail I must return—you must then tear yourself away, and succeed me in the trial."

He left Germany, and went to Holland, but the image of the loved one was with him still.—Away from that sky which was above his home, away from that land which held his only source of happiness, he could not live. He languished in misery, drooping and fading like the Asiatic plant which the European removes, and endeavors to rear in an arid soil, deprived of the sunbeams which were its life. He reaches Amsterdam, and is soon laid postrate by a raging fever. In the dreams of delirium the loved one is ever before him—he must return, or die. The physicians are alarmed, and feel that her presence can alone prolong his life. He commences his return, pale, worn, emaciated to a skeleton—he reaches his native land, a fearful example of that wasting power with which the mind destroys the body. He staggers to his brother's house, and is in the presence of his beloved.

"Brother, I am here, God knows how much my heart has striven—but I can do no more,"—and he fell senseless into the arms of the young girl.

His brother evinced a not less noble spirit—he did not falter in this emergency. In a few weeks his preparations were completed and he was ready to depart.

"Brother, you went with your sufferings to Holland; I shall endeavor to bear mine to a greater distance. Do not lead her to the alter until I write to you—my brotherly affection imposes on you only that condition. If I can gain the victory over myself, let her be yours, and may God—bless your love!—If I cannot—then let Heaven judge between us! Farewell. Take this sealed packet, and do not open it until I am far from you. I am going to Batavia."

He sprang into the carriage, and left the pair bowed down in an agony of sorrow. In greatness of soul he had surpassed his brother; and they could not but love his magnanimity, and mourn the necessity which separated them from a being so generous and noble. The sound of the departing wheels smote on their hearts like a peal of thunder, The poor girl—but no?—let us wait until the end.

The packet was opened. It contained a Will, drawn in due form, giving to his brother all the property which he possessed in Germany, in case he never should return.

Digitized by Google

Already the generous youth was far from home. He embarked on board a Dutch ship, and arrived without accident, at Batavia, from whence, after the lapse of a few weeks, he sent the following letter to his brother.

"Here in this distant land, when I offer to the Almighty my prayers and blessings, I think of you and our unfortunate love, with the feelings of a martyr. My unaccustomed situation—the new scenes which are around me, have expanded my soul. Heaven has vouchsafed me strength to make the greatest sacrifice to friendship.—She is thine. My God! I have shed a tear—it is the last. I have succeeded in my self-conquest—she is thy wife! Brother, if I was destined to possess her, I cannot believe that she would have been happy with me. But if she should ever think that she might have been?—brother, brother, that would weigh heavily on thy soul.—Forget not at what a price she might have been purchased for thee—that wife. Let thy bearing towards her be ever like that which is now dictated by thy youthful love. Look upon her as a precious legacy from a brother whom you will behold no more. Do not inform me of your wedding day; for my wounds are still bleeding—but write me when it is past. The power which has been given me to make this sacrifice, is to me a certain pledge that God will not abandon me in this land of strangers."

The marriage was performed—a year of happiness succeeded—and then, the young wife died. In her last moments she disclosed a terrible and fearful secret, which till then had never escaped her soul. She had most loved the absent brother.

The two Barons are yet living. The elder is still in Germany, and has been married to a second wife. The younger has succeeded in obtaining that peace for which he sought. He has made a vow, never to be married—and he has kept it.—Providence Literary Journal.

Written for the Casket.

The Destruction of the Inquisition.

Ope thy portals, den of doom,
Swift unclose thy living tomb,
Render up each wretch forlorn
To the joys of life new born,
Lift the veil of night that lies
Wrapt around thy mysteries.

See! thy baffled minions lower,
Forced to give the keys of power;
Withering hate, and pallid fear
Course their brows, the while they hear
Muttered curses, deep, not loud,
Bursting from the infuriate crowd.

Hark! the grated doors expand,
As at touch of magic wand,
Superstition's chains unbound,
Leaps the captive from the ground,
While his wildered senses reel,
Burthened with the joy they feel.

Where the dark and misty air
Dim absorbs the torches glare,
In that dungeon's far confine
Haply some forgotten pine;
Lo! they struggle into sight,
Dazzled by the new found light.

How shall mortal tongue relate
Griefs on hope deferred that wait?
When, by disappointments prest,
Sinks the soul in numbing rest,
Till reason, grown in sorrows old,
Reluctant quits her cherished hold.

Such that aged captive's lot,
Forgetting all, by all forgot,
See his streaming, blanched hair,
Time has lodged such sorrows there—
Nought can cloud that marble brow,
Nought delight or vex him now.

Thou,* who enthroned on Glory's car,
Swept Europe's bounds with whelming war,
Whose name made farthest nations mourn,
And Gaul embrace her funeral urn,
Whilst death doomed, prodigal of life,
Her slaughtered children crowned the strife.

Though thou art steeped with damning guilt,
In seas of blood relentless spilt,
Yet shall this deed to heaven arise
As an atoning sacrifice.
Perchance, should Mercy hold the scale,
It may 'gainst thousand crimes prevail—

The fight is o'er—the struggle done—
And clouds envelope Freedom's sun,
Again expands that iron gate,
And closing seals the captive's fate,
Again the Fiends assume their reign,
And all the toil and strife is vain—

Vain!—no!—though firm the despot's power,
And reft of hope the present hour,
Ne'er shall the memory of that day
Wrapt in oblivion pass away,
But stir the soul with fierce desire
Till Vengeance light the signal fire.

When dawns the day of loud alarms,
And roused Iberia shouts to arms,
When echoing peals the battle cry,
And thousands swear to do or die,
When each Sierra teems with life,
And pours its torrent to the strife:

Then in their breasts this scene shall glow,
And steel each arm, and nerve each blow,
Then shall the aged captive rise,
Again the tortured meet their eyes—
Till gathered wrongs of ages past
Whelm tyrants with the whirlwind's blast.

HOWARD.

From the Hartford Pearl.

MARRIAGE HYMN.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Not for the summer hour alone,
When skies resplendent shine,
And youth and pleasure fill the throne,
Our hearts and hands we join;

But for those stern and wintry days,
Of sorrow, pain, and fear,
When Heaven's wise discipline doth make
Our earthly journey drear.

Not for this span of life alone,
Which like a blast doth fly,
And as the transient flower of grass
Just blossom—droop, and die;

But for a being without end,
This vow of love we take,—
Grant us, Oh God!—one home at last,
For our Redeemer's sake.

* Napoleon.

Digitized by Google

Written for the Casket.

The Legend of Buck Island.

"Dreams, magic terrors, spells of mighty power,
"Witches, and ghosts, who rove at midnight hour."
TRANS. OF HORACE.

"Lay her in the earth,—
"And from her fair and unpolluted flesh,
"May violets spring!"
HAMLET.

I am a Virginian born—a native of that oldest and loveliest of the States that form the proud sisterhood of our Union. How many long and wearisome years have been added to "those beyond the flood," since I wandered light of limb and fancy, free over the breezy hills of my birthplace in the rich and populous county of Albemarle! I left it when life was young,

"And hope beat high within my buoyant breast," and have since roved far and wide; yet while most intermediate scenes and events are wholly forgotten, or become recollections dim and indistinct, and transient as fleeting dreams of the night, my early memories prove themselves imperishable, and rise continually about me in fresh and vivid array, as if they were things of but yesterday. I see before my mind's eye palpable and plain as the forms around me, the companions and haunts of those golden days—the majestic mountains, the eternal forest's solemn and awe-inspiring as the sacred groves of the Druids, devoted to primeval solitude and darkness, save when a momentary stream of sunshine chanced to pour down its light over the leaves as the wild deer came bounding and rustling through the green wood shade,—

"Every alley green,
"Dingle, or bushy dell of those old woods
"And every bosky bourn from side to side," with all the softer charms of sylvan spring and pastoral valley opening into pictures, of such quiet and poetic beauty as dwelt of yore beside Arcadian rill and fountain, are well and fondly remembered with each simple history and legend thereunto belonging—and eagerly imbibed and conned over by my kindling fancy. One of these many traditions in particular, related of my favourite place of resort, took deep hold of my imagination, and seems to me even now not unworthy repetition, as preserving and illustrating many traits of old times, and manners in the "Ancient Dominion."

There is, in all the broad lands and bright isles that the sun shines upon in his daily round, no fairer spot than that deep and lonely glen, embosomed amid blue hills, and inlaid with two lines of sparkling silver by the Rivanna and its tributary, Buck-Island Creek. It made part of a splendid domain, divided into three plantations, the whole bearing the name of this last watercourse, and owned by an upstart lowlander, who, residing in a little town, far down on the sea-board, was so devoid of taste as to abandon the romantic precincts of Buck Island to the tenancy of an overseer: at least so it was when I used to frequent its solitudes. But it had not always been thus deserted; more than half a century before, in the days of colonial subjugation, here had been the homestead of a wealthy and high born Englishman, who, occupying the vast and venerable "pile," erected by his wife's remote ancestor, and enlarged and beautified by each subsequent proprietor, lived and revelled in all the patrician pomp and boundless hospitality, peculiar to our ante-national era. The ruins of the stately mansion, (stately that is for those times), crowned with many a wreath of ivy, intermingled with yellow jessamine, the exotic honey suckle, and other vestiges of human culture, yet cumbered its site on the fair brow of a mighty hill; the huge chimnies built of imported bricks, as hard and durable as stone, still stood perfect among heaps of crumbling rubbish, and the wild overgrowth of bushes and creeping plants, which ran along the scarce perceptible foundation, and mantled the fallen walls,—and on their tall stalks, rising here and there in naked altitude, like monumental pillars, illustrating some marble wreck of antiquity, might still be read the date of the edifice 1654; and V. W. the initials of its founder, Valentine Wolverine.

With this man, who made one of the first settlements among these mountains, and is still spoken of there as a very remarkable personage, our story has nothing to do; but once established in comfort, the family continued to prosper through three generations, till at length all the wealth and honors clustering around it, centered in one sweet daughter, who shone the proudest beauty of her day, and espoused Sir Rezin Bland, a Briton of mightly lineage, but slender fortune, who had wandered across the seas in search of preferment, and found it in a union with the heiress of Buck Island. It was to be sure a sad mesalliance, that wedded the descendant of crusading barons to the offspring of a Virginia planter, whose name, though eminent in his own land, was unknown in merry England as the forsaken hovel, which had there sheltered his peasant progenitors. But, though strongly tempted on the first blush of the business, to pronounce on the lovely parvenue, and her evident partiality for him,

"The hind that would be mated to the lion,
"Must die of love,"

this inopportune fit of the heroic proved but transitory with the adventure so highly favoured, and speedily gave way to a proper sense of the expedient; for Sir Rezin was a dear lover of wealth, and the good things of this world, which wealth commands—had a shrewd eye to his own interests, and an implicit belief in the ennobling properties of his own blood, that reconciled him to this stoop from his high estate even in a matter so delicate as a matrimonial engagement: besides he could not but attach himself to a creature so pretty and withal amiable as his opulent bride; and through many years of wedlock, their hapiness suffered no interruption, save when Heaven visited them with the loss of several promising infants. There was thus only one girl left to be the exact image of her mother's person, and to blend the advantages of her father's grand genealogy with the ample possessions of her maternal house. 'Tis needless to say how devoutly this sole child so fairly and richly endowed, was doated on by either parent. Still, though presumptive owner of thousands of fertile acres, and hundreds of slaves, and already looked up to as the pattern-belle of that olden and haughty aristocracy, the young Fanny, as she grew up in the bloom and sweetness of congenial retirement, would have had to "hide her diminished head" before the least lady-milliner or shop keeper now extant; for, alas! the poor thing could boast herself, neither travelled nor accomplished, and had never so much as heard those charming terms, waltzing and attitudinizing. The means of education afforded her were simple, yet sufficient to impart all the plain (vulgar they would now be called,) but admirable qualifications necessary to the character of a Virginia matron; exercising an almost regal sway over a numerous and dependent household; and nothing beyond was aimed at, or desired by the loftiest and the loveliest in the land.

Digitized by Google

At that barbarous epoch, the unenlightened colony was destitute of those appliances and adjuncts of polite tuition, patronized under the enlarged conceptions of the present regime in the shape of fashionable academies, and foreign vagabonds, monopolizing by patent the art of conducting them. Boarding Schools—those invaluable sources of modern elegance and love; there were then none for the training up of young ladies in the way they should not go; and the finishing of them in a refined superiority of airs and graces. The stupid provincials, poor in spirit, if not in purse, when compared with the high minded bankrupts of these dashing days, aspired not to have their simple daughters destined to the drudgery, (insufferable as 'tis voted by their polished posterity) of minding their own household concerns, manufactured into the student of all languages, dead and living, just able at last to jabber away in a jargon apt to be mistaken by one of the uninitated for a compound of the confusion of Babel; into the fair artist caricaturing nature alike in the application of her brush to canvass and rouge on her own face—with her musical sister, wisely scorning to perplex herself with the difference between the natural and chromatic scales, and solely intent on strumming a half strung harp, and trilling forth in true scientific style, an Italian song, the pronunciation thereof duly got by rote along with the words—or "tho' last not least," into the poetess (as the phrase goes) confounding with a noble disdain of rules—those impertinent clogs to genius—the epic, lyric, and dramatic modes; and exposing in print with all the complaisance of self-applause, a string of rhymes happily modelled after those long since immortalized in the matchless song by "a person of quality." In place of a female literati so gifted and famous, the country, at the hum-drum time our tale treats of, imitated their sober grandmothers content to exercise their privilege of speech in their mother-tongue—to please by the resistless spell of their own simple manners, and modest dress; and holding with the ancient mythologists, that the goddess of wisdom was likewise the inventor of spinning. The system of education then prevalent among the upper classes, was purely domestic; the mother never yielded up the guardianship of her girls to a hireling substitute—but keeping them under her own careful eye till the moment, which at the altar transferred their allegiance elsewhere, took herself the chief share in "rearing the tender thought," and teaching "the young idea how to shoot;" in addition to her lessons, a sort of bonne, generally an elderly English woman, perfectly skilled in needlework, the economy of the menage, and the important arts of raising paste, and clear-starching muslin, made them practically acquainted with all the subordinate duties of a house-wife, and regulated their deportment and avocations, when the lady of the mansion was unavoidably engaged, or indisposed, for the moment to the trouble: moreover they learnt writing and cyphering from an elder brother, or perhaps, a tutor employed to teach these branches to the family at large; and such constituted the sum total of feminine attainments, except, which was rarely the case, a music master could be procured to undertake a class for the harpsichord. Thus bred up at home, the young Virginia gentlewoman of the 15th century, found herself well fitted to fulfil the rational ends of her creation, though sadly deficient in the finery and frivolity of second-had ton as exemplified in the elegants and bel-esprits of 1833. We ourselves desire to be understood as entertaining all due respect, for these exquisite apes, on hearsay, of the ways of the fashionable world across the waters; but a cynic, disposed to sneer at the innovations of refinement, might reckon the solid and serviceable knowledge gained under the old order of things, as no bad off-set against a smattering of the "Clogies," and ill naturedly contrasting the fine simplicity of a natural manner with the awkward mimauderies, and shallow pretensions, mistaken by our fair but ignorant and imitative tyroes for a style foreign and recherche,—exclaim with the poet, who perambulated and portrayed the greater part of Europe,

"More dear to me, congenial with my heart,
"One native charm than all the gloss of art."

And to none might the lines more readily apply than to the artless beauty, whose ill-hap ordained her the heroine of my commemorative Legend. Sir Rezin and Lady Bland, following the usual method, no more dreamed of sending their daughter out of the house for instruction, than parents would think now-a-days of transporting theirs to Botany Bay to get morality. All that their darling heiress knew of useful or ornamental, had been acquired under her natal roof,—and there was imbibed and fostered that love of home—that self identification with local objects, and taste for domestic occupations—that capacity and habit of living and delighting, in the privacy and utility of her proper sphere, which forms the essence of woman's perfection, and invests her with more and sweeter attractions than the cestus of Venus was fabled to confer.

Miss Bland had no companion of her own sex—but an orphan boy, distantly related to her mother, and about three years older than herself, had long dwelt at Buck Island, and become to the young recluse brother and sister and cousin all in one. While she was taken up with her daily routine of tasks, either reading aloud in the "Spectator," or sewing some elaborate piece of embroidery beside Lady Bland—then seated at the harpsichord with her master, the celebrated Victor, who was prevailed upon by an enormous price, and the eclat of teaching a personage conspicuous beyond her compeers, to travel every two months from Williamsburg to Albemarle in attendance on a single scholar—and afterwards picking cotton, knitting her own stockings, or busy under Mrs. Springett's direction, among the pickles and preserves in the pantry—else varying these homely labours by copying into her receipt book, (then current among the ladies instead of albums,) some approved recipe medicinal or culinary; and he employed in conning his accidence at the "old field school," kept in a log house on a corner of the Buck Island estate—or studying accounts in the Steward's room—or reciting some Latin author to his patron, who was learned in the classics, and sometimes took note of George's progress therein; the fond playmates, whose hearts already "went coupled and inseparable," necessarily improved and pined apart: but the instant these several allotments were over, and the hours of liberty and recreation arrived, they flew to play, and ramble, and be happy together. Owing to such constant association with her cousin, Fanny, by nature,

Digitized by Google

"As sportive as the fawn,
"That, wild with glee, across the lawn,
"Or up the mountain springs,"— came to achieve and practice a variety of active sports, gaining thereby the hue of a wood nymph with the mien and proportions of a sylph. 'Tis true her lady-mother, and the demure deputy acting under her, bent on keeping "the child's" skin as white as a lily, and transparent as alabaster, strictly forbade, and severely chided all out-of-doors exercise; but Sir Rezin, well pleased to see on his cherub's cheek,

"The pale contending with the purple rose," encouraged her to run and ride about the plantation and neighbourhood at pleasure. Himself an accomplished horseman, he enjoyed nothing so much as to witness her exhibitions with George Meredith at her bridle-rein, of the grace and address, with which she managed the most spirited steed; and the little damsel, not daring to defy the maternal authority, ever acknowledged as paramount, but skilful to disown it, mostly contrived to coax her ladyship into tolerance, if not approval, of this liberty of motion.

The time was, however, at hand, when the forms of society would interpose to check such happy heedlessness of intercourse; for the youth was now verging from adolescence to manhood,—and the bright heiress no longer a child, but a woman. With the advent of that period, when we "bear a charmed life," alike productive of our most serious dangers and our purest bliss, there came a total unlinking of the chains, hitherto drawing the two into such close approximation. The delicious past was, in a measure, done away with. There was no longer the interchange of innocent endearments and "cousinly kisses"—nothing of the same natural and licensed familiarity, whether tete-a-tete or before others—no more airings on horse-back together, animated by a frolicksome race, or pleasant strolls, hand-in-hand, and for hours through the romantic scenery, wherein the Bland demesne might have rivalled a Hagley or a Stowe; no more gay encounters in the romps and games, befitting their age and lively temperament, and lately so rife between them. In the ordinary course of things, some change of the sort was to be expected; but here was "something too much" of it. The couple, whilome so frank and affectionate in their behaviour, were now grown, not indifferent, but distant, constrained, and apparently averse from one another. Each was sensible of, but, at the same time, misconstrued the conscious shyness, symptomatic of their mutual state of feeling. The young lady believed that she was only obeying the prescriptions of a despotic decorum, in laying aside the childish freedom, with which she had been wont to consider George as her second self: she had yet to learn that the reserve of her altered manner was but the veil thrown by maidenly delicacy, over an excess of affection, otherwise too apt to break out in open demonstration. Poor Meredith, as deeply mortified as he was entirely mistaken, was too little versed in woman, too inexperienced in the inconsistencies of that passion which, in her, most displays itself by affecting a disguise,—to see in this sudden coldness, the surest mark of his interest in his little play-fellow's heart. He tortured himself with the fear that he had some way fallen under her displeasure, without being able to screw his courage to the inquiring point with one so long and so intimately sharing his thoughts, his confidence, and his converse.

Fanny, to every body else as naive, as gentle, and as buoyant as ever—the idol of all around her from the courtly and high-minded knight himself, down to the humblest crop-hand, that, knowing his young mistress only by sight not speech, gazed in reverential awe at her fairy form flirting about the wood-land paths of the premises, seemed to her enamoured kinsman "another and yet the same;" 'twas but a few short months, fled like "morning's winged dream," since a charming and playful child, she nestled by his side, and there found her dearest resting place: now arrayed in all the glow and dignity of lovely womanhood, she rose before him like a celestial vision, and entranced in proportion as she receded from him. He beheld her daily redoubling her coyness and her enchantments—he felt his love for her each moment deepening into the rapture of adoration; and though thus seeing and hearing her so bewitching, yet so unkind, he sighed in the bitterness of his soul over the loss of his past precious immunities—he still could not bring himself to compare the tame quietude of his boyish happiness, with the fervid gush of ecstacy overflooding his heart, as it now swelled and throbbed, with the maddening pulse of "first, of passionate love." He felt, though he tried to persuade himself otherwise, that its object treated him not like a relative; he was aware that in honor, in gratitude, and in reason, he could aspire to nothing more: yet while he strove to believe that Fanny's difference of demeanor, was meant, properly and not harshly, to indicate the immense distance, now that they were about to appear before the world, between the heiress of Buck Island, and one who was the mere pensioner of her father's bounty, he could not be utterly and hopelessly while thus lingering near her, and catching at times, a soft glance straying towards him from those beautiful eyes.

Digitized by Google

Yet in her noviciate, and as unsuspicious of him as of herself, the unconscious cause of all these struggles, observed them not, any more than she stopped to scrutinize her own strange and contradictory sensations. But if love still wrought after his wont by hoodwinking his votaries, these were those near them, whom prudence gifted with as many eyes as Argus. Lady Bland, with the double instinct of a woman and a mother, quickly penetrated into the state of matters between the parties, and a hint from her soon decided her proud, though generous husband how to act in a conjuncture so delicate. After a joint deliberation, and having first satisfied himself of the verity of her ladyship's surmises, Sir Rezin issued his orders accordingly without thinking it worth while to let the younger members of the family into the secret of his arrangements: those, for whose benefit he intended them, were, therefore, left in present ignorance of their tenor, lest a premature opposition should confirm that attachment, which it was his anxious aim to avert.

George, restless and unhappy, under the continued estrangement from his cherished cousin, was still more cast down by the near prospect of his departure for college: William and Mary being, of course, the one selected for him. Not long before, when the current of his feelings flowed in the calm communion of brotherly regard towards the daughter of his benefactress, how eagerly had he panted for the hour, which would transfer him from the tutelage of a tiresome preceptor into the wide field of noble competition for the honors and degrees of a university. It now rapidly approached, that long wished-for hour; yet while the strong dictates of pride, of duty, and of self respect, urged him away,—the fondest sentiments of devotion, now worshipping as a mistress his former friend, proved a potent spell to enchain him near her: and the date of his inevitable journey glared incessantly in his mind's eye, like the angel's burning brand, waving before the banished inhabitants of Eden in signal of their perpetual exclusion. Nor did the idea of parting sadden him alone. Fanny, whose mind, gently stirred by the impulses of a guiltless tenderness, had, as yet, suffered none of the agonies of passion, would, at this crisis, have been "of ladies most deject and wretched,"—but that she suspected not the tendency of her own heart—consequently foresaw neither objections nor disappointment, and looked forward, in the confidence of sanguine youth, to a delightful reunion long before vacation-time. They were both somewhat enlivened by the arrival of a party invited to spend some weeks at Buck Island; for, though the bustle of hospitable cares incident to this accession, presented a new hindrance to the resumption of this late intimacy, it likewise served to dissipate thoughts and emotions, painfully concentrating on one subject.

It being part of the parental policy to separate the lovers as much as possible, the entertainment of the guests, (who, with two or three exceptions, were, of her own sex and age) mainly devolved on Miss Bland. She had, to be sure, an easy task of it; for her visitors, wild with the spirit of health and innocence, had no need of incitement to mirth, but rather the contrary: besides there was no lack of auxiliaries to re-inforce her. The gay and lovely group assembled at the lordly mansion, with the peerless heiress at its head, attracted thither all the young men of note in the neighborhood. Blenheim, Castle-hill, Carysbrook, and the other neighboring seats, each sent its representative to swell the patrician coterie, and to strive for the favor of la belle Chatelaine, (for beautiful she still was) as an earnest of the smiles of her fascinating daughter; and she, as playful and as artless as a simple child, enjoyed the pleasantry of the moment, without a care or fear for the future. She, nevertheless, missed and longed, though in vain, for the participation of her old companion. The prey to an attachment, as hopeless as 'twas idolatrous, Meredith shrunk from the joyous din of the festivities around him—and under pretence of a careful preparation for college, evaded much attendance on the queen of the revels and her nymph-like train. The rest went gaily on, amusing themselves with the usual country pastimes; shooting at a mark, hunting, riding, fishing and fidding occupied the men by day; while the ladies—for the sexes, then as now rarely mingled much together at the villas of Virginia—diligently employed themselves in copying patterns and learning new stiches in embroidery, in knitting gloves and purses for their favourite cavaliers, and in chatting on the feminine topics of fine clothes, for new fashions there were none) eligible matches, and the best modes of freshening butter, and renewing stale pickles. In the cool of the evening, (for such was the horror in which females of rank held the plebeian stigma of being tanned, freckled or sun-burnt, that none, during mid-day, would venture to an open window, or outward door, without the precaution of a double handkerchief pinned closely over the face,) the high-born bevy, in all the airy glee of youth and self approving charms, were free to all sally forth, and take the fresh air in a ramble about the grounds or plantation.

No place could offer a lovelier variety of views and walks than the site of the Wolverine homestead, while its improvements were admired as a fine specimen of the first style of reigning elegance. On the middle eminence of a range of woody hills, boldly swelling over the vale of waters, (a position contradistinguished to the customary choice of a sheltered hollow) stood the house, a low square building, consisting of one story, and an attic with vast dormant windows. The various additions by successive occupants, originally jumbled together without order or proportion, had been altered and rebuilt by Sir Rezin, into the regularity observable in the architecture of that age—and each floor divided into a grand cross passage—the indespensible distinction of an aristocratic edifice—and eight rooms with hearth and mantle-pieces of marble. The cellars, well lighted, were laid off in the like manner; and several of the compartments, separated, instead of walls, by a trellice of lattice-work, and inlaid with a dry pavement of round white pebbles, were used as summer parlours. One, in particular, hung with a green tapestry of climbing plants with a beautiful spring bubbling up in the centre, formed a retreat perfectly luxurious and appropriate for the siestas and light repasts of the hot season.* Nothing could be more varied and enchanting than the prospect from the apartment above. On the left, the eye, glancing over a fair garden, laid off with the antique and trim formality of alley, shrub and parterre, now superseded by the natural negligence of the jardin Anglais, encountered a noble reach of woods, apparently coeval with the creation, and exhibiting a delightful play of lights and shadows,—beyond which, stretching from the North to the South-west, the grand chain of the Alleghany Mountains—the Blue Ridge proudly pre-eminent among them—towerd in majestic outline against the horizon, and, robed in the azure hues of distance, seemed a meet pathway, leading from earth to heaven. Through the magical perspective of openings, judiciously cut among the trees, appeared only a few miles off, and its localities all distinctly visible, the far famed Monticello, since immortalized by the domicile and tomb of Jefferson. From that point, running eastwardly, the sweep of a superb grove, sloped gently down to Buck Island Creek, here broader and deeper than many a European river renowned in song. Its waters emerging from this umbrageous screen, and gleaming through the thick fringe of willows and alders, marking the line of their after-course, rolled on a mile or two further, to their junction with the Rivanna. On the right of the mansion, the spacious yard extended its "smoothe shaven green" to the edge of the lofty hill, which, with those on either side of it, abruptly declined into a level. Bare of the trees, clothing the adjoining heights, it displayed only a thin sprinkling of undergrowth, with one gigantic oak, flinging its storm worn branches and contorted roots over a slight cavity, whence the clear jet of another copious spring swelled out its waters into the light. Between the base of this ridge, and the liquid boundary, formed partly by the creek, and partly by the river, the sight took in, one mile in width, and unequalled even by those on James River, the magnificent plain of the low grounds with their rich pasture-bottoms and meadows, alive with herds and flocks, that might have graced a cattle show. These luxuriant grazing tracts were either relieved by an immense expanse of sea-green wheat, which, in its agitated play under the breath of the harvest wind, rippled and undulated like the waves of a summer ocean—or alternated with the ample extent of corn-field rows, "tall as the eaves of the home-house," and variegated with the scarlet white and yellow blossoms of the bean, pea, and the cucumber vines twining about them—or elsewhere, diversified with a prime array of tobacco plants, that handsomest and most valuable of our native growths, here in size so prodigious, that each one, when its deep green leaves spread themselves fully open, was in circumference as large as the round of an ordinary dining table. Beyond these fertile flats, the gaze of the beholder was caught by the whirl of flashing waters, foaming, and falling, and turning the busy wheel of a merchant mill, (as those manufacturing flour, are called in Virginia,) which marked the spot, where the lesser emptied itself into the greater stream. On the opposite shore, a fine sylvan landscape, blended with lawns and green hills, groves and cultured fields, melted away in the dim shadowy distance. Nothing could be more gloriously beautiful than the eastern prospect at sun rise, when it lay bathed and brightened in the flood of early empurpled light, unless it were the evening aspect of the etherial mountains, coloured over by the beams of declining day, and the centennial woods outstretched beneath.

Digitized by Google

"Like a waving sea of glittering gold."

When they companied together in the careless days of lost enjoyment, George and Fanny had best loved to rove through the broken glades and tangled paths of the forest dells and depths; but not so the rural belles now congregated at Buck Island. There were two established promenades trodden by them in preference to the finished vistas of the extensive gardens, or the wilder recesses of the picturesque domain. One was a broad road, whose gentle meanders, bounded on one side by the zig-zag fence, that hedged in the low grounds, led along the foot of the hills already described, to the crossing-place at the creek, where an enormous log, spanning the stream, presented a rude bridge to the footsteps of passengers, and a convenient station for such ladies as chose to angle for the admiration of the gentlemen fishers, scattered up and down the banks hereabouts. These fair flirts, with pretty shrieks and gestures of mimick terror, impelled each other along the narrow and slippery pass—or gathering together, pretended to watch and disturb the motions of the mocassins and other water snakes, that harboured among the moss and floating vegetation, intermixed with drift wood and loose branches, which the force of the current lodged against the sides of the log. The object of these coquettish manœuvres being effected, it was the pleasantest thing imaginable, for the whole party to saunter along the banks of the clear brown waters, now shaded by high rocks broken into every fantastic variety of form—then edged with a soft slope of mossy turf—or widening into a strand of hard white sand, refreshing to the eye, and firm yet moist to the foot, enclosed between projections of the dark grey cliffs,—while the leafy garniture, feathering the sides, crowning the summits of the steeps, and forming a rich back ground to the picture, waved emblazoned with all the hues of gorgeous autumn, from full crimson, bright orange, and deep Tyrian purple, to the faint, whitish green of the leaf, just fading into brown.

The other, and most agreeable walk, was along the grand approach to the house, which, after threading a wild bit of forest scenery, ran down the long winding hill, and on through two or three gates, till, having traversed the low grounds, it terminated at what was called, par excellence, the fishery. This was an islet, lying just where the creek and river met,—whose velvet verdure of emerald green, and diadem of lofty elms and beeches, overhung with the wild grape vines in all their festooned luxuriance of tendrill and clustering fruitage, rendered it a chief and charming print in the water view. The high banks to the north-east, shelving down to the river, suddenly broadened into a spacious beach with fixtures complete for hauling the seine; and here on a large tabular rock, sacred to the annual banquet, and lying beneath the willows, whose long, wreathy branches swept the stream, the first fruits of the shad season were, according to immemorial usage, broiled and eaten, even if it chanced that the successful cast of the nets, summoned the lord of the manor from his midnight rest to honor the festival observance. As cool and sequestered as a grotto, yet within sight and hearing of the lively stir and hum always within and about a mill-house; the islet was the favourite haunt of all "true brethren of the angle"—and as such enticed the dainty steps of the lady-pedestrians, not to share but to spoil the unsocial spot. At sundown, all preparations being there made for what was esteemed the most choice of regales, the scattered groups met at the cow-pen to drink syllabub warm from the cow; then succeeded a sumptuous supper, as many as fifty dishes being often displayed on the board,—after which the old people sat down to cards, and the younger inmates closed the evening with a merry dance.

*This description is taken from the celebrated seat of Scotch Town in Hanover County, long the favourite residence of Patrick Henry.

Digitized by Google

Nor did the females of the party dispense with those experiments of a private and bewitching nature invariably practised on occasions like the present. Prompted by the inquisitive impulse of womankind, they were apt to steal away from the public gambols, and betake themselves to the performance of those lighter modifications of superstitious rites, a belief in which constituted one of the characteristic traits of the age. The interpretation of dreams then composed a science as honourable and approved as in the time of Joseph; witches and goblins were universally recognized as infesting the land; signs and prognostics carefully compared and explained; and in a word, the system of demonology was complete. Much of this strain of ideal terrors, was, perhaps, derived, in the first instance, from the negro menials, who, coming of a race besotted with strange imaginations of sorcerers, spectres, and all the absurd imagery of their African creed, and hardly daring to stir out singly after dark, dealt in the most marvellous narratives of omens and apparitions; at any rate, their wild outpourings to the ear of infancy and youth, tended greatly to nourish the visionary turn of mind so general and so infectious. Few at the remote period herein commemorated, had the hardihood to dissent from an article of faith so firmly established as the tenet of spiritual interference in human affairs; and in the country especially, positive scepticism on a subject deemed so awful and so veritable, seldom occurred. The contagion pervaded even the highest orders of society, who, though not absolutely acquiescing in the doctrine of ghostly agency, were far from inwardly despising its mysteries, even when they affected to test them out of pure fun. In this way there rarely happened a gathering of young persons, particularly if the more credulous sex predominated, the individuals whereof failed to try their fortune by some of the minor ceremonies, similar to the Scottish observances of Halloween.

The propensity to dabble in these spells, something too serious, as they were supposed, for jest, moved most of the fair guests at Buck Island, who, without, however, admitting their male attendants to a knowledge of what was held as sacred as the worship of the Bona Dea, had each one essayed her peculiar charm, and been rewarded for the patience and daring, that wound the ball, or eat the apple, or underwent St. Agnes's fast by a glimpse of her destined partner in the airy semblance of some distinguished beau of the day.

These auguries, received sometimes as matter of sport, but oftener in grave and prophetic earnest, served to create no small mirth among the giddy girls, who ventured on an appeal so solemn; but Fanny, laughing to scorn the whole ritual of incantations, had as yet stooped to meddle with none of them. Doubly shielded by the lack of that dangerous attribute, a high and excitable imagination, and by a bolder spirit than belongs to her sex, having been infused in her by her father, a resolute contemner of all superstitions, Miss Bland placed no faith in the idle hallucinations infatuating those around her: still in the bottom of her heart, and despite all the arguments of her better sense, there lurked a secret and portentous dread of tempting by any ordeal a stern revelation of the will of fate. Swayed by this latent and nameless premonition, no less than by the strong disbelief of principle and reason, she long resisted the taunts and ridicule of her gay companions, who stigmatized her forbearance as cowardice. If the lovely heiress piqued herself upon aught, it was on her freedom from that womanly weakness; all doubts, and scruples yielded to her solicitude to vindicate herself from such a reproach; a reproach that borrowed some semblance of truth from her pertinacity in declining the test, by which her accusers had all evinced their more than Amazonian intrepidity.

The most potent and dangerous spell consisted in "eating the dumb cake,"—and this the "Bland beauty," as her visitors styled her, made choice of, with a view to signalize her superiority of courage. The rite required to be performed alone, at midnight, in her own sleeping chamber, which, according to the arrangement of every country house in Virginia, opened within that of her parents, through which the sole access lay. Here in spite of her natural and acquired bravery, our young heroine felt her heart beat violently, as she went through the preparatory ceremonial, which concluded by doffing the mystic garment, that, with one sleeve dripping from its immersion in the vessel filled at the haunted spot, where three streams met, was to be hung ready for the dexterous turn, by which the incorporeal visitant was to manifest his presence: this done she retired to bed to await the important, perhaps perilous, issue. Awe-struck, and trembling in every limb, the fair appellant of supernatural power, yet looked and listened in an intensity of excessive, but not alarmed, expectation. All around lay hushed in a stillness as if of death; none of the nocturnal sounds, common about a rustic abode, disturbed a silence soon beginning to be felt as portentously oppressive: no lowing of cattle—no cackling of fowls—no voices or whistle of belated labourers was heard to invade the deep tranquility of the night. Even the very whip-poor-wills, that, from dusk to dawn, were wont to clamour so dolefully and incessantly in the surrounding woods, forbore to utter one solitary cry. Within doors every sound had long since died away; the revellers, lately so flush with the life and noise of enjoyment, were all lulled to profound repose,—and not a murmer rose to break the intolerable stillness, save the piping of the tempestuous autumnal wind, as it rustled and moaned among the boughs of the huge walnut trees standing in the yard, and howled loudly and fiercely about the windows and chimneys of the house. At length the great clock in the hall striking twelve, announced the witching hour of the night—that hour, when she was to behold, as in a glass, the primary personage and event of after life. The deep knell fell with a hollow and ominous sound on Fanny's ear, rendered nervously acute by keen attention; but she fixed a steady and sharpened gaze on the spot, where her matrimonial fortune was to be figured forth in the phantom —double of the future spouse. Now, for the first time, was the secret inclination of her heart unveiled to her, as the image and the name of George Meredith came on her fancy and her lips as the one dearest to her on earth, and whose bride alone she wished to be. Raising herself on her elbow, and putting back her clustering curls that fell over her heavenly brow, she strained each sense of sight and hearing to the uttermost. The last stroke slowly echoed through the spacious building, when a faint groan was uttered near her, and the shadow of an outline, dim and undefined, crossed her aching vision, at the far end of the room; the fitful flashes, darting upward from the hearth, gleamed on something broad and bright which was thrice waved on high, and sheathed in the ample vesture, intended as the object of a greeting far different. The shapeless shadow vanished—the flames burnt low and pale—and all again was vacancy and silence. Instinctively the fair searcher into the mysteries of futurity, shrunk back, and shrouded herself beneath the coverled; awhile she lay breathless and with eyes shut, the words of prayer and holy adjuration faltering on her tongue. But Fanny was bold beyond her sex and years; re-assured by the perfect stillness that reigned around, she ventured, by degrees, to uncover her head; the high wind had sunk into a dead calm—and she heard only the big rain drops pattering heavily against the window panes. Slowly and fearfully, she unclosed those large blue orbs, outsparkling the sapphire's blaze; they encountered nothing, in her hasty glance around the wide old chamber, but each well-kown piece of furniture, and the chair conspicuously placed before the fire, and sustaining the vestment of showy lawn, which had received, and yet bore the elfin token. The influence of that principle, which woman is said to have inherited from the remotest antiquity, roused her to instant resolution; she wrapped herself in a long dressing gown, that lay ready on the bed,—and in a tremor of rising hopes and fears, stole on tip-toe across the floor, starting and holding in her breath, as the planks creaked under her light tread. As she seized and shook the linen with an agitated grasp, something fell from its folds, and rang like metal on the ground; eagerly she stooped to pick up what her haste had displaced, and shuddering with terror at the ill portent before her, had well nigh dropped it again. It was, as one quick look sufficed to show, an antique dagger of extraordinary size, and crested with heraldic devices. Relinquishing her hold of it, Miss Bland sunk into a seat, unable to obey her first impulse of flying into the next apartment, and arousing her parents. But this moment of terror over, she restraindd herself, from the fear of provoking the endless raillery of those, whose credulity she had so derided. After a short interval, and summoning all her courage to her aid, she lifted the weapon, foreshowing to her startled fancy, a fatal doom, and going to a chest of drawers, deposited and locked it in one of them. Then again seeking, and scarcely able to attain her couch, she betook herself to fervent orisons; and thus endeavouring to banish the thrill of horror, that pondered on an omen so appalling, she continued by turns, to tremble and to pray. So passed the weary hours of that memorable night.

Digitized by Google

The sun was just rising as Miss Bland started from a heavy slumber, and strove to shake off the panic of the preceding night, which still impressed her like a fearful dream. She sat up in bed, and tried to collect her scattered senses, disordered by such a paroxism of fright and remorse as Scott describes in one, who had invoked the some-what similar oracle of the Taghairm. Little by little, however, these painful sensations passed away,—and her mind, cheered by the soothing influence of the "sweet hour of prime," gradually regained its usual firmness of tone. The empurpled east glowed with the kindling beams of rosy morn; the air was redolent of sweet scents, and pleasant sounds; and all nature seemed to awaken sedately glad beneath the mild, attempered ray of the autumnal sun. Examined under the broad light of day, and by one, whose constitutional deficiency in the disturbing quality of an ardent imagination, rendered her little obnoxious to the phantasms of superstition,—the hideous visions of her past vigil, resolved themselves into air, and she could but wonder at her own weakness in being thus wrought on by what she now rationally construed into the vague illusion of uneasy sleep. Suddenly a new apprehension assailed her; recollecting that she still retained tangible proof of the reality of the scene, the trembling beauty ran to seek the dagger, which, sleeping or waking, she had so carefully laid away. Shivering with nervous trepidation, she unlocked the drawer, that held it, and sought it long and heedfully —but in vain. The magic steel had disappeared like the unearthly hand that wielded it; and Fanny, a fresh load of doubt and dread removed from her breast, fell on her knees, and in a spirit most humbly and contritely grateful, proceeded to offer up her matinal devotions. These over, and her tumultuous state of feelings subsiding into a holy calm, she suffered her attendant, Phillis, of whose presence she now became aware, to dress her. This girl, labouring like most of her colour, under a violence of curiosity, that established, beyond a question, her derivation from mother Eve, had eyed the motions of her young mistress as intently as the latter watched those of the ill-omened spirit. Like all ladies' maids, a sort of confident, Phillis had assisted about the previous arrangements of the hazardous midnight emprize,—and now stood bursting with impatience to hear the particulars of an adventure, to her simple ken no less daring than Ulysses' descent to the infernal regions might have seemed to his warrior-train. Miss Bland however appearing in no hurry to open the conversation, Phillis, relying on her general good nature and condescension, took upon herself to commence it, most volubly huddling question upon question, and one exclamation on the back of another. But her lady, instead of gratifying her flippant inquisitiveness, commanded her to silence in accents so unwonted and authoritative that poor Phillis, utterly astounded, seized the first opportunity of retreating to the kitchen with the news that "Miss Fanny was certainly bewitched by the hob-goblins that had like to have carried her off during the night."

Digitized by Google

Hardly was one querist dismissed, ere Miss Bland found herself obliged to contend with a host of them; being broken in upon by an irruption of her lively young friends, all wild for an account of the occurrences of the night. Fanny, overwhelmed by the torrent of interrogatories, had no chance to put in a word till the whole party entered Lady Bland's chamber. Here all were respectfully silent before their elders; and after the usual embraces, exchanged between the parents and daughter, Fanny answered the sarcastic banter of Sir Rezin, and the anxious inquiries of her mother by a full relation of the horrors that beset what she termed her wilful wicked watch. Her juvenile auditors listened in breathless credence and dismay; Lady Bland, as weakly superstitious as any old Highland crone or Guinea negress, turned deadly pale at the mention of a token so terrific; and their joint ejaculations and incoherent expressions of pity and alarm, had well nigh frightened the object of their concern into fits. Luckily, the worthy knight, above such vulgar prejudices, was at hand to counteract their preposterous, but mischievous conclusions. Calling his "sweet Fanny" to him, he warned her tenderly, yet with the assured air of one, enlightened by reason and philosophy, against the folly—nay, sin, of suffering herself to be disquieted by the mere terror of a disagreeable but empty dream. His discourse, though not without effect in encouraging the beauteous visionary, was but coldly received by the prepossessed minds of his other hearers, who adjourned to the breakfast-room, firmly persuaded of the truth of the inauspicious augury,—and looking on the envied heiress as a being denounced and doomed.

The like gloomy forebodings, too, made a deep impression on the kind and elegant mistress of the mansion; but her wiser husband, trusting in the strength of his arguments, and Fanny's good sense to second them, had other and more important matters in his head. Designing a temporary removal to Williamsburg, he had given orders to have his town-house got in readiness for the immediate reception of the family. Unpleasant as such an interview would prove on several accounts, he still conceived some explanation due to his ward, of whose character the guardian had not been idly unobservant. Their guests were to leave them on the following day; Sir Rezin, therefore, summoned Meredith to his study, and affected to consult him confidentially, touching the prospects of his darling daughter. He neither felt nor expressed displeasure at the natural consequence of the young man's association with his lovely cousin; being sure that, by addressing him on a strain of appeal to his honor, he could at once, (and not otherwise) carry his point. The fond yet ambitious father dwelt on his great expectations for his unrivalled heiress,—dilating on her beauty, her many accomplishments, her warm and unoccupied heart,—and on the brilliant match, which, in virtue of such rare endowments, he reckoned on her speedily contracting. Observing how few, delicately circumstanced as George had been, would have come out of the furnace unscathed, he complimented him on those strict principles of integrity, that had so well stood the test, to which he had ventured to subject them from parental anxiety to secure a brother for the sole girl, to whom Heaven had denied one; and with a mixture of dignity and energy, thanked his auditor, speechless from excess of interest, for having scorned to abuse the trust reposed in him by himself and Lady Bland: he ended by saying that George would, no doubt, coincide with him in thinking his education such as to qualify him for the place already engaged in the compting-house of an eminent importer of Bremo, on James River, where it would be the special care of his protector to accelerate his admission into a partnership in the establishment. Sir Rezin had intended to give his protege the advantages of a course at William and Mary; but that was now out of the question. He was about to take his daughter to town in order that the gaieties of the Metropolis and the assiduities of numerous lovers might wear out a childish partiality from her heart: hence it would never do to keep the person who had made the dangerous impression perpetually at her elbow. 'Tis true the foreign universities were open to young Meredith; but the prudent father cared not to increase the native attractions of his dependant, by imparting to them the polish inseparable from a residence abroad. It became requisite, therefore, to provide for the final settlement of him, who had been so unfortunately, for its peace, introduced into the domestic circle of the Blands; and though with a severe pang to his generous feelings, Sir Rezin resolved to crush, at once, the high hopes, which his patronage had fostered, by transferring the humble relative of his wife, to a situation, eligible indeed, but infinitely below that, to which he had been, heretofore, taught to aspire.

Conscience-stricken, and sensible of having transgressed the spirit, if not the letter of his benefactor's confidence in him, Meredith listened without reply or disclamation till Sir Rezin ceased to speak. Even then he could, with difficulty, find words to declare his gratitude, and to signify his compliance, in all things, with the wishes of his more than parent. But the few unconnected sentences, which his agitation allowed him to stammer forth, the penetrating knight adroitly eked out, and answered in terms of satisfaction and approval. He finished the conference by presenting George with a draft of some amount on his merchant at Richmond, assured him of his constant favor and assistance, and in case of his own death, recommended, in earnest and pathetic phrase, Lady Bland and his adopted sister to his dutiful and brotherly regard. The youth would fain have refused the pecuniary evidence of Sir Rezin's approbation; but the latter, good-humouredly commanding his young friend to pocket it, walked out of the apartment, after laying the check on the table before him.

Digitized by Google

The next morning beheld Buck Island consigned to even more than pristine quiet and monotony; the company being all gone—Meredith engaged in preparing for his sudden and permanent change of abode—and the Lady Bland by turns absorbed in maternal anxieties and melancholy presentiments, which last she had, however, self-command enough to keep to herself. Never had Fanny seen her beloved home, wear an aspect so totally desolate. She had looked forward with fond certainty to the departure of their visitors as the epoch, whence to date the renewal of happiness and the old friendship between herself and her cousin; but, to her exceeding surprise and sorrow, he, far from responding to her timed advances, shunned her more sedulously than ever. Some days passed by in this way; the desheartened girl drooping under a repulse as unexpected as it appeared unkind, and permitting her thoughts to brood continually over the apprehension of a destiny evil beyond that menaced by the pressage so disastrous, and perchace, too true. Sir Rezin was not slow to note the alteration in her looks and manner, which he ascribed in part to the real cause; for while her ladyship held it impious to slight or defy a supernatural warning, even when conveyed through the medium of a dream, and concluded her daughter to be naturally affected by the unlucky import of hers,—the more rational father, by no means suspected his idol, fortified as her mind was by his precept and example, of such disgraceful apostacy from their mutual creed as the lending herself to the dominion of vagaries so wild and weakening. Neither would he, for an instant, allow a possibility still more degrading, to wit: that the descendant of the ancient and haughty house of Bland, renowned since the reign of Cœur de Lion, could so far forget her illustrious lineage, as to degenerate into a love-sick mourner over the loss of an inferior, though meritorious favourite: he rather supposed her given up to the ennui, always arising from over-excitement, and in the present instance, heightened by the prospect of indefinite and irksome seclusion. But however much the proud couple differed as to the origin, they perfectly agreed in a remedy for the disease; neither purposing such ill policy as to let their beauty pine away her youth in solitude. Their idea of spending the approaching winter in Williamsburg, had been casually canvassed among the gay party just dispersed; so that Miss Bland was no stranger to the plan. Still it was with a fresh thrill of pleasure that she heard Sir Rezin, in answer to her playful complaints of the dull and lonesome villa, proclaim his design of setting off, without delay, for town, in order to be in time for the entry of Lord Botetourt, with whom he had been particularly intimate in England. But poor Fanny's delight at this intelligence, immediately sustained a severe shock; its main source being destroyed by a few simple words from her father, which, when, with a return of her former ingenuousness, she openly rejoiced that her cousin George would thus continue with them, unfolded the arrangement, whereby, instead of repairing to College, he was to go, for good and all, in another direction. Notwithstanding her strenuous efforts to suppress them, the astonished maiden's tears began to flow in a profusion that happily saved her from swooning or suffocation; and starting up in an agony of grief and shame, she flew out of the room to vent her feelings in the privacy of her own sleeping bower. Sir Rezin and Lady Bland observed and too well understood the expressive avowal of those silent drops; but each had predetermined to be wilfully blind to all demonstrations of an attachment, which they considered it as their bounden duty to disallow.

Meanwhile, like a disembodied spirit haunting the scenes of earthly bliss, George Meredith wandered about the groves and glades of Buck Island. The late conversation with his patron had been of power to harrow up his very soul—and to excruciate him with the torments of the damned: the loftiest and the tenderest impulses of his nature had been alike wounded by parts of it. For hours afterwards his mind was a chaos of distraction and despair; and when partially restored to a state of sane and dispassionate judgment, its alternations of high and tranquilising resolve, of wild despondency, and resentful rage, aptly exemplified that tale of the royal board, daily bespread with dainties, fit for the gods, yet to be wasted and polluted by the ravages of the insatiate Harpies. At one moment, his heart, melting with a grateful sense of the parental kindness, the delicate observance hitherto treating him as a son and equal, became soothed and exalted into a sublime and delicious composure by a firm determination to persevere in the stern course, prescribed as the fiery ordeal of his desert: even the ecstacies of happy love excelled not the elevating, though transient glow, enkindled by these heroic musings. Then the bitter conviction of his complete and implied dependence, of his presumption so covertly rebuked, of the unworthy contrast of his extrinsic inferiority to her, who was still his kinswoman—and till now his companion, darkened his soul like the overshadowing wings of the foul mythological monsters, and swallowing up each ennobling and consolatory emotion, left it filled with the confusion and fury of madness. But it was not for one, upright, rational and clear sighted as was Meredith, long to persist in this fierce and uncandid mood. After the first pangs of mortified pride had abated, he could not but own the truth and justice of the offensive innuendoes, administered, as they were, in the guise of commendation. He felt and acknowledged the generosity of Sir Rezin's conduct, and his own slender claims to so much goodness; a goodness, which, in place of punishing, or even reproving his amorous folly, had exercised the most considerate indulgence of its weakness. He was conscious that his patron had probed the secret of his breast—that the confession of his rash passion, otherwise demanded of him by honour, was thereby rendered useless, if not supererogatory. He knew that he was trusted—and must prove himself trust-worthy. The path of duty and virtue, though thorny and dismal, lay straight before him, and he solemnly swore to tread it with a steady and unreceding step. But the unhappy young man soon discovered that it was one thing to bind himself in his solitary meditations, by such a vow—and another to adhere to it, when hourly tempted to its violation, by the angel figure of her he adored, hovering around him, all smiles and tender complaisance. He found, to his cost, that

Digitized by Google

"Few can hold a fire in hand,
"By thought upon the frosty Caucasus,"— and that his only safety was to be sought in flight: so, on the fourth day after the explanation between himself and the knightly proprietor of Buck Island, he left the home of his childhood, the paradise of his youth, the anticipated asylum of his maturer years, to seek his fortune among strangers and superiors.

The charming being, for loving whom he was now an exile, sustained by her displeasure at George's marked avoidance, no less than by her desire to efface all remembrance of her unseasonable and excessive burst of sorrow, behaved herself like a heroine, when in his general leave-taking of the family after supper, on saying "good-night!" for the last time, he kissed and bade "God bless her!" But for weeks and months the plaintive tenderness of those parting accents thrilled on her ear, rendering her insensible to all other vows and protestations, even though sanctified by that authority, which she reverenced as the mandate of the Deity. Long before day-break, Meredith was gone,—leaving Fanny with every faculty of head and heart benumbed by the bereavement.

It cut Sir Rezin to the quick to see the object of his paternal dotage, fading away from her glow of sprightly beauty into a pale and moping shadow of her former self. Judging nothing else necessary to renovate her bloom and gaiety, but a translation into the splendid sphere of a mimic court, he abridged the period of their continuance in the country; and in an incredibly short space, the inhabitants of Buck Island found themselves on the road to the seat of government. Many a backward look did the pensive Fanny cast on her birth-place; where, much as she had lately longed to escape from its (to her) storied apartments and walks, she now felt as if she could linger forever. The mansion-house, overtopped by the ascending amphitheatre of blue mountains, was long visible to the fond gaze, that dwelt on it as on the face of a valued friend, seen for the last time; its environs, despoiled of their foliage and verdure, and saddened by the gray mists of an early November morning, impressed the melancholy fancy of the fair hypochondriac as emblematical of her own decline; and with many a long-drawn sigh, she passed through scenery so familiar and so consonant with the strain of feeling, which made her internally exclaim,

"My May of life
"Has fall'n into the sear, the yellow leaf."

But ere they had proceeded many miles, the excitement of motion, and the novelty to one so little locomotive, of objects common to every rural transit, produced the hoped-for effect on a young and vivacious mind; and the parents, who lived but in their child, congratulated themselves on the judicious measure taken in this journey, as they viewed the tender colour stealing over Fanny's cheek, already dimpled with something like one of her wonted smiles.

It being a prime object with Sir Rezin to get to town early enough to attend his noble friend in his ceremonial reception by the House of Burgesses, the travellers pressed on with all the speed possible, to six blooded black horses, with flowing manes and tails, imported from the mother-country along with the carriage, coachman and postillions,—and drawing the whole distance of two hundred miles, a coachee, heavy with carving and moulding, and capacious as a moderate sized dwelling. But the anxious courtier found himself doomed to some portion of the disappointment, which, through his agency, embittered the lot of others; being attacked by a sudden and violent fit of the gout, at the house of a patrician friend, appointed as one of their stopping places in King and Queen County, for persons of distinction rarely tried the accommodations of the paltry inns along the road side. The philosophic knight, who carried his theory of patience into practice, endured the delay and his physical tortures with an equanimity worthy of Epictetus; but it was no slight trial to her ladyship, that in lieu of witnessing the grand procession arrayed around the state coach, which, with its glittering trappings, gilded wheels, and eight milk-white steeds in rich caparisons, enshrined the dazzling figure of Lord Botetourt, shining like a gemmed image, in his suit of gold tissue and white satin, and chapeau buttoned with a loop of diamonds, which precious decorations blazed on other parts of his dress,—she was forced to put up with a mere second-hand description of the glories of the scene. Fanny, like a young girl, unused to splendid ceremonies, had longed at first to see the show; but her thoughts were wholly occupied by her father and his sufferings from the spasmodic twinges of his complaint. After a fortnight's confinement, Sir Rezin became rapidly convalescent—and the party soon resumed their route in good health and spirits. Miss Bland, though her mind was far from at ease, struggled earnestly, and not unsuccessfully, against her sorrow and her love. Nothing so much contributed to re-establish her serenity, as the ungrateful and capricious neglect, with which she imagined herself repaid by him, to whom she had surrendered the treasury of her pure and ardent affections. Every emotion of feminine pride and delicacy roused to resentment by Meredith's studied coldness, she determined to tear the remembrance of that thankless cousin from her bosom, if the effort cost her her life's best blood; but she had been so long accustomed to love and cherish him, first as a brother, and then as a friend, his idea was so closely and indissolubly interwoven with every thought and memory of her past existence, that hitherto the attempt had seemed like halving her heart. But she was now thrown into a new world, where the allurements of pleasure, the sighs of other wooers, and the adulation of society might triumphantly contend with a secret and unrequited partiality.

Digitized by Google

The Blands reached Williamsburg in safety, and were welcomed by crowds of friends and parasites. The richest and loveliest heiress in Virginia had only to show herself to be adored; and her arrival was celebrated in prose and verse by the wits of the town as dividing public attention with the entree of the new Governor. But conscious as was the young beauty of her surpassing charms, she yet trembled to encounter general notice in a fashionable assembly—to undergo the searching gaze of the many, the supercilious criticism of the fastidious few—the false yet flattering eulogy so often derisive of the object it pretends to deify. She panted for applause, yet dreaded to be mocked or condemned: nor were her fears altogether groundless. In those days, when the "Ancient Dominion" was irradiated with a galaxy of female loveliness, from the resplendent Byrd "to the pretty Miss Fountain" (designated by that epithet as the chief of three Sister-graces) the men had grown hypercritical in beauty. It was necessary to be faultless in order to be approved, and of this, the Albemarle toast was apprehensively aware. But her modest self-distrust was soon banished by the award of those judges, whose voice gave law in such matters—and who unanimously affirmed that Fanny Bland, just then sixteen, transcended her mother, the famous Miss Wolverine, in personal charms. And in truth, for a blonde, our heroine might have been pronounced a piece of perfection. Eyes as soft and bright and blue as the azure "of Heaven's own tinct"—locks profuse and waving like the "golden hair" of Hope, with a complexion, a face, and form, as fresh, as fair, and as aerial as those of Guido's Aurora, qualified her to pass for an animated transcript of that personation of the Goddess of the morning. And if at times, the changes of an exquisite sensibility paled the hue of her cheek, and imparted a dewy sadness to her downward glance, it only added to the interest, without detracting from the symmetry of her beauty. Besides, the simple notions of her cotemporaries reckoned her highly accomplished; for an adept in every species of elegant needle and handiwork, she likewise performed finely on the harpsichord—and the dying falls of her clear voice, as sweet and spontaneous as the warble of a bird, sunk into the very soul, as she sung some touching old ballad or new English song. Unlike our present race of fair linguists, her music dealt not in French romances or Italian bravuras,—and, shocking to relate, her admirers esteemed her not the less for such a paucity of science and languages. Such rare attractions as those above enumerated, taken into consideration, with the certainty of their being appended to them the reversion of a half-dozen of the finest estates in the Colony, it may be supposed that the "Bland beauty" created a vast sensation among the ton of the Metropolis. As many lovers forthwith laid suit to the heiress of Buck Island, &c. &c. as to the heiress of Bruges; and if not with equal publicity, their pretensions were advanced with, to the full, as great formality. The unrefined ideas of our plain ancestors invested the father with the absolute disposal of his child,—and out of compliment to this right as well as to defeat any ulterior and insidious designs on the part of the wooer, the established usage required him to address himself, first, to the higher powers: hence, no gentleman presumed to pay his court to a young lady without the preliminary of "asking leave of the house," as his application to the parent or guardian went in familiar phrase. Only two or three of the competitors for Miss Bland's favour—and those of too high standing to brook the contumely of a dismissal by proxy, were honored with the paternal permission; the rest met on the threshold with a civil though stately denial; for Sir Rezin had already pitched upon a suitable husband for his admirable daughter.

On the second Sunday after they got to town, Sir Rezin, Lady Bland and their divine heiress made their first public appearance at the principle church. The proud knight, like most Englishmen of family, was a staunch Episcopalian, and a regular church-goer to boot; her ladyship conformed to his mode of worship, as a matter of duty, and the young Fanny had been bred up in the strict tenets of that sect. Of course this distinguished trio took possession of the upper pew, (for at that rude period the seats in the house of God remained unsold) which corresponded with that set apart for the Royal Governor, and bearing in letters of gold on a ground of purple velvet, the name of Alexander Spottswood, not yet replaced by the insignia of the present incumbent of the chair of State. Within the ample curtains of the same rich material, Lord Botetourt and his suite were already seated, and taking cognizance of the clergyman and congregation. Immediately the opposite pew, graced by the belle of the day, constituted the centre of attraction. "The pure and eloquent blood speaking" in Fanny's transparent cheek, evinced her painful embarrassment under such general and oppressive scrutiny, which, however, relaxed not for all her symptoms of discomposure. Whether it was that the variable hues of her complexion, adorned her anew—or that his fated hour was come, we cannot undertake to decide; but certain it is, a young Scottish nobleman, who had come over as an attache to the official train, and as a single man and a lord, had himself been, so far, "the observed of all observers," fixed, during the long hours of the offices and sermon, on the lovely mountaineer, a gaze, whose intensity approached to fascination: it was, in power and duration, similar to that, by which the serpent is said to ensnare his prey. When the service was over, and the Blands, in walking down the aisle, exchanged salutations and sentences with their august friend, the Governor, he presented this inveterate starer to Sir Rezin and the ladies as Lord Malcolm Irvine, second son to the duke of Roxburgh. The young nobleman immediately attached himself to the side of Miss Bland, and she left the church attended by her titled escort, and followed by the ill wishes of all the envious fair ones present. Nor did Lord Malcolm and his new acquaintances part company at their coach-door; being invited to a seat in the vehicle, he accompanied them home,—and hereafter, spent every leisure moment—that is to say two-thirds of his time—in endeavoring to recommend himself to her, who had so instantaneously enthralled him. 'Tis true he had not, as yet, complied with the form always introductory to a set courtship; but the acute knight, willing to strain a point in favour of a personage so illustrious, accepted the constancy of his visits and assiduities as declarative of his ultimate purpose, and hailed the prospect of such alliance with unfeigned pride and joy. Her ladyship, too, exulted in the vanity of her heart over a conquest so glorious, and so far exceeding what her most sanguine speculations had devised, for her daughter's matrimonial settlement.

Digitized by Google

Not so, the artless country girl, who was the object of Lord Malcolm's devoirs,—from which she shrunk with a repugnance, not wholly inexplicable. Of noble birth, and accomplished in graces of mind and body, the young foreigner seemed possessed of qualities to ensure admiration and even a softer sentiment; but there was that about him, obvious to the slightest observer, that soon chilled all warmer emotions into cold respect, not unmingled with awe. Dark, pale, and sad, his countenance bore the stamp of inward care; and the effect of his fine features was at times, marred by an expression revolting and indescribable, which at once checked the kindly flow of human sympathies towards him. Akin in contour and complexion to the natives of Southern Europe, rather than to the fair and ruddy Caledonian; his eyes, black as the raven locks of his head, often gleamed with such strange and ghastly lustre as those accused, in the olden time, of communing with the dead, were said to contract in their occult and unhallowed intercourse. His manner partook of the gloomy cast evidently pervading his mind; and though he would occasionally rally and exhibit in lively colloquy, much satirical and descriptive power, there was oftener perceptible through his faint atttempts to diguise it, a depth of despondency, a wild and reckless wretchedness, apparently tinged with a horrible anticipation of something monstrous, to be endured or done. In short, his whole appearance embodied the ideas, set forth in German tales, of mysticism and diablerie, of a being fore-warned of his predestination to deeds of guilt and woe. According to rumors afterwards floating hitherward from his native land, Lord Malcolm was a victim to the visitations of the second sight,—and in one of those trances when his

"Eye intent
"Was on the vision'd future bent,"

had seen some frightful prefiguration of his own after-fortune. Since when, (as the report farther bore,) plunged in stern and silent misery, he had hurried from one clime to another, from solitude to cities, in the vain endeavour to escape from himself, and the phantom terrors, racking his overspent brain. True or false, this tradition, credited by many, contained a plausible commentary on the text presented in the person and singular deportment of the dark-browed Irvine; still subject as he was to such unsettling and whimsical spells, Lord Malcolm was in many respects, well worthy to be loved. A chivalrous courage and magnanimity of sentiment, involving the absence of all low and selfish traits of character—a temper, venting itself, on strong provocation, in tremendous bursts of passion. but otherwise even, placable, and long suffering—with a fund of deep and tender sensibility, and "a hand open as day to melting charity," composed a sum of excellence, capable, if duly appreciated, of counterpoising the involuntary prejudice against his unnatural aspect, and habits of extraordinary and spectre-seeking abstraction. Yet notwithstanding his many good gifts, the mere presence of Lord Malcolm seemed to operate as an antidote against affection and fellow feeling. His own family endured rather than enjoyed his relationship,—his acquaintances ripened not into the regard of friendship—his very domestics, almost emancipated from service by his mild and bounteous rule, repaid it by indifference and ingratitude. In one point of view only, was the cadet of the house of Roxburgh sought and smiled upon. Immensely rich from heiring his mother's estates, young, handsome, and a nobleman, his amorous approaches had been encouraged, in his own and other lands, by the high-born, the lovely, and the witty, all emulous of an establishment so brilliant. In Williamsburg, among an aristocratic set, infatuated with reverential homage for British rank and title, he found himself not barely caressed—but worshipped. The least notice from the noble Scot, sufficed to turn the head of the lady so graced: no wonder, then, that the happy heiress, who had the fortune to fascinate him, heard herself envied and congratulated on all sides, as she moved amid the admiration and the pageantries of the great and gay world. But Fanny, insensible to the felicity of her lot, languished to escape from the lively round, and the fetters, preparing, as she dreaded, to bind her for life to a man, from whom she was utterly and unconquerably averse.

The winter was now far advanced; Lord Malcolm had proposed in form for Miss Bland, to the infinite satisfaction of her father,—by whom he was immediately presented to the reluctant daughter as her future husband. And now, for the first time, and in the most important crisis of her life, the spoiled child—as she was called—of nature and fortune, found her prayers and representations disregarded by her parents. Assuming her heart to be meanly set on a union with the humble companion of her childish years, both father and mother looked upon themselves as fulfilling a sacred accountability in using all means to avert a catastrophe so ignominious. The surest method of accomplishing this, was by matching her with a person, in every respect her mate. The alliance with Lord Malcolm exceeded even their loftiest expectations,—and in urging—nay commanding, their daughter to accept it, they conceived themselves literally to snatch a brand from the burning. Fanny could oppose to their fluent and emphatic dissertations on the rank and splendor and desert of him she wished to reject nothing save her positive and insurmountable abhorrence of any marriage; especially with the present candidate for her hand. Of him, she professed a peculiar dislike—or rather absolute loathing: yet when Sir Rezin, so far relenting from what he deemed a needful severity, gave her the option of selecting another from among her patrician suitors,—the poor girl, in all the agonies of irresolution, unable to make a second choice, or to own her whole soul devoted to that kinsman, who had tacitly refused to reciprocate its preference, could only answer by silence and tears; and the knight, not unreasonably chafed at her thus trifling with his well-meant indulgence, proceeded to act upon the consent, which he pronounced in her name, by arranging with the bridegroom-elect the settlement preliminary to an event so grand and momentous. To her mother, the despairing Fanny then ventured on a half appeal, as to a woman, who had wedded from motives, not of interest, but of inclination; but, though her agitated pleadings would have been listened to, where an ordinary lover was concerned,—Lady Bland, dazzled by the lustre of a ducal coronet, (for the feeble state of the heir-apparent made Lord Malcolm's succession to the dukedom a probable circumstance) would hear nothing tending to disparage his merit and pretensions. Even her daughter's strong allusion to the evil destiny that menaced her conjugal state, failed to awaken the superstitious terrors recently vibrating in her ladyship's breast; she laughed at Fanny's ridiculous reminiscence—drew a bright picture of the felicity and magnificence about to bless her married lot—and kissing the blanched cheek, that belied her prediction, hastened away to consult about and order the wedding finery.

Digitized by Google

Sir Rezin now touched the acme of his grandeur, from which he was ill inclined to be swayed by the puerile objections of his daughter. Besides it both angered and wounded him to suspect her of insincerity, and of aiming to make dupes of her parents. He could not bear that his "pride and pet" (his name of endearment for her) should slyly entertain a hope of overreaching him, and of finally prevailing on his sanction to her degrading passion,—sooner than grant which, he believed himself willing to follow her to her grave. All this artifice was the exact opposite of his own character; and could Miss Bland have persuaded herself to speak out to either parent, both her love and her life would have terminated the better for it. Not that Sir Rezin would, have been in any event, wrought upon to crown her misplaced attachment,—but an implicit and respectful confidence, in unison with the best impulses of his nature, would have gone far in inducing him to suspend, if not to break off, an engagement from which her heart so revolted. The free spoken and plain dealing knight might have been taken as a fair specimen of the hearty, old English character. Frank, liberal, and kind to all about him, constant and tender in his attachments, inveterate yet open in his dislikes, his temper was cool but inflexible; and exacting obedience in every essential point even from his wife and only child, his intentions were well known to be unchangeable,—and their edicts admitted of no repeal. A warm and steady friend, a bitter but generous enemy, his susceptibilities were uncommonly strong, and principally engrossed by his darling Fanny. Yet fondly as she was doated upon for her own sake, she was not the less valuable to one of his arrogant and aspiring temperament as the passive instrument for perpetuating his in her own exaltation; while > "Affection chained her to that heart,

> "Ambition tore its links apart;"

and though in hurrying the preparations for her virtual sacrifice, he imagined himself to be solely intent on working out her worldly salvation, his high views of personal consequence and family aggrandizement, had no small share in unconsciously determining his line of action. By the proffer to his silly girl of a liberty of choice among those, who sought her with his approbation, Sir Rezin assured himself that he had not only done away all imputation of undue harshness, but that he actually condescended to delegate a portion of his legitimate authority. It was moreover, his firm opinion that the force of habit and continual contact with an elegant husband, would infallibly expel the image of her absent and inferior lover; and that when the period of her infatuation was over, his refractory daughter would thank and reward him for the wholesome controul now exercised to make her Lady Malcolm Irvine. Thus thinking, the resistance and entreaties of the unhappy Fanny "passed him by as the idle wind, that he respected not," and her repugnance, instead of procrastinating served only to accelerate the completion of the affair.

Young, timid and inexperienced, Miss Bland dreamed not of disobliging her parents by choosing her own means of happiness. And in truth, it would have been easier for her to die than to own her shame in still suffering her thoughts to cling to the man, who had repelled and forgotten her favourable sentiments. She conscientiously believed that her parents had the right to dispose of her,—exerted herself to school her rebellious heart into conformity with their wishes; but her virtuous endeavours, though, at first promising success, were not to triumph in the unequal and protracted conflict. As it was, they produced a cold, though gentle tolerance of her noble lover, who unused to the lively effusion of a fervent regard, was content to construe the faint complacency of her manner into the maidenly bashfulness befitting a modest gentlewoman; and enraptured as he was by her beauty and apparent sweetness of disposition; it would have required a much more energetic refusal that Fanny, under existing circumstances, was capable of to make him relinquish a pursuit, drawing so near to its close. In a word, Lord Malcolm was perfectly satisfied—Sir Rezin and her ladyship delighted beyond measure—and their fair but fading heiress submissive to their irreversible decree.

While such was the mental frame of its in-

Digitized by Google

madam and their illustrious ally, Bland House continued to be, ostensibly, the seat of splendor and rejoicing. Weekly entertainments, ordered at an immense expense from the noted Raleigh Tavern (for the founder of the feasts disdained economy on such occasions) out-did every thing of the kind before exhibited in Williamsburg except (perhaps) the fetes at the Government house, by courtesy ycleped Palace. The cost of the winter's sojourn in an establishment, conducted on a scale of extravagance commensurate with that practised at Buck Island, where the slaughter of a beef without regard to what became of the carcase, took place, if suet was wanted for a pudding,—absorbed the proceeds of the sale of a considerable salt-work. But this out-lay seemed nothing in comparison with the gratification of Sir Rezin's pride—and while Lady Bland and her divine daughter monopolized the envy and admiration of the town. The last hyemal month was now at hand; the enamoured Irvine grew impatient to have his

"Joys lodg'd beyond the reach of fate,"—

and the exulting yet uncertain father readily acceded to the importunity for an appointed day, so well according with his own conviction of the necessity of as much haste as consisted with that rigid maxim of propriety, which abhorred precipitancy in such matters on the part of the lady—or a premature celebration of the marriage-rite. The middle of April was therefore, fixed upon as a date not too early for a decorous and dignified solemnization; and Fanny, a little reconciled to her inevitable destiny, awaited in silent resignation the hour of her surrender to Lord Malcolm and bondage. Humbled to the dust by the thought of the imprudence, which had permitted a surprisal of her affections, she had experienced her full punishment in the seeming scorn and oblivion, which guerdoned her condescension,—and now strained every nerve of her fortitude and self-command to retrieve herself in her own esteem by a graceful acquiesence in the addresses of one, who sought her with all the ardour of genuine and honourable passion: hence her affianced lover found himself daily greeted with increasing smiles and softness; and Miss Bland derived her best reward from the benedictions of her overjoyed parents. She never heard from George Meredith save by the short, formal letters, notifying her father of his health and welfare; in these her name occurred only in his general remembrance of them all,—and Fanny still arraigned him as fickle and insensible, while he writhed under all the tortures of hopeless love. The opportunities of communication between Bremo, and the metropolis, were "few and far between,"—but the news the craving exile was able accidentally to gather of the Blands, represented his loved and lost cousin, first as radiant in gaiety and charms, the queen of fashion and of hearts—and afterwards as about to abdicate her maiden-reign of loveliness. Particulars of the match he learned not, farther than that the man of her choice was Scottish and noble; and this much known, he shunned all the flying reports concerning an event, of the time and circumstances whereof he coveted to remain in perpetual ignorance. But a diffuse epistle from his ci-devant patron, elate as he seemed with pride and pleasure, gave Meredith full information on every point,—and mentioning their immediate return to the family seat, insisted on his presence there at his "sister's nuptial." George, losing sight of that deference, habitually obedient to Sir Rezin's will took counsel, on the painful occasion, only of his heart—and, though, alas! too late, of his prudence: he, therefore, respectfully but steadily declined the invitation, much to the displeasure of the inditer, —who, in his jealous solicitude to stifle all suspicion, whether in the mind of its object or by others, of his daughter's absurd predilection, had bidden and certainly calculated on his coming as a very important circumstance.

Agreeably to the intention announced in this letter, the Blands soon left town for Albemarle. Beginning, as Fanny did, to feel her pride soothed, and her self-love propitiated by the assiduous devotion of her titled bridegroom, she, nevertheless, luxuriated in the involuntary hope that, during their temporary separation there might something chance to convert this into a final parting. With a spirit gladdened by the cessation of Lord Malcolm's gallantries for at least six weeks, at the end of which time he had leave to follow them, she performed the journey home, —and with a full yet lightened heart, hailed the sight of the blue, waving outline of the far Alleghanies visible for miles during their passage through the lower plantation of Buck Island. Her entrance into the grounds immediately surrounding it,—and still more within the old mansion itself, where every object too forcibly reminded her of past days, and him who had rendered them as sweet as they proved fleeting, brought with it a train of melancholy musings. But deeming such indulgence criminal as it was incompatible with her positive engagement, she intermitted not her zealous efforts to promote the growth of her kindly sentiments towards the person, to whom she was all but solemnly plighted. It was not long, however, ere the faint and reluctant regard extorted from her rather by the dictates of duty, and the re-action of feelings outraged by another, than by a sense of Lord Malcolm's actual merit, withered and died away under the revival, by a casual discovery, of her co-existent attachment in all its fond and imperishable fidelity.

A few days after she reached home as Miss Bland, no longer bounding forward with the elastic tread of the wild gazelle, was slowly walking up and down the broad central avenue of the garden, she saw her maid Phillis coming in search of her with a folded paper in her hand.—The idea of a letter from her noble betrothed instantly suggested itself,—and vexed at having her reverie dispelled by the unwelcome intruder, she took it with a mixture of reluctance and remorse, scarce listening the while to the garrulous bearer, who proceeded to say that aunt Dosia (the washer woman,) had found it in the pocket of one of Massa George's waist-coats, that he had, by mistake, left out when packing up?' With a cheek manteld over at the mention of that name, with the soft rosy bloom lately stationary there, the conscious beauty mechanically unfolded the sheet, which, bearing neither signature nor superscription, was still identified and held as hallowed, by his writing. It contained a copy of verses addressed to herself, blotted indeed, and illegible in some places—in others devoid of connexion and rhythmical accuracy—yet pouring forth with a pathos and energy purely Sapphick, the passionate and deathless idolatry of his heart, the sacred obligations imposed on it by honor and gratitude, and the violence with which it throbbed and panted to unburden itself at the feet of her, to whom he was condemned to be forever mute. As she hurried again and again over the impassioned effusion, the whole truth flashed upon Fanny's mind; she now saw that he, by whom she had imagined herself contemned and overlooked, had been actuated by motives of the loftiest integrity, and by the tenderest respect for her supernal preeminence; added to which it was apparent from the tenor of the composition that the authority of a third person had indirectly interfered between them. But such was not the first view that the transported maiden took of the delicate subject. Eagerly and repeatedly she went over the lines that "lapped her soul in Elysium,"—and for a brief space revelled in a beatitude comparable with that enjoyed by "the blest above."—The precious, the overwhelming conviction that she was beloved—that her's was not that mortification, that agony (the deepest and most insupportable that woman can endure) of pining in unrequited affection—re-animated her at once with all and even more, than her former beauty,—and transformed the pale and pensive being, moving languidly along with the dejected yet exquisite grace of a deserted Ariadne, into a glowing vision of light and loveliness, hardly touching the ground over which she glanced with the airy step of a Hebe, immortal in youth and freshness. In all the flutter of this first rapture, the fairy Fanny hastened to throw herself on her mother's neck, there to whisper the tale of her long cherished attachment, and to petition for the happiness of herself and George, once more enthroned as her friend, her lover, her "all of bliss below." The servants who met her as she glided onward, stared in open mouthed wonder at the light, lively gait, and beaming face, all smiles and blushes, so different from her late lassitude of mien and motions. But when half-way to Lady Bland's chamber, the palpitation of her heart compelled the happy girl to pause and take breath; again she drew forth the paper, invaluable beyond uncounted treasures, in order to confirm her agitated bosom by another perusal of its delicious contents. She read it over with a more deliberate attention—and in a moment how changed her countenance! how fallen her ecstatic hopes! She no longer bent her steps towards the confessional chair, whither they but just tended, but turned away to a remote apartment, there to weep undisturbed over the demolition of her bright but baseless dreams. Sadly the fair mourner now scanned the full import of the last and most impressive stanza, which had been slurred in the rapidity of her previous notice. Fraught with the calm spirit of a high and immoveable resolve, and couched in correspondent power of language, its couplets breathed the strong, the stern determination of the writer to die, but not to dishonor himself before heaven, his own conscience, and the world, by a base betrayal of duty and principle, even though to win her, whose image installed within his breast, as in a holy shrine, would aye be worshipped there with the reverence due a guardian saint—but she herself never wooed to be his earthly bride. With this declaration, subversive of all her half-formed fancies in her trembling hand, why, reasoned the down cast Fanny, need she expose herself by invoking a fruitless pity? how stoop to plead for him, who thus deposed his claim and proudly renounced all hope, all thought of her? Yet were not all drops of sorrow, in the dewy suffusion that bathed her lovely eyes. It was balm to her bitterest feelings to know herself adored even while forsworn and forsaken; and days elapsed ere the delightful delirium, induced by this persuasion, yielded to the "sober certainty of waking" woe, about to engloom the rest of her mortal span. That assurance of a mutual passion at first imparting a short sweet solace to her heart, soon became the source of deepest regrets and keenest pangs; and Miss Bland, distracted at thought of the misery consequent to a forced marriage with Lord Malcolm, as it stood opposed in odious contrast to the wedded bliss, that might have been hers, grew nervous, irritable and unsettled in proportion as the day drew near, which was to abridge her maiden state of liberty. She blamed herself for her want of fortitude and self-command—but all in vain; she had neither wish nor power to think or speak, save on this one engrossing theme; so, shunning all commerce with her friends, and above all with the parents, whose cruel kindness was thus operating to destroy her whom it was their sole aim to preserve, the hapless victim of their false policy sought in the solitude of her own soul for comfort and support.

Digitized by Google

> "She pray'd for strength, but falling tears
> "Betrayed her weakness as she knelt!"

She prayed for death—yet it came not any more than patience or relief.

Sir Rezin, a close observer of her inconsistencies, knew not what to make of his drooping beauty, who, no longer "like some gay creature of the elements, playing in the plighted clouds," frolicked through the house, diffusing life and sunshine around her path. Moody, captious and abstracted, her conduct seemed to develope the symptoms of incipient madness. Her knightly sire ceased to attribute the alarming change to her disappointment in love—but rather deemed her constitution deranged by some serious physical malady. The poor lady Bland firmly believed her daughter to be bewitched—and would fain have had recourse to a famous—or more properly infamous doctress, who, working by sign and spell professed to cure all diseases originated by witch-craft—or, to borrow the local phrase, tricking; but her more judicious husband peremptorily prohibited a practice so absurd, and possibly dangerous. The uneasy parents were just about calling in the family-physician, when to their inexpressible relief the mental disorder, as they judged it, of their darling child, took another—and not less touching—turn. The unnatural petulance and fitful rest-

Digitized by Google

keenness marking its first stage suddenly subsided into a deep but placid sadness, that spoke a mind hopeless indeed, but still resigned in wretchedness. Hers was now the condition depicted in the simple lines descriptive of the heroine of Lady Ann Lindsay's ballad!"

"No longer she wept—her tears were a' spent—
Despair, it was come and she thought it content;
She thought it content,—but her cheek it grew pale
And she drooped like the lily, broke down by the hail."

Hitherto maddened by the tortures of suspense to which she had subjected herself by a rash experiment, Fanny's strange impatience expired with the impetus which had concentrated her whole soul in the one mighty effort. But the die was now cast—her last stake had been played and lost! Henceforth there was nothing left for her but the performance of her filial duties (on which she included the gift of her hand where her parents had promised it) and the dull repose of the grave. She had just heard, for the first time, directly but secretly from her kinsman at Bremo. During the trance of feeling produced by her discovery of Meredith's attachment, Miss Bland had unconsciously assumed it for granted that his heroic immolation of the passion so vividly pourtrayed by him arose from his implied belief of her indifference to it—and that his stern self-control would instantly vanish before a glimpse of her real sentiments: besides still thrilling with the exquisite sensations which had condensed an age of bliss into the moment, that taught her she was beloved, her tender nature could not forbear a disclosure fraught with the like transports for him. Quelling the modest scruples which long interposed to hinder the execution of her project, the fond girl, for the first time guilty of a clandestine action, enclosed his own production to her poet-lover with those words written in the envelope. "You say true, cousin George: we can never be more to each other than friends and cousins; but do not believe that any body can ever love you better than, or half-so-well as your own broken hearted Fanny B."

The missive was duly received, with what emotions we will not attempt to say; but in spite of the encouragement indirectly held out to him—of the naive avowal so obliquely yet fully made, George never faltered for a moment in his noble course. The interim between the dispatches of her packet, and the arrival of the answer, was spent by the wretched heiress in one long paroxysm of shame, impatience and almost despair. At length it came—a long and tender reply, putting the literal acception on her single but comprehensive sentence,—signifying his intention to embark without delay for the East Indies, and beseeching her as his "friend and cousin" for one last private interview, ere he went (the time and place thereof to be assigned hereafter) made an end forever of Fanny's feverish alternation of doubts and hopes,—and falling, like the bolt that rends as it blasts, the shock stunned and rifled her inmost heart.

After the receipt of this final renunciation, Miss Bland's whole system appeared to undergo a violent and thorough revolution. All dread or thoughts of the union heretofore so abhorred, seemed obliterated from her memory, while her mind dwelt only on dark and dreary images, presaging her own speedy death. Traits, till now unknown to her character, suddenly unfolded themselves; for instance, an airy strain of imaginative power, and the wildest weakness of superstitious excitement, like the apparition of the air drawn dagger, apostrophized by Macbeth, the vision of a bloody steel brandished by a spectral hand, floated before her mind and eye, palsying her with horror; unearthly voices, as she averred, summoned her away by name,—and once when stooping over the clear fountain of the Limestone Spring, a hideous reflection of some monstrous object alarmed her almost to phrenzy. The medical men, of whom several were now in attendance, could recognize the indications of no definite disease; but they all joined in opinion that some heavy trance preyed upon the mind of the patient, which could only be relieved by disburdening itself. By the exertion of all her influence over her daughter, Lady Bland, at last, wrested from her the secret of her breast, and this confidence, though extorted, proved of the happiest efficacy. No longer pressing like an incubus on the springs of life, the dreadful load of anguish uncommunicated, lessened by degrees as her Ladyship, soothing and sympathizing with her burst of love-lorn sorrow, wrought upon her to vent it in words and tears: and thus giving free scope to her emotions, Fanny insensibly wept them away upon her mother's bosom. The wholesome effusion of humid grief, at once lightened her oppressed brain; and Sir Rezin who had well nigh shared his daughter's bewilderment, beheld with incredulous rapture the alteration effected by a few days unreserved communion with her maternal counsellor.

A slight shade of melancholy still hung on Fanny's brow,—but she had so far regained a state of composure, as lady-like, to inspect with the complaisance of gratified vanity, an importation of splendid goods made up into the most bewitching bridal attire, over which Lady Bland and a select female conclave descanted with as much onction as Hero's waiting woman, about the duchess of Milan's gown. The noble bridegroom, now daily expected, came in for his share of their panegyric, and his fair affianced, tiring no less of his name, than of the gorgeous display of silver tissues and brocades, rose colored tiffanies, and Brussels lace, went forth to recreate herself in a solitary evening stroll. She still retained her passion for long walks,—and now wandered along one which had been a special favourite with her absent cousin. About one third of the way to the fishery, the path turned off to the right and wound away from the low grounds through a green meadow, usually ancle deep in timothy and clover, sending up a sweet smell as the foot pressed the white and purple flowers. At the end of a few hundred yards the lane, as it might be called—being edged on either side with an irregular hedge of sumac and hazle—widened into an open space, sloping down to the head of a beautiful stream. This was the far-famed Limestone Spring, where Fanny now found herself for the first time since her recent fright beside its brink.—

Digitized by Google

From beneath the overshadowing canopy of a Titan like oak, the medicinal waters, as they were then thought, gushed forth from a source so abundant as to swell at once into an ample brook, whose crystal current ran smoothly along, "making sweet music with the enamel'd stones," between banks beset with the odorous purple flag, the golden rod, and "a thousand fresh water flowers of several colours," interspersed with thickets of laurel, holly, and eglantine. Such was the aspect of the place in its vernal and summer beauty; but at present it lay bare and desolate as the huge rocks of the deserted quarry beyond it—or like the heart of her, who now viewed it a wintry waste, and longed to be laid at rest beneath the green sod, which the quiet waters laved. But those waters, so peaceful and limpid, had been stained with the blood of innocence, and the soft and sylvan scene around had echoed to the yells of savages, frantic with revenge, and red and reeking from the slaughter, many years before, when the red men devastated the Colony. A large company had assembled a few miles off to celebrate a rustic wedding. The pair were standing before the parson, the pretty bride attired in her wedding dress of white calico at the left hand of her sturdy bridegroom, about to repeat the solemn words, —when a fierce glare of light wrapped the house in flames and bursting through the shroud of smoke and fire, a band of Indians, shouting with the fury and gestures of demoniacs, involved the party in one indiscriminate massacre. Their fell purpose being achieved, they marched off, carrying as their sole prisoner the almost lifeless bride. Finding themselves hot pressed by the avengers of blood, the miscreants tomahawked and scalped their shrieking victim beside the Limestone Spring, and rushed on to covert in the woody labyrinth, extending for miles around. The pursuers coming up soon after, left her for the time on the spot where she had fallen,—but returning in the evening from their desperate chace, they buried the mangled body where it lay. Ever since the lonely grave had been respected and pointed out by those narrating the tale of this sad nuptial. Generally strewn over with the earliest and loveliest violets of the spring, there were even now on it, a few large clusters half blown and filling the air with their rich fragrance.

As Miss Bland, in her pale statue like beauty, and immobility of posture, leant, like another Arethusa, just risen from her virgin waves, over the margin of the stream, the perfect proportions of her figure, her simple grace of attitude and the folds of her white drapery, gave her the look of some rare piece of sculpture, a choice trophy of Grecian art. Here she rested from the fatigue of the long walk, meditating mournfully the while on him, who had so often stood beside her—and on the dark rolling billows over which he was so soon to track his way. Suddenly the musing maiden felt herself clasped about the waist and—and had well nigh fainted from excess of surprise and terror. The sound of the voice accosting her, gave her courage to look up, and she found herself in Lord Malcolm's arms. The sight of him only increased her agitation; and hastily seating her on the fragrant little mound close by, he brought water in the large gourd always swimming in the Spring, and applied it to her lips and temples. As the lovely invalid slowly recovered, the young nobleman explained and apologized for his abrupt appearance by stating that he was but just arrived—and in his extreme impatience to greet her had ventured, on permission of Sir Rezin, who had the goodness to show him the way, to intrude on her solitude; not for an instant anticipating the painful effects of her being thus taken unawares. Still weak and trembling, Fanny shuddered and started up at finding that, oh! dire omen! they had during their brief converse been seated on the "Bride's Grave." Lord Malcolm expressed the tenderest concern at her faded looks,—but he had already heard the assigned cause of a severe indisposition. Fearing for the effect of the keen air on her delicate frame, for the spring being remarkably backward, "as yet the trembling year was unconfirmed," he hurried her away as hastily as his care for her weak state permitted.

Buck Island now resounded with the bustle of preparation for the important solemnity, the day of which was close at hand. All this pomp and confusion ill suited with the habits of the grave and retiring Irvine; but he vainly urged his preference of a plain and private style of nuptials.—All the gentry for miles around, were bidden to the marriage feast, which was according to usage to consist of a dinner and supper, with the evening-entertainment of a ball. No king and prime minister ever toiled harder to methodize a kingdom than did Lady Bland and her right hand, the housekeeper, to regulate the endless arrangements of the august affair. On Sir Rezin devolved the amusement of the noble Scot at such times as his beautiful betrothed chose to retreat into her citadel of maiden state and coyness: but upon the whole Miss Bland treated him with exemplary courtesy—and supported herself well under the flurry and excitement of the occasion.

On the morning of her nuptials, she looked pale and sad, and the traces of tears were perceptible on that cheek, unrivalled for form and colouring; but brides enjoy a prescriptive right to cry and look melancholy at attaining the grand aim of all their manœuvres: so nobody noticed a circumstance as common—indeed indispensable—as any part of the sacred ceremony. By nine o'clock, she was dressed in her wedding suit of white brocade, damasked and fringed with silver, whose magnificence was fully perceptible through the bridal veil of finest mechline lace which, enveloping her from head to foot, was rendered nearly superfluous by the quantity of long, fair hair, streaming loose and shining like molten gold. At the elbow of this bright creation, were stationed her six bride-maids wearing on breast and shoulder their favours of blue ribbon, knotted with silver; these were young ladies of the highest rank in the colony. The like number of cavaliers, composed the suite of the bridegroom, who, clad in a habit of white cloth and satin, richly laced with the precious metal appropriated to hymenial decorations displayed a refulgence of joy in his countenance and carriage, as dissimilar to the usual lurid ex pressions of his eye and mien as a sunbeam from a streak of fiery lightning. The marriage rite was performed, agreeably to the fashion of that and our own time, at the parish church, whither the company repaired in a procession of coaches drawn by four and six horses along the road, lined with the country people, collected to take a peep at the grand parade. This attendance consisted of the select friends of the party; the major portion of the guests being invited only for the evening. The sumptuous dinner, comparable to a Lord Mayor's feast for the richness, rarity and abundance of the viands, passed off as such entertainments are wont to do—but amid a heartiness of appetite and mirth, expleded by the ideas of modern refinement. The bride not now a drooping white lily, but glowing with the hue and radiance of the rose, sat at the right of her noble bridegroom, and received with a mixture of confusion and triumph, the homage of his impassioned devotion. Yet was not Fanny's heart at ease; but it swelled under the conscious pride of beauty, adorned with the utmost elegance of dress, and the adulation lavished on the heiress of Buck Island, now ennobled as the choice of a titled foreigner,—while the excitement of the crowd, the lights, the gaiety and splendor reigning around her, imparted a contagious tumult to her veins! But the hour of alternation was about to succeed: already her head began to ache and turn giddy with the buzz and confusion of the scene; and whispering a few words to her mother, the ladies rose simultaneously and vanished from the dining room. About half an hour afterwards, Lady Malcolm was crossing the hall on her way to her own chamber; she heard her name distinctly articulated in a voice that thrilled through her frame; she turned to the sound, and a well remembered figure threw a billet towards her, and instantly disappeared. The summons was potent as the conjuration of a necromancer over an unruly spirit—and like that obeyed.

Digitized by Google

Long before the gentlemen broke up their convivial divan (for, then as now, they sat late at the wine) Lord Malcolm, true as the shadow to the substance, had left the table, and was eagerly seeking his adored bride. He caught a glimpse of her during her momentary conference in the hall, which he beheld with a distrust of the evidence of his own perceptions. By and by the dispersed guests re-assembled in a side parlour; but Lady Bland looked round and inquired in vain of the domestics for Fanny and her noble lord. At length the bride's long absence was noticed by the company, while her ladyship and the punctilious knight wearied themselves in conjectures as to where she could have hidden herself. The evening was chill and lowering, and 'twas highly improbable that she would go forth alone and in her slight and splendid garb, so unfit for a promenade. After nearly an hour spent in questions and surmises, Lady Bland found her daughter in her own room, apparently engaged in re-adjusting her dishevelled hair—but pale, cold and agitated in the highest degree. Forbearing all comment on her singular absence and manifest discomposure, the fond and exulting mother, after aiding the trembling Fanny to arrange her dress, accompanied her into the saloon, which was the appointed reception room of the evening circle. Just as they joined the company, Lord Malcolm entered by another door, his face so lately animated with the effulgence of love and gaiety, now wan and stern, while his eyes glared like those of a corpse. Something so strange and sepulchral pervaded his manner and appearance, that all, with whom he came in contact, involuntarily sprung aside; his motions and actions resembled those, which the force of galvanism extorts from the dead. The lively strains of the violins now gave signal for the opening of the ball; this etiquette required the new married pair to do, and like an automaton the bewildered bridegroom led forth the admired heiress, now all his own, for the minuet, with which all gestic pastimes invariably began; but between his constrained and unconscious movements and the embarrassment and perturbation of the distressed Fanny, never was a dance worse performed. Gigs, a favorite exhibition, as they gave the gentleman a right to a kiss from his partner at the close, then succeeded; after which came the prime exercise and country dances; and as the assembly waxed merry, and the salutations became general and unceremonious, their attention was gradually diverted from the extraordinary behaviour of the abstracted Irvine. The surpassing bride, who, attended by her lovely train, had sat like Venus, surrounded by the graces, withdrew from the festivity as soon as supper was over. After a banquet, served on wrought plate, that might have graced the nuptials of a prince, reels, the national (if such an epithet be not a solecism,) dance of the Virginians, commenced with renewed zest and spirit, and continued till near day break. About sunrise, the customary hour of stirring with the family, the house was still, and the revellers asleep.

Morning dawned as clear and dazzling as the sun's bright rays, shining on an untracked expanse of snow, could make it. During the night, as intensely cold as mid winter, there had been a heavy fall of it, though it was now as late as the middle of April. One by one, the servants began to struggle forth from their domitories; the housekeeper's shrill voice was heard resounding far and wide, like a sea gull clamouring in a storm,—and the disordered scene of the over night's jollity, presently exhibited the precision and nicety of holiday apartments. By eight o'clock, the inmates, transient and permanent, amounting to some score, were ready and assembled for breakfast, which only waited the forthcoming of the two most conspicuous personages. Lady Bland, blushing at her daughter's incivility, sent more than one messenger to hasten her,—but their whispered reports bore that the door of the bridal chamber, was, to be sure, ajar, but that no sight or stir of life within answered to their calls. Another half hour wore languidly by and still no sign or news of the noble couple. The heart of the anxious mother began to misgive her with a foreboding that all was not right; and in an under tone, she commissioned two of the bride-maids to go with the housekeeper, and rouse the sluggards. The trio knocked repeatedly at the half opened door, but no response was rendered to their summons;

Digitized by Google

and awed by the strange silence and the idea of intruding upon the privacy of a lord, they returned, without entering, to relate their fruitless errand! Lady Bland, wild with an alarm that infected her husband, rushed through her own chamber, vacated by her for the night, into the one beyond; Sir Rezin, the housekeeper, and one or two others following. The rays of the sun, reflected through the red moreen window curtains, involved the apartment in a ruddy twilight, but its circuit seemed still and vacant as that of an empty monument. In her hurried advance to the bed, which stood at the upper end, her ladyship's foot encountered something slippery as glass—and falling on a long crimson stain slightly crusted over, she felt her hand wet with something thick and curdled; at the same instant the drawing back of a window curtain, enabled Lady Bland to see what soiled her palm; it was blood! She screamed and fainted away; the affrighted bridemaids re-echoed her cry, and the room, in a moment filled. Some raised the senseless mother and bore her away—others hastened to Sir Rezin's side, who, immoveable as if carved out of stone, stood gazing on a sight of horror, that might well have terrified a father. On the bridal bed, as stiff and cold as the marble effigy on a tomb, lay the fair young bride—her bosom gashed with a ghastly wound; her sweet features fixed in the pallid rigor of death! One long lock of pale gold, escaped from beneath her midnight coif, and dabbled with clots of frozen blood, fell floating on the floor, and one little hand, that which bore the wedding badge, was thrown, half raised, across her breast, as if to ward off a blow, but there was no trace of convulsion or the struggle of murderous strife.—These were to be found in the wide stream of blood around the spot, and in the weapon, which gave the death stroke and was left sticking in her breast. This was a Highland dirk, inlaid with armorial bearings exactly similar to those so often described by the murdered Fanny, as encrusting the phantom dagger of her dream.—No other vestige of the assassin bridegroom was visible; he had evidently not passed the night within the chamber, for the angel victim to his maniac wrath had been many hours dead.—Amid all the horror and distress, paralyzing the house hold, a party of the gentlemen guests, made strict search for him throughout the demesne and vicinity—but without success. One of them fell upon a track, extending beyond those, stamped by the passage of the menials about the yard; it led to a wild, high cliff, overlooking the deepest part of Buck Island Creek, now slightly skimmed over by the frost,—but here it terminated or was lost. Whether the murderer stung by a paroxysm of remorse, had fled thither, or thrown himself into the stream below—or whether some accidental passenger had printed the snow, none ever knew; but from that night and hour, Lord Malcolm Irvine was never seen or heard of more.

THE LEGEND OF BUCK ISLAND,

In the confession made to her mother by the hapless sacrifice to the jealous phrensy of a husband, there was one circumstance studiously suppressed; that was the farewell meeting solicited by George Meredith and promised by herself. An opportunity of establishing himself to great advantage in the Antilles, offering itself, the unhappy young man eagerly embraced it as the means of quitting a country now become odious to him, and of shaking off the patronage by which he felt himself debased. On the day which proved the last of Miss Bland's life, he arrived in the neighborhood for the express purpose of this parting interview. Loth to trust an emissary between them, he went over himself to Buck Island, and picked a chance of delivering the few lines apprizing her of his arrival, and where he then waited for her. Lord Malcolm witnessed the receipt of this billet, he saw the eager trepidation with which his bride sped off after its perusal. It was but natural for him to follow her, as he did, nearly stifled by excess of passion. The appointed trysting place was an arbour in the garden distant only a few paces from the great gate, whither the light figure, he, but a moment before adored as angelic flitted before him. The unhappy bridegroom all hell raging in his breast, beheld the impassioned meeting, the wild embrace, the flowing tears.—Maddened by some words of dubious import as imperfectly heard by him, he was on the point of bursting upon, as he thought, the guilty pair,—but the dread of vengeance defeated thereby, arrested his deadly design. They continued together but a few moments; with all the fiend unchained within him, he saw their separation and ere he could move from the spot where rage and a confluence of horrible emotions transfixed him, both were out of sight. The sad sequel has been already related.

There remains but little to be told of our tale: George Meredith settled in Antigua, where he long dwelt, universally esteemed but unmarried. Sir Rezin never held up his head after the tragical end of his idolized child, whom he outlived only one year. Lady Bland.

"Surviving all
"Charms, kindred, children," lived to the extremity of human existence—but not at Buck Island. Detesting the scene of her daughter's untimely catastrophe, and unable to disbelieve, yet unwilling to verify the popular rumour, that insisted on supernatural appearances within the fatal chamber; and on "airy tongues that syllabled" the lovely victim's name at dead of night, disturbing the rest of the household,—she left the family seat not to return, as soon as decency would allow, after the loss of her husband. After her death the vast possessions on which she had so prided herself, went to enrich a remote and obscure branch of the Wolverines, with which in her days of maternity and palmy hope, she scorned to acknowledge affinity.

After her ladyship's desertion of the mansion house, it remained unoccupied and gradually fell into decay. The belated passenger, as he trudged along the road to the crossing place at the Creek, looked up in vain to the brow of the hill for the many lights erst burning there as a cheering beacon to his steps; and instead of the stir and "voices of social men" once resounding where all was alive and gay, his ear caught only the melancholy sounds of the doors and window shutters, flapped by the high winds; or of the screech owl, hooting from some mouldering corner or chimney top. A residence too extensive for the person to whom it fell in the division of the estate, the dilapidated building was at last pulled down and the timber and other materials mostly employed to construct two smaller dwellings. The Bland home-stead thus perished as the name was extinct and passed away; and the history and memorials, of the once haughty and splendid race, exist only in the time worn ruins of an edifice, and in this imperfect record of the Legend of Buck Island. E. C. S.

Digitized by Google

From the New England Magazine.

THE SHETLAND WIDOW.

In consequence of the gale, which, in the autumn of 1832, wrecked so many unfortunate Shetland fishermen, their widows were obliged to supply their places in the boats, to save their families from famine.

"Aye lend thine aid, my son, to push
The shallop from the shore;
For I must take thy father's place
To ply the feathered oar,
And out upon the faithless sea
Must thou my little Steersman be.

"And thou wilt trim the sail, and steer
Head-land and low reef by;
And mark, where sunken rocks, beneath
The deeper waters lie.
Small skill, I know, my son, is thine;
But yet, alas! still less is mine.

"My weak heart trembles, thus to see
Our cot no longer near;
And view the lessening winding shore,
Like a faint line appear.
My babes! shall I e'er see you more,
Or tread again that flying shore?"

"Mother, thou see'st the blue waves break,
And sparkle in the sun:
And we our laden bark shall moor,
Ere yet the day is done."
"So smiled the sea that very day,
That last, thy father went away.

"But inland, see, the sea-mews veer;
I fear a flurry's nigh;
Glad I could sleep beneath the waves,
But could not see thee die.
How near these wailing storm-birds keep,
And o'er the roughening billows sweep!"

"Nay, courage, mother, ne'er before
Was't thou outside the bay;
For often thus, from stem to stern,
The stormy petrells play.
And rest thee on thine oar, the gale
With gentle breathings, fills the sail.

"And o'er the crested ocean waves,
Our skiff shall gaily ride;
As o'er the breakers and the surf,
We see you sea fowl glide.
And He who guides the sea-bird thus,
Will, surely, mother, think on us."

"God bless thee, boy! thou art my stay,
While I should comfort thee;
The widow and the orphan's God,
Is He, who rules the sea;
And I will trust his power to guide
Our shallop homeward o'er the tide."

Mrs. Carmichael in her "Domestic Manners and Society in the West Indies," gives the following curious and extraordinary account of the Chasseur Ant, common at Trinidad.

One morning my attention was arrested at Laurel Hill, (Trinidad,) by a number of black-birds whose appearance was foreign to me; they were smaller but not unlike the English crow, and were perched on a calabash tree near the kitchen. I asked D. who that moment came up from the garden, what could be the cause of the appearance of so many of those blackbirds. She said, 'Misses, dem be a sign of de blessing of God; dey are not the blessing, but only de sign, as we say, of God's blessing. Misses, you'll see afore noon-time, how de ants will come and clear de houses." At this moment I was called on to breakfast, and thinking it was some superstitious idea of D's. I paid no further attention to it. In about two hours after this, I observed an uncommon number of chasseur ants crawling about the floor of the room; my children were annoyed by them, and seated themselves on a table, where their legs did not communicate with the floor.

They did not crawl upon my person, but I was now surrounded by them. Shortly after this the walls of the room became covered by them, and next they began to take possession of the tables and chairs. I next thought it necessary to take refuge in an adjoining room, separated only by a few ascending steps from the one we occupied; and this was not accomplished without great care and generalship; for, had we trodden upon one, we should have been summarily punished. There were several ants on the steps of the stair, but they were not near so numerous as in the room we had left, but the upper room presented a singular spectacle; for not only were the floor and walls covered like the other room, but the roof was covered also.

The open rafters of a West India house at all times afford shelter to a numerous tribe of insects, more particular the cock-roach; but now their destruction was inevitable. The chasseur ants, as if trained to battle, ascended in regular thick files to the rafters, and threw down the cock-roaches to their comrades on the floor, who as regularly marched off with the dead bodies of the cock-roaches, dragging them away by their united efforts with amazing rapidity. Either the cock-roaches were stung to death on the rafters, or else the fall killed them. The ants never stopped to devour their prey, but conveyed all to their store-house. The windward windows of the room were glass, and a battle now ensued between the ants and jack-spaniards, hotly pursued on the panes of glass.—The jack-spaniard may be called the wasp of the West Indies; it is twice as large as a British wasp; and its sting in proportion is more painful. It builds its nest in trees and old houses, and sometimes in the rafters of a room. The jack-spaniards were not quite such easy prey, for they used their wings, which not one cock-roach had attempted. Two jack-spaniards, hotly pursued on the window, alighted on the dress of one of my children. I entreated her to sit still, and remain quiet. In an almost inconceivable short space of time, a party of ants crawled upon her frock, surrounded, covered the two jack-spaniards, and crawled down again to the floor, dragging off their prey, and doing the child no harm. From this room I went to the adjoining bed-chamber and dressing-room, and found them equally in possession of the chasseurs. I opened a large military chest of linens, which had been much infested; for I was determined to take every advantage of such able hunters; I found the ants already inside; I suppose they must have got in at some opening of the hinges. I pulled out the linens on the floor, and with them hundreds of cock-roaches, not one of which escaped.

We now left the house, and went to the chambers

Digitized by Google

built at a little distance; but these all were in the same state. I next proceeded to open a store room at the other end of the house, for a place of retreat; but to get the key I had to return to the under room, where the battle was more hot than ever; the ants had commenced an attack upon the rats and mice, and strange as it may appear, they were no match for their apparently insignificant foes. They surrounded them as they had the insect tribe, covered them over, and dragged them off with a celerity and union of strength, that no one who has not watched such a scene can comprehend. I did not see one rat or mouse escape, and I am sure I saw a score carried off during a very short period.

We next tried the kitchen—for the store room and boy's pantry were already occupied; but the kitchen was equally the field of battle between rats, mice, cock-roaches and ants killing them. A huckster negro came up selling cakes, and seeing the uproar, and the family and servants standing out in the sun, he said—"Ah, Misses, you have got the blessing of God to-day and a great blessing it be to get such a cleaning." I think it was about ten when I first observed the ants; and about twelve the battle was formidable; soon after one o'clock the great strife commenced with the rats and mice; and about three the houses were cleared. In a quarter of an hour more the ants began to decamp, and soon not one was to be seen within doors, but the grass round the house, was full of them; and they seemed now feasting on the remnant of their prey, which had been left on the road to their nests; and so the feasting continued till about four o'clock, when the black birds, who had never been long absent from the calabash and pois deux trees in the neighborhood, darted down among them, and destroyed by millions those who were too sluggish to make good their retreat. By five o'clock the whole was over; before sundown the negro houses were cleared in the same way; and they told me that they had seen the black-birds hovering about the almond trees as early as seven in the morning. I never saw these black-birds before or since, and the negroes assured me that they never were seen but at such times.

APPARITIONS.—The celebrated historian De Thou had a very singular adventure at Saumur, in the year 1598, which shows the happy effects of a calm inquiry into the cause of any alarming or extraordinary appearance. One night having retired to rest, very much fatigued, while he was enjoying a sound sleep, he felt a very extraordinary weight upon his feet, which, having made him turn suddenly, fell down and awakened him. At first he imagined that it had been only a dream; but hearing soon after some noise in his chamber, he drew aside the curtains, and saw by the help of the moon, which at that time shone very bright, a large white figure walking up and and down, and at the same time observed upon a chair, some rags, which he thought belonged to thieves who had come to rob him. The figure then approaching his bed, he had the courage to ask it what it was. 'I am,' said the figure, 'the Queen of Heaven.' Had such a figure appeared to any credulous, ignorant man, he would doubtless have trembled with fear, and frightened the whole neighborhood with a marvellous description of it. But De Thou had too much understanding to be imposed upon. On hearing the words which dropped from the figure, he immediately concluded that it was a mad woman, got up, called his servants, and ordered them to turn her out of doors; he then returned to bed and fell asleep. Next morning he found that he had not been deceived in his conjecture, and that having forgot to shut the door this female figure had escaped from her keepers, and entered his apartment. The brave Schomberg, to whom De Thou related his adventure some days after, confessed that in such a case he would not have shown so much courage: The king likewise, who was informed of it by Schomberg, made the same acknowledgment.

The following relation contains a description of apparition of a different kind, no less appalling. M Schmidt, mathematical teacher at the school of Plo near Nuremburg, which had formerly been a cloist once happened to awake suddenly as the morning l gan to dawn. On opening his eyes, he beheld with tonishment a monk standing at the foot of his b Looking at him steadfastly, he appeared to be well fe and his head far from small, was sunk a little betwe a pair of very broad shoulders. The chamber w sufficiently secured; Mr. Schmidt alone slept in it; a he was very certain that no one would attempt to pu trick upon him in jest. He knew also that no part his clothes or any thing else was hanging at his bed foot. The figure exactly resembled that of a mon clothed in a white surplice, the falling folds of whi were very clearly to be distinguished. Had an ignora and timid man beheld this appearance, he wou probably have covered himself up with the bed cloth and firmly maintained that the ghost of a monk h appeared to him. As the school had formerly been cloister, many monks had been buried both in th church and church yard, and it was currently reporte among the vulgar that the place was haunted. M Schmidt, however, neither ignorant nor timid, immedi ately conjectured that his eyes were deceived, thoug he could not conceive in what manner. He raise himself up a little in his bed, but the apparition did no move; he only saw more of it, and the folds of the su plice were still more conspicuous. After a little whil he moved towards the right, yet the apparition remain ed, and he seemed to have in part a side view of it; but as soon as he had moved his head so far as to have a slight glimpse of the bed's foot, the apparition re treated backwards, though still with its face to the bed. Following the apparition quickly with his eyes it re treated with speed, swelled as it retreated to a gigantic form, a rustling noise was heard, and—at once the apparition was changed into a gothic window with white curtains which was opposite the bed's foot and about 6 or 7 feet distant from it. Several times after this, Mr. Schmidt endeavored when he awoke to see the same appearance, but to no purpose, the window always looking like a window only. Some weeks af ter, however, on awakening, as the day began to dawn he again perceived the monk's apparition at his bed foot. Being now aware what occasioned it, he exam ined it narrowly. The great arch of the window form ed the monk's shoulders, a smaller arch in the cent of this his head, and the curtains its surplice. The fol of these appeared much stronger than they did at th same distance by daylight. Thus the figure of the mon appeared plainer, nearer, and smaller than the windo would have done.—Dick's Improvement of Society.

THE VOICE OF THUNDER.

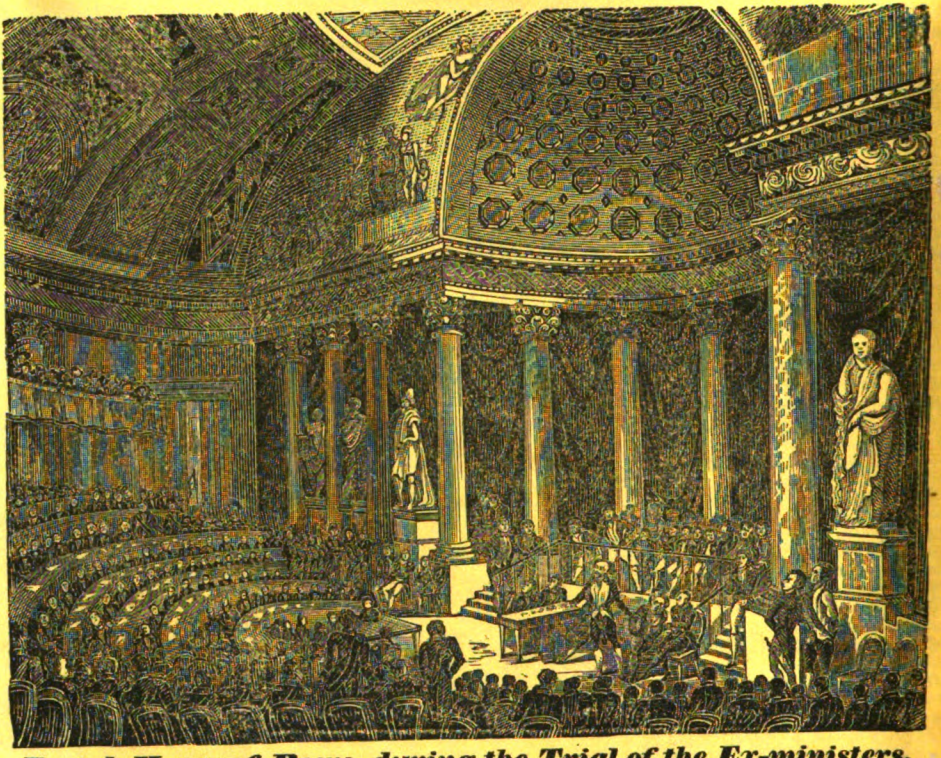
BY GREENVILLE MELLEN.

Voice from the deep of air!
That speakest from thy shrine of stooping clouds,
Shaking the buried in their marble shrouds,
How stern thou pealest there!
Thou makest men grow pale,
Rebuking them amidst their mirth,
Till they look upward from the heated earth,
In wonder and in wail.

No sound that rides the sky
Calls to the human heart with such a thrill,
Commanding its proud pulses at its will,
As thine, O voice on high!
No sound sublimer rolls
Above old mountains, valleys, and the sea,
To stir, with its great music, full and free,
The deep fount of our souls!

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



French House of Peers, during the Trial of the Ex-ministers.

Harbour and Custom House of Dublin.

Digitized by Google

French House of Peers, during the Trial of the Ex-ministers.

The French Chamber of Peers occupies a magnificent hall, which has been constructed for its accommodation in the centre compartment of the Palace of the Luxembourg. It is in the form of a Greek Theatre, about 80 feet in diameter, supported by Corinthian columns, in imitation of marble. In the interior are statues of Solon Aristides, Scipio Africanus, Demosthenes, Cicero, Lycurgus, Camillus, Cincinnatus, Cato of Utica, Pericles, Phocion and Leonidas, in which the modern sculptors of France have endeavoured to surround her senate with the most appropriate historical recollections. In a recess facing the assembly, is the president's seat, and before it is a bust of Louis XVIII. by Dupaty.

This apartment of the Luxembourg gave name, in 1814, to the entire palace: a marble tablet being at that period placed over the principal entrance which announced its change of designation.

There needed no inscription of this kind to denote the purpose to which it was devoted on the memorable occasion to which our plate alludes. The whole public interest of the metropolis of France, and indeed of the civilized world, was too powerfully engaged in what was passing. It was felt to be a trial not only of the alleged crimes of the unfortunate gentlemen implicated, but of the strength of the new government.

Harbour and Custom House of Dublin.

Dublin is seated in view of the sea on the east, and in a fine country, which swells into gently rising eminences on the north and west, whilst lofty mountains bound the horizon on the south. The city itself cannot be seen to full advantage on first entering the harbour, but the approach to it from thence exhibits a fine prospect of the country for improvement and cultivation, which have a most agreeable effect to enliven this most delightful scene. The Wicklow mountains on the south, with the pointed cone of the sugar-loaf, contribute not a little to embellish a landscape so extensive and picturesque as not to be equalled by any one view in Europe, excepting, perhaps, the Bay of Naples, to which it is acknowledged to bear a striking resemblance.

Dublin might be a commodious station for shipping, were it not for two sand banks, called the North and South Bulls, which prevent large vessels from crossing the bar, and sad experience has proved that the bay is not a safe place for anchorage; in consequence, a new harbour has been formed at Howth. The river, however, has been greatly improved for such vessels as do not draw too much water to cross the bar, by a prodigious work on the south side of it, called the South Wall, and which extends three miles. It is formed of large blocks of granite strongly cemented, and strengthened with iron clamps, the breadth on the top being near forty feet, and rising five feet above high water mark.

Goods are brought to the custom house in a species of lighters, of which a good idea may be formed from those represented in the cut. The custom house itself, if we consider the beauty of its architecture, or the judicious choice of site and accommodations, must be acknowledged to stand at the head of all those establishments erected for commercial purposes among European nations. It is situated in the northern division of the city, and as is represented above, close to the side of the river. The expense of this magnificent structure, which is larger probably than the trade of Dublin requires, was no less than two hundred and fifty-five thousand pounds sterling. It is 375 feet long, by 275 broad: opposite its east front are the government wet docks.

We feel a peculiar pleasure in being able to offer our readers an original poem from the pen of that accomplished American female, Miss Hannah F. Gould, of Newburyport. There is a vein of feeling pervading the whole of the subjoined poem, which increases the charm of its versification, and entitles it to rank among the best efforts of her pen. We are happy to add that our columns will be occasionally graced with other poems from the same gifted writer.

Written for the Casket.

THE VETERAN AND THE CHILD.

BY HANNAH F. GOULD.

"Come, Grandfather, show how you carried your gun
To the field where America's freedom was won;
Or bore your old sword, which you say was new then,
When you rose to command, and led forward your men!
And tell how you felt with the balls whissing by,
While the wounded fell round you, to bleed and to die!"

The prattler had stirr'd in the veteran's breast,
The embers of fire that had long been at rest.
The blood of his youth rush'd anew through his veins;
The soldier returned to his early campaigns—
His perilous battles at once fighting o'er,
While the soul of nineteen lit the eye of fourscore.

"I carried my gun, boy, as one that should be
But loosed from the hold of the dead or the free!
I fearlessly lifted that trusty old sword,
In the hand of a mortal, with strength from the Lord!
In battle, my vital flame, freely, I felt,
Should go, but the chains of my country to melt.

"My blood sprinkled warm upon Lexington's sod,
And Charlestown's green height to the war-drum I trod.
From the Fort on the Hudson our arms I depress'd,
The proud, coming sail of the foe to arrest.
I stood at Stillwater, the Lakes and White-Plains,
And offered for freedom to empty my veins.

"Dost now ask me, child, since thou hear'st where I've been,
Why my brow is so furrow'd, my locks white and thin—
Why this faded eye cannot go by the line,
Trace out little beauties, and shine bright as thine;
Or why so unstable his tremulous knee,
Who bore, 'sixty years since,' such perils for thee?

"What! sobbing so quick? are the tears going to start?
Come! lean thy young head on thy grandfather's heart.
It has not much longer to glow with the joy,
I feel, thus to clasp thee, so noble a boy!
But when in earth's bosom it long has been cold,
A man, bear in mind what, a babe, thou art told!"

Digitized by Google

THE CHASE.

FROM THE LOG BOOK OF RICHARD MIZEN, Q. S.

'A sail!—a sail!—a promised prize to hope!
Her nation—flag—how speaks the telescope?'
CORSAIR.

'SAIL, ho!' cried the mast-head-man, as the daylight broke on the U. S. ship ———, on a fine morning in June, 18——.

'Whereaway?'

'Off the weather bow—a taunt brig, with her yards braced up, and all sail set alow and aloft.'

'How does she set in the water?'

'Light, sir, as a duck!'

'Any sheer in her waist?'

'Straight as a line, sir!'

'Quartermaster, give me the glass.' Lieutenant Smith took a long look. 'The very chap we've been looking for! Mr. Griffin!'

'Sir.'

'Let the Captain know there's a suspicious brig to windward, and the Dog Keys to leeward, right under the fore chains.'

'Ay, ay, sir;' and Mr. Griffin was out of sight in a moment.

'Forecastle, there! out and loose the flying jib; topmen, aloft and shake the reef out the topsails, and stand by to let fall topgallant sails; afterguard, man the main sheet; and you, gunners, look out for the arm-chests!'

A dozen 'ay, ays' were bellowed at once. It seemed lieutenant Smith gave all these orders in a breath, and in as short a time, pea and monkey jackets were doffed, and every man in motion. The quickness with which all the commands were executed, gave earnest that the men understood their cause, and before their commander appeared on deck, the whole was completed and the ship under full sail.

'Whereaway is this craft, Mr. Smith?' said the captain.

'Just outside the fore-tack, sir.'

Captain L. took a glass and for some time looked steadily in the direction designated. He appeared satisfied, that the vessel in sight was no other than a piratical brig, of which he had been in search.

'The very fellow!' said he, as he dropped the glass from his eye. 'Call all hands, Mr. Smith, and give her the royals;—we must catch that brig before night.'

A moment after, the boatswain's shrill call, succeeded by his gruff 'all hands ahoy,' rung through the ship, and in a few minutes the drowsy sailors, one by one, came bunding up the hatchways, till all were on deck.

By this time the trade wind set in, and the ship gathered headway. Its freshness invigorated all, and with the intelligence of a chase, dispelled the surliness of the men, who had been deprived of their rest, and seated an animated expression on every face. The brig was about two miles distant, and plainly visible to all.

'Cast loose the bow gun, and get her ready for a fire.'

'Ay, ay, sir.'

'Is there any current setting towards these keys, Mr. Smith?'

'No, sir; the current sets to the northeast.'

'How close can we scrape the reef?'

'A cable's length will carry us clear.'*

'All ready with the gun, sir,' cried the quarter gunner.

'Fire, then, and plant the shot under her fore foot, and take care not to touch her.'

'Up helm a little—there—steady, steady,' and the quarter gunner lengthened out the last syllable till he got the gun in a fair range.

'Stand clear, and watch the shot,' cried he, as he retreated a pace and pulled the lockstring.—Away went the ball, and all eyes were bent to see the spot it should strike. The aim was fair, for the iron fell close ahead of the brig;—she passed over its wake, and stirred neither tack nor sheet. There was a profound stillness in the ship, for all were surprised that the brig showed no symptoms of obeying the summons, and were unwilling almost to believe their own eyes.—Captain L. participated in the feeling, and it was not until he plainly saw such was the fact, that he ordered the gun to be discharged again.

'The breeze freshens, sir; shall we take in sail?' said Mr. Smith, as the wind whistled sharply through the rigging, and the ship began to plunge heavily into the accumulating waves. Captain L. paid no attention to the remark.—He was absorbed in thinking of the brig.

'Shall we furl the royals, sir?' again demanded the lieutenant; 'the lee chains are under now.'

'Are you ready with that gun?' shouted the captain.

'All ready, sir.'

'Give it to her then, among her spars.'

The ship was for a moment kept away from the wind, and the gun fired. The shot went far over the brig, doing her no damage.

'What are you about there? who trained that gun?' cried the captain.

'I trained it, sir,' replied Palmer, the quarter-gunner, with the rim of his tarpaulin between his thumb and forefinger; 'but the ship was so o'reened to leeward that I could'nt fire lower.'

At that moment the breeze freshened still more, and the main royal yard snapped in twain. The sail sagged down, and flapped about so furiously as to endanger the mast. Nothing short of this could have diverted captain L.'s attention from the brig; now, the snap of the yard startled him, and he saw he was carrying topgallant sails and royals, when commonly he would have had a reef in the topsails.

'Take in those flying kites, sir, and down with the topgallant yards. You'll have the masts over the side presently, and then we may whistle for the brig. In with them, sir.'

Captain L. was in a passion. The truth is, the wind was every instant freshening, and was already nearly half a gale. The ship was foaming and plunging through the seas, without rising upon them, at the rate of nine knots an hour; her masts pitching and jerking with that short, uneasy motion that must, in a very short time, have snapped them, had not the slight accident aloft informed captain L. of the trial he was making of his spars. The lighter sails being in, however, eased them so much, that immediate danger was no longer apprehended, and then attention was again fixed on the brig. She still held her course, having only taken in her royals. This movement more fully showed her real character; for, in furling them, more men were seen aloft than any merchantman could have spared from deck. By this time the long gun was ready for another fire. Captain L. aimed and fired it himself, but with no better success than Palmer. The shot fell short. The next moment a volume of smoke issued from the weather side of the brig, and the booming report of a heavy gun came on the increasing gale.

*One hundred and twenty fathoms, or 720 feet.

Digitized by Google

'Does the scoundrel defy me!' cried the captain. 'Beat to quarters, and give him a broadside, right into his hull!'

'The brig bears away before the wind,' cried a man from the jib-boom.

'Hard up the helm, then!' cried the commander; 'up with it, and square the yards.'

'Avast, there!' exclaimed Mr. Smith; 'there's a reef close under the lee bow, and if you keep her away the tenth part of a point, we shall be dashed to pieces in five minutes!'

The order was instantly countermanded.—Captain L. sprung to the lee gangway, and discovered to his dismay the low, black rocks ranged regularly along, not four hundred yards from the ship! He then passed rapidly on to the forecastle, and threw a hasty glance along the ledge, till his eye rested on the last point. He saw, with the quickness of thought, that he was in a situation from which it would be difficult to escape. The gale rapidly increased. The ship, trembling at every joint, was breaking through the drift and foam, cutting the boiling seas that every moment broke clear over her, deluging her deck with water. Captain L. made his way back to the quarterdeck. The peril into which he was unconsciously thrown, brought him completely to himself;—the brig and all else but his ship was forgotten. He was perfectly cool, though quick and nervous in his movements; and a shade of anxiety was discoverable in his face, notwithstanding his effort to suppress all outward demonstration of his feelings.

'The ship cannot stay in this sea,' said he, in a low, hurried, and half-inquiring tone, to Mr. Smith.

'No, sir; she will never go round in such a swell as this. No human efforts could make her!'

'And she will certainly go to the bottom if we attempt to wear!'

'Certainly!' replied the collected Smith.

'How does that point bear?'

Lieutenant Smith stooped and glanced at its position.

'About two points on the bow, and not half a mile off!'

'Give me the trumpet, sir—give me the trumpet! She must go round, or we'll be smashed in five minutes!' and seizing the trumpet, he shouted, 'ready about,' and the other orders for tacking closely followed. There was a moment of bustle and changing of places among the men, and then all was quiet.

'Are you all ready, forward?'

'All ready, sir!'

'Ease down the helm—handsomely! handsomely! Let fly the jib-sheet!'

The helm was put down, the sheet let go, and slowly the ship's head came up to the wind, and her sails were slightly shivered. To the success of this movement every man on board looked with a heart swelled almost to bursting, for on it, they knew their safety hung. The seas dashed over her more impetuously—and, for a moment, she stood almost still. This moment was to decide. If the wind caught the head sails aback, the manœuvre would be complete, and the ship safe; if not, she would most likely get stern-way, and the most disastrous result was to be anticipated. Captain L. did not, for an instant, forget his terrible responsibility at that crisis; but gazing intently on the sails, his whole soul seemed wrapped up in the event. His feelings were his men's, who did not, for one moment, withdraw their straining scrutiny from the indicators of their fate. Scarcely a minute had elapsed, yet to them it seemed an age, when slowly the bows of the ship payed off from the wind, and it was apparent she would not go about.

'May she be damned for that!' growled a sailor within hearing of his commander.

'Silence, sir!' exclaimed the captain.

There was a startling solemnity in his tone and manner, evincing a just sense of propriety at a moment so big with the fate of human beings.

'Bring the ship to the wind, quartermaster, and keep her as close as she will lie—touch and go.'

'Touch and go, sir!' was the immoveable seaman's reply.

The ship, obedient to her helm, came up, and regained her headway, without having very perceptibly fallen off. By this time the point it was necessary to weather was a few hundred yards distant, and to every man on board, it seemed the merest possible chance to pass it—to strike it, would be certain destruction. The gale still increased, yet captain L. did not dare to start a rope. Every strand was stretched to the utmost. The spars were sprung into the shape of bows. If the ship before dived through the seas, she now seemed to drive them before her, so tremendous was the power with which she was urged onward. Her lee guns dragged in the water, and the lee side of the deck was full of it. Under such a press of canvass, it was only wonderful the masts were not swept from the deck, or the ship capsized. As she neared the point, the feelings of her inmates were wound up to an agonizing pitch. Some stood, with terrified countenances, grasping the rigging; some crept away to a corner, and with their faces buried in their hands, waited in silent dread the consummation; while others gazed with aching eyes on the rocks, as the ship, with appalling rapidity, neared them.

But what sound is that, like the report of a cannon, that comes so stunningly on the ears of all?

'The jib's burst!' yelled a trumpet-toned, unearthly voice from the forward deck;—it seemed the knell of hope!

'Lay out and loose the fore-topmast staysail, and man the halyards!' shouted the undismayed commander; 'move, men, for your lives! quartermaster, keep the ship steady!'

Digitized by Google

'Steady, to a hair, sir!' was the cool, undaunted reply.

By the time the fore-topmast staysail was hoisted, the ship was directly abreast the point of danger. Then was the agony of that fearful trial, almost beyond mortal bearing! Instead of finding it, what they supposed, a point, of terminating suddenly, they discovered, on approaching it, that the ledge continued in a right line nearly a quarter of a mile! The ship was then so near it that a strong arm might have cast a biscuit on the rocks, and she was sensibly drifting to leeward, under the press of wind and the continued setting of the sea. The water boiled up around her from the rocks below! The spray of the waves was almost thrown back on her deck from the rocks above! Could they hope to escape? Not one man expected to see the setting of that day's sun! Each settled in his own mind to meet his Creator as best he could—Captain L. was the only man who quailed not amid the furious encounter. With a steady gaze on the sails, he watched the quiver of their edges, and not once removed his eyes from them. He knew that on keeping the ship close to the wind, depended all, and to that he looked, as the arbiter between life and death.

'Luff, quartermaster, luff,' said he in a rapid under-tone, as if uncertain whether the command was correct; 'luff, I think the wind veers!'

'It does, sir; she has come up a point.'

To this reprieving intelligence there was but one drawback in the mind of captain L. The wind, constantly fitful, might suddenly change back to its old point, in which event the headway of the ship would be deadened, and as close to the breakers as she then was, not one hope would be left. But an allseeing Providence did not so decree it. Still the commander watched the sails, and still the ship came gradually up.—Every moment removed her farther from the breakers. There was a sensible movement throughout the ship. A long drawn sigh burst from the men, and they breathed again, as they saw the distance between them and danger momentarily lessening. At length, the last black rock was left behind, and the weight of torture was removed from their breasts, who, a short time before, were prepared to battle with 'the foaming brine;' and to die on the rocks, whose very existence they now scarce thought of!

Attention was again directed to the brig, and she was perceived almost hull down to leeward, with all sail set. The sea was clear, and captain L. became again intent on the chase.

'Now slap her before the wind,' said he to his lieutenant; 'crack all drawing sail on her from stem, to stern, and before we sleep this night, we'll have her.'

The ardent and steady commander then gave the trumpet to Mr. Smith, and sought his cabin. His feelings had been terribly wrought up, and the revulsion was more overpowering than he was willing to exhibit to those around.

His orders were obeyed with unwonted eagerness and celerity;—the ship like a moving cloud, flies onward through the majestic billows, yet seeming scarce to touch them,

'So gloriously her gallant course she goes.'

Now she lifts her head, sparkling with a million drops, high in air, like a gay caparisoned steed; now plunges it into the hillocks of crested brine, dashing the effervescent spray in snowy and fantastic curls before her prow:—Now resting almost motionless on the apex of an arching sea, or darting forward with accelerated impetuosity:—Now gracefully careening from side to side; then moving steadily, with upright masts, on her winged career, like a sea-bird soaring on the rushing gale:—

'Who would not brave the battle fire,—the wreck,
To move the monarch of her peopled deck?'

Throughout the forepart of the day the wind was still strong; at meridian, it had sensibly diminished; and before the afternoon had half expired, the sudden gale dwindled into the steady trade, the waters subsided, and the ship moved on rapidly, but without labor. The distance between the two vessels was, at sunset, shortened to about two miles.

'We shall have a brush with that fellow, yet;' said captain L. as he relieved his eye from a long scrutiny of the brig, and cast it on a dark cloud that was backing up from the horizon behind.

'Does she show teeth?' demanded Smith.

'Ay; she has unshipped her bright sides and shows a full row; her deck swarms with men too. Are the guns all double-shotted?'

'Yes, sir.'

'The small arms in order?'

'All in perfect order. I have examined them myself. Not a pistol will miss fire, and the cutlasses would brain a man in a child's hand!'

Four hours afterwards, the ship still under a press of sail, captain L. stood where he did in the last conversation with his lieutenant. He had remained, with his eyes rivetted on the brig till suddenly, as if she had sunk to the bottom, she disappeared, and it was in vain he swept the horizon with his night glass. Nothing could have startled him more than did this unlooked for vanishing. He certainly had not withdrawn his eyes from her five minutes, altogether, and yet was she gone, and nobody could see her.—The night, too, was unfortunately darker than usual, for much of the sky was overcast with the cloud that first appeared at sunset. Captain L.—to use one of his own expressions—was 'all aback.' He went to the forward part of the ship—then to the gangway—then back to the quarterdeck; and looked in every direction; and it was reduced to a certainty that the brig was nowhere to be seen.

'In the devil's name, what can have become of her!' said he at length; 'this is not the latitude of the Flying Dutchman, or I should think I have been fooling myself with a goblin galliot all day! Are there any rocks about here, Mr. Smith?'

'Not a single breaker on the chart, sir.'

'Then she's afloat, and have her, I will! Masthead, there!' and without waiting for an answer, he shouted again, 'mast-head, there!'

'Sir!' sounded a voice, as if from the clouds.

'Do you see any thing of that brig?'

'No, sir!'

Captain L. became still more impatient.—Every man on board was set to look out for the invisible brig; and for half an hour, one hundred and fifty men and three hundred eyes looked out in vain. Never was man so puzzled as captain L. He did not know which way to turn, how to act, and least of all, what to think. There was a mystery about the matter that resisted the touchstone of professional experience and skill. That he should, in turning away for two minutes, have lost sight of the brig, was to him incomprehensible; and was certainly enough to disturb his equanimity.

Digitized by Google

'If I lose that brig,' said he, impatiently, I'll throw up my commission, and swear the prince of darkness himself is cruising in these seas, in an invisible Baltimore brig! Forecastle, there!'

'Sir!'

'Do you see any thing, yet?'

'There's something on the starboard bow, sir, but we can't make it out.'

Captain L. was on the forecastle in a moment. One look satisfied him. There was the brig, within point-blank distance, and not a rag of canvass abroad.

'Not gone yet, my fly-away! Mr. Smith, down with the studding sails, and beat to quarters!'

The words were hardly from his lips, before every man, as if simultaneously impelled, sprang to a rope, and in a minute, the light sails were lowered from the yards, and thrust below deck. The next, the deck was as silent, and the men as immoveable, as if they had become stone under a sorcerer's wand! They were at quarters!

Along the deck, at regular intervals, were lighted matches, and battle lanthorns, that cast a subdued light on the paraphernalia of war, scattered around in seeming confusion, yet, every article in its proper place, and showed the expression of eagerness combined with stern determination, depicted on the faces of the men. If there be a moment of a sailor's life, when his ardent character shines with greatest brilliancy, it is when he momentarily expects a battle to commence. With a swelling heart and a bounding pulse, he stands impatient for the word, no thought of danger or dismay, damping the vigor of his fiery spirit. Yet, is he never more steady in his judgment. That, as his other faculties, strengthens with the emergency, and he exhibits the uncommon spectacle of the intensest passion, guided, controlled, and regulated by an impetuous, but almost unerring judgment. It is then we are taught to admire his character; it is then the darker shades are lost in the halo of brilliancy his manliness and valor throw around him; and we forget that the lion of the battle can be as well the prince of a debauch, and the abject slave of degrading and inhuman passions.

With a steady speed the ship approached the brig. From the moment the guns of the former could be brought to bear, they were trained with exactness against the enemy, now within pistol shot of the ship, and nearly abreast. Not a light was visible about her, and not a sail was spread to break the delicate line of her long and rakish masts against the sky. No human figure showed itself above the bulwarks, save one, that, even in the darkness, appeared commanding, and he was at the helm.

Her long black hull rose and fell gracefully on the swells of the sea, and once in awhile, as she lurched to her side, a line of open ports could be distinguished, which seemed to bid defiance to the approaching ship.

'Brig ahoy!' shouted captain L.

A pause succeeded the hail, in which the crew scarcely breathed, so intent were they on the answer. The only sound was the rushing wave, and the flapping of the ropes swayed to and fro by the vessel's motion. No answer came.

'Brig ahoy!' again cried captain L., more vehemently.

'Hilloa!' came back upon the wind, in a clear, strong, and sonorous voice.

'What brig is that?'

There was no reply; but slowly, and as if by preternatural agency, the brig's sails were loosed and distended to their limits. No living creature was seen to effect this movement. No one could be perceived on the yards, and the man first seen, was the only one on deck. It seemed the work of magic.

'If you do not answer, I will fire into you!'

'Fire, if you please!' was the taunting and contemptuous answer.

'Stand by!' cried captain L.

'Stand by!' was heard from the brig, in an elevated, commanding, and determined tone.

Captain L., still willing to spare an inferior foe, exclaimed:

'Will you answer me? What brig is that?'

'No!' shouted the solitary of the brig.

'Fire!' screamed captain L.

'Fire!' yelled the other.

At the word, the broadsides of both vessels were discharged. As the sheeted flame burst forth, the ocean far round was lighted up with an intense, momentary blaze, and millions of sparks hung, for awhile, between the vessels, and gradually sinking to the water, were extinguished. Instantly succeeding the report, were the crash of timbers, and the groans of the wounded. Unheeded they fell, and their cries reached not the ears of comrades, who, at any other time, would have flown to their relief; now, the spell of battle was on every heart: the timid grew brave; the feeble, strong; the courageous, lion-like! For a short time, the wind was lulled by the concussion of the discharge, and the cloud of smoke hung upon the surface of the sea, completely concealing the combatants from each other, till the breeze resumed its supremacy, and swept it onward, and they emerged to view.

Again the lightning of their broadsides glared upon the sea, and their thunder roared, mixed up with the thunder of the clouds, and the fitful gusts of a gathering storm. A heavy, impenetrable darkness reigned, save close by the water's surface. Extending a few feet above that, was a subdued, sickly brilliance; the ocean had put on its mantle of light, and in every direction, as far as the eye could span, the breaking waves looked, as if on every crest was lighted a pale white fire, till the entire expanse seemed a vivid sheet of dancing flame. The effect was magnificent, and inspiring, heightened, as it was, for a moment after the fire of the vessels, by the flying shot, as they bounded and rushed through the waters, leaving a train of awakened light, like lightning, streaming over the face of the vasty deep!

Digitized by Google

Before the hostile vessels were prepared for a third discharge, the clouds that had been steadily gathering overhead, opened, and a deluge of rain, accompanied with a violent wind, an almost unintermitted stream of lightning, and one constant peal of deafening thunder, poured down upon them! Further combat was impossible. The full terrors of a tropical storm were above and around them. The wind almost instantaneously strengthened into a furious gale, and in the tumult consequent on a visitation so sudden and unprovided for, the vessels were separated.

During the greater part of the night, the ship lay to under short sail, and when the day dawned again, no vestige of the brig was visible.

Western Magazine.

The following lines are the production of a lady, who, for the last ten years, has been confined to her chamber by a lingering and painful affliction. They breathe noble sentiments, and evidence a well informed mind, which has preserved its freshness and vigour in spite of bodily suffering and the encroaches of disease. We lay them before our readers with great pleasure, and while we sincerely sympathise with our correspondent in her afflictions, we cannot but congratulate her on the possession of intellectual powers, from which she must necessarily derive great solace, and which enable her, as it were, to triumph over the frailness of human nature.

Art of cultivating Friendship, made known in a Dream.

Imperial night, her banner had unfurled,
And reigned in solemn silence o'er the world;
When sunk, by downy sleep, to soft repose,
This shining vision to my fancy rose.
The great Apollo, on a lofty throne
My ears saluted in a melting tone;
Around his temples shone a halo bright,
And Iris's bow imbibed the beams of light—
Flames from his eyes, and his immortal lyre
Re-echoed numbers of enchanting fire.
Friendship, sweet friendship, was his ardent theme,
Which long I had conceived an empty dream;
At least on earth, and to the skies confined,
And for our fallen nature too refined.

This shining sovereign of the tuneful train,
(While sweet contagion ran through every vein,)
Assured me, that the seeds of friendship lie
Neglected, and for want of culture die.
I'll teach you this Elysian plant to rear,
And while it blossoms in a terrestrial sphere,
Its odours shall a heavenly balm impart,
To cheer the spirits, and improve the heart.
Let virtue in thy breast erect her throne,
And friendship will not let her reign alone.
For these fair sisters, travel hand in hand,
And strength impart, as either strength demand.
Virtue is tender, though she is heavenly fair,
And must be cherished with officious care;
But while her growth your daily cares demand,
She lends her sister a supporting hand.

Fair science, early, should those minds refine,
Who would their hearts in leagues of friendship join.
Sweet flowers are cherished by Parnassian dews,
And knowledge tender sentiments infuse.
With caution shun that popular mistake,
Nor this nice principle for passion take,
That often sways the low and vicious breast,
Where sacred friendship seems to be a guest.

Receive, O! thoughtless youth, a God's advice,
And early learn true wisdom from the wise;
Of their assistance you are much in need—
Without it, virtue's paths you cannot tread;
And vice corrosive—social pleasures' bane,
Dissolves the links of friendship's golden chain.
The tyrant, fashion, too, corrupts the heart,
And love of gold, subdues with magic art.
Fly those enchantments, friendship to enjoy,
For they its richest harvest will destroy.

Receive the sacred word, its hallowed strains
Are sung with joy, on Eden's blissful plains:
They kindle here the same celestial love
That fires the disembodied saints above.
Each page emits a soul-reviving light,
To dissipate the gloom of mental night.

While these last notes were rolling from his lyre,
My spirit caught the sweet celestial fire—
Those flowry pages of Eternal truth,
Shall be the guide and comfort of my youth:
There will I range with ever new delight,
Where clustering glories every sense invite.

The tuneful God now stretch'd his wings for flight—
Stay, stay, I cried, and bless my longing sight;
But rapid in his flight, he spurn'd my prayer,
And the sweet vision melted into air.

THE WIND IN THE WOODS.

'Tis a pleasant sight on a vernal day,
When shadow and sun divide the heaven,
To watch the south wind wake up for play:—
Not on the sea where ships are riven—
Not on the mountain, mid rain and storm,
But when earth is sunny and green and warm,
O woodland wind, how I love to see
Thy beautiful strength in the forest tree!

Lord of the oak, that seems lord of the wild,
Thou art shaking his crown and thousand arms,
With the ease of a spirit, the glee of a child,
And the pride of a woman who knows her charms;
And the poplar bends like a merchant's mast,
His leaves, though they fall not, are fluttering fast:
And the beach, and the lime, and the ash-crown'd hill,
Stirs to its core at thy wandering will.

The pines that uprear themselves dark and tall,
Black knights of the forest so stately and old,
They must bow their heads when they hear thy call,
Aye, bow like the lilly, those Norsemen bold;
And every tree of the field or bower,
Or single in strength, or many in power,
Quiver and thrill from the leaf to the stem,
For the unseen wind is master of them!

It is gallant play, for the sun is bright,
And the rivulet sings a merrier song;
The grain in the meadow waves dark and light,
As the trees fling shade, or the breeze is strong.
And over the hills, whether rocky or green,
Troops of the noonday ghosts are seen;
The lovely shadows of lovelier clouds,
With the gloom of the mountains amongst their crowds.

The birds as they fly scarce use their wings,
They are borne upon those of the wind to-day;
And their plumes are ruffled, like all green things,
And flowers, and streams, by his noisy play.
One hour,—and valley, and wood, and hill,
May be sleeping and shining all bright and still;
Not a wave, not a leaf, not a spray in motion,
Of all which now looks like a vernal ocean—
Beautiful this;—yet I love to see
Thy strength, O wind, in the forest tree!

Digitized by Google

From the New England Magazine.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MATHEW CAREY.

LETTER I.

"Homo sum. E humani a me nilalienum puto."
TERENCE.

DEAR SIR,

SEVERAL months have elapsed since you requested to be furnished with an autobiographical sketch of my life, or with materials from which you might yourself form a sketch. Doubts of the propriety of the measure,—various occupations which pressed me at the time—and a spirit of procrastination,—a leading trait in my character,—combined to postpone a decision on the subject till now, when, on mature consideration, I have determined to comply with your request.

Among the motives which have led to this decision, an prominent one, be assured, is, a hope that the sketch I propose to give, however deficient it may be of entertainment, forgwant of the thrilling scenes of interest —the strokes of humor—the frequent anecdotes, wherewith many autobiographies abound, (for which, by the way, I suspect in various cases the writers "draw on their imaginations for their facts,") it can hardly fail to have a beneficial tendency, by a display of the overwhelming difficulties and dangers, with which I have had to struggle for a full third part of my life, when I was almost daily on the verge of bankruptcy—dangers which I could not have overcome but by the most unshrinking perseverance and industry. The example of the favorable result of that perseverance and that industry, may encourage others in similar emergencies, who are desponding, and on the point of yielding to the pressure of difficulties, to buffet the waves, and finally reach the haven of ease and comfort in their old age. The hope that this result may, and the belief that it will, take place in many instances, afford encouragement to this undertaking, and will amply compensate for the time bestowed on the composition.

It may not be amiss here to state two classical passages, which most completely strengthened me in my difficulties, when I was on the point of sinking.

"Revocate animos: mœstumque timorem
"Mittite. Forsan et hæc olim meminisse juvabit."
VIRGIL.

This prophetic aspiration has been fully realized. It is delightful to look on the storms by which my poor bark was so often and so long assailed, and which for years threatened it with inevitable destruction.

"SPERAT INFESTIS—metuit secundis—
"Alteram sortem—BENE PRÆPARATUM PECTUS."
HORAT.

In addition to these aids, I had three constant stimuli goading my sides, whenever, as often happened, the energies of my body and mind were prostrated, and I was on the point of "giving up the ship." These were—the dread of poverty in old age—the claims of an increasing and interesting family—and the horror of obliging other people to pay my debts, as would necessarily have been the case, had I stopped payment.

So much for preface. Now to the thread of my story.

I was born in Dublin, on the 28th of January, 1760. My father carried on the useful, but not highly prized, occupation of a baker, in which, by inflexible honesty, unceasing industry, and rigid economy, he made a handsome fortune.

Of my early days I have a very faint recollection, except on one point, the wonderfully slow development of my faculties. I was less advanced in intellect at ten or twelve years of age, than many children in this country, at six or eight. In fact, I was in the rear of all the young people of my age and acquaintance. My conceptions were slow and immature. I was, truly an extremely dull boy. I had, however, a considerable aptitude for arithmetical exercises, and for the acquisition of languages, the latter of which was my ruling passion. Had I been adequately encouraged, and been provided with the proper "means and appliances," I am persuaded that, before I was twenty-one, I should have attained a knowledge not only of all the modern languages of Europe, but of the most important of the ancient ones. This will appear probable, when I state, that after about seven weeks hard study, without a master, I was enabled to read, and perfectly understand, French prose with great ease, and had little difficulty with the poetry of the language. It must, however, be observed, that I studied in the long days of summer, from sun-rise to sun-set, fifteen or sixteen hours, and scarcely allowed myself time for my meals. So that I studied as much in one month, as learners generally do in six, perhaps in twelve. In this case, too, I had suitable French books with English translations, nearly literal: among the number, the most prominent and useful were French Fables, Telemaque, and Les Voyages de Cyrus.

My education, like that of other lads of my rank in life, was extremely limited, and confined to the rudiments of the English language, arithmetic, and a slight smattering of Latin. Those who know the wide range of education at the present day, can scarcely conceive the extraordinary disadvantages under which children labored seventy years ago, particularly in Ireland. Of books, uniting entertainment with instruction, calculated for young people, I do not recollect to have seen six, perhaps I might say three. A large portion of the reading of young people of that day, for amusement, was confined to Don Bellianis of Greece, Gesta Romanorum, the Seven Champions of Christendom, the Seven Wise Masters of Greece, Guy, Earl of Warwick, &c. &c.; and for the improvement of their morals and manners, the history of Pirates, and of the Irish Rogues and Rapparees, &c. &c.

One particular worthy of notice is, that, by an anomaly probably of rare occurrence, although I had, as I have observed, a peculiar aptitude for common arithmetic, in which I made considerable progress, I never was able, notwithstanding various efforts, to master the rudiments of mathematics, a kindred science; and I presume, according to Spurzheim, the phrenological bumps that indicate the former, would equally indicate the latter.

When I was about fifteen years of age, it became necessary to choose a trade. I was decidedly in favor of that of printer and bookseller, which were then generally united. I had fixed my mind on them from the time I was five or six years of age. My father had a strong aversion to them—so strong, indeed, that while he gave me my choice of any other of the twenty-five corporations that existed in Dublin, he absolutely refused to look out a master for me at those trades —and, therefore, I sallied out to procure one for myself, and at length found one, a bookseller, of the name of McDaniel, who, during the period of my apprenticeship, changed it to McDonnel, as a more respectable name. Being very poor, he was tempted, by the apprentice fee, thirty guineas, to take me, although he had but little occasion for my services. My father was to board me on Sundays, and to pay for my washing.

My lameness, which took place when I was about a year old, through the carelessness of my nurse, was about as great a grievance to me as his to Lord Byron —not probably from the same motives. It operated on his vanity, and thus was felt daily and hourly. I was annoyed by the taunts and jeers and nicknames of my school and play-fellows, who, humanely, as is usual in such cases, omitted no opportunity of teazing me, and reminding me of a misfortune, of which I have felt the disadvantage almost every day of my life.

Had surgical aid been called in at an early period,

Digitized by Google

this calamity might have been remedied, and I been secured from the various unpleasant and injurious consequences by which it was attended; among which a leading one was, that, by disabling me from associations with those of my own age, in which pedestrianism was involved, I gradually contracted a timidity and backwardness, which have "grown with my growth," and at every period of my life have had a pernicious operation on my career. This effect was greatly aided by the austere system under which I was brought up at home.

Mr. McDonnel was a hard, austere master, of most repelling manners. He never, in a single instance, expressed approbation of my conduct, however careful or industrious I was.

I had been a great, indeed a voracious reader, before I was bound apprentice—and had clandestinely subscribed to a circulating library, contrary to the wishes, and indeed without the knowledge, of my parents, who were opposed to the kind of books which, alone, I was desirous of reading. I used to be dissatisfied that I could not exchange books oftener than once a day. I used to sit up till twelve and one o'clock, reading novels and romances. Yet now, when attending a book-store, as I did for two years, where there was scarcely any business done, and where, of course, I had leisure to read four-fifths of my time, I did not read as much in a month as I was wont to do in a week. Strange perversity of our nature! which leads us to pursue with avidity whatever is forbidden or attainable only with difficulty, and to neglect the selfsame things when coursing our acceptance!

My first essay, as a writer, was when I was about seventeen years of age, and was on the subject of duelling. One of my fellow apprentices, T. McMahon, had a sparring match with the apprentice of a ruffian bookseller, of the name of Wogan, whose work was executed in McDonnel's office, which terminated, as sparring matches generally do, in a downright battle royal, in which the latter was completely discomfited; and carried off, as memorials of his defeat, a pair of black eyes and a bloody nose. He complained to his master, as if he had been wantonly and wickedly assailed. Wogan came to demand satisfaction and an apology from McMahon; who, being a lad of spirit, refused to comply, unless the apology were mutual, as the offence had been. Wogan was exasperated, and made his lad send a challenge to McMahon to meet him to decide the affair in the Phœnix Park, on the Sunday morning following. McMahon was as bold as a lion in combat with the fists or cudgels, but dreaded, with Bob Acres, "double-barrelled swords and cut-and-thrust pistols." He was in dread of the rencontre the remainder of the week; but was relieved from his perplexity by the interference of McDonnel, who forbade him to appear on the ground. Wogan was quite serious; went with his lad to the Park at the appointed time; waited for half an hour; and came home vaporing and threatening to post McMahon.—Feeling indignant at this ruffianly conduct, I wrote an essay on duelling, showing its wickedness and absurdity, and detailing the number of persons who had fallen sacrifices to the horrid custom in France, under Henry IV. closing with this observation—

"These remarks are offered to the public in consequence of an attempt made by Mr. W. not a hundred miles from the Old Bridge, to produce a duel between two apprentice lads. Quere. If one or both had been disabled from earning a livelihood, would Mr. W. have supported him or them?"

The essay was published in the Hibernian Journal, a paper, of which McDonnel was half proprietor, but the management of which was left to his partner, a Mr. Mills. The MS. was sent for—my writing was known—I was severely reprimanded—and, to propitiate Wogan, McMahon, who was an unprotected orphan, was basely dismissed. But the unworthy sacrifice did not avail. Wogan was implacable, and withdrew his work from McDonnel.

My next essay was attended with much more serious consequences, and rendered me for a time a voluntary exile from my country.

I had directed my attention, at this early day, to the horrible oppression of the Irish Catholics, and had read every book and pamphlet I could procure, respecting the tyranny exercised on them, and the calumnies with which, for the purpose of justifying that tyranny, they were overwhelmed. With my mind filled with their sufferings, and my indignation roused, in the year 1779, I wrote a pamphlet entitled

"The urgent necessity of an immediate repeal of the whole Penal Code against the Roman Catholics, candidly considered; to which is added an inquiry into the prejudices entertained against them; being an appeal to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, exciting them to a just sense of their civil and religious rights, as citizens of a free nation."

"Beware, ye Senators. Look round in time;
Rebellion is not fixed to any clime;
In trade, religion, every way oppressed,
You 'll find—too late—such wrongs must be redressed.
Seize quick the time—for now—consider well—
Whole quarters of the world at once rebel."

LADY LUCAN.

"Cuncta prius tentanda; sed immedicabile vulnus Ense rescindendum."

When nearly finished at press, I advertised it for publication in a few days—and the title page, with its daring mottoes, was published in the newspapers—together with an address couched in very strong language, of which the following is an extract:—

TO THE ROMAN CATHOLICS OF IRELAND.

"At a time when America, by a desperate effort, has nearly emancipated herself from slavery; when, laying aside ancient prejudices, a Catholic king becomes the avowed patron of Protestant freemen; when the tyranny of a British Parliament over Ireland, has been annihilated by the intrepid spirit of Irishmen; it is a most afflicting reflection, that you, my countrymen, the majority of that nation, which has shaken off an unjust English yoke, remain still enchained by one infinitely more galling; that you are, through your own pusillanimity, daily insulted by imprudent menacing advertisements, from insignificant parts of the kingdom; that a new tyrannical bigots in Meath and Wexford, presume to take into their own hands, the legislative and executive part of our government, and, with a dictatorial power, prescribe laws to their fellows subjects."

The plan of the pamphlet was a good one, but the execution was as might be expected from a young man, little experienced in writing, quite puerile.

The publication excited a considerable alarm, grounded on the tenor of the mottoes; for in fact the body of the pamphlet was wholly inoffensive, as it consisted principally of extracts recriminating the charges made against the Roman Catholics, with interlocutory matter. Parliament was then sitting; and the advertisement was brought before both houses; by the Duke of Leinster, in the House of Lords, and by Sir Thomas Connolly, in the House of Commons. It was adduced as full proof of the seditious and treasonable views of the Roman Catholics, and made use of by their enemies, in and out of Parliament, to show how unworthy they were of the favors, as they were called, which the Parliament was then preparing to accord to that persecuted and oppressed body. These pretended favors were some not very important relaxations of the cruel chains which had been accumulating for nearly a century a relaxation, solely the result of the terror excited by the revolt of the American Colonies—the French war—and the Volunteers.

Digitized by Google

There was, at that period, an association in Dublin, elected by the Roman Catholics, to manage their concerns, and to plead their cause with the government.—It partook of the general depression and servile spirit, which a long course of oppression uniformly produces. It was, in a word, the most servile body in Europe, and as unlike the Emmetts, the Shearness, the Samsons, the McNevens, of the Insurrection of 1798, or the Shiels, and the O'Connells of the present day, as the slavish Parliament of Charles II. which established passive obedience and non-resistance, by law, was to the glorious and immortal band who signed the Declaration of Independence, in 1776.

This cringing body, to make fair weather with the government, and to clear themselves of any participation in the seditious publication, called a meeting, headed by the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, and by Lord Kenmare, and embracing nearly all the influential Catholics of Dublin; denounced the obnoxious advertisement in strong terms; offered a reward of, as well as I remember, forty pounds, for the discovery of the author, and engaged lawyers to carry on the prosecution in the event of a discovery.

I need not say that my father, who had no suspicion that one of his offspring was about to expose him to so much trouble and expense, was excessively alarmed.—He took measures to have the publication suppressed—and the types of those parts not yet printed off, viz. the preface, introduction, and four pages of peroration, were distributed, and, of course, never worked off. To the Catholic Committee an offer was made of burning the edition, provided the idea of a prosecution were given up. This offer was rejected, and a fierce prosecution was determined on.

Dreading the consequences, it was determined, after I had been concealed for four or five days, to send me out of danger; and I was put on board a Holyhead packet, with a few guineas in my pocket, to proceed to Paris, with a letter to a Roman Catholic priest, by whom I was introduced to Dr. Franklin, who had a small printing-office at Passy, a village in the neighbourhood of Paris, for the purpose of re-printing his despatches from America, and other papers. He engaged me, and I officiated in his office for some months, when, not having occasion for me any longer, I went to work with Didot le jeune, who was then engaged in printing some English books, where I did not remain long—for in about twelve months from the commencement of my exile, the storm having blown over, I returned to Dublin.

During the time when I was at Passy, an invasion of Ireland was contemplated by the French; and the Marquis de la Fayette, who was then in Paris, and was probably intended to take a part in the enterprize, called on me, to make inquiries on the political state of that country. But I was utterly unable to give any information on the subject, as I had lived in a state of total seclusion from public affairs, of which I knew little or nothing. I was as complete a green horn as ever was brought into trouble by the crude productions of his pen.

During my absence, the residue of my term of apprenticeship was purchased from Mr. McDonnel, and, on my return home, I engaged for a time as conductor of a paper, called the Freeman's Journal. At length, on the 13th of October, 1783, when I was nearly twenty-four years of age, my father gave me wherewith to establish a new paper, called the Volunteer's Journal. I was miserably qualified for such an occupation, which required no small degree of tact, of experience of the world, and considerable prudence, in all of which, I was greatly deficient. I had a superabundance of zeal and ardor, and a tolerable knack and facility of scribbling. These were all the qualifications I possessed for the management of a patriotic paper, the object of which was to defend the commerce, the manufactures, and the political rights of Ireland against the oppression and encroachments of Great-Britain.

The paper, as might have been expected, partook largely of the character of its proprietor and editor. Its career was enthusiastic and violent. It suited the temper of the times; exercised a decided influence on public opinion; and, in a very short time, had a greater circulation than any other paper in Dublin, except the Evening Post, which had the great merit of calling into existence that glorious band of brothers, the volunteers of Ireland, whose zeal and determined resolution to assert and defend the rights of their country, struck terror into the British Cabinet, and forced the ministry to knock off chains that had bound down the nation for centuries, and blasted the industry, the energies, and the manifold blessings bestowed by nature on that highly favoured island.

The Volunteer's Journal, fanning the flame of patriotism which pervaded the land, excited the indignation of the government, which formed a determination to put it down, if possible. A prosecution had been for a considerable time contemplated; and at length, the storm which so threatened, burst, in consequence of a publication which appeared on the 5th of April, 1784, in which the Parliament in general, and more particularly the Premier, were severely attacked.

On the 7th of April, the paper in question was introduced into the House of Commons, and after considerable debate,

"Mr Foster moved that an address be presented to the Lord Lieutenant, requesting that he will please issue his proclamation, offering a reward for apprehending Mathew Carey." Parliamentary Register, or history of the proceedings and debates of the House of Commons in Ireland. The first session of the fourth Parliament in the reign of his present Majesty; which met the 14th of October, 1783, and ended the 14th of May, 1784. Vol. III. page 153.

Besides this procedure, a prosecution was instituted against me, for the libel against the Premier.

I kept myself retired for a few days, with a bar across my room door. But imprudently venturing into the office at an early hour in the morning, unapprehensive of danger, I was apprehended by a Police Officer on the 11th of April, to answer for the libel. I was brought before the sitting magistrates, and ample bail was offered for my appearance; but various difficulties were started, in order to afford an opportunity to the Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Commons to take me out of the hands of the civil magistrates, which he accordingly did, and conveyed me to his house, where I was treated with considerable rigor. I was not allowed the free use of pen, ink, and paper—nor free converse with my friends. An armed centinel was placed in my room, and one out side the door, besides a guard at the street door.

As an adjournment of Parliament had taken place, I was held in close custody in the house of Mr. L'Estrange, Sergeant-at-arms.

On the 19th of April, Parliament met, after the recess, when I was brought before the House of Commons, and interrogatories being put to me, I refused to answer them, on the ground that, having been arrested by the civil power, and being under prosecution for the supposed libel, I was not amenable to another tribunal.

I then preferred a complaint against the Sergeant-at-arms, under three heads:—

1. That I had been denied the free use of pen, ink, and paper, every thing I wrote being inspected by that gentleman.

2. That my friends were occasionally denied access to me; and

Digitized by Google

3. That a sentinel was constantly in my room, with a drawn bayonet, and one outside.

"Mr. L'Estrange admitted the three several charges, and justified his conduct under each.

"He said that from the time of his bringing Mr. Carey home to his house, he was in continual apprehension of his being rescued by a mob; that he considered himself in a very dangerous situation while he had him in his house; as to denying admission to the friends of Mr. Carey, he confessed, that once or twice he did deny persons admission; but this was on account of the great confusion, which the concourse of persons, assembled about Mr. Carey, occasioned in his family; and as to the third charge, he justified his conduct by declaring that he was every moment in apprehension of a mob assembling to rescue Mr. Carey. Upon the whole, he said, that, having a prisoner such as Mr. Carey in his charge, was a new situation to him; that he had received no advice or direction from any one how he should conduct himself, but had acted with caution to the best of his knowledge, and with a sincere desire to discharge his duty faithfully." Idem, p. 183.

Notwithstanding Mr. L'Estrange's confession of the truth of the charges, it will astonish the reader to find, that "Mr. Gardiner read two resolutions, the first declaring the charge against Mr. L'Estrange, ill-grounded and malicious—and the last an approbation of Mr. L'Estrange's conduct." Idem, p. 184.

This barefaced conduct called forth the reprobation of several independent members, among whom Sir Edward Crofton, Mr. Griffith, Sir Edward Newenham, and William Todd Jones, were the most conspicuous. I was allowed to produce evidence in support of the charges against Mr. L'Estrange, which I fully established.

"As to the person at the bar," observed Mr. Crofton, "I never saw him before this hour. I cannot therefore be deemed guilty of partiality to him, in speaking one word in the cause of humanity. Sir, the treatment that that person has received, has been unprecedented. He has been forcibly taken out of the power of the civil magistrate, and confined a close prisoner; denied the use of pen, ink, and paper, and surrounded by a military band. Sir, as I passed through Abbey street, I was surprised to see triple rows of soldiers drawn up before the house of your Sergeant-at-arms. The thing is too ridiculous. One would think so great a force was to guard some person of gigantic strength—a Gulliver in Lilliput—and not a poor puisne printer in Dublin." Idem, p. 171.

"Mr. William Todd Jones said he would negative Mr. Gardiner's resolutions, though he should stand alone; because the charges brought by Mr. Carey against the Sergeant-at-arms, were supported by sufficient evidence, and were also admitted by that officer himself. And these charges exhibited such arbitrary proceedings as were totally inadmissible in, and repugnant to the spirit of, all free countries—that to declare Mr. L'Estrange's conduct to Mr. Carey to have been constitutional, he thought would be to establish a very dangerous precedent, and such as he conceived would be as degrading to that House, as it would be tyrannical and intolerable in a free state." Idem, p. 186.

After much debate,

"Mr. Gardiner rose, and declared himself convinced, by Mr. Carey substantiating his charges, of the impropriety of the first resolution he had read; for which reason he moved, that the conduct of Mr. L'Estrange, Deputy Sergeant-at-arms, to Matthew Carey, while in his custody, was cautious, firm, and humane." Idem, p. 185.

This resolution, notwithstanding its manifest injustice and falsehood, so far as regarded "humane conduct," was carried by a majority of 40—43 in the affirmative, and 3 in the negative.

I was ordered, by the House of Commons, to be committed to Newgate, where I remained until the 14th of May, when, Parliament having adjourned, and their power of detention in prison having ceased, I was triumphantly liberated by the Lord Mayor.

During my stay there, I had lived joyously—companies of gentlemen occasionally dining with me on the choicest luxuries the markets afforded.

Although thus freed from the clutches of the Parliament, the criminal prosecution for the libel on John Foster, the Premier, like the sword of Damocles—was suspended over my head. It would, it is true, have been impossible, in the inflamed state of the public mind, to procure a grand jury to find a bill against me. But that salutary and protective process was suspended by the Attorney-General, filing a bill against me, ex-officio, which dispensed with the interposition of a grand jury.

My means having been in a great measure exhausted, in the establishment of the Volunteer's Journal, and dreading the consequences of a prosecution, and a heavy fine and imprisonment, which would probably be the result of a conviction, my friends, on due consideration, were decidedly of opinion, that it would be advisable to withdraw from my native country; and accordingly, on the 7th of September, 1784, when I had not reached my twenty-fifth year, my pen drove me a second time into exile. I embarked on board the America, Captain Keller, and landed in Philadelphia, on the first of November. I was concealed aboard the vessel till she was out at sea, as some of the myrmidons of government came on board, two or three times, in search of me, while the vessel lay in the harbour. I got on board in female dress, and must have cut a very gawky figure, when proceeding to the corner of a street adjacent to my dwelling, where a coach was ready to receive and convey me on board.

I had sold my paper to my brother for £500, to be remitted to me as soon as practicable. I had but twenty-five guineas in my pocket, of one half of which I was cheated on the passage by a band of sharpers.

Yours respectfully,

Philadelphia, Oct. 4, 1833. MATHEW CAREY.

THE LIFE-BOAT.*

"The life-boat! the life-boat! when tempests are dark,
She's the beacon of hope to the foundering bark!
When midst the wild roar of the hurricane's sweep,
The minute guns boom like a knell on the deep.

The life-boat! the life-boat! the whirlwind and rain,
And white crested breakers, oppose her in vain;
Her crew are resolved, and her timbers are staunch,
She's the vessel of mercy—God speed to her launch!

The life-boat! the life-boat! how fearless and free
She wins her bold course o'er the wide-rolling sea!
She bounds o'er the surges with gallant disdain,
She has stemmed them before, and she'll stem them again!

The life-boat! the life-boat! she's manned by the brave,
In the noblest of causes commissioned to save;
What heart but has thrilled in the seaman's distress,
At the life-boat's endeavors, the life-boat's success!

The life-boat! the life-boat! no vessel that sails,
Has stemm'd such rough billows, and weather'd such gales:
Not e'en Nelson's proud ship, when his death-strife was won,
Such true glory achieved as the life-boat has done!"

---

* "This song has appeared in a volume entitled "Patriotic Songs," by Agnes and Susannah Strickland, dedicated by permission to the King of England."

Digitized by Google

DICK DOLEFUL.

A Sketch from Nature.

It was to the late Captain Chronic, R. N., I am indebted for the pleasure of being very slightly acquainted with Richard Doleful, Esquire. The father of Dick had, during the Captain's long and frequent absence on service, acted as his agent and factotum; receiving his pay and his prize-money, managing his disbursements, and investing the annual surplus to the best advantage; and I incline to attribute to old Chronic's kindly and grateful remembrance of the father, rather than to any personal regard for the son, his tolerance of the latter as the almost daily visiter at his house. Dick's "good friends" are "sorry to admit" that there are many bad points about him; his "best friends" compassionate him into the possession of ten times more: hence it may be inferred that Dick, upon the whole, is a much better person than the best of his friends. Yet even I, who do not presume to be his friend, consequently have no motive for speaking in his disparagement, must allow him to be a very unpleasant fellow. Now, as the term "unpleasant fellow" may be variously interpreted, I would have it distinctly understood that I do not mean to accuse him of ever having thrashed his grandmother, or kicked his father down stairs, or poisoned a child, or set fire to a barn, or burked a female, young, beautiful and virtuous, or encouraged an organ-grinder or a Scotch bagpiper to make a hideous noise under his window, or, in short, of any enormous wickedness; I mean—and whether his case may be rendered better or worse by the explanation, must depend upon individual taste—I mean only that he is a bore.

For the last three years of his life, the Captain, whose health was gradually declining under the effects of an uncured and incurable wound in the side, had scarcely ever quitted his house; and for a considerable portion of that period he was unable, without assistance, to move from his sofa. In addition to his sufferings from his glorious wound, he was subject to the occasional attacks of inglorious gout, and of three visits a day from Dick Doleful. Under such a complication of ailments, his case, both by his friends and his physicians, had long been considered hopeless. Indeed the Captain himself seemed aware of the fatal character of the last-named malady; and more than once expressed an opinion, that if he could be relieved from that, he had strength and stamina sufficient to conquer the others. I paid him a visit one day, and entered his room just as Mr. Doleful was leaving it.—Doleful sighed audibly, shook his head, muttered "Our poor dear friend!" and withdrew. This, from any other person, I should have construed into a hint that our "poor dear friend" was at his last gasp; but being acquainted with Mr. Doleful's ways, I approached the Captain as usual, shook his hand cordially, and, in a cheerful tone, inquired how he was getting on.

"Ah, my dear fellow," said he, at the same time slowly lifting his head from the sofa-cushion, "I'm glad to see you; it does me good; you ask me how I do, and you look, and you speak as if you thought there was some life in me. But that Mr. Doleful—! Here he comes, Sir, three times a day; walks into the room on tiptoe, as if he thought I had'nt nerve to bear the creaking of a shoe; touches the tip of one of my fingers as if a cordial grasp would shatter me to atoms; and says, 'Well, how d'ye do now, Captain?' with such a look, and in such a tone!—it always sounds to my ears, 'What! ar'n't you dead yet, Captain?' Then he sits down in that chair; speaks three words in two hours, and that in a whisper; pulls a long face; squeezes out a tear—his dismal undertaker-countenance lowering over me all the while! I'm not a nervous man, but—"; and here he rose from his sofa, struck a blow on a table which made every article upon it spin, and roared out in a voice loud enough to be heard from stem to stern of his old seventy-four, the Thunderer:—"I'm not a nervous man; but d—m me if he doesn't sometimes make me fancy I'm riding in a hearse to my own funeral, with him following as chief mourner. I shall die of him one of these days," added he emphatically, "I know I shall."

"He is not exactly the companion for an invalid," said I: "the cheerful address of a friend, and his assuring smile, are important auxiliaries to the labours of the physican: whilst, on the contrary, the——"

"Aye, aye; the bore of such visits as his! They would make a sound man sick, and hasten a sick man to the grave. And, then, that face of his! I could'nt help saying to him the other day, that when I shot away the figure-head of the French frigate, La Larmoyeuse, I should have liked to have his to stick up in its place."

"It is evident his visits are irksome and injurious to you. Why then, do you encourage them?"

"I don't encourage them, and if he had any feeling he would perceive I don't; but bores have no feeling. Besides, I can't altogether help myself. His father was useful to me; he managed my money-matters at home when I was afloat—a kind of work I never could have done for myself—and so well, too, that I consider my present independence as of his creating. Remembering this, I could not decently toss the son out of window, do you think I could? Eh?"

My honest opinion upon the matter being one which might have put the Captain to some trouble at his next interview with the gentleman in question, I suppressed it, and merely observed, "Mr. Doleful has told me how useful his father was to you."

"Aye, and so he tells everybody, and so he reminds me as often as I see him, and that's the bore. Now, I am not an ungrateful man, and am as little likely as any one to forget a friend, or a friend's son; but every time this king of the Dismals reminds me of my obligation, I consider the debt of gratitude as somewhat diminished: so that if I live much longer, the score will be entirely rubbed out, and then, d—n me, but I will toss him out of window."

After a momentary pause the Captain resumed:—

"Then, there's another bore of his. We take physic because we are obliged to take it: it is'nt that we like it, you know; nobody does, that ever I heard of. Now, he fancies that I can't relish my medicine from any hands but his, and he will stand by when I take my pills, and my draughts, and my powders. Ipecacuanha and Dick Doleful! Fangh! two doses at once! Will you believe it my dear fellow? the two ideas are so connected in my mind that I never see physic without thinking of Dick Doleful, nor Dick Doleful without thinking of physic. I must own I don't like him the better for it, and that he might perceive. But, as I said before bores have no feeling—they have no perceptions—they have no one faculty in nature but the faculty of boring the very soul out of your body."

Seeing me take a book from amongst several which lay on the table, he continued: "Aye; these's Mr. Dick again! I send him to get books to amuse me, and that's what he brings. Pretty lively reading for a sick man, eh! Nice things to keep up one's drooping spirits! There's 'Reflections on Death,' Dodd's 'Prison Thoughts,' the 'Deathbed Companion,' 'Hell; a Vision.' I must have a fine natural constitution to live through all this!"

I took my leave of the invalid, and, at the street-door, met Dr. Druggem, his physician, and his surgeon, Sir Slashly Cutmore, who were about to visit him. I mentioned that I had just left their patient, suffering under considerable irritation, caused by the unwelcome interference of Doleful; and ventured to express an opinion that a hint ought to be given to the latter, of the desirableness of diminishing both the length and the frequency of his visits to the Captain.

Digitized by Google

"Hint, Sir?" said Druggem; "a hint won't do. Slight aperients will have no effect in this case: I am for administering a powerful cathartic:—this Mr. Doleful must be carried off at once—forbid the house, Sir."

"I am quite of Mr. Druggem's opinion," said Sir Slashly: "the Captain must instantly submit to the operation; he must consent to the immediate amputation of that Mr. Doleful, or I'll not answer for his life a week."

The next day Mr. Doleful favoured me with a visit.

"I call," said he, "to lament with you the unhappy state of 'our poor dear friend,'" and he burst into a tear.

Now, as I knew that the state of "our poor dear friend," was no worse then than the day before, I interrupted his pathetics, by telling him that I was not in a lamenting mood; and, rather unceremoniously, added that it was the opinion of his medical advisers, that the state of "our poor dear friend" might be considerably improved if he, Mr. Doleful, would be less frequent in his visits, and if, when he did call upon "our poor dear friend," he would assume a livelier countenance.

"Well!—Bless my soul! this is unexpected—very unexpected. I—! Me—! The son of his friend—his best friend! Why—though I say it, had it not been for my poor departed father—[And here he burst into another tear—] I say had it not been for my poor father, the Captain might, at this moment, have been —— Well; no matter—but Me!—how very odd! I, who sacrifice myself for the poor dear sufferer! with him, morning, noon, and night, though it afflicts me to see him—as he must perceive: he must observe how I grieve at his sufferings—he must notice how much I feel for him. Why, dear me! What interest can I have in devoting myself to him? Thank Heaven I AM NOT A LEGACY-HUNTER."

This voluntary and uncalled-for abnegation of a dirty motive, placed Mr. Doleful before me in a new light. Till that moment the suspicion of his being incited by any prospect of gain to bore "our poor dear friend" to death, had never entered my mind.

Captain Chronic lived on for a twelvemonth, during the whole of which, except the very last week, Dick Doleful, spite of remonstrance and entreaty, continued to inflict upon him his three visits per diem. A week before his death, the Captain, who till then occupied a sofa, took to his bed; and feeling his case to be hopeless, and conscious that he had not many days to live, he desired that his only two relations, a nephew and a niece, might be sent for, and that they alone should attend him to the last. Dick, greatly to his astonishment, thus excluded from the bed-chamber, still continued his daily three visits to the drawing-room. Upon the last of these occasions, so vehemently did he insist upon seeing his "poor dear friend," that, without asking the Captain's permission, he was allowed to enter his bed-room. The opening of the door awoke the Captain from a gentle slumber into which he had just before fallen. Perceiving Dick, he uttered a faint groan. Dick approached the bed-side, as usual on tip-toe; as usual he softly pressed the tip of the Captain's fore-finger; squeezed out the usual tribute of one tear; and with the usual undertaker look, and in the usual dismal tone, he said, "Well, how d'ye do now, Captain?" The Captain faintly articulated, "Dick, Dick, you've done it at last!" fell back upon his pillow, and expired!

At about ten o'clock on the same morning, Dick Doleful, looking very like an undertaker's mute, called upon me. He was dressed in black and had a deep crape round his hat. "The dear departed!" was all he uttered.

"Is it all over with the poor Captain, Mr. Doleful?"

"He's gone! Thank heaven I was with the dear departed at his last moments. If ever there was an angel upon earth ——! so good, so kind, so honourable, so every thing a man ought to be. Thank heaven I did my duty towards the dear departed. This loss will be the death of me. I have'nt the heart to say more to you; besides, the will of the dear departed will be opened at twelve, and it is proper that some disinterested friend should be present at the reading. Good morning. Oh! the dear departed! But he's gone where he will get his deserts."

At about two o'clock Mr. Doleful was again announced. I observed that his hat was dismantled of the ensign of mourning, which it had so ostentatiously exhibited but a few hours before. He took a seat, remained silent for several minutes, and then burst into a flood of real, legitimate tears.

"Be composed, my dear Sir," said I; "recollect your grief is unavailing; it will not recall to life the departed."

"The departed be d——d!" exclaimed he, starting in a rage from his chair. "Thank heaven I am not a legacy-hunter, nevertheless I did expect —— You know what I did for the old scoundrel, you know what time I sacrificed to him, you know how I have watched the hour and minute for giving the old rascal his filthy physic, and yet ——! I repeat it, I am not a legacy-hunter; but I put it to you, Sir, as a man of sense, as a man of the world, as a man of honour, hadn't I a right to expect, a perfect right to expect —— What should you have thought, Sir? I merely ask how much should you have thought?"

"Why, perhaps, a thousand pounds."

"Of course—to be sure—I am any thing but an interested man; and had he left me that, I should have been satisfied."

"How much, then, has he left you?"

"Guess—I only say do you guess."

"Well—five hundred?"

"Why, even that would have served as a token of his gratitude; it isn't as money I should have valued it; or had he left me fifty pounds for mourning, why even that would have been better than —— But, Sir, you won't believe it; you can't believe it; the old villain is gone out of the world without leaving me a farthing! But I am not disappointed, for I always knew the man. So selfish, so unkind, so hard-hearted, so ungrateful, so dishonourable, so wicked an old scoundrel—! If ever there was a devil incarnate, take my word for it he was one. But he's gone where he will get his deserts." And, so saying, Exit Dick Doleful.

It is but justice to the memory of the Captain to state, that in the body of his will there had stood a clause to this effect: "To Richard Doleful, Esq. in testimony of my grateful remembrance of the services rendered me by his late father, I bequeath One Thousand Pounds." By a codicil of later date, this bequest was reduced to eight hundred; by a third, to five hundred; and so on, by others, till it was reduced to—nothing. Thus had poor Dick Doleful bored his friend out of his life, and himself out of a legacy.

From the London Monthly Magazine.

THE UNITED STATES.

FROM GOETHE.

America thou hast it better
Than our ancient hemisphere;
Thou hast no falling castles,
Nor basalt, as here.
Good luck wait on thy glorious spring,
And, when in time, thy poets sing,
May some good genius guard them all
From Baron, Robber, Knight, and Ghost traditional.

Digitized by Google

NELSONIANA.

Many striking expressions are recorded of Nelson's early years which show that he had a settled purpose of outdoing all the achievements of his naval predecessors. The common notion of sailors that one Briton is a match for three Frenchmen was deliberately adopted into his creed, and, calculating upon this advantage as the short and easy road to fame, he resolved upon enterprizes heretofore deemed impracticable. He cheerfully set his life upon the cast—"Victory, or Westminster-abbey," his favourite war-cry. An old Italian proverb says that "he who would be Pope must take it strongly into his head, and he shall be Pope." Nelson, from the moment that he first went to sea, appears to have reasoned and acted on this quaint maxim. He was determined to succeed in whatever he undertook. When he attacked the bear upon the ice, while a youngster on the frozen ocean, and when afterwards, as an Admiral, he bore down upon the French squadron at the Nile, this was the load-star that guided him to conquest. On beholding the gallant ships of the enemy, Captain Berry, in an ecstacy of delight, exclaimed —"If we succeed what will the world say?" "There's no if, in the case," replied Nelson: that we shall succeed is certain. Who may live to tell the story is a very different question." His personal valour sometimes rose to enthusiasm, as when, with only his boat's crew, he fought the Spanish commodore hand to hand in Cadiz bay; or when, on St. Valentine's day, he boarded two of their ships of the line: yet even then it was regulated by a steady sense of duty. His was not a blind physical courage: he knew and felt the danger, but his self-possession never deserted him. At Copenhagen, during, as he often declared, the hottest engagement that he had ever witnessed, the fire of the Danish batteries was doing terrible execution on board our ships, when a shot struck the Elephant's mainmast close to him. "Warm work," said Nelson to the officer with whom he was pacing the deck; "this day may be the last to many of us in a moment—but mark me," said he, stopping short at the gangway,—"I would not be elsewhere for thousands." Soon after this, Sir Hyde Parker became exceedingly anxious for Nelson's critical position, and made the recal signal. This being reported, Nelson, humourously putting the glass to his blind eye, said, "I can't see the signal," and directed that for close action to be kept flying. On the last day of his life his farewell to Captain Blackwood, as well as other circumstances of his conduct, showed a remarkable presentiment that he should receive his death wound in the approaching conflict: yet, under this foreboding, the cool deliberation with which he made his dispositions, and gave his orders, and watched every movement of the enemy, while exposed to a hail-storm of bullets, proved the imperturable intrepidity of his heart. Unwearied perseverance was another striking feature of Nelson's character. Every succeeding triumph indeed was but the inspiration of a greater undertaking. "Nil actum reputans si quid superesset agendum." He set no value on personal comforts, nor cared for the severest privations. Public duty, while afloat, occupied all his thoughts. For two long years he watched with cat-like vigilance the Toulon fleet, and when the French Admiral put to sea in a heavy gale, which blew Nelson off their coast, and, uniting with the Spaniards at Cadiz, sailed for the West Indies, with eighteen sail of the line, having on board four thousand troops, he pursued them thither, with ten ships only, and tracked them with such speed and sagacity through those islands that, false intelligence alone saved them from his grasp. Returning to England, worn down by the unceasing anxiety and fatigue of this extraordinary chase, he had scarcely arrived at Merton, his beloved retreat near London, to enjoy a short repose, when he was roused at five in the morning by Captain Blackwood, on his way to the Admiralty with despatches. Nelson instantly exclaimed, "I am sure you bring me news of the enemy's fleet, and I shall yet give M. Villeneuve a drubbing." In three weeks from his landing he was again at Portsmouth. On resuming the command, Lord Barham, who was then at the head of the Admiralty, presented the navy-list to him, desiring him to choose his officers. "Choose yourself, my Lord," said Nelson; "they are all actuated by the same spirit; you cannot choose wrong." The offer and refusal were equally creditable to these two honourable men. Nelson's consideration for others was strongly marked at the unfortunate attack of Teneriffe. Mr. Nisbet, son of his lady by a former husband, was serving on board of Nelson's ship, the Theseus. Knowing the very desperate nature of the service in contemplation, he resolved that this young man should not accompany him, but when all was prepared, Nisbet appeared before him, equipped to take his share in it. Nelson urged him to remain on board, saying—"Should we both fall, Josiah, what will become of your poor mother? the care of the Theseus falls to you." Nisbet replied—"Sir, the ship must take care of herself. I will go with you to-night if I never go again." Providential indeed was this resolve, for Nelson lost his arm by a grape shot at the instant of landing. Nisbet raised him from the beach, bound up his wound, and by great exertions conveyed him safely under the enemy's fire. They had to pass through the drowning crew of the Fox cutter, which was just then sunk by a shot from the batteries. Nelson, though in great agony, laboured with his remaining hand to save several of these poor fellows; and when afterwards it was proposed to take him alongside of Captain Freemantle's ship, for surgical aid, he insisted on being carried forward to the Theseus, lest his sudden presence should alarm that gallant officer's wife, who happened to be on board. So little did he regard his own sufferings that in the dispatch, written with his left hand two days after the action, he made no allusion to his wound. A similar omission was observed three years before, when he lost an eye at the siege of Calvi: nor should it be forgotten that, when severely, and as he believed, mortally, wounded in the battle of the Nile, the explosion of the French Admiral's ship instantly recalled him from the cockpit, whither he had been carried, and he at once forgot his own peril and anguish, while giving directions to save the remains of her crew from destruction.—Lodge's Portraits and Memoirs.

Digitized by Google

The following lines, from the pen of a distinguished pulpit orator, were sung recently in Baltimore.—They evince a high degree of melody, and inspire noble and elevated sentiments. We publish them from the manuscript of the author, and have pleasure in being the first to present them, in the columns of a public journal:—

THE ORPHAN'S HYMN.

Air—"O no we never mention him."

Cold blew the north wind bleat and wild,
The snow was on the ground,
When a poor houseless orphan child,
By charity was found.
Pale was its brow with suffering,
His hollow cheek was wan,
And plaintive was its murmuring
For parents dead and gone.

Its bitter tears were flowing fast,
Until the fount was dry,—
And when the last lone drop had past,
Came tearless agony:
Dark, dark, upon the Orphan's soul,
Earth's heaviest shadows gloomed,
And sorrows' ocean seemed to roll,
O'er one to misery doomed.

The lonely orphan longed to die,
And on its mother's breast,
Within the dreamless grave, to lie
In its eternal rest:
It longed to hear a father speak,
Though hoarse his voice in death;
It longed a mother's love to seek,
Though wasted was her breath.

Hark, voices call thee, lovely one!
Come from the searching cold;
From the chill night-wind quickly run,
Sweet lamb, within the fold;
Angelic woman's silver tone,
Now thrills within thine ear,—
And mothers, lovelier than thy own,
Are gathered round thee here.

Clothed, fed, and sheltered here at last,
Let orphan voices sing,
Of gloom and danger, overpast—
Of ended sorrowing:
Sing of celestial Charity,
Of Woman's deathless love,
Till, robed in Christ's bright purity,
You shout your praise above.

JOHN NEWLAND MAFFITT.

MODESTY.—"There is no charm in the female sex that can supply the place of virtue. Without innocence beauty is unlovely, and quality contemptible; good breeding degenerates into wantonness, and wit into impudence. The best preservative of female honor is female delicacy; modesty is the hand-maid of virtue, appointed to tend, to dress, to serve her; it is, as it were, a kind of armour, which the sex should always wear, to adorn and defend them; and when that is laid aside, they are neither beautiful nor safe."

From the Lowell Journal.

AN AFRICAN'S REVENGE.

[The following thrilling tale is translated from a passage in Eugene Sue's French novel of ATAR GUL. The scene is laid in Guadaloupe. It is merely necessary to premise that Atar Gul is a favorite slave, whom Colonel Willis brought from Africa several years before the event described is supposed to have taken place. Atar Gul always appeared faithful to his master, and grateful for his kindness to him—but in secret he brooded over the loss of his liberty, and resolved to be deeply revenged. Smiles shone on his countenance, but deadly hatred rankled in his heart.]

When Atar Gul had nearly reached the summit of the mountain, the sun had already risen, and the lofty heights of La Sauffriere threw their shades to a great distance across the valleys below. As he was about entering a sort of dell, formed of huge blocks of granite, which seemed to have been fantastically heaped up around, he heard a fearful sound, and stopped short—it was the sharp hiss of a serpent! He soon after heard the flapping of wings over his head, and on looking up he saw one of those birds called Secretaries, or Man of War Birds, common in tropical climates, which having already descried the serpent was making wide circles in the air, but approaching nearer his destined prey every moment.

The serpent seemed aware of the inferiority of his force—and was rapidly gliding towards his den, when the bird, apparently aware of his intention, descended with the rapidity of lightning, and alighted in his path—and with his large wings, which were terminated with a bony protuberance, and which served him both as a war-club and a shield, he effectually prevented the retreat of the venomous reptile.

The serpent now became enraged, and the beautiful and variegated colors of his skin, sparkled in the sun like rings of gold and azure. His head was frightfully swollen with rage and venom—he darted out his forked tongue, and filled the air with hisses.

The huge bird extended one of its wings, and with a longing eye on the serpent, advanced to the conflict, but his wary antagonist watched his movements, and with quick motions of his body to the right and left, evaded his attacks, until finding that his mode of warfare would not long avail him, he at length darted at the bird, and vainly attempted to fix his poisonous fangs in his body, and crush him in his folds. But the Secretary caught him in one of his claws, and with a furious blow of his beak, fractured his scull. The serpent struggled violently for a few moments—but resistance was useless—and he was soon stretched lifeless before his victorious enemy.

But ere the bird had time to enjoy the fruits of his victory, the report of a musket was heard, and the Secretary in his turn, lay dead by the side of his venomous antagonist. Atar Gul turned his head, and saw Theodore standing on a rock above him with a fowling piece in his hand.

"Well, Atar Gul," said the young man, sliding down from the summit of the rock—"was not that well done?"

"It was a good shot, master—but I am sorry that you have killed the bird—for these Sceretaries wage war with these venomous serpents, with which our mountains are infested." And the black pointed to the reptile—which was seven or eight feet long and four or or five inches in diameter.

"Ah!" exclaimed Theodore—"I regret it now—for I do detest these hideous serpents—I would give half my fortune to be able to exterminate the monsters."

"You are right master," said Atar Gul. "They are a great nuisance, and their bite almost always proves fatal."

Digitized by Google

'It is not only that,' said the young man, 'but you know that my betrothed Marguerite—whom if Heaven wills, I am to wed to-morrow, has a most unaccountable antipathy to the sight of one of those animals. Less so now, than formerly I confess—for once the name of snake would almost deprive her of sensation. But her father, her mother, and myself have at various times tried to conquer her silly but deep-rooted fears of these reptiles. We have tried to accustom her to the sight of them, and have often thrown them in her way after they had been killed—and then laughed at her screams of terror.'

'That is the only way to conquer her foolish antipathy, master,' said the wily African. 'In my country we thus habituate our woman and children to sights of horror. But a thought strikes me. A means presents itself of curing her of these foolish fears, if you can only be prevailed upon to adopt it.' And his eyes were for an instant lighted up with a gleam of ferocious delight. 'We will take the snake home with us. But first let us cut off his head. We cannot use too much precaution."

'Noble fellow!' said Theodore, as he assisted Atar Gul to separate the head of the serpent from the body. It is a female,' whispered Atar Gul to himself, 'and the male cannot be far off.'

They proceeded towards Col. Willis's habitation—the black dragging after him the bleeding carcase of the serpent. The house in which the Colonel resided like most of the houses in that climate consisted of but one story, with wings. In one of the wings was the bed chamber of Marguerite. A piazza in front of the window, and a jalousie, screened the room from the devouring heat of the tropical sun.

Theodore approached the window on tiptoe—cautiously opened the jalousie, and looked in—Marguerite was not there. He then took the serpent from the hands of Atar Gul—who as it seemed through an excess of precaution first bruised the neck of the reptile on the window frame. Theodore hid the serpent, whose brilliant hues had already become tarnished by death, beneath the dressing table. He then retired, and closed the jalousie.—As he turned away he met Colonel Willis, who laughed heartly at the trick which Theodore was playing Marguerite.

The room which was appropriated was truly the asylum of innocence. The hand of a mother had been there. It was seen in all the elegant and useful furniture which had decked the apartment. The little bed, curtained with white gauze—those stuccoed walls, polished, and shining as brilliant as Parian marble—that harp and table covered with music books—that little dressing glass—those silken robes—that cross of mother of pearl—those jewelled ornaments—in a word, all those trifling things, which are so precious to a young girl, whispered a tale of Innocence, Love and Happiness.

The door opened, and Marguerite entered. She seated herself before her dressing table—but she saw not the reptile beneath it. While she arranged her hair, and essayed a ribbon, which Theodore had praised, she sang the song which she had been taught by her lover.

'To-day' soliloquized the lovely girl, 'I must try to appear as beautiful as possible. To morrow I shall belong to another. O, Theodore! with what devotion he loves me. Nothing on earth can add to my happiness.

She approached so near the glass, to judge the effect of the ribbon, that her breath tarnished the brilliant surface of the mirror—then with her finger, she playfully and smilingly traced upon the glass the name of Theodore.

A slight noise near the window, awakened her from the delicious reverie. She turned towards it, blushing lest her dearest secret had been discovered. But the paleness of death instantly came over her features. She convulsively threw her hands before her, and tried to rise—but she could not. Her trembling limbs refused to sustain her, and she fell back into her chair. The unhappy girl saw peering through the jalousie the head of an enormous serpent!

In a moment he was lost amongst the flowers, which were tastily arranged before the window. His disappearance gave new strength to Marguerite, who rushed towards the door which opened into the gallery, screaming 'Help! mother, mother, help! Here is a monstrous Serpent!'

But her parents and her lover held the door outside—and laughed at what they conceived to be her imaginary fears. 'Well done, my girl,' said Col. Willis, cannot you scream a little louder?—The snake will not eat you, I'll engage—poor little thing! How frightened she appears to be!'

'Marguerite—I am ashamed of you,' said her mother—'The serpent will not hurt you. It is dead.'

But her cries continued.

'My dear Marguerite,' said Theodore, 'don't be alarmed. I put it there myself—and you shall give me a kiss for my pains, sweet girl.'

Meanwhile the hideous monster left the flowers, and glided into the room. Marguerite, finding her cries for assistance of no avail, uttered a loud shriek, and fell senseless on the floor. The serpent raised its head, and for a moment seemed to be reconnoitering the apartment. But when it saw its companion dead on the floor, its eyes absolutely sparkled with rage. It sent forth a loud hiss, and advanced towards the unfortunate girl.

With a rapidity almost inconceivable, the hideous reptile twined himself around the graceful limbs and sylph-like form of Marguerite. His cold and slimy neck rested against the snowy bosom of his victim, and there he fastened his venomous fangs!

The hapless girl restored to consciousness by the agonizing pain of the wound, opened her eyes—but the first object, which met her view, was the horrid head of the reptile, swollen with rage—his eyes flashing fire—and his open mouth displaying the crooked and deadly fangs.

Mother! Mother! O dear mother!' faintly screamed the dying girl.

But a half suppressed laugh was the only response to her convulsive cry. The jalousie was slowly opened, and Atar Gul looked in at the window—his eyes glaring with malignancy and triumph!

"Elizabeth! Elizabeth!' said Mrs. Willis. 'She answers not—perhaps she has fainted with terror.'

"Silly girl?'? said the Colonel. 'But we will open the door, and see what is the matter.'

Some heavy object lay against the door. He gave a violent push, and entered the chamber, followed by Mrs. Willis and Theodore. But who can paint the agony of the parents and the lover—when they found they had stumbled over the dead body of the unfortunate Marguerite.

As they entered the apartment, the Serpent was seen to glide out at the window. * * * *

Hints to Actors.—Madame Clarion attributed her growing prematurely old to the influence of the griefs and distresses which it was her constant province to represent on the stage; and the malade imaginaire of Moliere is said to have proved fatal not only to Moliere himself, but to the actor who succeeded him in the part. Pliny has a still more remarkable anecdote to the same effect: he states that there was an actor who imitated the feelings of the gout so naturally, as at length to bring the disorder upon him.

A well-made man always looks shorter than he is; ditto a well-made woman.

Digitized by Google

THE LAND.

"I've been upon the mountain deep,
When the wind had died away,
And, like an ocean god asleep,
The bark majestic lay;
But lovelier is the varied scene,—
The hill, the lake, the tree,
When bathed in light of Midnight's queen—
The land! the land for me!

The glancing waves I've glided o'er,
When gently blew the breeze;
But sweeter was the distant shore—
The zephyr 'mong the trees,
The murmur of the mountain rill,
The blossoms waving free,
The song of birds on every hill—
The land! the land for me!

The billows I have been among,
When they roll'd in mountains dark,
And night her blackest curtain hung
Around our heaving bark;
But give me, when the storm is fierce,
My home and fireside glee,
Where winds may howl but dare not pierce—
The land! the land for me!

And when around the lightning flash'd,
I've been upon the deep;
And to the gulph beneath I've dash'd
Adown the liquid steep;
But now that I am safe on shore,
There ever let me be;
The sea let others wander o'er—
The land! the land for me!"

The feeling and sentiment which characterize the above beautiful effusion, are scarcely more attractive than the simplicity of style and expression, which distinguishes the following. Both are excellent articles. We regret that we are unable to name the authors.

YO HEAVE.

AIR—The Mountain Boy.

Oh, that I were a sailor boy,—
How happy should I be!
My boundless heart would burst with joy,
To sail the shoreless sea.
Some proud exploit I'd soon achieve,
And long and loud I'd sing—Yo heave!
Yo heave I'd sing,
A merry king—
The wild wave, sweeping by,
Would bear my song
Its course along,
To where it meets the sky.

I'd hie me to the pointing prow,
To see the eddies play;
And hanging from the vessel's bow,
Sport with the sparkling spray.
So closely to the bow I'd cleave,
A happy sailor boy—Yo heave!—
Yo heave, I'd sing,
The sea would fling
Its foam about my feet;
And shrill would float
The sea-birds' note,
My loud yo heave to meet.

Then how I'd watch the white-caps curl,
By thousands coursing on,
Like bunches tied of frosted pearl,
All glittering in the sun.
The happy sight I'd only leave
To sing my thrilling song—Yo heave.
Yo heave I'd sing,
The wind should wing
My song the white caps o'er
Loud on the air
The sound should wear,
Mixed with the billows' roar.

The cordage coil, my hempen throne,
With all but I asleep,
I'd mount to watch the mirror'd moon,
Full forty fathoms deep.
I'd flourish then my tow-shirt sleeve,
Flounce on my feet and cry—Yo heave.
Yo heave I'd sing,
My voice should ring.
And rouse the sleeping crew;
Who with surprise,
Would rub their eyes,
And join the yo heave too.

And when the storm would sweep across
Old ocean's bosom blue,
Tear up the foam, the wild waves toss,
And fright the gallant crew—
Swinging aloft, the deck I'd leave,
And o'er the tempest shout—Yo heave!—
Yo heave I'd sing,
To th' tackling cling—
I vow I'd sooner ride
That reckless storm,
Than, snug and warm,
Sit by a good fire-side.

I wish I were that sailor boy,
To climb the lofty mast,
My song, Yo heave!—my light employ,
To tie the tackle fast:
Among the shrouds I'd sit and weave
A net and sing the while—Yo heave;
Yo heave I'd sing,
A merry thing,
A light and careless boy—
To mount the shrouds,
And count the clouds
And sing—You heave my joy.

TO MAKE A GOOD WIFE UNHAPPY.—See her as seldom as possible. If she is warmhearted and cheerful in temper; or if, after a day's or week's absence, she meets you with a smiling face, and in an affectionate manner—be sure to look coldly upon her, and answer her with monosyllables. If she force back her tears and is resolved to look cheerful, sit down and gape in her presence till she is fully convinced of your indifference. Never think you have any thing to do to make her happy; but that her happiness is to flow from gratifying your caprices; and when she has done all a woman can do, be sure you do not appear gratified.—Never take an interest in any of her pursuits, and if she asks your advice, make her feel that she is troublesome and impertinent. If she attempts to rally you good humoredly, on any of your peculiarities, never join in the laugh, but frown her into silence. If she has faults, (which without doubt she will have, and perhaps may be ignorant of,) never attempt with kindness to correct them, but continually obtrude upon her ears, 'what a good wife Mr. Smith has.' 'How happy Mr. Smith is with his wife.' 'That any man would be happy with such a wife.' In company never seem to know you have a wife; treat all her remarks with indifference, and be very affable and complaisant with every other lady. If you follow these directions, you may be certain of an obedient and a heart-broken wife.

Digitized by Google

From the London Monthly Magazine.

THE REJECTED ONE!

'Cruel, cruel fate!' said the young Augustus Blenkinsop, dropping a tear into the empty porter mug, 'wherefore dost thou torment me thus? I have a prepossessing leg, inimitable tie, and a mind far above buttons—yet I was born to disappointment! Evil, thrice evil, is the fate that dogs the representative of the Blenkinsops; thou art rejected of men.

The eyes of Stoker gleamed with the intelligence of those of a deceased mackerel.

'Help yourself,' said Stoker, with emphasis, replenishing the pot with Henry Meux's best XX.

'Kindest of men,' cried Blenkinsop, 'love may perish, but friendship never dies!' The pot not being born beneath the same horoscope with the speaker, was not rejected.

'Come, Blenkinsop, my boy,' said Faucitt, filling his pipe, no long faces here. Let's have a song—or spose you tip us a bit of autobiography. Waiter—another quart of stout—remember what the great Dr. Watts says:

"Wo is the child of thought, and kin to fear,
One yields to pipes, but both must yield to beer!"

'My sorrows,' answered Blenkinsop, can yield to neither. O, Seged, Emperor of Ethiopia! well hast thou said—

'O, curse Seged,' said Faucitt, 'let's have none of him.'

'Certainly not,' said Stoker.

'Well, then, friends, listen and be dumb—but first, I'll trouble you, Stoker, for the other mug? A deep silence followed, broken only by the protracted breathing of Augustus at his draught, until, having rivetted his eyes for a moment on the bottom of the pewter, he set it down with a sigh, and proceeded.

'Need I tell you that I am the only son and heir of Reginald Nicodemus Blenkinsop of Dot-and-go-one Hall, County Somerset—that his father was—

'We know all that already,' interrupted Stoker.

'Rash young man!' said Blenkinsop, with solemnity—'the blood of a hundred sires burns within me—but I forgive you. You know I was born with considerable expectations—that godlike fortune seemed to welcome me from the heavens for a time, appeared to smile benignantly on the scion of an ancient stem. In the words of the poet—,

'Od—n the poet!' shouted Faucitt.

'Certainly,' said Stoker.

Blenkinsop looked sternly.

'Alas,' said he, 'those were the last hours of unadulterated happiness that I ever enjoyed. I went to the University—I studied hard—I bought an alarm clock—eschewed wine parties—proctors reverenced me—my tutor smiled upon me—my acquaintance cut me—I read my degree—I stood the examinations—heavens and earth, I was rejected.

The two friends exchanged looks of astonishment, though in a peculiar fashion.

'Next morning, I was far from Oxford.—Rouse thee, O Augustus exclaimed I to myself,' 'and let not this misfortune overwhelm thee. The Spartan mother shed no tears over her departed son, and why shouldest thou mourn for a paltry degree? No! rather like my sires of old, will I take my father's sword from the wall and go forth against the enemies of my country to conquer or to die!' So saying, I lit a cigar. The Blenkinsops have always voted with ministers; I had interest at head quarters; I was promised a commission, and I at once purchased my regimentals, and let my mustachios increase. 'Never,' cried the enraptured, though alas! suffering tailor, as he gazed upon the martial figure that issued from his hand all scarlet and gold, 'never seed I gemman vot looked better! And he spake aright. I felt then within my bosom the ardor which lighted up as with a spell the soul of Anthony, and drove Themistocles to the combat; and I called to mind the glorious saying of Miltiades, Cowards die many times, but a brave man never dies!'

A prolonged whistle issued from the lips of the petrified Faucitt.

Stoker squinted with a horrible obliquity of vision.

Blenkinshop sighed.

'My evil destiny again interposed. That very evening I received a letter from the War Office. Fire and steel! what did I behold! Cruel Hobhouse! Relentless Hill! Implacable Wellington! My application was rejected!

I fixed my useless sabre in the wall, and returning to the other end of my apartment, prepared to die like Cato; but the carpet caught by my spurs, and I fell prostrate to the ground. I arose an altered man, and sitting calmly down, I drank deeply of thought, and brandy and cold water without. After all, said I, war is a savage pastime; the soldier is but a hireling. So saying I drew another cork. Life, I resumed, is but short, thou knowest well, O immortal Flaccus!'

"Oh, confound Flaccus!" said Faucitt.

"Certainly," said Stoker.

"Yet despair not, Blenkinsop! Thou wert formed to shine in the court, and not in the camp; surely there is many a beautiful maiden, saturate with silver, who would be proud to be called Mrs Augustus Blenkinsop!"

"Miss Emily Pelican was both rich and beautiful; she had the figure of a Cleopatra, and the mind of a Sappho! She had published a volume of poetry, called "The Undespairing one of Kamtskatka," and she had two thousand a year. Her hair was of the hue of sunset, a rich and glorious crimson, and her eyes were of a pale etherial green. The first moment I saw her, I loved her, and hope whispered me that she was my affianced bride. I gave a post obit to a wealthy Shylock, Manasseh Ben Melchisdeek, who at cent per cent, furnished the supplies. Stulty again suffered, and I sported a cab. The sweet Emily received me favorably, and I won the good will of her maiden aunt, by escorting her once to church.

Faucit thrust his tongue into his cheek; and Stoker significantly elongated his outstretched hands, resting his left thumb upon his nose. The very bars of the grate grinned. I sat with my beloved in the same box at the Opera. I was her partner at balls, her attendant every where, and I thought at last I could discover the symptoms of a reciprocal attachment. The crisis was approaching—bills came fast pouring in, therefore love must be confessed.

One day she was reclining on an ottoman, caressing a corpulent poodle, while I lay in the attitude of the Dying Gladiator. Tenderly, yet impressively I seized her hand, and modulating my voice to its lowest and most musical tone, I ventured to say, "Emily! sweet Emily! do you love?"

A roseate blush overspread her countenance. "Spare me, Augustus!" she murmured. "Ah! dost thou confess the soft enslaver?" said I, starting to my feet. "O thou terrestrial seraph! speak—tell me—will you wed?" A blush still deeper than before dyed her burning cheek. Gates of Paradise!—and when? In half audible accents she whispered, "Wednesday!"

I seized her hand again; O Cupid! fairest denizen of Olympus! What do I owe thee for this—Wednesday! Sweet, sweet Emily! adored Miss Pelican! On that propitious day shall I lead you to the altar! On that day shall I place the sacred ring upon——

She started with a look of astonishment—"You lead me to the altar; on Wednesday I am to be married to Captain Ferdinand Fitzspurs!"

My brain spun round—a red gleam of fire flashed before my eyes—a bolt of ice quivered in my heart—I staggered and reached the street, I know not how.

Digitized by Google

O the agony of that moment! I feel it even now—my heart—my brain—my soul! O Stoker—O Faucitt—how hard it was again to be rejected!"

"Werry," said Faucitt.

"Werry;" reverberated Stoker. And he grinned like a bag of nails.

I rushed home like a demon. Fury was in my heart, and I kicked over a stall of oranges—I reached my lodgings and entered my room—amongst an infinity of bills lay a packet, carefully sealed—was it a remittance from my relenting father—I seized—I opened it—madness! my two last articles from the Monthly Magazine, rejected! O friends do you not pity me?—

"I do, pon my credit," said Faucitt. The interesting youth had just emerged from the Insolvent Court.

"I do, pon honor," said Stoker. He had been horsewhipped at Epsom, for cheating at a thimble-rig.

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.—General Mercer of Virginia, at a dinner recently given him by his constituents, related the following anecdote.

Entering the same valley eight years after, by a new road leading to a point higher up, called then the Loup—it was in the autumn of 1812—I met a man, second to but one who ever fought the battles, or enlightened the councils of our country, either State or National. He wore, I well remember, as is his custom, shoes instead of boots, and had his ancles bound around, for some distance up, with thongs of papaw-bark, to guard them from the bite of the rattle-snake, and his beard had been unshaven for many days. He had walked ahead of his companions, and was awaiting as I had been for a day or two, the arrival of the James River boat in which, as a commissioner of the State, he was about to complete the most dangerous part of an obstructed navigation, if navigation it could be called, which he had steadily prosecuted for a distance of eighty miles, along the Greenbriar and New River, towards the Falls of Kanawha.

I saw him aftewards, for many nights in succession, pluck the twigs & leaves off the branches of the neighboring trees, to make his bed in the tent, beneath which we slept, on a surface rarely, if ever, even enough to rest without pain. With no human abode in sight for ten days together, and for a part of that time without other subsistence, he made his morning and evening beverage of tea of the sassafras, growing in the adjacent thickets, and bread of the remaining husks of the meal which had already been sifted.

This person, it seems, was Marshall, then and ever since, Chief Justice of the United States.

MARRIAGE IN LAPLAND.

It is death in Lapland to marry a maid without the consent of her parents or friends. When a young man has formed an attachment to a female, the fashion is to appoint their friends to meet, to behold the two young parties run a race together. The maid is allowed, in starting, the advantage of the third part of the race, so that it is impossible, except voluntarily, that she should be overtaken. If the maid out-run her suitor, the matter is ended; she must never have her, it being penal for the man to renew the proposal of marriage. But if the maid has an affection for him, though at first she runs hard, to try the truth of his love, she will (without Atalanta's golden balls to retard her speed) pretend some casualty, and make a voluntary halt before she come to the mark or end of the race. Thus none are compelled to marry against their own wills; and this is the cause that in Lapland the married people are richer in their contentment than in other lands, where so many forced matches make feigned love, and cause real unhappiness.

AMUSING ANECDOTE OF KEAN.

By T. C. Grattan, Esq.

He had never, I believe, yet disappointed a London audience, but on one occasion the circumstances of this one he often related to me. He had gone to dine somewhere about ten miles from town, with some few friends of his early days, players, of course, fully intending to be at the theatre in time for the evening's performance. But temptation and the bottle were too strong for him; he outstayed his time, got drunk, and lost all recollection of Shakspeare, Shylock, Drury Lane, and the duties they entailed on him. His friends, frightened at the indiscretion they had caused, despatched Kean's servant, with his empty chariot, and a well-framed story, that the horses had been frightened near the village where Kean had dined, at a flock of geese by the road-side, that the carriage was upset, and the unfortuate tragedian's shoulder dislocated. The story was repeated from the stage by the manager; and the rising indignation of the audience (who had suffered the entertainments to be commenced by the farce) was instantly calmed down into commiseration and regret.

The following morning Kean was shocked and bewildered at discovering the truth of his situation. But how must his embarrasment have been increased on learning that several gentlemen had already arrived from town to make anxious inquiries for him? He jumped out of bed, and, to his infinite affright, he saw amongst the carriages those of Sir F. Burdett, Mr. Whitehead, and others of his leading friends, whose regard for him brought them to see his situation in person. Luckily for him, his old associates, the actors, had, with great presence of mind and practised effrontry, carried on the deception of the previous night. The village apothecary lent himself to it, and, with a grave countenance, confirmed the report; and Kean himself was obliged to become a party, nolens volens, in the hoax. His chamber was accordingly darkened, his face whitened, and his arm bandaged. A few of the most distinguished inquirers were admitted to his bed-side; no one discovered the cheat; and to crown it completely, he appeared, in an incredible short time, on the boards of Old Drury again, the public being carefully informed that his respect and gratitude towards them urged him to risk the exertion, notwithstanding his imperfect convalescence, and go through the arduous parts of Richard, Macbeth, and Othello, on three successive nights, with his arm in a sling!

THE GREAT EARTHQUAKE.—Lisbon was destroyed by an earthquake Nov. 1st, 1755. On the 18th of the same month, the most violent shock of the same nature recorded in the annals of this continent, was felt through the whole of this country, but particularly in in the section extending from Halifax to Chesapeake Bay. The direction was from northwest to southwest—the time of commencement about 11 minutes before 4 o'clock in the morning. Our old historians tell us, that the excitement occasioned by it was such as to cause the houses of public worship to be frequented and filled by all orders of people. The 23d of December following was, in consequence of it, observed as a day of humiliation and prayer.

We have before us, at this moment, a Lecture read in the Chapel of Harvard College, on the 26th of the month, "on occasion of the great earthquake which shook New England the week before," by John Winthrop, Esq. Hollisian Professor of Mathematics and Philosophy. The learned gentleman says, that the shock lasted four minutes, and the greatest violence of it half that time. "He forbear to rise [from his bed] because the agitation was so vehement, that he concluded it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to go from the bed to the chimney, without being thrown down." The windows continued rattling for a minute or two.

Digitized by Google

In endeavoring to prove that it began with a horizontal motion of the earth, he refers to the dashing of liquors over the sides of open vessels, the oversetting many things in houses, and the throwing of bricks from off the tops of chimneys to some distance. In order, he says, to estimate the velocity with which some were thrown from his chimney, he measured the greatest distance on the ground to which any of them reached, and found it to be thirty feet. The height of the chimney from which they were thrown was thirty-two feet. That the vibrations of buildings, and especially of the higher parts of them, were, in fact, extremely swift, appeared from some facts, which had come to his knowledge, as the bursting of a distiller's cistern by the agitation of the liquor in it, and the breaking off the spindle of the vane on Faneuil Hall, in Boston. This spindle was a pine stick, of about five inches in diameter at the place where it was snapped off, and ten feet high; the weight of the vane on the top of it was about thirty pounds. He mentions also the bending of the windvanes on some high places. One at Boston was bent at its spindle, three or four points of the compass; and another, at Springfield, was bent to a right angle.

From the New York Mirror.

ACHERON, OR RIVER OF HELL.—This celebrated river of antiquity, rises in Molossia, in Greece, flows through Thesprotia, and after passing through the Acherusian lake, falls into the sea, near the Cimmerian promontory, a little below Parga. It is known in modern geography by the name of the Souli river, and the gloominess of its scenery accords well with the fancied horrors of Tartarus. Homer called it, from the dead appearance of its waters, one of the rivers of hell; and the fable has been adopted by all succeding poets.

"The sad infernal stream, the moat of hell,
Where dire chimeras and the furies dwell;
Where sportive fish were never seen to play,
Nor water-nymphs to keep their holiday;
The joyless lake, whose dark and dismal wave,
Rolls sullen onward, gloomy as the grave."

ADONIS, THE BEAUTIFUL.—This celebrated youth, who was very fond of hunting, was the favourite of Venus. In the pursuit of his favourite amusement, he received a mortal bite from a wild bear, which he had wounded, and Venus, to testify her affection, changed him into a beautiful flower, called the anemone. The word properly signifies wind-flower, because it is supposed to open only when the wind blows. Proserpine is said to have restored Adonis to life, on condition that he should spend six months with her, and the rest of the year with Venus. This implies the alternate return of summer and winter.

"The beauteous youth, on whom the queen of love
Propitious smiled—who, in the sylvan grove,
Received his death-wound from the foamy boar,
His snowy limbs all dyed with crimson gore."

AURORA MORNING.—This goddess is generally represented by the poets, drawn in a rose-coloured chariot, and opening with her rosy fingers the gates of the east—pouring the dew upon the earth, and making the flowers grow. Her chariot is generally drawn by white horses, and she is covered with a veil —Darkness and Sleep—(Nox and Somnus) fly before her, and the constellations of heaven disappear at her approach. She precedes the Sun, and is the herald of his rising.

——"The blushing goddess which doth sway
The dewy confines of the night and day;
——Who from the glowing east displays
Her purple doors, and odoriferous bed,
With bright dew-dropping roses thickly spread;
Which as she in her lightsome chariot rides,
Scatters the light from off her saffron wheels."

BACCHUS, THE GOD OF WINE, ETC.—This jovial deity, is said to be son of Jupiter and Semele. He was the Osiris of the Egyptians, from whom the fables respecting him were taken by the Greeks. He is generally represented crowned with vine and ivy leaves, with a thyrsus in his hand. His figure is that of an effeminate young man, to denote the joy which commonly prevails at feasts; and sometimes that of an old man, to teach us that wine, taken immoderately, will enervate us, consume our health, render us loquacious and childish like an old man, and unable to keep secrets. Bacchus is sometimes represented like an infant holding a thyrsus and cluster of grapes with a horn. He often appears naked, and riding upon the shoulder of Pan, or in the arms of Silenus, who was his foster-father: He also sits upon a celesial globe, bespangled with stars, and is then the same as the Sun or Osiris of Egypt. He is sometimes drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tiger. His beauty is compared to that of Apollo; and, like him, he is represented with fine hair loosely flowing down his shoulders. He has been called,

"God of the cheering vine, who holds in awe
The spotted lynxes which his chariot draw.
——"The dimpled son
Of Semele, that crown'd upon his tun,
Sits with his grapy chaplets."

Secret of living always easy.—An Italian bishop having struggled through great difficulties without complaining, and met with much opposition in the discharge of his episcopal functions, without ever betraying the least impatience, an intimate friend of his, who highly admired those virtues which he conceived it impossible to imitate, one day asked the prelate if he could tell him the secret of being always easy. "Yes," replied the old man, "I can teach you my secret, and will do it very readily. It consists in nothing more than in making a right use of my eyes." His friend begged him to explain. "Most willingly," said the bishop. "In whatever state I am, I first look up to heaven, and remember that my principal business here is to get there; I then look down upon the earth, and call to mind the space I shall shortly occupy in it; I then look abroad into the world and observe what multitudes there are who in all respects have more cause to be unhappy than myself. Thus I learn where true happiness is placed, where all our cares must end, and how very little reason I have to repine or complain."

SENTENCES FROM HORACE.

No one is born without vices, and he is the best man who is encumbered with the least.

It is but fair that he who entreats a pardon for his faults, should be ready to grant one in his turn.

As soon as age shall have strengthened your limbs and mind, you may swim without a cork.

It is of no consequence of what parents any man is born, so that he be of merit.

Let there be some end to your searching after riches, and since you have more than enough, be in less dread of poverty.

All, but especially the covetous, think their condition the hardest

He who is always in a hurry to be wealthy and immersed in the study of augmenting his fortune, has lost the arms of Reason and deserted the post of virtue.

The friendship of great men is a laudable acquisition, yet their favors are ever to be solicited with modesty and caution.

Death is the ultimate boundary of human matters.

Digitized by Google

THE MINSTREL BOY.

AS SUNG BY MRS. WOOD—WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE.

Digitized by Google

2.

The minstrel fell: but the foeman's chain
Could not bring his proud soul under;
The harp he loved ne'er spoke again,
For he tore its chord asunder;
And said, "No chains shall sully thee,
Thou soul of love and bravery:
Thy songs were made for the pure and free,
They shall never sound in slavery."

Digitized by Google

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

THE FAIR SEX.

When Eve brought woe to all mankind,
Old Adam call'd her woe-man;
But when she woo'd with love so kind,
He then pronounced her woo-man.

But now with folly, and with pride,
Their husbands keenly trimming,
The ladies are so full of whims,
The people call them whim-men.

A CANDID TUTOR.—When I first went to Cambridge, says Horace Walpole, I was to learn mathematics of the famous blind professor Sanderson. I had not frequented him a fortnight before he said to me, "Young man, it is cheating you to take your money; believe me, you never can learn these things; you have no capacity for them."

REFINEMENT.—A lady went into a dame-school not long ago, in an adjoining county, and seeing a little girl at work, asked her what she was making. The child dropped a curtsey, and replied, "A Hemise, ma'am." "A what?" said the lady, "why it looks like a shirt!" "Yes, ma'am," rejoined the little workwoman, "only Governess says we ought to say Hemises for these, the same as Shemises for the others."

"A MAGPIE'S CUNNING.—A gentleman who had a magpie told me that having stolen many articles, he watched him narrowly, and at length he was seen by him gathering pebbles, with much solemnity, and dropping them into a hole about 18 inches deep made to receive a line post. After dropping every stone he cried 'carach' triumphantly, and set off for another. Making himself sure that he had found the object of his search, the gentleman went to the place and found in the hole a poor toad which the magpie was stoning for his amusement."—Book of the Seasons.

INCONVENIENCE OF DEFECTIVE EYES.—A clergyman formerly of this town, who was in the habit of exchanging often, in the course of his parochial duties, one day called upon a venerable old lady, a member of his church, who had poor eyes. At first he indulged in the usual kind enquiries about her health, and then after the different members of her family, but all the while he observed she looked somewhat vacant and surprised. At length she exclaimed, "I don't seem to recollect who you are." "You don't go to meeting often, I'm afraid," said he, "or you would at once know who I am." "Yes I do," she replied, "but I'm quite certain I never see you there!"—Northampton Courier.

CONFESSION OF AN IRISH PEASANT.—Luke M. Geoghan being at confession, owned among other things that he had stolen a pig from Tim Carrol. The priest told him he must make restitution; Luke couldn't—how could he, when he had eaten it long ago? Then he must give Tim one of his own. No; Luke didn't like that—it wouldn't satisfy his conscience, it wouldn't be the downright identical pig he stole. Well, the priest said, if he wouldn't, he'd rue it, for that the corpus delictum, Tim's pig, would be brought forward against him at his final reckoning. "You don't mane that, father?" Indeed but the father did." "And may be Tim himself will be there too?" "Most certainly." "Och, then, why bother about the trifle this side the grave? If Tim's there, and the pig's there, sure I can make restitution to him then you know."—Monthly Magazine.

Some years since, a fellow from the city was traversing through Vermont, exhibiting a large collection of wax figures, among the monstrosities of which were Queen Caroline, Bergami, Lieut. William H. Allen, (killed by pirates,) Aaron Burr, shooting Hamilton. The foremost man' went around the hall explaining the various figures, and on coming to this, exclaimed. 'This, ladies and gentlemen, is Aaron Burr, Vice President of the United States, in mortal combat with the immortal Hamilton; and then lifting to the ceiling an eye teeming with the inspiration of bards of the Olden Time, he broke forth in the inimitable style of Orator Pop Emmons, with:

Oh, Burr! Burr! what hast thou done?
Thou hast shooted dead great Hamilton!!
You got right behind a bunch of thistles,
And shooted him dead with a pair of hoss pistols!

"A man had a young wife—took into his head to be jealous of a friend—no cause, dare say. Was going from home one day—meant to tell her to avoid company of said friend, but by good luck asked advice of another—sensible man—knew better—said never do that!—way to make her think of him, if never did before—woman do any thing tell not. Try her—tell her be sure not to ride upon old Towler, great savage watch dog, while you are absent—see what'll happen."

"Husband took friend's advice—gave particular orders not to ride dog—wife stared, laughed, promised—never dreamt of such a thing—afraid of dog too—soon ha' thought of riding a dragon, if hadn't been told not. Husband gone, went to look at Towler directly—gave him bones—got friendly by degrees—scratched his head—patted his back—lost all fear—got a straddle—had a tumble—scratched her face—no hiding that—when husband came back, laid all the blame on him—said she fancied dog-riding must have been something very pleasant, or would not have been denied to her!"

When Andrew Dunlap, Mayor of the good old city of Dundee, died, his executors resolved to appropriate to their own peculiar benefit, the provision contained in a Codicil which bequeathed to the framer of an epitaph which should be endorsed upon his tomb-stone the good round sum of thirty pounds Scotch. The executors wisely concluded that, to entitle them to an equal division of "the spoils," the epitaph should be the joint product of their united inspiration; and consequently, they (there were three of them) voted, that an epitaph, proper, should consist in a well arranged triplet; and therefore, under the peculiarities of the case, it was quite proper that each executor should contribute a line ex tempore. Under his equitable arrangement, they commenced their poetic operations. The first eked out his line thus:

"Andrew Dunlap, Mayor of Dundee."

The second, under a solemn sense of the recent, afflicting dispensation of Providence which had deprived Dundee of a civil head, continued:

"Andrew Dunlap, died did he;"

And the third, in pious agony, capped the mournful climax with:

"Hallelujah! Hallelujee!"

Trust not the world, for it never payeth that i promiseth.—Augustin.

True wit consists in retrenching all useless discourse, and in saying a great deal in a few words.

A man may play the fool with every thing else, but with poetry:

——Neither men, nor gods, nor pillars meant
Poets should ever be indifferent.

I would to heaven this sentence was writ over the door of all our printers, to forbid the entrance of so many rhymers.—Montaigne.

Digitized by Google

A green wight, of green Erin, was sent to a druggist's store, to procure honey, but when arrived there he had forgotten his errand. Being somewhat disconcerted, he looked about him to discover wherewith he might refresh his memory. "Do you wish any thing?" inquired the druggist.

Pat. "Sure, and so I do, but I'm not thinken how to spake it now jist."

Drug. "Can't you think of something that sounds like it, or looks like it?.'

Pat. "Ay, that I can, and do ye know them ere little varmints, bad luck to their mother's children, what bites so sharp with their tails?" Pill was puzzled, and for the life of him he could not think what Paddy wanted. So he called on his wife to obviate his difficulty. "Honey," said he, "Honey, come here and"—

"Och, by ——," said Pat, interrupting him, "that's jist what I want!"

A countryman, a short time ago, on being liberated from St. Augustine's gaol, walked into a neighbouring ale-house and asked for a pint of beer, informing the landlord, at the same time, he had no money, but that, if he would furnish the supply, he would tell him some thing greatly to his advantage. Boniface hesitated, but finding the man's countenance to wear an honest sort of appearance, placed before him a "tankard of mild." A few minutes elapsed, and the beer had vanished, and with it my host's patience, for he eagerly demanded the promised information. "Hark y'e," responded the newly released delinquent, "If you should be unfortunate enough to get on the tread-mill, the easiest birth is against the wall."—Kentish Chron.

A Searching Operation.—"Billy, my dear, where have you been, at this time of night, to get your shirt turned wrong side afore?" "Been, mother!—been to an auction, where a man lost his pocket book; and they shut the doors, and searched us all from head to foot; that's how I got my shirt turned;—glad to clear out any how—staid two hours, and they had'nt half sniggled when I left 'em."

Painter's Miseries.—Requesting a lady, who is the bearer of a squint, to oblige you for a moment by looking at you, in order to catch a peculiar expression, when she, half surprised and half angry, wondering at his stupidity, exclaims, "Why, indeed, sir, I have been looking at you this half hour." Hearing a person say, "Well, to be sure, if it wasn't for the face, I should think that was meant for Miss E."—it being intended for that identical person. Painting an old gentleman, who the first hour grins and chuckles you out of all patience, and then, by way of making amends, falls asleep the second.—Le Studio.

A Sharp Turn.—Spiller, the celebrated comedian came forward one Saturday to announce a benefit. He began his address, "ladies and gentlemen, to morrow evening." Here a voice from the pit of the theatre cried out—"to morrow, Oh! Mr. Spiller, you forget to morrow will be Sunday." "I know it," replied the droll—"ladies and gentlemen, to morrow evening a charity sermon will be preached in the church of St. Andrew's, Holborn, for the benefit of fifty poor boys, and as many girls of that parish, and on Monday evening the comedy of the Busy Body will be performed in this theatre for the benefit, &c.

A person once said to a father whose son was noted for laziness, that he thought his son was very much afraid of work.—"Afraid of work," replied the father, "not at all, he will lie down and go to sleep close by the side of it."

A gentleman paying his addresses to a young lady, the daughter of a wealthy planter, and of course entitled to the honour of being very accomplished, inquired of her if she was not lonesome, there being no society in the neighbourhood, and how she spent her time; she replied she was not lonesome; that she amused herself in reading and writing. He asked her whether she was most fond of writing prose or poetry. "Nary one," says she, "I writes small hand."

SYMPATHY.

By Bishop Heber.

A Knight and a lady once met in a grove,
While each was in quest of a fugitive love;
A river ran mournfully murmuring by,
And they wept in its waters for sympathy.

"O never was Knight such a sorrow that bore!
O never was maid so deserted before!
From life and its woes let us instantly fly,
And jump in together for company!"

They searched for an eddy that suited the deed,
But here was a bramble, and there was a weed;
"How tiresome it is," said the fair, with a sigh,
So they sat down to rest them in company.

They gazed on each other, the maid and the knight,
How fair was her form, and how goodly his height;
"One mournful embrace!" sobbed the youth, "are we die!"
So kissing and crying kept company.

"O had I but loved such an angel as you!
O had but my swain been a quarter as true!
To miss such perfection how blinded was I!"
Sure now they were excellent company.

At length spoke the lass, 'twixt a smile and a tear,
"The weather is cold for a watery bier;
When summer returns we may easily die,
Till then let us sorrow in company."

The common superstition or the death-watch is thus noticed in "Howitt's Book of the Seasons."—"The peculiar noise which this little beetle makes by beating its head against the wood it inhabits, has been regarded amongst the superstitious as an omen of death. It is generally in April and May when its knockings are most frequent; and it is now generally understood to be a signal by which they are enabled to find each other in their dark labyrinths. If two of them are placed in separate pill boxes, at a short distance, they will frequently answer each other for a considerable time.

Anecdote.—The crooked streets of Boston are proverbial. Not many years since, says the New Bedford Gazette, the town of —— sent a new Representative to the General Court who had never been in that city of tortuosities. He started at the usual time, for the capital, to watch over the interests of his constituents, who were not a little surprised at seeing him back in less than a fortnight after he set out. On being asked the cause of his return, he replied, that he "staid in the city ten days—wore out his boots—eat up all his bread and cheese—could'nt find the State House; and so he thought it was best to return and report progress!"

Scotch Wit.—Two Scotchmen, messmates and bosom cronies, from the same little clachan, happened to be stationed near each other, when the celebrated intimation was displayed from the admiral's ship.—"Look up, and read you Jock," said the one to the other;" "England expects every man to do his duty;" not a word frae puir auld Scotland on this occasion."

Digitized by Google

From the Saturday Evening Post.

THE BASHFUL LOVER.

She is the fairest of the fair,
The gayest of the gay;
Her brow is smooth and free of care,
And her eyes, are bright as day.
I've look'd on her with passion's glow,
And oh! I love her well,
And I've often wish'd to tell her so,
But I've yet the tale to tell.

I've often held her pretty hand,
And thought I'd tell her then;
But could not, thoughts or speech command,
And swore I'd try again:
I'd conn'd a speech of love sincere,
And thought I'd speak it well;
But when my lips, approach'd her ear,
I'd yet the tale to tell.

She ask'd me, "do you love the girls?"
I blush'd—I know I did;
And like some rude and witless dunce,
Hung down my throbbing head.
"Dear Jane," said I, "you long have known—
Or must have known it well—"
And there I paused, and gave a groan,
I'd yet the tale to tell.—

One day I met her all alone,
Within a shady grove,
And thought as others oft had done,
"This is the place for Love."
I grasp'd her hand, and said, "Dear Jane,
I hope to meet you well!"
"Indeed!" said she—my speech was vain—
I'd yet the tale to tell.

My faithless tongue—I must complain,
Deceives me every week;
For, "Dearest Love—I love you Jane!"
Is all I want to speak—
'Twill talk of any thing but that,
The winter's eve quite well;
But when I rise, and take my hat,
I've something yet to tell. LISLE.

From the Boston Morning Post.

ANSWER

To a Lady who requested me to restore her love letters in consequence of a pique.

"Geese, villain?"—Macbeth.

Restore all your letters bewitching?
Nay, dearest, that cannot well be—
The cook, long ago, in the kitchen,
Singed the goose with the papers, you see,
Then the flames that you wrote of, in flame
Ascended the chimney above,—
Since the cook had no billets of wood,
I gave her the billets of love.

Aye, sweet—and the goose tasted sweeter—
Your sauce has come rather too late—
The onion you used in your weeping
Had better have graced my plate.
To see your rhetorical flowers
By Genesee flour outdone,
Your grave things eclipsed by the gravy;
I vow; was the best of the fun.

When I was in love, or pretended
To be so, my sweetest of girls.
Recollect you were never offended
When I played with your clustering curls,
Your letters—a scullion might use 'em;
But how did you manage with mine?
I know they were warmed by your bosom,
And read fifty times, every line.

Grieve not for your sweets; "to such uses,"
Hamlet tells us, "we all came at last"
The goose has been singed, cooked and eaten,
The hour of dinner is past.
But even if all should be known,
My awful transgressions be proved,
Your notes but inflamed the wrong goose,
And not the right gander you loved.

LOVE'S INFLUENCES.

Love—what a curious, comical thing it is,
Pleasing, and teasing, and vexing us so,
Just like a bee with its honey and sting, it is Here and 'tis there, and wherever we go.

Now, it is courting, transporting, and thrilling us,
Nothing in nature can equal our bliss;
Now it is frowning, and chilling, and killing us,
Plunging us down to the lowest abyss.

Then of a night, how it sets us a dreaming, O!
Misses and kisses flit over the brain,
Gay dresses, bright tresses, caresses, all seeming so
Real and true that we waken with pain.

Sometimes pathetic, jocose, metaphysical,
Various aspects and manners it wears,
The pretty and witty, the solemn and quizzical,
All have their part of its pleasures and cares.

When a mere boy—say some five or six years ago—
One roguish girl played the mischief with me;
What with her smiling, beguiling, and tears you know,
Soon was I a pitiful object to see.

O how delightful and frightful! to walk with her,
Down to the church that stood towering hard by;
And then while I tarried, unable to talk to her,
Eyeing and sighing and dying was I.

Then what a quarrel—I tremble to think of it,
Little was left me of life and of hope,
If not in despair I was just on the brink of it,
Often I thought of a razor or rope.

Ghost-like I wandered for weeks by a lonely brook,
Shaded by woods, from society free;
Then, fixed on the earth, my glazed eye-balls would only look
Up, when my head struck the limb of a tree.

Parents and kindred cried, "What is the matter, dear?
Duly and truly your feelings impart."
"Ah me!" I replied, with a groan, "such a clatter here,"
Putting my hand where I once had a heart.

Well, sure enough, it was tough, but I bore it all;
Years of adventures have since passed away,
But yet in good truth I have hardly got o'er it all,
Queer I appear as the most of folks say.

Pardon my folly, kind, generous editors,
Thus to be whining and rhyming about
What [publish it, then you'll be greatly my creditors]
Scarcely we live with and can't live without.

If a man borrows a shilling from you, and on being dunned pretends to have forgotten it, you may with considerable safety set him down as a liar.

On the Coldness of my Love.

My love—a steam-boat I will prove her,
And I'm the paddle-wheels so wide—
With all my power I strive to move her,
Yet, like those wheels, I'm put aside.

A lady's album is generally worth looking at, as a psychological curiosity, indicative, to a considerable extent, of the taste and feeling of its owner.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

MEDALLION HEAD of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE & MARIA LOUISA.

Ruled by Machinery from the Medal executed by Andrieu.

Published by S. C. Atkinson for the Casket.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

ATKINSON'S

CASKET

OR GEMS OF

LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

Thy fate unpity'd, and thy rites unpaid!
No friend's complaint, no kind domestic tear,
Pleas'd thy pale ghost, or grac'd thy mournful bier.
By foreign hands thy dying eyes were clos'd,
By foreign hands thy decent limbs compos'd,
By foreign hands thy humble grave adorn'd,
By strangers honour'd, and by strangers mourn'd.

No. 2.] PHILADELPHIA.—FEBRUARY. [1834.

NAPOLEON AND MARIA LOUISA.

Ruled by Machinery, by Asa Spencer, from a Medal executed by Andrieu.

The beautiful medallion which embellishes the present number of the Casket, is a specimen of a peculiar style of engraving which America claims the exclusive honor of giving birth to. In 1817, by the use of a machine which had been invented in Philadelphia, Christian Gobrecht, die-sinker, produced upon copper an engraving from a medal, having upon it the head of Alexander of Russia. From this engraving impressions were taken and distributed. The claims set forth in the London Philosophical Magazine for 1832, rest upon no proof, while its existence in this country for so many years previous, abundantly established it as an American invention, even if the fact had ever been denied, which does not appear to be the case. In 1819, Mr. Asa Spencer, of the house of Draper, Underwood, Bald & Spencer, bank note engravers, took with him to London, a machine of the kind above alluded to, which was designed principally for straight and waved line ruling. This machine was used in London during the year just mentioned, and the mode of ruling waved lines, and of coying medals was then exhibited and explained by Mr. Spencer to several artists. Little, however, was done in the way of medal ruling, until about four years since, when a desire to apply the method to the engraving of designs for bank notes, caused it to be revived by Mr. Spencer, who bestowed great attention on it, and overcame the difficulties encountered in the outset.

The peculiar construction of this machine has never been made a secret, nor has it ever been patented, although prudential motives have required that it should not be minutely described, and thus be placed in the hands of those by whom its use might be perverted to improper purposes. In consequence if this free communication in relation to this machine, it is now made, with modifications in the details, for engravers, by some of our machinists.

It may not be amiss, however, briefly to observe, that this machine is constructed much on the principle of a pentegraph. Since it has been introduced into the art of bank note engraving, it has materially increased the safety of notes, by rendering it wholly impossible to make a counterfeit. The effect produced is so peculiar as to defy all efforts of the graver at imitation. The steel implement of the engraver soon becomes blunted by an application of this kind, and the keen point of a diamond is alone found equal to the task of tracing successive lines of equal distinctness on the hard surface of the steel plate. Mr. Spencer cannot be too much distinguished for his zeal in perfecting an instrument which combines so much real utility with the beauty of its productions; while his success in doing so would seem to be the highest possible evidence of his skill and science as an artist and mechanic. The completion of such a machine appeared alone wanting to place the respectable engraving company before mentioned, at the summit of their profession. If they have heretofore been admitted to possess taste, talent and skill of the most exalted order, they must now be allowed to add the finishing qualification of perfect safety—a quality as necessary in their works as light is to creation.

A BLUSH—"What a mysterious thing is a blush! that a single word or look, or a thought should send that inimitable carnation over the cheek, like the soft tints of a summer sunset! Strange, too, that it is only the face—the human face—that is capable of blushing! The hand or foot does not turn red with modesty or shame any more than the glove or stocking which covers it. It is the face that is the heaven of the soul!—there may be traced the intellectual phenomena, with a confidence amounting to a moral certainty. A single blush should put the infidel to shame, and prove to him the absurdity of the doctrines of chance.

Digitized by Google

The following song, composed for the occasion was sung at the late celebration of the anniversary of St. Andrew, by the St. Andrew's Society of Savannah, Ga. It is almost equal to Burns's original.

"Thistle Bloom."

TUNE—"Should Auld Acquaintance."

Should Scotia's emblem be forgot?
Should mem'ry scant it room?
Should we her sons remember not
The Thistle's bonnie bloom?

CHORUS.

The Thistle's bonnie bloom my friens
The Thistle's bonnie bloom,
We 'll toom a stoup this gladsome night
To "Thistle's bonnie bloom."

Tho' far frae hame an' native lan,
Our hearts shall feel no gloom,
While here we join a winsome clan
To sing "The Thistle Bloom."

CHORUS.

The Thistle's bonnie bloom, &c.

We loe her glens, her braes, her burns,
Her heather and her broom,
But maist our soul for country yearns,
At sight o' Thistle bloom.

CHORUS.

The Thistle's bonnie bloom, &c.

Tho' aft we quaff to Scotia's gude,
Whylist mirth an' sang gae roun,
Yet nobler feelings warm the bluid,
Inspired by Thistle bloom.

CHORUS.

The Thistle's bonnie bloom, &c.

We bid the tearfu' widow turn,
Her eyes frae aff the tomb,
We hush the wail o' orphan bairn,
Taught by thee, "Thistle bloom."

CHORUS.

The Thistle's bonnie bloom, &c.

Then sing ye chiels wie' heart and soul,
Skirl loud nor fash the tune,
Gar Indus tell it to the pole,
And praise thee, "Thistle bloom!"

CHORUS.

The Thistle's bonnie bloom, &c.

From the Saturday Evening Post.

LINES.

Adieu! ye sunny, summer hours,
A long, perhaps, a last farewell,
When spring renews his vernal flowers,
I may not with their freshness dwell.

A spirit sunk, a broken heart,
Ne'er mingles with the gay and free,
And misery cannot bear to part,
From one, so wretched, lone as me.

My dreams of love and joy are o'er,
Which smiled upon my youthful day,
Now, syren hope can charm no more,
Or lure me with its fleeting ray.

Each gayer thought aside I fling,
Its fading bliss, and idle dreams,
I would not to my bosom bring,
One thought of fonder, earlier themes.

Then fare ye well, ye youthful hours,
Ye days of love, and hope farewell,
When spring renews her vernal flowers,
I may not with their freshness dwell.

C. H. W.

Written for the Casket.

The Three Wishes.

A DREAM.

Of all the slaves who bowed to the ground, and touched the dust at the feet of Sultan Morad, the most submissive and most discontented was Mehemet Han. To have beheld the complacency with which the same Mehemet stroked his beard, twisted his turban, adjusted his cashmere—to have observed him, with solemn steps and downcast eyes, entering the mosch, mortals must have regarded him as the most sincere Moslem who had ever kissed the Black Stone of the Caaba, at Mecca. Sincere, indeed, was Mehemet Han, in the object of his piety, and that was his own aggrandizement; and a puzzle it must have been to the great Prophet himself, to divine the depth of the ambitious desires of Mehemet Han.

It was one of those summer evenings, the beauty of which no fancy could realize, unless that fancy had been vivified by the scenery of Thrace and Bithynia, along the Bosphorus, and sublimed by the last beams of day, glittering upon Turkish minarets, moschs, and tombs, through the trembling cypress boughs, with which these edifices are interspersed, and partially overshadowed. The surface of the straits, just sufficiently ruffled to shew it was liquid—the solemn abodes of departed Mussulmen—the fading rays still playing upon the long banks of clouds, hanging over the fields of Thrace, or rising mountain-like from the bosom of the Marmora; the moon appearing over the distant mountains of Asia; and in the centre of this splendid picture, the thousand shapeless and varying forms created by the twilight, from the houses and shores, and the whole rendered peculiarly impressive by the deep toned Muzzein breaking on the ear. All nature was called to repose, to contemplation, and to unfeigned devotion; and thousands, relieved from the cares of day, felt the balm upon their souls. But there was one to whom the rich scene seemed as did Paradise to the first tempter of man:

"Each passion dimm'd his face,
Thrice charged with pale ire, envy, and despair."

The very day thus closed, had Mehemet Han, with the most apparently devoted expression of attachment and fidelity, assisted to put the sword of the Prophet into the hands of a new grand vizier. That new vizier was the great Achmet Cuprogli. The now cringing and repining Mehemet Han, the son of a Curd, was the spoiled favourite of Cuprogli; and never since the days of Saladin did a more fierce and ungrateful fugitive issue from the mountains of Curdistan.

"May his soul be in Eblis, before the snow falls on this city," muttered the heart-stricken Mehemet. "For what have I despoiled the unbelievers, and made their habitations desolate! The Kaffirs, what is ten millions of sequins?—a trifle. By the Holy Sepulchre! I am not a Pacha of Three Tails, and a Begler Beg, for no purpose. If Morad himself doth not weep when my riches are named, then some other Pacha has already made Roumelia as complete a desart as I have left Anatolia—that basest of all the worshippers of Allah, that Cuprogli. But he shall not always frown in the Divan. The great sheriff himself—the proud and haughty Morad, may yet tremble at the name of Mehemet Han. The bowstring, which sent his predecessor, Ibrahim, to mingle with unbelievers —Caprogli, Grand Vizier—hah!—and Mehemet Han, at the end of ten years' service, only a Pacha of Three Tails. The whole faithful followers of Omar, bowing the knee to Caprogli; and me, when thirty summers have ripened my brain, sent to——Why has Allah poured the full stream of wisdom on the head of Mehemet, and left the sculls of Morad, and his vizier, Caprogli, barren rocks on the desart? Holy Prophet enlighten the mind of thy servant, for these things are dark and hidden."

Digitized by Google

At these words the spirit of the Moslem sunk, oppressed, and whilst his head rested on the root of a aged cypress, and his body reclined beneath the arch of a tomb, gray from time, a deep slumber steeped him in forgetfulness; but the body only slept; the mind, with the rapid and mysterious transitions of a dream, seemed to awaken to a new life.

"Mehemet Han—Mehemet Han," called a voice from the air.

"Thy servant is here," replied the astonished Mussulman; and he beheld before him, descending from a fleecy cloud, a being, not of earth, with robes light as ether, and sparkling with every precious gem. His eyes, though benign as those of the most beauteous houri, were too radiant for mortal sight, and those of Mehemet closed beneath their power; his lips were also sealed as he sunk to the ground at the feet of the celestial stranger.

"Fear not, Mehemet, thou most faithful amongst the faithful children of true believers. I am one of the seventy thousand times seventy thousand spirits, who await and fly to the nethermost bounds of the universe, at the command of the great Prophet. Come, thou favoured one, behold what the blessed Mahommed hath vouchsafe to bestow on him whose prayers are recorded in the Book of Remembrance."

More than the light of a thousand suns seemed now to beam on the earth. The Marmora sea, the adjacent shores, and the edifices of the imperial city and adjacent villages, appeared involved in an ocean of light ineffable. The angel stretched forth his hand and touched the shoulders of Mehemet, and both rose, light as the zephyr which fans the flowery garden of the seraglio: they rapidly ascended to the region of clouds, now tinged with every colour which could delight the eye or ravish the senses. The dark soul of Mehemet was, for the moment, penetrated by the effulgence, and his powers of vision expanded as his elevation stretched the vast domains of his master, Morad, as a chart beneath his feet. The Marmora appeared a mere pond, as the distant Archipelago, studded with islands, advanced, bringing forward the mountains and vales of Greece, Macedonia, and dimly presenting the shores of Italy, beyond the Adriatic. The snow clad Hæmus could not conceal the dark and majestic Danube, or the crescent, shedding its moon-lit beams on the borders of Hungary, and around the entire shores of the Euxine. Sweeping his rapid view to the south, the distant and burning shores of Africa stretched along a horizon, beneath which Cyprus and Candia seemed as two blooming gardens, on each side of the Chelidonian promontory.

"Turn thine eye to the mountains of Asia," said the spirit, as Mehemet was swiftly borne along the winds. Anatolia and Caramania, with the towering Caucasus, seemed to float westward, as the shores of Europe receded, and the mountains of Asia, the Caspian and Indian seas, and the cities of Persia, rose on the eastern perspective. The heart of Mehemet swelled with delight, as the whole Mahometan kingdoms and nations presented a varied tapestry to his enraptured gaze. But from the too immense picture his bewildered fancy was withdrawn by his guide, as they at length rested on the highest peak of Amanus.

"Turn thine eyes to the northwestward," and Mehemet obeyed the spirit. His dream then bore the flight of imaginary fancy to the plains of Konia, over the fountains of the Ermak and Sacaria rivers, until his mind's eye fixed on Istamboul, (Constantinople) rising the pavillion of kings, between two seas. The streets of that city, and its harbour, presented one connected scene of military parade and pomp. Here pranced the proud Arabian courser, as he bore the still prouder warrior. There, in solid array, troop after troop marched to the quays, where ships innumerable received the turbaned legions. Amongst those grim warriors one rode in stateliest garb; his scymetar gleamed with studded diamonds, and on the banner before him, floated the insignia of Othman power. The heart of Mehemet grew sick at the sight, and his countenance blackened with rage:—this honoured commander of thousands, was Caprogli.

"They heart may yet be comforted," said his guide; "be calm and thou shalt see." Mehemet devoured his wrath in silence, as the white canvass of a mighty fleet floated down the Marmora. His eye pursued the crowded ships as they passed the Dardanelles, the Archipelago, and the beauteous Scio; and until, sweeping through the Cyclades, they passed Cape Sassoeo, and moored in the bay of Mutium, in Candia.

"Let the storm of war rage," said the spirit; "be attentive to the message I bring thee from the Prophet—it is in these words: 'Go to that servant of Allah, and grant him the full fruition of the THREE most ardent wishes of his SOUL.' I await thy desires, Mehemet Han."

"Wealth," sighed the Moslem.

"Most wisely hast thou chosen, son of a mortal: wealth will command the services of friends, and lay thy enemies at thy feet. Here is a purse," said the spirit, opening his robe, and placing the surcharged repository of gold in the hands of Mehemet, "which thou cannot exhaust. Ever full: all the riches of the infidel children of trafic, all the riches of the gorgeous east, and all treasures of the Sheriff Morad, put together, would be poverty to thy riches, favoured Mehemet."

The heart of Mehemet glowed for a moment as he placed the invaluable gift in his bosom; but in another moment he cast a glance towards Candia, and his breast heaved.

"Thy second wish, Mehemet," said the spirit.

Digitized by Google

"Life," quickly replied the Turk. "Life—what is it?—a flash of lightning—a peal of thunder"—

"And all is gone into the place of silence," observed the spirit, with a smile; for short, indeed, is the course of the days of man; but thou, oh greatly favoured Mehemet, shalt have no cause to complain for want of length of years:—when two hundred springs shall have renewed the flowers of Asia, over yonder plains, thy full strength of manhood shall not be then complete."

Mehemet exulted in the promise, felt his purse, stroked his beard, but again glancing over contending fleets and armies in Candia, he again sighed.

"The day of thy death I cannot foresee myself," said the spirit; "I am commanded to assure thee, that more than five hundred years shalt thou live."

"Blind and fettered," impatiently replied Mehemet, with all the gold and silver the earth contains; with length of days seven-fold more than the common term of man's life—what is then the possessor but a voyager on the ocean of time, whose vision is sealed? Futurity"—

"Thy third wish," interrupted the spirit, "is easy to divine—be it so;" and he touched the head of Mehemet, and at the same time he drew from his bosom a small golden clasped book. "This is the BOOK of FUTURITY," he continued; "it is now thine. Thou art now enriched beyond all other mortal possessions:—thou art ensured of life far beyond the utmost term granted to thy fellow men; and thou hast what no human being but the great Prophet can boast: thou hast the records of coming time."

Here the spirit smiled, and was silent. The entranced Mehemet remained lost for some moments in the mixed exultations created by his new condition. A chill came over him; he turned round to where his guide had stood, but he was now alone on Amanus. The snows were drifted around him, as the winds sighed amongst the frozen summits. He clasped his hands on his breast: his purse and book were safe, but the whole landscape, not open to ordinary vision, had vanished. Mehemet sighed; but a change again came over the spirit of his dream. He seemed to awake as if from a delicious sleep, and found himself reclining on a most superbly rich ottoman, in an apartment, the walls of which was mother of pearl, the floor a carpet of woven gold; the frames of the doors and windows, crystal, vying in sparkling brightness to the finest diamonds of India. On every side vases of jasper supported flowers of every dye, and exhaled a fragrance which reached and soothed the inmost senses. Soft and thrilling music stole upon the ear, and the tones rose and fell at the inward wish of the hearer. Servants, in the most gorgeous livery, were prostrate awaiting the commands of their lordly master.

"Slave, bring that golden ewer, and place it by me," exclaimed Mehemet. He was obeyed. "Leave me alone, slaves," he continued in a raised voice, and in a moment he was alone in the most costly apartment ever conceived by the human imagination.

Clapping his hand to his breast, he drew forth his purse, and withdrawing the strings, seized the sapphire button at its top, and held it over the ewer. A stream of golden pieces, mixed with the most brilliant and high-wrought gems, flowed into and soon overflowed the ewer, and spread upon the precious carpet beneath.

"It is enough—blessed be Allah, and Mahommed is his Prophet," exclaimed Mehemet, closing his purse and replacing it in his bosom. "I will solace myself with a few pages of the book of futurity," said the now happy Musselman, as he drew forth the portentous volume. On its lid he read,

"The promises of Allah shall be fulfilled."

"Then shall Mehemet Han be richer than all the kings of the earth; live more than seven times longer than common mortals—see farther into futurity than any other prophet, except the blessed Mahommed, and be wiser than Soloman himself," whispered his heart, to close his reflections as he unclasped the volume, and most rapturously read,

"Ask, and it shall be unfolded to thee."

This was written on the obverse of the golden cover, and turning to the right side, he found the book was indeed a mirror, or rather a window through which he saw whatever of futurity he desired to see.

"The siege of Candia?" he sighed, and Candia was once more before him. The city of Mutium had surrendered, and only about one hundred thousand of the faithful had been sent to Paradise, from under its walls. The fleet in triumph was leaving the place, and Cuprogli—"Dog!" roared Mehemet, and clouds and darkness obscured the book.

"Mehemet Han, grand vizier?" muttered the inquirer, and the page was again clear, as he maddened, sprang to his feet, drew forth a most tranchant blade of Damascus, twirled his mustachios, and swore extinction to the whole host of unbelievers. Here he remembered and repeated a text of the Koran; "Be moderate in prosperity." This advice restored his soul to some patience, and he again turned his eye to his book.

"When will Mehemet Han be grand vizier?"

"In the year of the Hegira, 1300," appeared in letters of fire, and like the lightning's flash disappeared.

"Merciful Allah!" most piteously exclaimed Mehemet, "I shall then be more than two hundred years old."

"Just about middle age," appeared in words of fire, as before, which flashed and was gone, but was followed by "Mehemet be attentive and be instructed."

The whole soul of the dreamer was now absorbed, and his gaze riveted on the scenes which opened before him. First rose the imperial city; but how changed! The faces of strangers appeared in the streets, with steps firm and mien erect, as if masters.

"Who are they?" mentally demanded Mehemet.

"Russians," gleamed above their heads.

"The mosch of Sultan Selim?"

"Like all other moschs in Constantinople, are purged, and have become pure—they are now"—

"Temples of the unbelievers," roared the indignant Turk. "The Seraglio?"

Digitized by Google

"Gone—its walls demolished—its rude and barbarous magnificence vanished—quays and warehouses formed the front—and within, merchant palaces rose. It is again Byzantium."

"Allah! Allah! thy ways are just but mysterious," groaned the distressed Mehemet. "The Divan—the great Padi—Schah—the Sheriff—the Sultan?"

The dilapidated walls of Barsa rose before him, and amid its half ruined palaces, his suffused vision beheld a remnant of Othman power, seated where had sat their ancestors in past ages, long before their scymetars gleamed on the western shore of the Hellespont. In front of the palace appeared a body of troops, with countenances downcast, motley clothed and armed, and at their head a man whose thin and flaxen hair and beard, and pale, haggard, and furrowed visage bespoke extreme length of years.

"Long live our great vizier Mehemet Han!" streamed along a dark and heavily clouded sky, and again all was silence and sadness. The very inmost soul of the sleeper was now transfixed: one of his most ardent hopes was realized, but, alas! under what shadows of calamity! The glories of his country departed; the followers of Mohammed trembling at the name of the long cursed and hated Kaffirs. Himself reduced to a shade, pictured the departed grandeur of the Othman empire, now falling in ruins upon its own foundations.

"My family?" he inwardly, yet scarcely dared even in thought to call forth that part of futurity.

"Be patient and be instructed," again beamed.

In the twinkling of a moment his dream carried him backwards in time and space. He was seated in a most magnificent pavilion, overlooking the gently ruffled surface of the Marmora. The pavilion rose upon one of the highest of the seven hills over which extended the imperial Istamboul. Beside him sat one of the fairest daughters of Circassia; a form which not even the most beauteous houri could excel. The odour of incense and flattery mixed to regale his almost overpowered senses. The lips of the enchanting Eutema were pouring forth a recitation of the wealth, power, and greatness of her beloved lord, the generous, valiant, and victorious Pacha Mehemet Han. The inflated heart of the same Pacha was moving a breast-plate studded with diamonds of inestimable price. The title of Saif'O Dawla, (sword of the state) was breathed by the bewitching Eutema, as she touched the hilt of a scymetar, a present from the great Sultan Mustapha.

"Thy enemy Cuprogli, lies amongst the bones of unbelievers, on the banks of the Danube," whispered Eutema. "Yes, my Lord! and the power of Mustapha is like the leaf in after summer: it is withering, and will"—

"Soon fall, and be trodden under foot," responded Mehemet.

"And my own lord be grand vizier," ejaculated Eutema, as she clasped the knees of the aspiring Pacha.

"What sound breaks the air?" demanded Mehemet, after an anxious pause.

"It is the howling wind," replied Eutema.

"No!" passionately rejoined Mehemet, "it is the angry sound of war"—and in fancy he stood breathless, with his right hand on the hilt of his studded scymetar. Sudden and frightful darkness in a moment overwhelmed him; his houses, pavilion—his Eutema and children, seemed swept before a mighty tempest, out of which issued curses menacing death! death! to the vile traitor, Mehemet Han."

"Villain! where is thy benefactor, Cuprogli?" loudly demanded one voice.

"Dead, on the field of Salankamen, and by the treachery of this caitiff," mournfully replied another.

"Death! death!" again resounded with redoubled fury, as the terrified wretch seemed hurled along by the very breath of rage, whilst the cries of his wives and children mingled in the blast.

Another change came: a glare like that of lightning gleamed around him; but not passing; the lurid flame made every object most dreadfully visible. The maddened Janisaries presented a front where every face seemed distorted by hate, vengeance, and unpitying malice. A gulph opened, and down plunged the fugitive to depths unknown. He was stunned by the fall as he reached the bottom of the abyss. With returning sense he looked around, and death would have been joyfully met, as relief from the horrors that arose from every sight and sound. His once beloved Eutema, his other wives, and his children, appeared as demons.

"Aha! aha!" shouted these furies; "all hail to the great, the mighty, the victorious, and the generous vizier, Mehemet Han!"

"Whose purse is never empty," cried Eutema, as she plucked his disordered beard, and snatching the fountain-purse from his bosom, and poured a golden stream at his feet.

Unable to bear the storm, the wretched Mehemet writhed in agony as he turned his face to the sulphurous ground, from which he felt unable to raise his bruised and broken limbs.

At once, silence more awful than the tumult which preceded it. The cavern was now indeed the cavern of death—not the death which ends life and its woes, but death of hope. Mehemet raised his head, and around him, on the very richest sofas, sat Eutema and his most beloved son, Nashili; but their faces were expressive of woe, too deep to admit a single breath or murmur. They fixed their gaze upon him, and their reproaches were red hot bolts piercing his inward soul. Eutema still held the golden fountain open, and the whole cavern seemed strewed with gold and jewels. Eutema raised her left hand, and the burning eyes of Mehemet obeyed the signal.

A figure emerged from the darkness; his stature and mien unearthly; his steps were slow, and visage solemn and stern. The gaze of Mehemet was fixed upon the advancing shade, who appeared to him as the spirit of the murdered Cuprogli. Stillness reigned until the voice of the dead seemed to pierce the walls around them.

"Mehemet Han, thou knowest me, and thee I know, thou man of blood and black ingratitude. Thy soul thirsted for gold, and on a bed of gold forty years shalt thou lie in torture. Behold this wound!" and the spirit of Cuprogli opened his breast red with gore. "That was given by thy means, if not by thy hand. My soul was wafted to where thine shall never come. Thy heart panted for length of days, and a measure of life was given thee seven fold. Thy desires were not satisfied by overflowing riches, or with five hundred years of life. From the lips of the Angel of Wrath, who cursed thee with a grant of thy own Three Wishes, did I receive an account of thy folly. Again thou dared to desire the book of futurity—and it was given thee. Read and be instructed. Had thou called for wisdom, it would have been given thee; and one ray of wisdom would have taught thee resignation to the laws of thy nature. Let the innocent be at rest," concluded the spirit of Cuprogli, as he waved his hand over Eutema and her son, and they were gone. The fatal purse was thrown at the feet of Mehemet, who was left alone in this deep abode of despair.

Digitized by Google

Thus far the dreamer read when in vain he attempted to withdraw his view from the fearful unfolding of his own fate. With that mysterious power given to man in sleep, moments seemed days, and days years. With the fatal volume in his hand, and the fatal purse at his feet, time appeared to stand still as the dark surface of the Marmora, or to flow heavily as the sluggish Bosphorus. A consuming thirst and gnawing hunger seized the vitals of the dreamer: for what appeared to be the condition of his image in the glass of futurity, was felt, and keenly felt, by the sleeping Mehemet. A table, covered with every viand which could tempt the appetite, slowly descended from the vault; wines, more sparkling than those of Shiraz, overflowed goblets of the purest chrystal; and fruits, luscious, as if plucked from the groves of Eden, all stood before the parched and famished Mehemet; but his pained and stiffened limbs refused their office when he attempted to touch the vessels which held the desired food or draught, made visible, and only visible, by a dim and dismal glare which gleamed at intervals through the vault.

"Five hundred years are surely past," thousand and ten thousand times, in bitterest torture, groaned Mehemet, as he writhed on his couch of gold and gems. "Will the angel of death never strike this head?" The awful sound of his own voice only answered in echoes—"Death never strike this head!" Memory, which awake or in sleep never deserts either innocence or guilt, spoke in words of fire; and Cuprogli, Mustapha, Eutema, and Nashili, passed incessantly through the brain of the remorse-wrung Mehemet. "All is lost!" was repeated in echo, "All is lost."

But, after what appeared countless centuries to the soul of Mehemet, the glass of futurity again became dim, and the prisoner in the cavern was for a moment lost to his sight. The clouds of obscurity rolled away, and the city of Istamboul, resplendent in light, was spread before him. All was action in its streets. A numerous army, in all the panoply of war, were preparing to march forth. The coursers were chafing their bridles, whilst the frowning spahis awaited the orders of a man who, in the most gorgeous apparel, mounted on a steed of the most perfect form, and of size above that of any other steed of this mighty host.

"Allah be praised—it is me!" muttered Mehemet—and hunger, thirst, and death, were forgotten, as in rapture his fancy bore him from the cavern to the imperial city. Janisaries and spahis were on their way, and the very earth seemed to tremble beneath their feet, as the Balkan was scaled, and the plains of Hungary spread on the far distance. Mehemet felt for his purse and book—and they were safe in his bosom.

"A page of futurity," whispered the now elevated vizier, as he rested on a couch of pearl and gold, and he again opened the dread volume. The deep and dark rolling Danube reflected the shadows of an army, who, with slow but steady steps, moved down its valley. The Save and Drave were passed, and this army enveloped at the same time the crescent floating over the battlements of Belgrade, and that city itself.

"The insolent sons of unbelievers will never dare meet me and mine host," loudly exclaimed Mehemet, as he clasped his warning volume and gave the signal of advance. But as in imagination he was borne along in his most magnificent chariot: "Let me feast mine eyes with the slaughter of these kaffirs—these dogs!" thought Mehemet, and the book of fate was again drawn forth.

The two armies now appeared drawn up in terrific array, from the Danube to the Save. The Christians, less in number, were headed by a small, brown-visaged man, in plain clothing; his sword, dark as the hand who held it, beamed no lustre. The soldiers of the cross, as plain as their chief, moved slow, steady and firm.

In the form of their standard, the crescent, the numerous and glittering host of Mahometans, their right on the Danube, and left on the Save, with the strong fortress of Belgrade beyond their enemies, now approached in dread array. No hope for the Teutones—their bones were doomed to lie bleached on the fields of Belgrade. The shock was made—the Mahometans seemed to strike a wall of brass and iron; they were broken, discomfitted and fled, bearing with them in their tumultuous flight the now terrified and stupified vizier, whose ears were pierced with curses, loud and terrible, against his folly, presumption, and cowardice. Some of the old time-blanched Janisaries swore, by the beard of Mohammed, that they never saw two kaffirs look so much alike as their recreant vizier and the traitor who betrayed Cuprogli, and who, years gone by, they had thrown headlong into the Bosphorus. Their wrath burned after the terrified vizier and a few of his creatures, who, mounted on the very fleetest horses, kept in advance of the exasperated warriors, who thirsted to quench the shame of their defeat in the blood of those who were regarded as the author of misfortune. The head of a defeated vizier has always stood loose on the shoulders of the wearer, in Istamboul, and prostrate before the infuriated sultan fell the trembling Mehemet Han.

"Caitiff, where are my troops?"

"The decrees of Allah are just," most piteously replied the miscreant.

Digitized by Google

"And I am his sheriff, to pronounce those decrees—mutes," said the sultan, in a voice which froze the soul of Mehemet, who forgot that his life was secured for at least the next four centuries. "But, no!" resumed the sultan, as a wave of his hand sent back the coming ministers of fate, "thou deservest not death—in a dungeon shalt thou languish."

In an instant, with the rapid transition of a dream, Mehemet was again in the dungeon where, in imagination, he had languished countless years in torture. The purse, the book, the gold-bestrewed pavement, and the profusely covered table, were again around him, and again were his inward vitals enwrapped in a flame of raging thirst, whilst his swollen and benumbed limbs refused their office. His eyes and brain remained to place before him what were once the objects of fierce desire, and now strewed before him in mockery. Through another period of pain and misery did he in vain invoke the angel of death. "Death will never come!" was responded from the endless darkness, every where hung round the sulphurous light which environed the sufferer.

As the distracted reader reached this period of his future fate, horror for a moment closed the gates of futurity, and when he once more turned his eyes to the page all was changed.

The Bosphorus was before him, but its waters were covered with an innumerable fleet, bearing down upon the imperial city. On all sides hosts were advancing upon the now silent and deserted palaces of Istamboul. He turned his view to Asia, and in the far distance beheld a melancholy cavalcade, and, anon, eyes suffused in tears turned lingering and despairing looks behind. In an attitude of stern despair, rode one majestic and aged man; his garb and turban, and the caparison of his horse, told the dreadful truth—"This is the sultan, the sheriff, the padishah"—and those vehicles, veiled in black, are bearing his wives and children to Bursa.

Who is that aged pacha who rides up to the sultan? He is Nashili, son of Mehemet; he bends his head low and is opening his quivering lips to speak. But casting on him a look of withering contempt and rage, the sultan drew forth his flaming scymetar, and the head and body of Nashili fall on opposite sides of his horse, and the wheels and hoofs of the cavalcade trample the fragments in the dust with execrations.

"Accursed family—son of a traitor!" murmured, bitterly, the fugitive sultan, and "Accursed family," was caught and repeated by the indignant troop.

As he beheld the mangled limbs and the blood of his son mingled with the dust, Mehemet gnashed his teeth in rage, horror, and despair.

Suddenly loud and repeated bursts of thunder, with swift recurring flashes of lightning, involved the cavern in uproar and flame. The earth rocked as if her hour of dissolution had come. Slowly the tumult ceased, and before the terrified Mehemet stood the same messenger, who, apparently ages before, had borne him to the top of Amanus. From his eyes beamed a light which penetrated the vast profound, and before which those of Mehemet were closed, as his heart sunk in dread.

"Mortal," said the spirit, "again has the mighty Prophet sent to thee another message." Mehemet groaned in agony. "Why," resumed the spirit, "dost thou mourn, and why is thy soul sad? Is not thy couch gold and costly gems? Is not thy sack of gold forever full? Is not thy table covered with every dainty that the farthest countries can supply? Hast thou not the book of futurity open before thee? and have thy days not been lengthened, to enable thee to enjoy more than any other mortal man was ever permitted to enjoy? Why dost thou fall in fear before me? I am as thou oughtest to be—a servant of Allah. Turn thee and hear the words." The angel stretched forth his hand, touched the head of Mehemet, over whose frame strength was restored to enable him to stand before the messenger of his fate.

"Know, thou man of pride and folly," said the spirit, "that it was to punish thy presumption that erst I was commissioned to grant thy desires. Know that none but Allah himself can reverse his decrees, and therefore know, that when riches above measure, and days seven-fold beyond the term of human life were given thee, that even the blessed Prophet could not change the smallest event which might arise from such riches and such length of days bestowed on thee; —it is not for even the Prophet of Allah to change thy heart. What thou hast read in the book of futurity, thou hast read from the pen of destiny. Thou hast seen thyself exalted and abased—thou hast seen thyself seated amid all that could allure thy voluptuous desires—and thou hast felt the fiercest pains of gnawing hunger and parching thirst, with every gift of earth before thee. Thou hast seen the benefactor, who raised thee from the dust, fall by thy ministry; and thou hast seen thy country fall. Thou hast seen the faithful driven from their inheritance, and their habitations enjoyed by unbelieving strangers. Thou hast seen, not thy beloved, for no tender love ever found place in thy bosom, but thou hast seen thy family dishonoured—thou hast seen the dead body of thy son the footstool of beasts of burthen. Now go on—read thy book—thou hast four hundred years before thee."

Saying this, the spirit cast upon the trembling Mehemet a look of mingled indignation and contempt, and disappeared in the deep darkness.

"Four hundred years!" groaned the man of despair, in accents which seemed, to his own ear, to rend the rocks around him, and dashing himself on the gold strewed pavement, clenched his hands in rage. A cold shivering seized his limbs, and he struggled in torture, when a voice pierced his heart, exclaiming,

"Mehemet—mighty Mehemet—my beloved lord—where art thou?"

"Fiends of Eblis, mock me not—I defy thy fury," exclaimed the now waking dreamer; but impressed with the varying and harrassing changes of his visions, he beheld another tormentor stand before him. This was the chief slave of his harem, who had marked his estrangement, and sought him amongst the tombs.

Digitized by Google

"Avaunt thou cursed Hafiz!" fiercely repeated Mehemet, as the moon beams fell upon the dark face of the slave.

"Allah and his Prophet defend my master!" most mournfully exclaimed Hafiz.

"Name not Allah—name not the Prophet, in these regions of misery. Take back thy cursed gifts—I hurl thee defiance"—and saying these words, in accents as only the children of Eblis should hear, hurled a real purse of sequins, and his tablets, at the head of the terrified slave. The purse and tablets passed the head of Hafiz and rebounded from the walls of a tomb.

"Ha! ha! thou spirit of blackest vengeance," roared Mehemet, "dost think I know thee not! Yes! thou bearest me to Amanus top—thou smilest on me in the form of my Eutema."

"Eutema awaiteth thy return," sobbed Hafiz: "Eutema, Nashili, and all thy family await thee"—

"Four hundred years have I to bear this cruel scoffer:—did I not see my Eutema hurled by the winds of desolation into the Bosphorus? Did I not see the sword of the sheriff strike to earth my Nashili—my son?"

"Nashili, and his mother, fair as the sun beams, await thee," repeated Hafiz. "May the hand of Allah and that of his Prophet be on my lord, Mehemet, for good!" ejaculated, in a fervent voice, the astonished and terrified slave, who felt assured that the spirit of evil had confounded the mind of his master.

Both were now silent. The moon had risen above the Bithynian hills, and threw a flickering light upon the tombs, as the trembling boughs bent to the gentle night breeze. A soft and soothing coolness played upon the fevered limbs of the perturbed Mehemet. His lips, parched with real thirst, felt the drops which fell from the branches. Still his senses wandered between two states of existence; while the slave, kneeling, heard with terror his broken exclamations:

"Did not a spirit bear me to the highest pinnacle of Amanus? Did not the same spirit give me, by order of the great Prophet, a purse which could never be empty? Did not he also assure me, from the great Prophet, that I should live seven times the life of man? Have I not already lived one hundred revolutions of the sun? Have I not been twice grand vizier?"—

"May the grand sultan, the lord of many nations, know and reward thy merit," interrupted Hafiz, in a most humble and supplicating tone.

"Have I not languished forty years in this dungeon: forty thousand feet below the surface of the earth?"—

"Strike the head of thy slave to earth," again interrupted Hafiz. "Thou art yet in the bloom of manhood; thy Eutema—thine Nashili, await thee—thou art amongst the tombs of Pera."

"And art thou Hafiz?"

"Put thy foot on the neck of thy slave."

Mehemet struck his hand with great force on his own forehead, as full wakefulness returned; and without regarding the prostrate slave, gnashing his teeth exclaimed,

"Then this has been a dream—some foul spirit of Eblis. I am still Mehemet Han, and Cuprogli is grand vizier—Morad is still sultan. The book of futurity—the ewer—the replenished purse—the death of Cuprogli—Mustapha, sultan—Mehemet grand vizier—great Prophet, are not dreams often fulfilled?"

The shrewd slave trembled, for other ears might be open amongst the tombs; and once more he ventured to breathe "Eutema—Nashili await thee"—

"And I return," at length replied Mehemet. "Slave, go,"—and as with folded arms he crossed the Golden Horn, the still surcharged mind found vent in broken exclamations:—

"Purse never empty—life seven times beyond the life of man—grand vizier—book of futurity! But, my soul, wouldst thou accept either? or, wouldst the accept all these gifts, as they appeared in thy dream amongst the tombs? Great Allah! thy will be done—but—but a purse pouring out a never-failing stream of gold and precious jewels! Grand vizier—cut down the infidels—make their horses dust, and——Great is Allah, and Mahomet is his Prophet!"

I had read thus far this rough translation from the Schah Nameh, when Miss Susan Grimm exclaimed,

"The unreclaimed miser! Why, after all he had suffered for thirst, in his sleep, when wide awake he still thirsted for that ever full purse. What could any person, even a Turkish pacha, do with all the money that"—

"Buy an office, to enable him to get more money!" gruffly muttered old Silas.

That admirable and unrefutable solution settled all difficulty; and we came to the conclusion, that if any one of us possessed the purse of Mehemet Han, that person was in a fair way, with prudence, to make his or her fortune, and rise in the world. MARK BANCROFT.

AMBITION.

By John Neal, Esq.

I've loved to hear the war-horn cry,
And panted at the drum's deep roll;
And held my breath while flowing high
I've seen our starry banner fly,
As challenging the haughty sky,
They went like battle o'er my soul,
For I was so ambitious then,
I burned to be the slave of men.

I've stood and seen on mountain height,
A standard swaying far and free,
And loved it like the conquering flight
Of angels floating wide and bright,
Above the storm, above the fight,
When nations warr'd for liberty,
And thought I heard the battle cry
Of trumpets in the sky.

I've sailed upon the dull blue deep,
And shouted to the eagles soaring,
And hung me from a rocky steep,
When all but spirits were asleep,
And, oh! my very soul would leap,
To hear the gallant waters roaring.

But I am strangely altered now;
I love no more the bugle's voice—
The rushing wave—the plunging prow—
The mountain with his clouded brow,
The thunder, when the blue skies bow,
And all the suns of God rejoice.
I've learned to dream of tears and sighs,
And shadowy hair, and timid eyes.

Digitized by Google

SKETCHES OF GEN. BRADDOCK.

The career of this General is perhaps better understood in the United States, than in his own country.—Indeed his name is scarcely to be found in the British Biographies—while here, the history of his defeat at Monongahela, is but another record of the prudence and valor of our beloved Washington.

Gen. Braddock sailed from Cork in 1755 with several British regiments, and arrived safely with his command in Virginia. A convention of Colonial Governors assembled at his request, and settled the plan of the Campaign. As the French had established themselves on the Ohio, and this was deemed equivalent to a declaration of war, one of the points of attack was the Post then well known as Fort Du Quesne, which, in 1754, had engaged the attention of the Colonial Governments, and was threatened with an attack from Washington, who was himself obliged to make terms with a superior force at Fort Necessity.

General Braddock seemed in his expedition to have laboured under the same disadvantages that Burgoyne did during our revolution. He had to construct his own roads, he was deficient in wagons, and instead of making a rapid movement towards the enemy, was several months on the way. It is said in some old papers to which we have access, that the landing of the troops in Virginia was a great error; and that £40,000 sterling might have been saved, if it had taken place at Philadelphia, while the march also would have been shortened six weeks.

Some curious anecdotes are related of the methods which he adopted by the advice of Dr. Franklin, to gain the assistance of the German inhabitants; but we have not time to relate them. It appears that, on approaching the Fort, he was warned of the necessity of moving with caution, and instead of sending an advance guard of regular troops under Lt. Col. Gage, he was advised to trust to the provincials who were accustomed to woods, and the usual stratagems of the enemy. A belief in the inferiority of the French strength, and an undue confidence in his own, led him to disregard the advice of Washington; and the consequence, notwithstanding a hard fought battle, was his entire defeat.

He himself behaved with great bravery, but in vain. Five horses were killed under him, and he received two wounds, one in the arm and the other in the lungs.—Both of his aids were badly wounded, though one of them, Capt. Orme, lived to make some noise in the fashionable circles of London. Such was the panic occasioned by the unexpected fire from the Indians in ambuscade, as well as the slaughter of the principal officers, that the wounded General was almost abandoned on the field. Eighty guineas were offered to any two men who would attempt to bring him off, but in vain. Nothing but the gallantry of Col. Gage, and another officer, prevented his being left to his fate. He died in four days afterwards. It is said that the troops who were present at this battle, were the same who were defeated at Prestonpans!

His military conduct has been so often censured, that it would only tire the patience of our readers to repeat the various opinions entertained of him by his contemporaries. His character has been assailed as deficient in goodness of temper and affability of manner.

New light has been thrown upon it by the letters of Horace Walpole, recently published in England, edited by Lord Dover, and now republished in New York.—The information is very curious and will be acceptable to all who take pleasure in the early history of their country.

Walpole remarks of his conduct, that the Duke of Cumberland, then a leading member of the Cabinet, found fault with the slow movements of Gen. Braddock, and discovered that "brutality did not necessarily consummate a general." According to the writer, he was a "very Iroquois in disposition." He had a sister, who, being unfortunate at the gaming tables of Bath, hung herself, leaving on a table near her, as an evidence of her indifference to death, some lines commencing with the words.

"To die, is landing on some distant shore."

Gen. Braddock on hearing of her death observed, "Poor Fanny, I always thought she would play till she would be forced to tuck herself up."

Another anecdote is recorded of him, that he had the meanness to live on the fortune of a woman of doubtful character, which he used without the least regard to her wants: and when at length he had taken almost her last guinea, (which she was inclined to save,) he accused her of the intention of cheating him, and never went near her again. This incident is said to be related in Fielding's Covent Gargen tragedy, with some little embellishments.

Another anecdote in the same work, is the duel between him and Col. Gumley, the brother of Lady Bath. As they were about crossing swords the Colonel called out to Braddock, "You're a poor dog, take my purse, for if you kill me, and run away, you will not have a shilling to support you."

Braddock of course refused the purse, was disarmed, and would not ask his life, which by the laws of the Duello made it forfeit to his vanquisher.

We have the same authority for the fact, that Gen. Braddock was at one time Governor of Gibraltar, where he became an especial favorite, and obtained, according to the journals of the times, a popularity well merited by his good conduct!

One thing is very certain, that the British Government were particularly unfortunate in the selection of Generals sent to this country. However gallantly they might have earned their laurels on the Continent, European tactics did not suit the wild woods of America, or succeed against the savages who inhabited them. The names of Shirley, Howe, Abercrombie, Amherst, Loudon, Prideaux, and Braddock, are a few of the list of those whose previous laurels faded or died upon our shores.

TO THE NIGHTINGALE.

(FROM THE FRENCH.)

Sweet Nightingale! that on the myrtle tree,
Sitt'st all alone,
Thou feelest, happy bird, that thou art free;
And much rejoicing in thy liberty,
Would'st make it known.
Ah! think that in thy tree
Some cruel spoiler's hand may spread the snare,
To rob thee of thy cherished liberty;
Ah! then—beware!

That tree, sweet Nightingale, appears to be
A home of rest,
Where spoilers cannot come to injure thee
Or rob thee of the liberty
That glads thy breast.
Alas! there is no home,
Tho' it be e'er so shelter'd or so fair,
Where danger and misfortune cannot come,
They're every where.

The odoriferous leaves that shade thy head,
'Are always green.
Hope's brilliant colours are around thee spread,
Her soothing influence is o'er thee shed,
Tho' all unseen.
Do not too firmly trust the flatt'ring word,
Or golden smile of Hope, however fair;
In this deceitful world, alas! sweet bird!
Even Hope's a snare

Digitized by Google

Written for the Casket.

ARGALYA:

A TALE AFTER THE GERMAN OF BARONNESS DE GICHLER.

ORIGINAL.

The late morning gleamed over the snow-covered plains on the Jenisey.* Quiet and deserted was the country: the most dreadful frost kept the natives in their wretched jurtas;† now the sun rose, and remained low above the horizon—blood-red did he look, through the impenetrable fog, without warmth, without reviving power, scarcely strong enough to give light to the immense white plains, which remained in a doubtful twilight. By degrees one of his diagonal beams fell into a cavern, on the Altai,‡ and awoke the sleeper, who, for many thousands of years, lay in that dreadful abyss; because thus did the All-ruling Power will it.

It was Argalya, one of the principal spirits destined to watch over the new-created earth, and to rule and regulate the changing effects of its elements and seasons. The heavy sleep, or rather torpor, which, for thousands of years, had weighed him down, began to disperse, and he to be conscious of his existence. Reminiscences moved dark and distant before his thoughts. He felt that he had existed, then ceased to be, and now to live again. He raised his head, and supporting it on his right hand, he looked around: black walls of rock surrounded him, at some distance, and formed an immense vault above his head; at the ceiling of which, none but an immortal could have discerned the wonderful formations of stalactites,◊ which were suspended in eternal darkness. In torpid surprise did he behold all this, but could not conceive, yet, how he had got there, and what had happened to him during his sleep.

By degrees the faculties of his mind recovered; recollections began to unfold themselves; he could collect his thoughts, and a passed-by eternity unfolded its depths before his soul. Now, now he recollected all—all that he had done, had suffered, had lost! He rose: "I am still!" he said, "and why, why not destroyed?" He sighed deeply. The sufferings of the immortals are in the same proportion heightened as their faculties surpass those of mortal beings. Now he left the only feebly lightened cavern. High rocks enclosed him everywhere; no tree, no shrub, scarcely a sign of vegetation, except a few lichens, which clung to the rifts of the rock. He shuddered at the sight of the fearful desert. Slowly he unfolded his ætherial wings, and lifted himself to the top of the mountain; he stood now on the highest peak of the Altai chain. Beneath him he saw extended the immense plains of Tartary and Siberia, as far as the Pole, covered with eternal snow, a true image of solitude and death. Argalya was astonished; a long time he thought that his eyes deceived him, but the same fearful view remained before them. A deadly freezing air prevailed—life appeared all around extinct. The rapid waters which fell from the black rocks of the Altai, were frozen, and lay before him like columns of diamonds; no water roared—no footsteps were heard—no voice sounded—the earth appeared like an immeasurable white tomb. "What a change!" exclaimed the genius: "Is this the same blooming earth which I once trod?" With doubtful flight he descended to the plain, still hoping to find what he beheld the delusion of his dimmed sight. But in vain! He sought emerald fields, and found nothing but snow, in doleful uniformity;—he looked for graceful palm trees, entwined with myrtle and roses, such as those which had given him shade in his immortal youth—black pines and gloomy firs, half bent down by the weight of snow, stood alone, weeping in the solitary desert.

Oppressed by sadness, Argalya now leaned against a rock, and thus poured forth his lamentation:—

"Oh! thou image of my inmost soul, world that has been, earth deprived of its charms, receive me! Thy bloom has fallen. I, too, have been touched by the chilly hand of death! yet cannot die, but must still suffer in this world, where all my delights once dwelt.

"Where are you gone, cheerful images of my youth, when a balmy breeze stirred above an ever-smiling nature, and an azure sky above the emerald soil—when zephyrs played in palm groves, and roses covered those naked rocks?

"From these mountains fell then eternal streams; where now on swamps the elk seeks food, the light and tame gazelle once sported. Plantains covered the banks of the streams, and from fragrant myrtle shrubberies, nightingales, in balmy evenings, would warble their songs of love and praise!

"Oh, beauteous image of the youthful earth, and far more beauteous still, of my own youth, thou art passed! Shuddering I turn from thee, such as thou art now. I am a stranger on this present globe, and what I have lost, and that which has been, can never be recovered."

Thus sighed Argalya, but no zephyrs answered him. A rude north-eastern tore the frozen snow from the rocks, and filled the air with sleet or hail. "Oh destiny," exclaimed the suffering spirit, "what a clime! what a change!" Again he sunk in the deepest despondency. In his inmost soul he had still deeper wounds, which yet, even with his thoughts, he dared not touch. But after again many days had passed, with their short suns and interminable nights, unheeded by him, he once more awoke from his gloomy reverie, and resolved, in human shape, to go over the country, and to obtain information from the inhabitants about the events, which were but too apparent, to have occurred.

He took the shape of a youth, such as they existed on the globe before the changes, which filled him with so much horror. With difficulty he concealed his celestial origin, and hoped thus

---

*Jenisey—a river in the eastern part of Siberia, which falls into the Arctic Sea.

†Jurta, is the expression, in general, for the wretched cabins, the abodes of the Cossacks, Samojedes, and all the different nations of the north of Asia.

‡Altai—an extensive chain of mountains in Siberia, and running over the greater part of the north of Asia.

◊Stalactites—the term for the minerals suspended from the vaults or roofs of subterraneous caverns, and formed by the dripping waters from within.

Digitized by Google

to escape observation; however, even in a happier clime, amongst a fairer race, his appearance, displaying more than earthly beauty, could not fail to attract the eye. For days he wandered over these wide plains, where no trace of a path, none of the abodes of men, appeared; but the Immortal felt no weariness. At last he saw, at some distance, smoke arise. Approaching, Argalya found some wretched jurtas, made by expanding the skins of animals over and between four posts. No domestic animals could he see, no orchards surrounded them, no neighbourly intercourse appeared to shew civilized habits. Argalya entered one of them; a figure scarcely human in its appearance, wrapt up in skins and blackened by smoke, crept forward, and when he stood upright, Argalya with difficulty recognised a native of the earth in the misshapen being before him. But more astonished still did the Samojede fall on his knees before the noble-looking stranger, to adore in him something superhuman. Argalya inquired of the savage the name of the country, its present and former condition; but the Samojede stared at him with surprize, and could not answer one of his questions. Argalya left him, and went from jurta to jurta: everywhere the same wretchedness, the same want of intelligence, and of all that which alone gives existence its value. He thought of plans and dreams which he nourished in his youth. "Oh what a race!" he exclaimed, mournfully; "how deeply fallen!"

At last his inquiries led him to a grey-headed man, a chief among his people; but even there, at first, fear and surprize prevented all communication. Argalya saw that this race was not capable of an intercourse with the Immortal. With the greatest difficulty he induced the old man to answer his questions—and what did he learn? The history of this unhappy people was already enveloped in obscurity, since the last scarcely expired century. Compelled to the hardest toils, to procure a scanty subsistance from their unyielding soil, they had not troubled themselves about what had happened out of their own village, or in times past and gone. Among their oldest people, however, there were still some traditions which spoke of a happy life in these regions—of better times, when the sun disappeared for a few hours only—when no snow covered the fields, and a happier race lived with little toil, in perpetual joy and pleasure; but at last their vices offended the Deity, and fearful inundations destroyed the sinful beings.

Argalya sighed deeply—"And when, when is it believed that this occurred?"

"It is difficult," the old man answered, "to calculate the exact time from mere verbal tradition. We know nothing but what, by relation, has descended from father to son; but, on the other side of yon mountains and deserts, towards the south, there lives a wiser people, in a more congenial clime; they possess the art to communicate their ideas, by means of lines and figures, so that what they wish to express, they can make lasting: and all who look at their signs understand the meaning. These my father happened to be with, in his earliest youth. Oh! I should have to speak for days if I told thee all the wonders he there did see. They have got long skins, prepared in a strange manner, and palm leaves, all covered with such lines and figures, from which they know every thing that ever has occurred, and so they told my father, that more than a thousand years had passed since that dreadful inundation had destroyed the earth."

"More than a thousand years!" Argalya repeated, with a secret shuddering. His recollection flew back over that immense space of time. "Oh! my Azora, where is thy dust?" he again exclaimed. The old man looking surprised at him. Argalya composed himself; he thanked his entertainer kindly for the information he had given him—offered him a gift, such as the Immortals only have to bestow, and vanished. The Samojede fell delighted on his knees, to adore the disappearing genius.

Argalya flew back to the rock of the Altai, where he again, in a dark cave, sunk into benumbing meditations, and no other thought prevailed on his mind than the one of the immense rift which separated him from all he had ever cherished. By degrees, all which had passed revived in his memory, and the charming images of his youth stood lively and fresh before his mind.

* * * * *

In the beginning of all, when the young earth issued from the hands of her Creator, hailed by the other planets as a sister and a playfellow, the earth was not as now, divided by the chilling changes of cold and heat, but a perpetual spring bloomed everywhere around. The sun rose in equal altitude over the world, and darkness and light returned at fixed hours. Everywhere prevailed joyfulness, innocence, and tranquility. Many beings of a higher nature, gifted by the Creator with various powers and faculties, guarded and supported the order of the whole. Some ruled the tempests, the rains, thunder and lightning; others kept the fire subject to their will; those ordered the course of rivers and streams; these reigned over the flood and tide of the oceans. A great number worked in the bowels of the earth, and many again were entrusted with ruling over the various kinds of living animals. In this manner they were placed upon different steps of strength, intelligence and power. Two spirits were placed above the rest, Argalya and Divaconta: the former as supreme ruler over the fire and the air, the latter over the earth and waters. Under their command stood the innumerable army of subordinate spirits; but they themselves, equal in power, although vastly different in their views and intentions, were subject only to the Creator, and his all-wise, all-beneficent law. The human race, then likewise flourishing strong and beautiful, lived under their kind protection, and had often immediate intercourse with their guardian spirits, who revealed themselves to their cherished wards either visibly or more frequently in dreams and apparitions. Blessed days of innocence and pure enjoyment were then in the ever blooming valleys of Cashmere, as well as in the plains, on the other side of the Altai, as far as the then not yet frozen pole.

It was not uncommon then that a spirit adopted some mortal as a particular favourite; in that case, their intercourse would become friendlier and more familiar, but always in conformity with their different habits and inclinations. The subordinate genii of Divaconta's power, the spirits of the sluggish earth, of the stagnant waters, of a less elevated nature, were easier attracted by the charm sof a terrestrial mistress. The consequence was, that a part of the globe was soon inhabited by a powerful race of giants and semigods, the offspring of such connections. Not so the spirits of Argalya: formed of noble mould, and living in the stirring air, in the purifying flame, they sought, through spiritual intercourse with such mortals they found worthy of their choice, to purify them of human weakness and imperfection, and then to elevate them to their own station. Still there are, with some people, traditions of a world long passed away, more or less rude, or refined, of the greater unfolding of a human mind, through means of its familiar intercourse with beings of a better and higher description. What are yon pleasing dreams of a golden age, of which we find traces in the history of almost every nation? What are the tales of the age of heroes, with the Greek? What so many mythes with the Hindoos? What are they else but a half-extinguished recollection of that blessed state.

Digitized by Google

But, alas! such happiness was not to last. The offspring of spirits and mortals began soon, in their pride of bodily strength and superiority, to deviate from the path of virtue and righteousness, and abuse that privilege which they had power to enforce. Encouraged by their protecting parents, they grasped at every thing. Innocence, tranquillity, and peace became rare; war commenced; the powerful trod down his vanquished enemy. The good, the virtuous, among whom Argalya's spirits selected their friends, were lost in the savage multitude, or withdrew to the solitude of the most retired spots. Divaconta's empire increased in power, and he began to consider the means how to make it supreme and general, by doing away with his long hated rival, and thus to rule alone and unlimited over the subjected human race, as well as over the spirits of all the elements. The execution of this scheme appeared comparatively easy. Argalya, always engaged with his own sublime ideas and profound speculations, had certainly the appearance of an antagonist but little to be feared, and altogether unsuspicious.

But Argalya was not so unsuspecting; in his breast also glowed an heroic fire; he too felt the charm of power. Not, however, would he attain it through mutiny against a higher throne, from where they both had received their strength; and still less would he owe his elevation to base and degrading treachery. Divaconta's schemes, however, did not escape him; a dreadful futurity opened before his eyes; but he resolved to act, and by the destruction of his dark brooding enemy, to secure at the same time his own power. A splendid object he thought within his reach: the rendering happy the human race, by elevating it, and by firmly establishing the empire of virtue and wisdom, founded upon principles of unalterable truth.

With such intentions did the two rulers over the spirits wander among mortals; the subordinate spirits participated in the views of their masters, and the exertions of both parties consequently opposed each other. The more Divaconta exerted himself to gain mortals over to his standard, by holding out to them power, wealth, and luxury, with the more zeal did Argalya labour to reform them, by pointing out to them the sublimer beauty of true virtue, the proud consciousness of doing right, and the high duty of resisting falsehood and wickedness. Divaconta had loved already more than one beautiful woman; more than one fair maiden had been carried to his subterraneous palaces, without paying the least regard to the tears, to the despair of those he robbed of their most precious treasures. Argalya had always withstood temptations of that kind; the elevated tone of his mind did not permit him to consider human beings as objects for an exclusive attachment; always looking upon the whole race as destined for his tenderest care and love. But, alas! his hour too had come.

It was one of the most beautiful summer evenings, such as only are known in tropic climates; light skies dissolving into purple gauze and edged with gold, floated on the azure blue of heaven; a constant stream of the sweetest perfumes from an orange grove, filled the balmy air, and the plaintive tones of many a nightingale sounded from rose and myrtle trees. Argalya came from beneath a group of palm trees, bending their beautiful crowns towards the refreshing evening breeze, on the edge of a small but crystal clear lake. He felt in that delightful mood which the consciousness of having done good alone can produce; the beauty of the spot attracted him; nature's sweet calmness, after a warm and fertile day, was in delicious harmony with his own feelings; the plaintive tunes of the little plumed songsters, the luxurious fragrance of the blossoms, communicated to his pensive mind an unusual softness, and sitting down on the velvet turf, he fell into a pleasing reverie. Looking upon the lake, he saw reflected in its pure waters the delicate sky and majestic trees. At length a noise awoke him from his dream, and looking up, he saw a female figure come forward from beneath the trees; she was dressed plain and chaste in snowy white, which reached to her feet; leading a beautiful boy by the hand, she walked down to the beach, in playful and fond conversation with the child. Argalya's eyes followed her, first out of involuntary curiosity, then he observed something noble in her carriage and walk; he heard her soft voice and well chosen expressions; now he became attentive, and felt a wish to see her features. She had, meanwhile, reached a corner of the lake, where she sat down with the boy, and threw back her veil. Argalya saw a regular and very delicate face, overhung by rich dark tresses; he observed her large gazelle eyes, moving languid and calm between the long, dark, and silky lashes; the velvet cheek was scarcely dyed by a rosy tint, and pearl teeth now appeared and then vanished again behind small but beautifully shaped lips of the brightest coral. Argalya had to confess, that he had seen many women more beautiful, but none more lovely. That which attracted him most was the chaste dignity, the virgin modesty, which her every movement expressed.

Digitized by Google

"Whoever the mortal is," he mentally exclaimed, "who calls yon lovely being his—whose name is pronounced with affection and love by those lips, by that voice—who may read his happy fate in those dark speaking eyes, truly is to be envied!" Argalya was still wholly engaged with these pleasing thoughts, when a large tiger approached the lake. With a cry of horror the female started up, caught the boy in her arms and would have fled; but her cry had attracted the animal's attention; it perceived her and drew back to pounce on his prey. Unable to fly, she threw her child towards a shrubbery, calling out to him to run for his life, and now awaiting her terrific death. At this moment her dreadful enemy sunk, his heart pierced by an arrow, lifeless at her feet, and a youth, holding a bow in his hand, came forward from beneath the trees.

Trembling and deadly pale, she stood like a beautiful image of timidity, and could not yet believe in her safety, notwithstanding the ocular proof at her feet. The youth advanced and addressed her; she lifted her eyes and saw a divine figure standing before her; a faint cry escaped her lips, and she would have fled again, but in the mildest terms he entreated her to remain. The sound of his voice, as also the sight of the beautiful stranger, made at that very moment a deep impression on her heart. She recollected herself: she now remembered that it must be him who had killed the tiger, and saved her life, that she owed him her gratitude. She returned, would have spoken, when again she beheld that majestic and still soft eye, those noble features of more than earthly beauty, and her tongue remained immoveable. Argalya understood that silence; it afforded him more than eloquent gratitude could do. He too was surprised by his feelings; he held her hand in his, he saw into her eyes, which sunk before his ardent looks; he threw his arm around her, and she sunk on his heart. It was a moment in which two congenial spirits united into one—a sacred moment, where two pure souls, recognizing each other, drew close together, not to part again for eternity to come. Slowly at last did the beautiful woman raise her head; Argalya's looks met hers; he saw there a heaven of love and purity reflected; through those clear crystals he could see to the bottom of her heart, and there read all she felt for him.

"Who art thou, lovely creature?" said the youth at last.

"They call me Azora, and Abdallah is my father; our house and grounds lay yonder on the coast."

"And who is thy husband?"

Blushing y replied Azora, "I have none; I am a maiden."

'A maiden!" Argalya exclaimed, with delighted looks: "not married!—and this child?"

"He is my brother."

"Thy brother, and thou wouldst have met that fearful death to save him! Oh, heavenly Azora, I love thee! thou must be mine!"

Azora drew back. "Who art thou, youth, that canst make me such an avowal, the first moment thou beholdest me?"

Argalya had forgotten that her appearance was only mortal, but now he felt it by a well deserved rebuke.

"Pardon, Azora, this too abrupt confession, which admiration for thy virtues, and the ardent wish to call thee mine, tore from my heart. I am called Coswanda; my home is on yon mountains. If thou canst not return my affections, consent at least sometimes to see me."

Azora blushed again, and remained silent; but only for a few moments. There was a something in her mind, which made every dissimulation towards that youth impossible. She raised her beautiful dark eyes to his, held out her hand to him and said:

"I love thee, Coswanda; I cannot conceal it! Thou art the first man that has ever inspired me with such sentiments, and I feel that I never can love another. Come with me to my father."

Coswanda replied by pressing her hand to his heart. One single moment had decided his fate. That heavenly being, whose energetic mind had hitherto been solely devoted to the exaltation of mankind, without one selfish thought, acknowledged that a tenderness, unfelt before, had taken possession of his inmost soul; that he had become subject to a mere mortal, and felt bound to the lovely girl to all eternity. But then these feelings were so new, so sweet, so transporting, that he never, even for a moment, had the feeblest desire to regain his former freedom. They now commenced their way homeward. Azora gave one hand to her companion, with the other she guided the boy. It had become almost dark; briars and the roots of trees made their walk difficult; Argalya supported his beloved friend, and gently led her steps; this situation had never before had charms for the Immortal, but he now regretted every step that drew them nearer to their destination. Leaving the grove, they came on the sea shore, and beheld, through the twilight, the extensive and splendid dwelling of Abdallah.

"That is our home," said Azora, pointing it out to her companion.

"That!" replied Argalya; "alas! probably thy father is wealthy then, and powerful?"

"So they say," answered the maiden; "our camels drink out of a hundred wells, and our whole people honour my father and follow his counsel."

"But I am poor," Coswanda said, after a short pause; "my father is an obscure hunter in the mountains: will thine receive me with kindness?"

"What! thee, who saved his child! Oh! thou knowest not my father."

During this conversation they had reached the house. Beneath an arbour of fragrant jessamine, upon cushions of the richest silks, they found the old man, sunk in pious meditations, from which their steps aroused him. He saw his children approach with the stranger, and influenced by his commanding appearance, rose to receive him with due respect. Azora threw herself in his arms, and told him her danger, her escape. With tears of the purest delight, Abdallah embraced his children and the courageous stranger, requesting the latter to divide with him all he possessed. The manner in which Coswanda received these expressions of gratitude from his new friends, produced with them strange feelings, partaking both of affection and reverence.

Digitized by Google

From that moment Coswanda was considered, in Abdallah's house, as an honoured and highly welcome guest. The cultivated mind of the father found ample satisfaction in his intercourse with the stranger; the boy attached himself to Coswanda with infantile partiality, and Azora's heart had been his from that memorable moment in which their eyes had first met, and every subsequent conversation increased his influence over her pure unsophisticated mind. Her happiness, her tranquillity, her life, depended upon him. In Coswanda's presence only did she exist; his voice alone resounded in her heart; his features were ever present to her; all the rest in her mind was nothing.

But not in expressions of mutual love and tenderness alone did their hours glide away. Coswanda became Azora's instructor; he opened her eyes to the wonder of the creation, and elevated her soul from the contemplation of the wise order which rules this world, to the adoration of Him who created all things, above and below. He made her susceptible for a presentiment of a mysterious connection with the world of spirits, and encouraged her to hope that she, through virtue and purity of mind, might elevate herself by degrees to that higher sphere. Azora hung in breathless attention upon every syllable, and if any thing could disturb her for a moment, it was the tone of voice in which he pronounced these divine doctrines: it was, perhaps, the animation of his features, uniting in them every charm of dignity and mildness.

In this manner passed days and months. Azora did not conceal her affection, and could never imagine that Coswanda's want of riches could be an objection to their union. Abdallah was intelligent and kind; he loved his daughter dearly, but he knew the world, and set a high value upon inheritable wealth and the age of his family, which for many centuries had been distinguished for virtue and honour, and had given more than one ruler to the people. He spoke to Azora about her attachment, who avowed it frankly; he dismissed her silently. Then he asked Coswanda to state to him his prospects, his connections; the youth was from a noble but obscure family, a stranger in that country, and without any property. Argalya retired and spoke himself to Azora, about the necessity of their separation. She would not listen to such a proposal; she would belong to him alone, and would fly with him to his mountains. He named her father, her aged father, and the anguish she would occasion him. Azora was silent. Argalya then represented to her the virtues of self-denial, the greatness of a mind which will conquer its passions, so glowingly, that she, convinced and overcome, at last held out her hand to him and exclaimed, faintly, "Thou hast prevailed; submission is my highest duty; but live I cannot without thee! fare thee well!" and she sunk lifeless at his feet. Argalya, delighted by the conviction of thus being beloved, but still more by such proof of his friend's being worthy of his affection, pressed his lips upon hers. The Immortal's breath recalled her spirits; she opened her eyes, but, alas! he had vanished. Her women hastened to her assistance; she recovered under their careful hands, but her happiness was destroyed. Alone did she seek the most solitary spots, but no complaint, no murmur passed her lips. In Coswanda all was lost to her; life had no charm more, youth no joy. She had only one wish remaining: to conceal from her father the misery that bowed her youth to the grave; she could not, however, sufficiently master her expressive features to mislead his paternal eye; he saw and felt for her.

Divaconta knew every movement of his hated enemy, and was consequently informed of Argalya's affection for Azora, from the commencement. He was pleased with it; he looked upon it as a fresh source for idle dreams, which would make Argalya still less dangerous. But then Argalya left his mistress soon again, and Divaconta heard that she lingered in misery and wretchedness on account of their separation. Surprise and curiosity made him wish to inquire into the true motives of Argalya's strange conduct; for he himself could not believe him capable of inconstancy or deceit. One beautiful morning he passed, in the guise of a young hunter, through the palm grove on the lake, followed by a splendid retinue. He found easily an excuse to enter Abdallah's garden, where he found the venerable old man engaged with superintending the various occupations of his domestics, and was received with all possible hospitality. Slaves, richly dressed, placed a table of costly wood under the shade of tall sycamores; others brought rich carpets and cushions, and a light but choice repast was spread before him. But the object of his curiosity was still wanting. Azora did not appear. In the course of conversation, Divaconto found an opportunity to inquire after her; Abdallah sent for his daughter. Divaconta had expected a dazzling beauty, and was therefore surprised when a delicate figure approached with calm dignity, upon whose pallid features deep and ill concealed agony was visible. Azora cast one look on the stranger; she found him very handsome; a splendid dress heightened the dignity of his commanding figure; his dark eyes appeared to lighten; but there was a something in these features which displeased her. She sat down at her father's side, and mixed only so far in their conversation as decency seemed to require. At first Divaconta felt inclined to smile at Argalya's taste, but he looked frequently at her during the repast, and a new charm appeared to unfold at every look. He found, by degrees, that Azora's features were inexpressibly noble—that the expression of her sorrows made her still more attractive—that her large dark eyes looked still more beautiful, contrasted by her pale features; and that the languid expression of those eyes, when now and then she lifted their silken lashes, was lovely beyond expression. He observed, too, the chaste dignity of her carriage and every movement, and finally the sound of her voice, which she, however, during his visit, scarcely raised, made a deep impression upon his mind.

Digitized by Google

He came to Abdallah's house to gratify an idle curiosity, and left it with the loss of his tranquillity. He parted unwillingly, and repeated his visit soon, which Azora observed with displeasure and her father with satisfaction; for his wealth and noble air had soon gained him Abdallah's esteem. He explained himself after a short time to father and daughter; from the former he obtained hopes, from the latter a decisive refusal of his offer, couched, however, in the most respectful terms. Divaconta was nothing abashed, because he felt convinced whatever might be the state of Azora's sentiments, that his appearing with all his power, and in his true character, would suffice to disperse every idea of a more favoured rival.

One morning the domestics of Abdallah came precipitantly and frightened into the presence of their master, informing him that a procession, the end of which their eyes could not reach, formed by men and animals of most wonderful appearance, was moving over the plain. Abdallah, with his whole household, hastened out to behold the wonder. The procession was led by the spirits of the ocean, mounted on immense sea-horses, sea-lions, and dolphins; those of the streams and rivers came next, dressed in sky blue gauze, and carrying urns and bowls of gold and crystal, which were filled with precious pearls, the finest corals, beautiful shells, and every thing costly and precious the bottom of the ocean and the beds of rivers produced. Then followed, mounted on dragons, crocodiles, gigantic salamanders, and other disgusting and fearful animals which prefer the darkest and dampest abodes, the spirits of the earth, who, in subterraneous mines, smelt the metals, neutralize the ores, lead the rich gold and silver veins though the hard masses of rock, and who, boiling, prepare the fluids which, through volcanoes and earthquakes, give evidence to the alarmed world of their mysterious agency. These latter were mostly of a strange appearance, shaped in nature's most fantastic moulds, disgusting, and often expressive of a malignant tendency. In fanciful baskets of gold and silver work, in boxes inlaid with precious stones and gems, they carried the products of their mines, virgin gold and silver in wonderful formations, and above all, those embodied sunbeams, the flaming diamonds, in all their varieties of colour and light. Upon white elephants the spirits of a higher order appeared now, all noble figures, each one more beautiful than the other, so that the astonished beholder fancied he perceived in every one the king and ruler of the spirits himself. But all this splendour appeared as nothing, compared to the sight of Divaconta, who now approached. Upon a golden car, drawn by four immense mammoths,‖ stood the majestic genius. The sparkling crown, the golden sceptre, the dark blue robe, worked with precious stones, but still more his majestic figure, far above human size, terrible, though beautiful, announced the ruler; and Azora and her father recognized with very different feelings, in the features of the king of the spirits, those of their new friend. Abdallah threw himself with deep adoration on his face; Azora, alas! fell lifeless in the arms of her women.

The car now stopped, and Divaconta flew from his elevated seat; he raised Abdallah, and after having spoken a few kind words to him, he hastened to Azora, who at that moment opened her eyes, but closed them again with a cry of horror when she saw the sovereign of the spirits standing before her. She was carried to her apartment, and though Divaconta remained long in anxious suspense for her revival, the messengers of Abdallah constantly returned with the same answer from her women, that she continued in a state of insensibility, and the afflicted father feared he should have to mourn over the loss of his only and beloved daughter. Divaconta mounted at last, gloomy and dissatisfied, his car, not, however, without previously having given, by mysterious hints, Abdallah reason to surmise what he would have to fear, if the wishes of the king of the spirits remained unfulfilled. The procession was now put in motion again, and he disappeared in the forest beyond the plain.

Azora now began to recover, and impatiently inquired if all had been a long and fearful dream. Abdallah pressed her joyfully in his arms, assuring her that she actually had seen the sovereign of the spirits, and that she would become his queen and the sharer of all his splendour. She threw herself at her father's feet, and implored him not to sacrifice her. Abdallah answered her in an authoritative manner, and represented the advantages, the honour of such a connection; but she remained silent. He now told her the threats of the angry spirit, and the dangers which unavailably awaited him and his people, if Azora refused to comply with Divaconta's wishes. She shuddered; her father had placed his own and the welfare of thousands in her hand; Coswanda's image stood before her soul,—her heart was broken. With faint and scarcely audible voice she said, "My happiness must not become destruction to thee or thine; I swear to be Divaconta's faithful wife!" Abdallah embraced his daughter now with the utmost joy, and then hurried away to direct the most splendid preparations for the nuptial solemnities.

Supported by one of her women, Azora walked—no, tottered, about sunset towards the lake, where she the first time had seen Coswanda. The evening was as fine as that never to be forgotten one; the same calmness, the same brilliancy of sky. She sat down on the aromatic turf; from beneath yon tall trees had the beloved of her soul appeared; here his eye had met hers, here his silver voice avowed his feelings; her tears mixed with the dew drops that hung on the violets covering her seat. She addressed herself in ardent prayer to the Creator, whom to adore and to love Coswanda so convincingly had taught her, and implored him to let her die, as she would become neither faithless or disobedient. In this state she remained for some time, ‖ Mammoths—immense animals of the antideluvian world, the bones of which still occasionally are found in Siberia, on the Arctic Sea, and upon some rivers in North America. The two finest entirely preserved skelestons of these giants of the forest, is one at St. Petersburg, at the Imperial Academy of Sciences' collection, the other at the Philadelphia Museum of Mr. Peale.

Digitized by Google

and in the exhaustation of her strength, she thought with joy that death, which to her brought no terrors, was approaching. Suddenly a voice, which made her tremble, pronounced her name. She started—Coswanda stood before her. She flew into his arms; at that moment all, all was forgotten! but, alas! too soon returned the consciousness of her misery; she tore herself from his arms: "Oh! fly, fly, my beloved!" she exclaimed; "we must part forever and ever, and thou art lost if that dreadful being finds thee here!"

"Azora," the youth replied with tender voice, "my Azora! banish those fears; we shall not part!"

She looked doubtfully at him, not understanding what he meant to express.

"Oh, my beloved!" she exclaimed at last, "thou knowest not what has happened to thy poor Azora! thou knowest not the dreadful Divaconta!"

"I know all," Argalya answered, "and I know that thou art mine. Come to my heart, noble, virtuous being, we are united forever! learn to know better the friend that adores thee; he is not the obscure hunter from yon mountains, not the poor stranger—he is"——during these words Argalya's figure had become taller and more majestic; celestial sublimity and a smile of eternal calmness was expressed in his features; golden wings, glittering in all the colours of the rainbow, unfolded themselves from his shoulders; a crown of the purest flames pressed his light brown curls; a mild fire beamed from his blue eyes; his cheeks glowed with Aurora's tint, and an overpowering splendour streamed from his whole being.

"Who art thou? Oh! who art thou?" exclaimed Azora, and sunk blinded, senseless at his feet.

Reviving, she found herself in Argalya's arms, who exerted himself with tender care to restore her to calmness. It was still the form of the resplendent genius, only softer, and moulded in a more human shape of beauty, so that the eyes of his beloved might bear the sight of him she adored. Azora beheld him with astonishment; she now recollected with what dazzling brilliancy he had appeared to her a few moments before. She disengaged herself from his arms, and sinking down at his feet in silent delight, folded her hands before him.

"My Azora! my beloved!" Argalya exclaimed, and bending down to his kneeling friend, he raised her joyfully up in his arms. "Come to my breast! I am not Coswanda, the poor hunter, Azora; I am the supreme ruler over the air and fire! I adore thee, and will repay that faith which thou hast preserved for the poor Coswanda."

"And Divaconta?" Azora cried with agony.

"Fear nothing, my beloved; I am at least as powerful as he is, and—let him try to tear thee from my heart! Argalya's eyes sparkled fearfully at these words, and Azora hid her timid face on his bosom. "Be composed, darling of my soul, in my arms thou hast nothing to fear;" said he, raising her head. "Listen to me! I never did love; the most beautiful genii, the handsomest daughters of the human race, failed to inspire me with that feeling. I beheld thee! Thy modest charms, still more thy virtues, changed my destiny. Thou did'st love me from the first moment. I desired to know if thy feelings for me would be lasting; thou wast obedient to the voice of duty when she gave thee her commands through my lips; thou did'st part from me, but not I from thee!—I could not!" he added, pressing her with a look of ardent love to his heart. "In dreams, which often dried thy tears, and which were not so void as thou then thought, I hovered near thee; I stood before thee when sleep held captive thy external vision; and now my rival came; thy father pressed thee hard; thou wast once more obedient to the stern commands of duty; and would'st have sacrificed thyself for the welfare of others. I saw thee towards evening seek the well remembered spot, dedicated to the recollections of our first endearments; I followed thee unseen; I heard thy prayer, I saw thy tears—oh, my Azora! how blessed the conviction of thy worth has made me! Thou art mine, not as with men, for a few rapid years—no! for eternity! and no power can divorce us!"

Azora was overcome by such unlooked for bliss; she could not speak, could not find words to express her feelings to her beloved friend, but he understood her silent delight; their eyes met, and the union of their souls was once more confirmed.

On her return to her father, she informed him of Argalya's re-appearance and true character, and, secure by his protection, she now entreated her father's consent to her rejecting the dreadful rival. Abdallah listened to her with astonishment and secret fear. If the certitude of his cherished daughter, being beloved by the two most powerful beings of this globe, filled him with pride, one thought again upon the consequences which probably would result from this rivalship, and the misfortunes which might arise from it to him and his people, made him foresee and fear a horrid and eventful futurity. Argalya again visited Azora. Their happiness had no bounds. Divaconta, meanwhile, raged over his rival's good fortune, whom he was anxious to destroy, but over whom he dared not hope to triumph. Too proud to expose himself to be rejected a second time, he avoided Abdallah's house and fled the country, to brood over his dark schemes for revenge.

The contest begun at first concealed under secret attacks and skirmishes, Divaconta being anxious to excite his enemy and force him from that calm composure which gave him so decided a superiority. Argalya opposed him with tranquil openness, and Divaconta saw that this was not the way to victory. His passions became more inflamed by open opposition; he now tried, on a direct road, to put his schemes into execution. He approached Azora again, but not in his own shape; sometimes in this and soon in another attractive disguise. In many enchanting situations, and under the most romantic circumstances, did he seek to attract her attention and to inspire her with sentiments which necessarily must have weakened her affection for Argalya. But these attempts were also fruitless. For Azora there existed but one being, to whom all her feelings, all her tenderness was due; and however artfully Divaconta's temptations were invented, they failed upon Azora's noble heart. His rage knew no bounds, and he resolved now what art could not perform, power should: and one day when Azora, followed by a few of her women, was walking to the dear grove of palm trees, the earth burst asunder before her feet, two subterraneous spirits rushed upon her and tore her, regardless of her cries, her screams, before the eyes of her women, down with them into the dreadful abyss, which immediately closed again. The women perceived the catastrophe without any means of preventing it, and hastened back with cries of woe to spread the same painful amazement which filled them, throughout Abdallah's house and the whole country.

Digitized by Google

Argalya's equanimity was now exhausted. The loss of Azora deprived him of all prudence and calmness. Excited by sorrow and anger to the utmost, he now on his side too exerted all the powers at his command to destroy his enemy and regain Azora. All the strength of the elements, of the powerful air, of the all-penetrating fire, was prepared to begin a long and doubtful contest against the equally fearful powers of Divaconta.

Azora had been carried to Divaconta's subterraneous palace. Walls of driven gold surrounded her, hangings in imitation of flowers, composed of the most precious stones, formed the ornaments; transparent draperies of incombustible asbest,¶ hung in graceful folds from the ceiling down to the floor, which, in a beautiful mosaic of onyx, jasper, porphyr, and emeralds, imitated the green turf in all its variety of blooming spring. The purest naphta* burned in large urns of alabaster, and dispersed a soft moon-like light. Delicious music sounded from behind the walls, and voluptuous perfumes, which lulled the excited nerves into a treacherous calmness, issued constantly from beautifully worked silver censers. Azora saw nothing of all this; her senses had fled from the moment of her abduction; she recovered late, and found herself on the purple silk carpets in Divaconta's unhallowed abode, surrounded by serving spirits in female shape and in the richest attire. She rose and looked around; her eyes fell upon the ruler of these spirits, who knelt at her feet in all his splendour and beauty, sufficient to captivate every disengaged heart. With a cry of horror she started up and made a movement to fly. Divaconta's anger began to kindle; he drew her forcibly back, and was on the point of punishing the ungrateful being by causing the downfall of the whole beautiful fabric, and burying her beneath its walls. His foot was already lifted to give the deadly signal, when her frightened looks turned upon him; she held her hands imploringly up to him; from her white arms fell the beautiful drapery of her ample robe; she sank on her knees and begged him, with burning tears, to take her back to her father. Divaconta remained irresolute before her. Hatred and love, revenge and compassion, contended in his bosom. He raised her, his arms encircled that beautiful slender form: "No!" he exclaimed, with a voice that shook the very palace and made Azora tremble—"no! I cannot resign thee—thou must, thou wilt be mine." She remained silent, her resolution was taken; she made no attempt again to soften a being by her entreaties whose heart appeared closed against every nobler feeling. Divaconta exerted all his artifice to induce her to speak; she did not open her lips again, and he left her at last in displeasure.

When she found herself alone she drew her veil close around her, and, enveloping herself entirely, closed her eyes against all which surrounded her, and sat apparently tranquil; but, oh! her mind suffered torments of sorrow and fear, and was the very reverse of that tranquillity she fain would have affected. No exertions of the surrounding spirits, no music, no dances which they performed to distract her, won one look, or induced her to break that silence which she had imposed upon herself. She took no food, —no slumber closed her eyes.

Divaconta had no faith, neither in constancy nor human strength of mind. He tried all; either to persuade or overpower her, neither prayers nor threats had any effect; but her strength began to fail; she became weaker from hour to hour, and with an indescribable delight she nourished a hope that death would soon deliver and unite her to the beloved of her soul, in transplanting her to a more congenial existence. She was sunk in such reveries when at once a dreadful clap of thunder shook the very foundation of the palace; the naptha lamps were extinguished, a fearful darkness prevailed, which now and then changed momentary with a blueish light, caused by vivid flashes of lightning; a hurricane roared, the walls trembled, their foundation shook; flames broke through from all sides, and Divaconta's spirits flew frightened away. At last the walls burst and, enveloped in flames, appeared Argalya, took the lifeless Azora in his arms and lifted himself without difficulty from the ruins into higher regions, where the heavier spirits of his enemy could not follow.

But the strength of Azora gave way to this new trial; she moved not, she scarcely breathed. With the anguish of love Argalya held her in his arms, and now first recollected that his fierce appearance was more calculated to solve the ties of her mortal existence, than to strengthen them. He lessened the dazzling splendour of his crown, and the terrors which surrounded him; his celestial breath touched her lips. She opened her eyes, gave a piercing scream, and threw her arm in agony around his neck, as if seeking for safety with him alone.

"Be calm, my Azora," he now said, with his mellow voice, which tranquillized and penetrated her soul; "we are safe; thou hast no more to fear."

She raised her head, and looking around found herself with her beloved friend in a car of burnished silver, drawn by four milk-white unicorns, who, spreading their splendid coloured wings, and armed with a golden horn on their heads, ¶ Asbest, or mountain flax—a fossil, of which the Egyptians understood to make an incombustible web, or thin cloth.

* Naphta—a white oileous mineral substance, found in a liquid state, and yielding a beautiful pure flame.

Digitized by Google

carried them with rapid flight through the skies. She now first begun to enjoy her safety. She told Argalya of her sufferings, her resolution to die; his looks beamed with gratitude for her constancy, and then he painted his torments too, when he heard of his rival's success, and gave her a picture of his contest with Divaconta, in which they both had exerted to the utmost the powers at their command. He described to her the war between the two elements, and how fire and air at last had overpowered the heavy earth, and the sluggish water had undermined the very foundation of the mountains, and triumphantly gained their way to her. Azora trembled at this relation.

"And where is my father, my brother?" she asked.

"Already in that safe refuge where I am going to take thee, my beloved," Argalya answered; "where your abode stood there is no longer safety for you; it has gone too far between Divaconta and me. In the midst of a war between the elements and their spirits, the mortal race cannot exist!" he added, gloomily.

"Oh, heavens! what dost thou mean?"

"Do not inquire, my Azora; thou and those thou lovest are safe; the rest leave to me and to Him who rules over all!"

Azora was silent; she had accustomed herself to pay unlimited obedience to the mere hints of her celestial friend, because she knew, she felt convinced, that all he did and wished was noble, was good, and being now perfectly calm, she exerted herself to shew him her delight and happiness, on account of their re-union, by the most affectionate tenderness.

Their flight was a long one; far beneath them they saw many an empire and sea; at length the land disappeared altogether, and the endless ocean spread before them. Towards evening they discerned a dark object on the surface of the water; it became more distinct and larger; it was land. The unicorns directed their flight towards it, and, lowering them, the car stopped. Azora was on the Island Atlantis.† A beautiful country, the extent of which her eyes could not reach, lay before her. Strangely shaped trees covered the beach; beautiful clear rivulets fell, in picturesque cascades, down from the grass covered mountains, which lined the shore; flowers, of the most brilliant colours, ornamented the velvet turf, and birds and animals, in the greatest variety of shape and colour, enlivened the airy groves.

"This is my abode," said Argalya, lifting Azora from the car and leading her towards a cheerful-looking cottage, which stood half concealed by tall magnolia and palm trees. Abdallah and his son hastened into her arms; the delight at beholding again the objects so dear to her heart, made her forget the anguish she had suffered, the dangers she had undergone. Argalya felt the sweetest pleasure in the happiness of his friends, but higher duties called him to other spheres, and at length, therefore, mounting his silver car, he vanished from their eyes.

When the first transports of joy had subsided, and given place to calmer considerations, fearful presentiments and cares troubled the minds of those Argalya had left behind. Neither Abdallah nor Azora could conceal from themselves that the dreadful contest between the two spirits would produce the most terrible consequences to the earth, to themselves, and, finally, to Argalya. Their time passed solitary and gloomy. In vain did the most beautiful nature, which smiled in eternal tranquillity and peace, invite them to its calm delights; in vain did the neighbouring cities and palaces offer them the joys of social intercourse,—their hearts were depressed by gloomy forebodings—their thoughts incessantly occupied with their distant country, and the dreadful fate which, in all probability, awaited its inhabitants. Azora suffered still more than her father; she had never yet been parted so long from Argalya—from the being upon whose welfare her own depended. She did not believe herself capable of bearing this wretched half existence, and when she recalled to her mind the expression of gloomy pensiveness which she had observed on his majestic forehead, at their last meeting, an indescribable anguish increased her sorrow, and caused her to suffer a perpetual agony.

Many, many solitary days passed, and Azora faded visibly; the source of life seemed exhausted, the animating spark on the point of extinction; but she exerted herself, nevertheless, to hide from her beloved father the presentiments which tormented her. He, however, clearly observed her state, and not having it in his power to give her relief and comfort, he could only sympathize and suffer with her. None dared give speech to his feelings, and, by expressing his own sorrows, provoke those of his companion. One evening, after they, in this silent anxiety of heart, had sat together some time, Abdallah retired to the cottage, to seek on his solitary couch that rest which he scarcely dared hope to obtain. Azora remained alone; in the light of a bright full moon, which illuminated the beautiful scenery, she sat, enjoying the solitary hour, in which nothing prevented her from giving free course to her sorrows, her anguish, when suddenly the beloved of her soul stood before her! She started up with the most exquisite delight, and incapable of speaking, she took his hand, the sweetest tears of joy breaking from her eyes. But when she looked more intently upon him, she shrunk tremblingly back: vanished had the celestial calmness which, in former days, beamed from his features—the expression of heavenly blessedness was no more. Gloomy and sad he fixed his feeble gaze upon Azora, and remained silent; her tongue, too, seemed bound by a spell.

"Azora," he begun at last, in a hollow voice, "great events await us. Now I must see if the friendship of an Immortal has strengthened, has nerved thy mind sufficiently to partake without bending it his sorrows and his cares. Probably I am lost!"

†Atlantis—an island, according to several ancient classics, situated beyond (west) the Pillars of Hercules, (Straits of Gibraltar). Many wonderful stories are told of its beauty and fertility. It was, according to their opinion, destroyed by a great volcanic revolution, and the present Azoric Islands would seem to be its ruins. Plinius secundus, Ptolomeus, and even the much later Marco di Polo, mention it; but from whence these authors obtained their information is impossible to discover.

Digitized by Google

Azora grew deadly pale, and remained like a beautiful statue, with fixed eyes and half open lips before him. He took her hands in his, and from the dark clouds which covered his forehead broke one beam of calm refreshing tenderness, like that of former days.

"My poor Azora!" said he, and she sunk, at these words, on his breast, bathed in tears.

"Only not parted from thee!" she cried, in agony, "all, all, but that I will—I can bear!"

He pressed her tenderly to his heart. "Listen to me, my beloved, and prove, by thy fortitude and firmness, that my choice of a friend was just and blameless. Thou art aware of my power, and that of my enemy. Upon this planet, which you call earth, there is none above us; but even we are subject to Him who has created us, as well as thee, the world of spirits and the race of men, and rules us according to eternal laws of the highest wisdom and supreme goodness. Sparks of his all-enlivening spirit animate us—you and every thinking being, only in different gradations as to purity and strength. Reason and freedom of will, are our most precious faculties. My will was pure! So at least I thought. I intended good! but even the purest spirits are not infallible in the eyes of Him! Remember it, Azora, and watch the more carefully over thy mortal heart! I was carried away by passion—passion for thee, and ambition after power, which concealed itself, without my at first discovering it, behind the brilliant vision of laying the foundation of a world composed of nothing but what is good and noble. I have gone too far! Excited by Divaconta's pride and arbitrary selfishness, I called powers to my assistance which cannot be put into motion without causing the downfall of the whole. Divaconta opposed me with similar arms; the foundation of this globe is shook; fearful events must be expected; I feel that I was wrong, and that very feeling is the beginning of my punishment—the continuation of it will be, that I have no power left to retract, to repair what has been done. One trial remains, which must decide my own, Divaconta's, and the fate of this planet; if I lose it, we are separated for ever! if I triumph, then thy and my happiness is again at the mercy of the Almighty, who is our Judge and our Father! And now farewell! we shall soon, or——never meet again!"

Azora had exerted all her strength to listen to the dreadful account, with that firmness which Argalya expected and claimed from her. His last sentence, however, tried her to the utmost; her eyes became dim, her pulses ceased to beat; she leaned faintly on the stem of a palm tree. Argalya read the state of her mind; he saw the force she exerted to conceal it. He threw his arm around her. "My Azora—my beloved friend—my sister!" he exclaimed, and these sounds would have recalled her from the grave! The fresh consciousness of being so beloved by that being, renewed her vigour. She turned her again beaming eyes upon him, and that look told him all she felt.

"Put thy trust in the Eternal, hope for his commisseration and mercy, when he sees my true and sincere repentance. I have erred! But He is the father of us all! Farewell! farewell!" He dissolved in light, his voice re-echoed once more, and Azora was alone.

Argalya returned to another hemisphere, to try, as he had informed Azora, the last dreadful contest with Divaconta, who, meanwhile, had neglected nothing to prepare all the strength of the spirits and elements at his command, and Argalya found him ready for the trial. It begun! No combat as men with arms and engines of war, such as mortals invent to supply their limited strength—no! a fearful trial of powers which move and maintain the planet—a contest which threatened to dissolve the very bindings of the earth—to precipitate the whole into dreadful ruins, and reduce it to the dark chaos which it was before the beginning of all! The elements were in tumult; from the centre of the earth broke volcanic flames, peaks of mountains fell down, dams of oceans broke, floods inundated the countries, rocks burst by subterraneous fires, and the waters from the mountains lift their beds and precipitated themselves over fertile valleys, destroying every thing before them. Hurricanes uprooted the forests, and threw down all which opposed their rage; the poles trembled, the axis of the earth shivered, the clouds were in motion, discharging torrents, alone sufficient to cause destruction. The despairing race of men poured their lamentations up to the wild roaring firmament, but were destroyed in floods or in flames. At last the Eternal Ruler of All threw his thunderbolts. He precipitated Divaconta, with his spirits, into the immeasurable abyss, and Argalya sunk, stunned, into the cave of the Altai. Thus was that period of the world at an end. The face of the earth was created anew, the direction of its axis altered; the beams of the sun fell in different gradations; the poles froze—eternal snow and ice replaced fertile fields; animal species were extinct; new men and geniuses created; green savannahs changed into wide oceans; and on mountains, which have been islands, the astonished naturalist will find the petrified remains of animals now the inhabitants of lakes. Beneath those wide sheets of water, our present oceans, are buried empires and flourishing cities; the tall masted vessel sails unconsciously above the former abodes of men. And, finally, the new human race was far different from what it had been, of which again we find traces in the traditions of almost every nation.

* * * * * *

This is the history of times before the passed Milleniums, which, after his awakening in the first hours of dark and gloomy recollection, ran through Argalya's thoughts. All was re-awakened in his mind, and re-awakened with that strength of which immortal beings alone are susceptible, and with which they alone can conceive times passed and gone; his blissful youth, his love for Azora, her tenderness and pure affection, her anguish at their separation, but also his own wrongs, he remembered, and what evils he had been the author of when influenced by passion. Thus, with feelings of the deepest repentance, he sunk down before the Almighty, and invoked his forgiveness. The prayers of the immortal spirit reached the throne of the Deity, and the sacrifice of his repentant heart was not rejected.

Digitized by Google

A tranquillised feeling, a slight return of that heavenly calmness, which once had blessed him, began again to lighten his soul. He shook off the gloomy sadness which had weighed him down since he awoke in the Altai, and which every new object he saw had increased, but now only a calm feeling of sorrow remained. He lifted himself from the rock where his gloomy thoughts at first began, and where, finally, his prayer for forgiveness arose, and spreading his golden wings, he commenced his journey to examine the earth in its new formation, and to become acquainted with the human race, such as inhabit the present globe.

His flight was first directed towards the region where Abdallah's house had stood, where, for the first time, he had seen Azora in the never to be forgotten palm grove. None but the eyes of an immortal could, after thousands and thousands of years, have found out and recognized that spot. A wide sandy plain spread before his sight; no sea or lake,† as in former days, could he discover. On the treeless desart he observed tents, here and there, ingeniously composed of felt. A race of human beings, much smaller and less endowed with beauty than the natives of the former earth, but strong and brawny, led here a monadic life, and numerous herds (droves) of horses, the only property of these tribes, which afford them food, drink, and clothing, grazed around their dark abodes. Argalya sighed, and directed his flight slowly towards the setting sun. There new countries, extensive empires, which he had never beheld before, and a more congenial air recalled again sorrowful and still sweet reminiscences to his mind. Here again he beheld the graceful crown of palms, bending to the balmy breeze, and here sweet perfumes rose from orange and myrtle groves; on flowery turfs, in airy groves, he saw a race more approaching in beauty to the beings of a former age. Their mode of life was more congenial, more luxurious, and in harmony with the clime they enjoyed; magnificent palaces were their abodes, or the poorer earned in aromatic fields and evergreen woods an easy existence. But as much as this race surpassed that which he had left behind on the deserted plains, in beauty of body and mind, it was still far below those human beings among which Argalya had spent the days of his youth.

He floated onward in the same direction. Now the shore of an entirely new world lay beneath him; first he discerned a new ocean, and with astonishment he saw former mountains of a large continent, the shape and appearance whereof was still clear in his recollection, shew their heads above the waters of the Archipelagos, as larger and smaller islands,‖ fertile and flourishing, and inhabited by a cheerful and gay race of men. He flew farther and still farther towards the west, to the ever dear Atlantis, the place where he had deposited that treasure which he had valued far above existence itself. Now he floated above Europea's utmost point. Here also he saw formidable traces of his own and Divaconta's rage, and how all was torn and altered. The ocean flooded here between two worlds, and formed straits§ where once had been mountains. Argalya groaned, but still he proceeded, almost with fear and reluctance; no land, however, appeared to his far stretched vision. All around, as far as immortal eye could reach, nothing could now be discerned but the blue waves of the ocean, limited only by dipping skies.

Gloomy and sad, he was returning, when, near a far extended coast towards the south, he saw a group of small islands dispersed. Argalya learned their name, and the name of the ocean upon the surface of which they floated. Astonished and deeply affected, he found in empty sounds a secret recollection of his lost happiness. These islands¶ were the remainder of the Atlantis, which, unknown how, had preserved the name of Azora.

Weary, he let himself down here on a rock projecting into the ocean. Once more times that were gone went painfully through his mind. The image of Azora appeared upon the dark blue wave; she seemed to hold her arms imploringly towards him, she gazed at him with her beautiful gazelle eye, which so often had rested upon him in love and tenderness; now she pronounced his name with her sweet and mellow voice.

"Oh! where art thou?" he exclaimed, mournfully. "Buried in the waves of this ocean, which long ago have dissolved, annihilated every trace, every particle of thy dear remains!

"And the divine spark, which animated that lovely form, that exquisite tone of feeling, which, although restrained by outward impressions, by human errings, still was capable of understanding, of sympathising with mine?—that pure spirit which, even when still in its mortal abode, responded to mine, and, conceiving our eternal unison, elevated itself already here below, up to my own sphere. Thou canst not be annihilated! Thou must still exist! But where—where dost thou sojourn?—in which space, on what planet is now thy blessed abode?

"Alas! I feel the curse that weighs me down. Not as clear as formerly does the universe lay before my vision; that also is limited, and—justly so; I have deserved it!"

He sunk once more into gloomy thoughts of

† There can be little doubt that the Caspian Sea extended much farther to the east as well as to the west in former times, and communicated with the Black Sea. A dreadful revolution, probably of a volcanic nature, may have burst the rock dam, which connected Asia and Europe, and have formed the present Bosphorus. The Black got thus an outlet into the Ægean Sea, the mass of waters inundated the countries around, and tore the narrow earth-tongues asunder. In this mode the separation of Sicily from Italy, and of Europe from Africa, may be explained. This decreased, of course, the quantity of water in Asia, and salt meadows and sea shells evince the former existence of sea at a considerable distance from the Caspian Sea and Lake Arald, which both, as the lowest places of the country, continued to be filled with, as it will be recollected, salt water.

‖ The Grecian and Ionian Islands of the present day.
§ The Straits of Gibraltar.
¶ The Azoric Islands.

Digitized by Google

remorse. Days, months and years passed again unheeded by him. Deep and sorrowful repentance, before Him he had offended, was the only relief, the only hope he had left.

* * * * * *

The eastern as well as the western coast of the Caspian Sea, is inhabited by pious Parses, adorers of the fire and of the holy and eternal light, the empire of which they believe to promote and increase by every charitable action, if it is only the taking care of an animal, or nursing of a delicate plant.* Such deeds, no matter however trifling they may appear, the Parses consider as pleasing to Ormuzd, who is, according to their faith, the supreme source of light. Their only object is, to increase and extend his power, and to abolish, or, at least, restrict that of Ahriman, the ruler of darkness and evil. The life and habits of this sect are pure and moral in the extreme, and, on that account, their rites have always been tolerated, and even treated with respect, by the most fanatic Moslemi which surround them.

On the west coast of the same sea, in the centre of a number of pits or wells, containing the purest naptia,† the town Bacu is situated. The soil around in its immediate vicinity appears to consist of nothing but inflammable materials. Wherever a hole is dug, flames always rise. At one place a perpetual fire, of a beautiful clear colour is seen, and around this the Parses kneel in pious devotion, adoring the pure element as the image of all that is good and virtuous, and feel inexpressibly happy by the conviction of being in the immediate vicinity of the power they adore and believe in.

Amongst them, Hashdad was one of the wisest and best. Old in years, he had all his life-time been a zealous promoter of the reign of light by his deeds, always marked by benevolence and charity. In his younger days he had travelled much and far, had investigated the doctrines of the wisest men, and made himself familiar with the history and religious rites of most eastern nations. Rich in knowledge, and richer still in virtues, he returned to the land of his fathers. His life was a chain of good actions; and a blessing to those that surrounded him; but, alas! it was not a happy one to himself. A beloved wife had shared his tranquil existence. The tempest which laid waste his country, when an ambitious conqueror overwhelmed it with a superior force, subjecting and destroying provinces to which he had no righteous claim, annihilated at the same time the tranquil happiness of Hashdad. He had one night to fly from the dwelling of his father, as the only way of saving his beloved partner and a lovely and only child from the blind rage of those savage warriors, and had soon after, in a foreign soil, to bury the remains of his cherished companion, whose delicate frame, yielding to the hardships of their sudden flight, left him disconsolate with his helpless daughter. Time, and doing good to all around, did not heal the wounds of his heart, but greatly relieved his anguish; and after the fury of the war was over, and the cruel conqueror had been extinguished like a sudden meteor, Hashdad returned to his country with his darling Sindiah, and selected, instead of the place where his former dwelling had stood, Bacu for his future abode. His days passed here in tranquil practice of piety and benevolence, the education of Sindiah, whose beauty and sweetness recalled to his mind that beloved being which he too early had lost, forming the sad recreation of his existence.

Sindiah was not brought up like other females in the Orient, to make a pretty toy for her future lord and husband. Hashdad had implanted doctrines of the most elevated and purest virtue into her infant heart, directed her feelings, and cultivated her understanding, and still neglected none of those minor, but more pleasing, accomplishments, which would render her an amiable companion to an equally noble-minded husband.

A pleasant hill, near their dwelling, on the top of which some splendid palm trees shaded a piece of rock, formed by nature into a commodious seat, was the place where Hashdad spent his evenings with his daughter, and instilled into her mind those sentiments which elevated her far above the rest of her sex. When the wide sea spread before their eyes in solemn calmness, and now and then the voice of a pious Parse, in tunes of praise, sounded through the tranquil air, or a grateful fire of sacrifice, kindled at the inexhaustible naptia wells, illuminated the dark sky by its ætherial light, then the pious father would unveil to the eyes of his daughter the world that had been—would tell her of ages long past, how differently the youthful earth had once been formed, how perpetual spring had prevailed everywhere, and that the virtuous human race, then inhabiting it, had often been found worthy of an immediate intercourse with beings of a higher description. Sindiah hung enraptured on the words of her father; her bosom swelled with inexpressible feelings; she sought most ardently to learn more, and endeavoured, by her questions, to obtain explanations, which Hashdad felt unable to communicate. All positive information he could give her, consisted in those indisputable evidences of immense revolutions the planet had undergone, and which he, for a great part, had examined himself, such as sea-shells and conchyles found now in a state of petrifaction on the peaks of the highest mountains, bones of immense animals, no longer existing, petrifactions of plants, the natives of the mildest climes, and now found beneath eternal ice.

Sindiah listened with profound attention to these relations, and the more intensely she listened, the more did they take possession of her imagination. None of the females she was in the habit of holding intercourse with, was able to

*According to Zoroaster's doctrine, Ormuzd is the principle of Good, or Light; Ahriman, that of Evil, or Darkness. They are in a perpetual war against each other; but, after a certain period, Ormuzd is to vanquish Ahriman, and nothing but light, truth and virtue is to reign on earth. This doctrine is, perhaps, one of the most sublime and, amongst its believers, most productive of moral and pure habits, of all which the Orient has produced.

†Near Bacu, on the Caspian Sea, the soil is, according to the reports of travellers, entirely saturated with naptia, which everywhere is easily lighted, and at one spot particularly produces a constant and beautiful flame.

Digitized by Google

comprehend and enter into her elevated thoughts, and she, therefore, retired from their society. None of the young men who approached the beautiful daughter of the wealthy Hashdad, with hopes of gaining her affection, answered the sublime idea which her imagination had formed, and they were consequently dismissed. Since those relations of her father, she continued, with the ardour of a youthful and the sublimity of a pure mind, to muse upon and finish those airy dreams, as she herself in more composed and cooler hours had to call them. But still her heart would continue to look up to higher regions for that which earth seemed to deny her. A divine ideal would constantly float before her, would fill her with trembling delight; she would bend before it with adoration, and at the same time press it to her palpitating heart in ecstacy of love. "Alas!" she would often sigh, "why did Ormuzd not give me existence in that happy age? an Amshaspand, or Ized,† might then have read my heart, and found me worthy of his affection!"

More distinct and clear became these visions to her soul. From the narratives of her father, and distinct dreams which revealed themselves to her mind, she composed in a short time, as she fancied, a tale of that annihilated world, which had so long occupied her thoughts. First, like dark reminiscences which revive in our minds, then clearer details unfolded themselves to her ideas. Not only the rough composition but the colouring and finishing of the picture engaged, irresistibly, her imagination, and thus the history of a Genius, who loved a mortal woman, the history of Argalya and Azora, as our former pages have attempted to represent it, came into existence, the production, the child, of Sindiah's imagination, to which she clung with passionate ardour, which she carefully transcribed on palm leaves, concealed from every unhallowed eye. In Azora's love for the sublime Argalya, she painted her own sentiments; equally as happy as Azora would she have been by the affection of a superior being; as tenderly attached, existing in the beloved object only, would she have felt, if it had pleased Ormuzd to let her live in that age of the blooming earth.

She felt inexpressibly blessed by these dreams and visions, and became more and more a stranger to the world around her. A deep rooted languor gained ascendancy over her mind, and with ardent wishes she looked for a more elevated, pure state of existence, for a fulfillment of her presentiments, which she could only hope to enjoy in a brighter and better world.

Her father observed the alteration in his daughter. He inquired fondly and earnestly into the cause; after some hesitation, with blushes and reluctance, she confessed her cherished visions. Hashdad was astonished; he did not know whether to pity or to blame his daughter. With all the arguments of matured wisdom, he contested against these airy images, and did all to convince her of the danger of such visions. Sindiah acknowledged the truth of his arguments; she promised to restrain her imagination, and exerted herself to keep her promise, but, alas! in vain. Argalya's heavenly image would not leave her; awake and in her dreams it stood before her; she would read the expression of the deepest love in his sublime features—nay, she would even think she heard his voice, pronouncing, in celestial harmony, her own name, and her languor increased instead of abating.

With anxious solicitude, Hashdad beheld the state of his daughter's mind. His fondness impelled to adopt, as he thought, the best method to reduce her mind to a more healthy tone. Dispersions in a pleasing reality, he hoped would prove the most efficacious remedy against an imagination too highly excited. He therefore increased her domestic occupations; he opened his house to strangers, and endeavoured to make her acquainted with men not unworthy of her conversation and esteem. Sindiah did all her fond parent could wish; she fulfilled her domestic duties with cheerfulness and exactitude; she made the most amiable hostess, because it gave pleasure to her father; but the nearer she approached beings of this world, the more satiated did she become with "an every day's life," the more did she perceive the vast contrast between that and the splendid image her imagination was incessantly haunted with.

In this manner time passed under fruitless trials and attempts. Sindiah's bloom began to fade; her languishing for something beyond this world, became more violent, and the exertions she made to conceal her feelings from her father, consumed her strength entirely. One evening, after their visitors had retired in unusual good spirits and gaiety, Sindiah, delighted to feel herself at liberty, took her lute and went to her beloved hill, to enjoy her own meditations.

She reposed on the rock; the moon scattered her silver beams through the large palm leaves, which were softly moved by a refreshing evening breeze. It was so calm, so beautiful around her! and solitude contributed so much to her happiness, particularly after an indifferent and still hurtful reality in which, for several days, she had been compelled to exist; she could not deny herself the consolation of seeking refuge with her invisible aerial companions, and of collecting closer around her those beautiful shadows which so often consoling and elevating floated before her inward eye. Clearer and more resplendent did she now behold them; tears filled her beautiful dark eyes, and at length she thus gave vent to her feelings:

"The night is calm; all nature is at rest. Welcome thrice, sacred tranquillity; delightful solitude, I woo thee! In thee my heart expands, and I feel far distant from the turmoil of an unfeeling crowd.

"What is yon noisy world to me? That happiness she has to offer, can yield no joys to me—what she has to bestow, I do not covet; but in my own visionary heart I feel a bliss above all reality!

"That felicity I cannot communicate to others, but when I am solitary and alone, it appears

†The Amshaspands are, according to Zoroaster's doctrines, the seven principal spirits in Ormuzd's empire; they are his assistants and companions. Izeds are spirits of the second class, and their number is not limited.

Digitized by Google

clear and resplendent before my longing eyes. Then, then I feel happy! I am with thee! I behold thee—thou speakest to me, and pure delight gives me thy heavenly voice!

"Oh, thou immortal being of light! hast thou never existed here? has my terrestrial eye never beheld thee? Can it be that thou shouldst only be a light vision, vanishing like the vapours of yon eternal flames?

"When languor painfully affects me, then my heart beats wistfully towards thee, and is restored to calmness again only through thee; then can I believe that thou had'st never been—that thy apparition is my imagination's mere play?

"Oh no! thou art no dream! Such love as my heart feels, is no void hope or vision! Wherever thy abode may be, near or distant, in what heaven, what planet, thou see'st me—thou knowest my longing mind!

"Oh! descend from thy height. Let me but once, only one single moment, behold thee in thy soft and celestial beauty! And should I cease to breathe, for that happiness would I joyfully quit this world, and follow thee to yon heavenly groves!"

Sindiah was silent; tears stopped her voice, when all at once she heard sounds like distant but delicious music; they were heavenly notes, which soon calmed the anguish that throbbed in her breast. Surprised, she rose, listening; she looked around to discover from whence those melodious tones proceeded. She could see nothing; all was tranquil and solitary; the moon shone bright, and over the green fields beneath her, which extended down to the sandy beach, floated a silver-greyish mist, and enveloped the beautiful scenery in a transparent veil. Suddenly the sea breeze seemed to increase, the mist became intenser, and through it Sindiah thought she saw something like lightning. Her whole frame throbbed, and an irresistible power attracted, even spell-bound, her looks upon the most impenetrable part of the mist. A sudden gust seemed then suddenly to divide it; it evaporated on both sides, and———an Immortal stood before her, in aetherial beauty. She gazed at him, and "Argalya!" she exclaimed, sinking senseless at his feet. When she recovered, the resplendent apparition stood still before her, his eyes resting upon her, beaming pure affection and celestial love. At length she found words for the expression of her sentiments, and exclaimed,

"Can it be? Does the being I dreamed of, asleep and awake—does it exist?"

"It does exist, and loves thee as in former ages!" answered a voice, the melody of which re-echoed in Sindiah's very heart. "Sindiah! Asura! dost thou not recognize the friend of thy first terrestrial existence?"

Sindiah looked astonished at the heavenly youth. She felt as if slumbering recollections awoke in her, as if she really had beheld those features before—had listened to the sound of that voice. Her heart palpitated almost to bursting—a delightful feeling seemed to solve the ties of life. Argalya's eyes continued to rest on her with inexpressible tenderness.

"At last," he said, "at last I have found thee again! Remember thy earlier existence; thou art not the first time here below. Thy pure spirit has, thousands of years ago, animated an equally beauteous form; then thou wast called Azora, and wast mine—mine, as I presumptuously thought, for eternity. Hatred from abroad, and my own errings, tore me from thee. But the events of that age, and the causes which parted us, are in thy recollection, only thou mistookest thy true reminiscences of a former existence for dreams and delusions of thy imagination. When I awoke from my death-like sleep, to which the just resentment of the Eternal had condemned me, I found myself a stranger on this globe, my power limited, the human race sunk, weak, and incapable of an immediate intercourse with beings of a higher nature. And where—where should I find thee? Thy first mortal form had been annihilated by the same flood which engulphed that peaceful island, the place of thy refuge. Where should I search for thee?—thee, for whose sake I willingly would have resigned my power, and, in a mortal form, have shared the lot of the poor beings of dust. More than a century has passed since I awoke. Deep remorse, and the loss of thee, made immortality a burden. The Ruler of us all looked down upon my contrition at last, and forgave; I felt a kind of tranquillity and calmness again. Conscious that the souls of human beings repeatedly returned to the earth until they, through various trials, had attained that degree of purity which qualifies them to be received into the abodes of eternal light. I knew, too, that dark recollections of their former state would remain, and that the better and purer spirits who, during their earlier existence, had enjoyed an intercourse with higher beings, would preserve, in elevated ideals of perfection which ever float before their minds, an eternal reminiscence of their first and earliest ties; that it was them, who never could be satisfied in the reality of this existence, who always look in vain for that happiness they once partook, and search in vain among the vicious human race for the superior being which they once loved, and which continues to hold possession of their minds. Thus I hoped. I tried at least to find thee. I went from country to country, from place to place. Thousands and millions of mortal maidens have I seen; I was often, for one short moment, deceived by some similarity in external appearance, by the expression of some nobler mind than common, and elevated sentiments; however, the illusion lasted but a moment! Too soon I perceived my error; and, after a long search, I begun to doubt if thy soul still inhabited this planet, or, perhaps, not requiring any purification,‖ it had taken its flight, long since, to the regions of light. An irresistible power drew me towards the east; there, a secret voice whispered to me, there, where once my happiness has budded, thou may'st find it again. I came here, and seeing thee, Sindiah,

‖ It is believed, among several sects in the Orient, that the human souls repeatedly return to the earth after death, until they, through various changes of the body, at last have received that degree of purity which is required for a state of eternal blessedness, or re-union with the Deity from which they are believed to have issued.

Digitized by Google

I found the treasure I had mourned for. I floated around thee, and found it easy to re-awaken in thy pure mind recollections of thy former state. My image revealed itself before thy inward eye; thou did'st love me again without the least presentiment that thou had'st given me thy affection in former days. Thou thought'st that a web of thy imagination, which was nothing but a repetition of real events and occurrences; thou fancied thou wast telling a dream when representing thy own and my history, together with that of this planet as it has been. Thy languor increased, reality lost all its attraction for thee, Azora. Fate is reconciled! The Eternal has restored thee to me! I am permitted to call thee mine forever; if——thou will it!"

Argalya ceased speaking, but his eyes continued to rest upon Sindiah, with the expression of the utmost affection and tenderness, who, lost in happiness, at last felt a perfect consciousness and recollection of her former existence.

"If I will it!" she exclaimed, at last, and tears of delight filled her eyes. "How can'st thou ask, thou my protecting genius, ruler of my destiny!"

"Azora," Argalya again began, and a gloomy cloud replaced the heavenly serenity on his countenance, "it is not now as in former ages. Neither I nor the other spirits who still invisibly inhabit this globe in common with you, can now approach you, as in yon happy days of innocence and guiltlessness. The degenerate race, debased by the grossest vices and evil passions, is not qualified any longer for an immediate intercourse with the world of spirits; in a scarcely perceptible mode is it now only in our power to influence your destiny: we can now only reveal ourselves to a few chosen ones, and can no more assume the form of mortals, which now must sully and degrade the purity and nature of spirits. At present, my Azora, there is but one tie which can unite us, but one path which leads to the world of immortal spirits, and wilt thou not tremble when I name that path?"

He again was silent.

"I understand thee, my beloved," Sindiah replied; "I should not be worthy of thy affection if I did not comprehend, perceive the road to which thou pointest—if I could, for one moment, hesitate to follow it! Guide me then—take me where and how thou wilt."

At these words she extended her arms towards him, and would have taken his hand, but the figure of air and light withdrew from her touch. Looking at her with a sweet sadness, Argalya whispered to her, in a scarcely audible but indescribably harmonious voice, "Not thus, my Azora; only beyond this existence can I reach thee my hand: here below our union is impossible!"

"Oh! then dissolve those ties which separate us!" she exclaimed; "break asunder the bars which confine me to this earthly existence. I feel the revolution which the sight of thee has produced in my soul! Who could endure mortal life after such a moment? Oh!! I implore thee! take me hence, and——give consolation to my father."

"Come, come then to me, my Azora! be mine for ever and ever!" exclaimed the genius, and superhuman delight beamed from his eyes.

At this moment celestial harmony sounded again, but now it seemed not to proceed from one place—from all around it came—from the skies above, from the rocks, trees, and plants below; every leaf whispered sweet melodies; their strains sounded stronger and fuller, more and more powerful; those notes penetrated into Azora's very life; they dissolved it into——tones. She felt the painful, but still sweet power which drew her pure spirit from its abode of clay. Argalya floated before her with increased brilliancy and splendour, the same as he once appeared before her in the palm grove. The stronger he shone, the more powerful did the celestial strains of harmony sound through the air, and the easier did her spirit leave its mortal form. At last! at last it was free, and golden beams of the early morning sun carried it to the abodes of eternal light, where Argalya awaited its arrival. The purest spirits were now united and became one for eternity.

DREAMS OF THEE.

Midnight!—the stars are bright,
And the pale moon shines coldly pure in heaven,
And the thin vapoury clouds, tinged by her light,
Like passing thoughts across her face are driven.
Midnight! the hour for rest—
The time, the dearest of all times to me,
When cometh slumber o'er my fevered breast,
And I can dream—ey, fondly dream of thee.

Yes—it is all of joy
Left to my blighted heart and burning brain—
The one pure pleasure that can never cloy—
The rainbow that my clouds of life sustain.
I wander all the day,
Like something scarcely of reality,
Careless of what I do or what I say,
And looking forward to my dreams of thee.

Ay—nought but dreams are mine:
I touch thy living hand but dare not press it;
I gaze upon that deep blue eye of thine,
And my heart longs—my lips refuse to bless it.
'Tis only in my sleep
I look upon thee firm, my heart quakes free,
And pour in burning words my passion deep:
I would not lose for worlds my dreams of thee.

The day and night seem changed:
I think of trees, and flowers, and falling streams,
As things from which my spirit is estranged;
As once in happier years, I thought of dreams.
My visions, like intense
And vivid truths, my slumbering eye can see;
And when a trance is on each outward sense,
My soul awakens in its dreams of thee.

And various are the forms
My thoughts assume in that deep solemn hour:
Sometimes thou look'st on me in clouds and storms,
And sometimes as a soft and gentle power.
But be they as they will,
Thou the one fond idea still must be—
Like sun-light over changeful clouds, thou still Art light and glory in my dreams of thee.

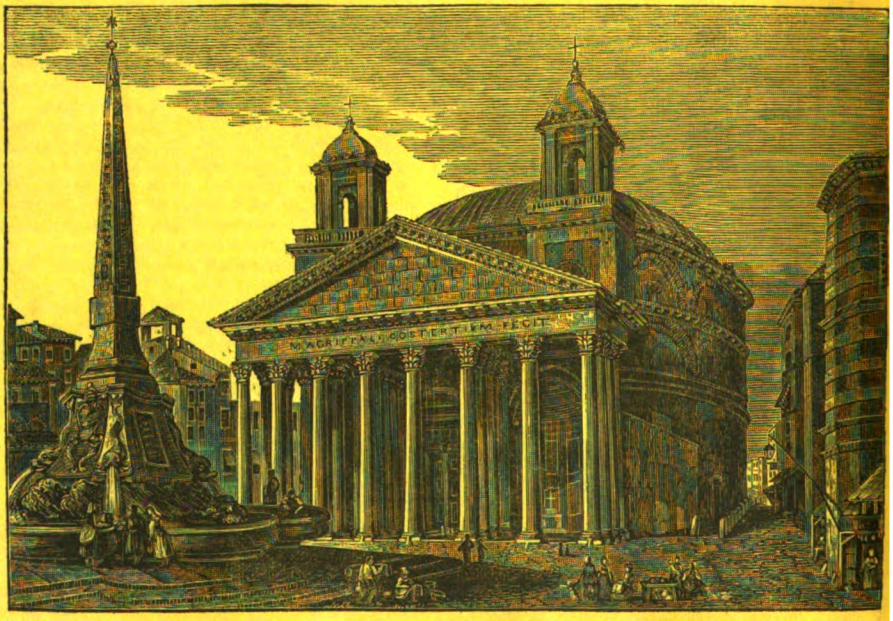
Then let me still dream on,
And in the realms of fantasy be blest,
And feel at morn, when the enchantment's gone,
'Tis my excited spirits turn to rest.
And when the slumber deep
Of death at last is falling upon me,
I'll only mourn because a dreamless sleep
It is, and I shall cease to dream of thee!

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

City of Oporto, Portugal.



Pantheon, Rome.

Digitized by Google

PANTHEON AT ROME.

The engraving on the opposite page is a view of the celebrated Pantheon at Rome, built on the campus Martius, by Agrippa, the favourite of Augustus. It was consecrated by Pope Boniface in 607, to the Virgin Mary and all the martyrs; hence it is still called St. Maria ad Martyres. It is still more commonly called the rotunda, on account of its form. It is justly considered one of the finest edifices of Rome, and the artist has succeeded in conveying an excellent idea of its beautiful proportions. The roof is of stone, and vaulted, and through a large opening in the centre of the roof, the whole of the vast interior is lighted. The portico, which is in an excellent state of preservation, seems to have been erected at a period later than the temple itself. It consists of sixteen columns of oriental granite, each of which is fifteen feet in circumference. The interior was formerly adorned with the most beautiful statues of the various deities, of which the best were carried to Constantinople by Constantine. At present there are in the eight niches, eight fine columns, placed there by the Emperor Adrian. The height of the temple is one hundred and thirty-seven feet, and the width the same. The diameter of the opening in the cupola is twenty-seven feet. The floor is paved with porphyry. The whole edifice has suffered much from the emperors, the barbarians and the popes. This building should not be confounded with a smaller Pantheon of the Minerva Medica.

THE CITY OF OPORTO, PORTUGAL.

During the present contention in Portugal between the brothers Don Pedro and Don Miguel, a view of Oporto, one of the principal cities of the Kingdom, cannot but prove interesting. Oporto is a place of great commercial, as well as political consideration. Its situation is one of great natural beauty. It is the largest city in Portugal, Lisbon excepted, and is said to have been founded about A. D. 417 by the Suevi. The city occupies the north bank of the Douro, (anciently Durius,) about five miles from the mouth of the river, and the Atlantic Ocean. The approach from thence to Oporto is remarkably beautiful. The dangers of the bar, across the mouth of the river, once passed, a succession of interesting objects present themselves on both sides, as we ascend towards the city. The little town of St. Joao da Foz stands on the north bank, close to the sea, and is the favourite resort of the wealthier inhabitants of Oporto during the violent heat of the summer. The river immediately within the bar, expands into the appearance of a lake. A little higher up it is narrowed by two abrupt hills. That on the right terminates in a precipice of bright hard sandstone, descending so steeply to the water's edge, that but lately a road has been made from Oporto along the bank of the river, to St. Joao da Foz, by blasting and hewing down a sufficient portion of the rock. This height, from its precipitous sides, is called the Monte d'Arabida, and forms the western boundary of a lovely valley, opening upon the Douro, covered with the Quintas, or villas, of the wealthier inhabitants of the adjoining city. Most of the Quintas at the mouth of the river command delightful prospects of the Atlantic Ocean, and the splendid effects produced on these scenes at sunset, in this glowing climate, are almost indescribable. Some idea of its beauty may be formed by reference to Colonel Batty's view from this point. The appearance of the Douro, with its numerous shipping, and the variety of interesting objects scattered on its cheerful banks, render this one of the most pleasing scenes in the circle of Oporto.

To economize time and space we must quit this enchanting spot. Gondolas, like those at Venice, are used on the river, but will not suffice for our celerity. We must reach at once the point of our Engraving. The view is taken from Villa Nova, an important suburb of Oporto, on the opposite bank of the river. The city may be divided into the high and the low town. It contains, in a civil sense, five wards, or bairros, of which the Sé, or cathedral hill, and the Vittoria, or height opposite to the Sé, (and crowned by a church, which was founded in commemoration of a celebrated battle fought on the spot with the Moors, which terminated in their defeat and expulsion from the place,) form the town properly called Oporto; and it is possible still to trace the remains of the old wall, which formerly surrounded and defended the place. The three other quarters, San Idelfonzo, Miragaya, and Villa Nova, are open. The latter is connected with the principal town by a bridge of boats, which is so badly constructed as to be scarcely able to sustain the violent power of the river when swelled by winter torrents. The Douro, like the Rhine and the Rhone, and all other rivers which flow through a rocky and often confined channel, commits at certain seasons the greatest ravages; and property to a considerable amount is annually lost at Oporto, by the irresistible force with which the river pours down and carries every thing before it. A bridge of granite has been long talked of to connect Villa Nova and Oporto, but the funds are not yet forthcoming, and the expense will be considerable.

The engraving represents the most ancient part of the city of Oporto. We are here directly fronting the bishop's palace, which, with the Sé, or Cathedral, and buildings, to the left, occupy the crest of the hill. Further left is the steeple of the church dos Clerigos, said to be the loftiest in Portugal after that of Mafra. This tower is visible from the sea at a distance of ten leagues, and serves as an important landmark for ships steering to the mouth of the Douro. It was erected in the year 1748, and is built entirely of the finest masonry, an art in which the Portuguese are almost unrivalled. On the summit of the hill to the right, touching the old walls and towers, is the convent of Santa Clara. Immediately below the Cathedral, the rocky steep has been cut into terraces, and laid out in gardens. The river is bordered by the old city wall. A noble street, the Rua Nova de St. Joao, is seen opening upon the quay on the left. Part of the bridge of boats appears on the right: it was first constructed in the year 1806, destroyed in 1809, but re-established in 1815. It was the scene of dreadful slaughter at the time the city was given up to pillage by the French. Some of the boats forming it had been destroyed, and many of the wretched inhabitants crowding to the bridge, in hopes of escaping from the enemy's sword, were urged on by the affrighted multitude into the rapid stream, and thus perished. On the river, to the right and left, is seen a Portuguese coasting vessel, called Hyate; in the centre is a wine-boat of the Douro, with a raised platform for the steersman. The foreground of the view is the shore of Villa Nova, adjoining the quay. The chief article of export is wine; and here is the grand depôt for this commodity, which is stowed in long, low buildings, called lodges.

Digitized by Google

"On the quays," says Mr. Kinsey, "are seen fine blocks of granite, already converted into form, having their edges cased with wood, ready to be shipped off for buildings in Brazil, where it appears that no good stone, or, at least, so durable as this, can be procured; pipe-staves from Memel, flax and iron, and occasionally coals from the north of England. There are generally at anchor in the river between Villa Nova and Oporto, Russian, Brazilian, English, American, Dutch, Danish, and some French vessels: but many of the latter nation are not to be found in the Portuguese ports. Two thirds of the shipping to be seen in the Douro, are British, Brazilian, or Portuguese."

The gardens of the city are luxuriantly stored. Brazilian plants, easily distinguished by their gaudy colours, vines on trellis, superb lemon-trees, lime and orange trees, pear, apple and plum trees, and Alpine strawberries are in abundance. The Indian cane, with its splendid blossom, whose colour resembles that of the Guernsey, or rather the Chinese lily, is a gay addition to the ornaments of this earthly paradise. Mr. Kinsey says, "The ulmis adjungere vitem is well known in poetical description, but in Portugal, besides overshadowing their artificial supporters, the vines are seen attaching themselves to, or hanging down in luxuriant festoons from forest trees, such as the oak, chesnut, and cork, in all the wildness of nature, and not unfrequently insinuating themselves among the branches of myrtle trees, which attain a considerable size in the hedge-rows, and contrasting their large purple bunches with the snow white blossom. The union is truly poetical, and its novelty is charming to the eye of a northern traveller. A vine is often purposely planted by the farmer under an oak-tree, whose boughs it soon overruns, repaying the little labour expended in its cultivation by its fruit, and the lop of its branches. Ten pipes of green wine, vinho verde, expressed from these grapes, will yield one pipe of excellent brandy. Being light and sharp, the vinho verde is preferred by the generality of Portuguese in the summer, to wines of superior strength and quality."

The population of Oporto and Villa Nova was stated by Colonel Batty in 1830, to amount to about 80,000 inhabitants.

He who is accustomed to commune with himself in retirement, will, sometimes at least, be impressed with the truths which the multitude will not tell him.

Written for the Casket.

TO MISS ——.

I knew her when the dawning years
Of childhood deck'd her circling brow,
When like the rose just budding forth,
Her charms were but a promised show:—
Her image waxed both bright and fair,
As days and months roll'd ceaseless on,
Her heart was buoyant as the air—
And radiant as the morning sun.

I knew her when in youth's bright morn,
A flowret still more fair she grew—
The rose-bud sipp'd the noonday rays,
And burst her hidden charms to view;
'Twas then this sweet retiring maid
First glanced upon the passing swain;
And oft within the silent shade
She sighed to join the social train.

I knew her when in riper years,
Her form disclosed a model rare;
And when she smiled—her looks so sweet—
The graces joyed to revel there;
Her brilliant eyes, like twinkling stars,
Would shed abroad each speaking glance,
Her ebon locks, unloosed their stays—
Would o'er her polished forehead dance.

Her mouth, whose gently pouting lips
Caught every youth's admiring gaze,
Was but excell'd by blushing cheeks
That far outshone sol's evening rays;—
Her beauteuos form, and graceful mien,
Has captured many a feeling heart;
And he that meets her fond embrace,
Is sure to feel a cupid's dart.

ALONZO.

THE WINDS.

Give me a voice like yours, ye winds, to woo
The virgin flowers, with Spring's unwritten song:
Or mourn o'er buried loveliness, as through
The prison bars of night ye sweep along;
Or where ye, in your vengeance, stoop to strew
Earth with your wrecks, to mingle with the throng
Of spirits who lift up their shout of joy,
And glory in your license to destroy!

I envy you your freedom. I would trip
Over the mountain swifter than the night,
I would go forth with every dawn, to sip
Dews from their morning refuge, ere their flight.
I would rest on the unconscious maiden's lip,
And who should spurn the arrogated right?
Or press the ringlets of the coyest fair,
Whose cheek would burn to know that I was there.

I envy you your fleetness. I would see
Once more, the world at old Wachuset's feet,
As in youth's first unwasted ecstacy,
I look'd in wonder, from your rocky seat,
On all my native hills, broad, green, and free,
And I would break to waves the silvery sheet,
Whose waters bore me, ere I learn'd the strife
Which troubles all the waters of my life.

But ye are spirits; and a mortal's sigh
Ye cannot answer. I must linger on Till time gives me a home with you on high
And all the chains which bind me here are gone.
Yet would I tempt and importune reply—
Not in the tones of earth, but in that ONE
Which answers to my yearnings: in the speech
That spirits know, and only spirits teach.

Digitized by Google

From the New England Magazine.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MATHEW CAREY.

LETTER II.

When I determined on emigration, I hesitated between New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and was finally led to prefer Philadelphia, because I had lately received a parcel of papers from this city, among others the Pennsylvania Packet of June 10, 1784, and Bradford's Weekly Advertiser, of about the same date, which contained an account of the proceedings of the House of Commons against me. In Philadelphia, therefore, my case was known; and of course the oppression I had undergone, I was led to conclude, would probably make me friends there.

In sailing up the river Delaware, the America, which was under the care of a drunken Pilot, ran aground on the Brandywine shoals, and was in imminent danger—but after a long struggle, was finally got off, by the aid of a number of hardy passengers, and half a dozen sailors belonging to a vessel bound for Jamaica, which had been wrecked at sea. They were taken off the wreck by a Philadelphia vessel, bound for London, which we met, and which removed them to the America.

As this vessel was a clipper, very sharp built, and aground at high water, there was a great alarm among the passengers, who were bewailing their hard fate, to be in such imminent danger, after a safe passage of three thousand miles. Men six feet high displayed the utmost consternation, and actually shed tears. Trunks and boxes were opened to secure money, and trinkets, and other valuable articles which were in a small compass, and could be carried about the person. The alarm was greatly increased by the frantic conduct of the pilot, who lost his self-possession, and ran about distracted.

Behold me now landed in Philadelphia, with about a dozen guineas in my pocket, without relation, or friend, and even without an acquaintance, except my compagnons de voyage, of whom very few were eligible associates.

While I was contemplating a removal into the country, where I could have boarded at about a dollar or a dollar and a quarter a week, intending to await the arrival of my funds, a most extraordinary and unlooked-for circumstance occurred, which changed my purpose, gave a new direction to my views, and, in some degree, coloured the course of my future life. It reflects great credit on the Marquess de La Fayette, who was then at Mount Vernon, to take leave of General Washington. A young gentleman of the name of Wallace, a fellow passenger of mine, had brought a letter of recommendation to the General; and having gone to his seat to deliver them, fell into the Marquess's company, and in the course of conversation, affairs of Ireland came on the tapis. The Marquess, who had, in the Philadelphia papers, seen an account of my adventures with the Parliament, and the prosecution I had undergone, enquired of Wallace, what had become of the poor persecuted Dublin printer?—He replied, "he came passenger with me, and is now in Philadelphia," stating the boarding house where I had pitched my tent. On the arrival of the Marquess in this city, he sent me a billet, requesting to see me at his lodgings, whither I went. He received me with great kindness; condoled with me on the persecution I had undergone; enquired into my prospects; and having told him that I proposed, on receipt of my funds, to set up a newspaper, he approved the idea, and promised to recommend me to his friends, Robert Morris, Thomas Fitzsimmons, &c. &c. After half an hour's conversation, we parted. Next morning, while I was at breakfast, a letter from him was handed me, which, to my very great surprise, contained four one hundred dollar notes of the Bank of North America. This was the more extraordinary and liberal, as not a word had passed between us on the subject of giving or receiving, borrowing or lending money. And a remarkable feature in the affair was, that the letter did not contain a word of reference to the enclosure.

In the course of the day I went to his lodging, and found that he had, an hour or two previously, departed for Princeton, where Congress then sat, having been in some measure driven from Philadelphia, by a mutiny among the soldiers, who were clamorous for their pay, and had kept them in a state of siege for three hours in the State House. I wrote to him to New York, whither, I understood, he had gone from Princeton, expressive of my gratitude in the strongest terms, and received a very kind and friendly answer.

I cannot pass over this noble trait in the character of the illustrious Marquess without urging it strongly on the overgrown wealthy of our country, as an example worthy of imitation. Here was a foreign nobleman, who had devoted years of the prime of his life, and greatly impaired his fortune, in the service of a country, separated by thousands of miles distant from his native land. After these mighty sacrifices, he meets, by an extraordinary accident, with a poor persecuted young man, destitute of friends and protectors—his heart expanded towards him—he freely gives him means of making a living without the most remote expectation of return, or of ever again seeing the object of his bounty. He withdraws from the city to avoid the expression of gratitude of the beneficiary. I have more than once assumed and I now repeat, that I doubt whether in the whole life of this (I had almost said) unparalleled man, there is to be found anything, which, all circumstances of the case considered, more highly elevates his character.*

I immediately issued proposals for printing the Pennsylvania Herald, which was extremely imprudent, as I was so utterly unacquainted with the temper and manners of the people. In a word, I was as destitute of some of the most important qualifications requisite to carry on a paper in Philadelphia, as I had been in Dublin, when I there commenced the Volunteer's Journal. I ought at once to have gone to work as a journeyman printer, and deferred entering into business on my own account for a year or two, until I had become acquainted with the country and those among whom my lot was cast. But foolish pride prevented me from taking this rational course, which I have often since had occasion to regret.

I soon supplied myself with types, but had no press. A Scotch bookseller and printer, of the name of Bell, had recently died in Philadelphia, and his stock, in which there was a press, was to be sold at auction about this time. As the press was very old, and very much impaired in usefulness, I expected to have it a bargain. But Colonel Oswald, who printed the Inde-

*It is due to myself to state, that though this was in every sense of the word a gift, I regarded it as a loan, payable to the Marquess's countrymen, according to the exalted sentiments of Dr. Franklin, who, when he presented a bill for ten pounds to the Rev. Mr. Nixon, an Irish Clergymen, (who was in distress in Paris, and wanted to migrate to America,) told him to pay the sum to any Americans whom he might find in distress, and thus "let good offices go round." I fully paid the debt to Frenchmen in distress—consigned one or two hogsheads of tobacco to the Marquess, (I believe it was two, but am uncertain,) and, moreover, when in 1824, he reached this country, with shattered fortunes, sent him to New York, a check for the full sum of four hundred dollars, which he retained till he reached Philadelphia, and was very reluctant to use, and finally consented only at my earnest instance.

Digitized by Google

pendent Gazetteer, and who viewed my operations with a jealous eye, commenced that hostility, which, ultimately, as will appear in the sequel, nearly cost me my life. He bid against me; and as I had absurdly fixed on a day for publication which was so near that I had not time to procure a new press, he continued bidding till he raised the price to about £50 currency, or 133 dollars, being one third of my whole fortune, and about the price of a new press.

My expectations of a remittance of the sum due me by my brother, were almost entirely disappointed. Of the amount I received but fifty pounds. The Volunteer's Journal finally perished, partly by the persecution of my brother, but chiefly by means of a paper set up under the auspices of government, with a similar title, which drew off a portion of the sale of the original paper, and most of the advertising custom.

At length I issued the first number of the Pennsylvania Herald on the 25th of January, 1785, which "dragged its slow length along" with slender hopes of success. On the 25th of March, same year, I took Mr. William Spotswood and C. Talbot into partnership, when the paper was enlarged; but still it did not make much progress, until I commenced the publication of a regular series of the debates of the House of Assembly, which was here quite a novelty. To this undertaking I was led by the following circumstances. A town meeting had been called at the State House, to take into consideration the calamitous state of the trade of the country, at which I attended in the midst of a large concourse of citizens, in order to give the public a statement of the proceedings. Jared Ingersoll, Esq. addressed the meeting with great effect. I sat down on my return home to write merely the heads of his speech—but found it run so smoothly, that I gave it in a regular series in the third person. When I handed it to Mr. Ingersoll for the purpose of examination and correction, he made only a few slight verbal alterations, and declared that he could scarcely have done it so well himself, as he had spoken without notes.

I naturally concluded that if I could publish a speech from memory, without having taken a single note, I should certainly be able to take down debates, with the advantage of a seat, a table, and pens, ink and paper. Accordingly, on the 27th of August, 1785, I commenced the publication of the debates of the House of Assembly, without the least knowledge of stenography. I abridged and took down the leading words, and was enabled to fill up the chasms by memory and the context; and as the printers had then more scruples about pirating each other, than some of them have at present, none of them republished the debates, of which the Pennsylvania Herald had, for that session, the exclusive advantage. John Dunlap, a respectable revolutionary character, who printed the Pennsylvania Packet, offered me a liberal compensation for the privilege of republication—but I declined, knowing that it would deprive the Herald of the very great superiority it possessed.

In the following session, Mr. Dunlap hired a stenographer, the well-known Thomas Lloyd, who, though an excellent stenographer, so far as taking down notes, was a miserable hand at putting them in an English dress. I learned his system, which was one invented by the Jesuits St. Omer's, but did not succeed better with it, than I had done before.

At this period, parties ran as high in Pennsylvania as they have done at any time since. The denominations were Constitutionalists and Republicans. The former were supporters of the Constitution then existing, which conferred the legislative powers on a single body, styled the House of Assembly, and the executive department on a President and executive Council. The Republicans were zealous for a change in the legislature, so as to have two branches, a Senate and a House of Representatives. There were various minor points of difference unnecessary to be particularized.

There was at that time a society of foreigners established in Philadelphia from various nations, English, Irish, Scotch, French, and West Indians, who styled themselves the newly adopted sons of the United States. Among the leaders were A. J. Dallas, the unfortunate Gerald, who, I believe, died in Botany Bay, Counsellor Heatly, —— Coulthurst, &c. &c. I was a member. The society was in perfect accordance in political opinions with the constitutional party, to which it became an auxiliary. As there was in it a number of zealous, powerful writers, they greatly annoyed the Republican party.

Colonel Oswald, who was the mouth-piece of the latter party, assailed their opponents with great virulence, and particularly their new auxiliaries, whom he grossly abused as foreign renegadoes. I wrote a reply to one of his attacks, in which were the following remarks which did not warrant the very acrimonious, and personal attack which followed on the part of the Colonel.

"National reflections are in every case as illiberal as they are unjust,—but from Americans, they are something worse. Yes, sir, I say they are something worse. It is a bold saying, and may prove disagreeable to nice ears—but it is not the less true. They are, sir, ungrateful to the highest degree. It is a fact too recent, and too notorious, to admit a doubt, that a great part of those armies, that nobly gained America her independence, were "aliens" or "foreigners," many of whose countrymen are now subjects of obloquy and reproach. I mean, French, Germans, Irish, &c."

"I shall conclude with one remark, that it gives me pain to see the conductor of a free press, so capable, from the energy of his writings and his intrepid spirit, to defend the cause of liberty, debase his paper by such illiberality." Philadelphia, Nov. 7, 1785.

A long and most violent controversy took place, which continued for some weeks, and was terminated as follows:

Colonel Oswald having commented on some of my paragraphs, which expressed doubts of sundry current rumours of the day, I replied as follows, with great severity, irritated by the infuriated style of his attacks—which were not confined to politics, but clearly manifested a desire to destroy me in the public estimation, and to prevent any chance of my success in life.

"I am, Sir, as you say, in doubt about several things. But there is one thing of which I never entertained any doubt, which is, that the literary assassin, who basely attempts to blast a character, IS A VILLAIN—whether he struts in glare of day, a ferocious Colonel Oswald, with drawcansir countenance, or skulks, a Junius, concealed for a quarter of a century."

M. CAREY.

To this Colonel Oswald replied:

"Your being a cripple is your main protection against personal insults, which your oblique insinuations would otherwise challenge."

ELEAZER OSWALD.

My rejoining was as follows:

"On this I shall only remark, that the quoted paragraph, which the Colonel alludes to, is as direct as obliquity as I have ever heard of. It cannot fail to remind the reader of the anecdote of the man, desired by the father of a girl to whom he paid his addresses, never to come near his house again, but who having gone there afterwards, contrary to those directions, was kicked down stairs. In some time, being met by an acquaintance, and asked how his love affair succeeded—he replied, that the last time he went to visit his Desdemona, her father had kicked him down stairs: so, added he, I took the HINT, and never went there since. One remark further: Colonel Oswald, who served in the army, is not to be told at this period, that though I am a cripple, there is a certain mode in which I would be on an equality with him. This hint is the less necessary to a man whose newspaper frequently holds out threats of coming to the point."

Digitized by Google

"It is possible some of them, when discovered, might come to the point."—Gazetteer, No. 215.

"But if fighting delight them, then come to the point."—No. 220.

This correspondence I republished in "The Plagi Scurriad, a Hudibrastic Poem, addressed to Col. Oswald." As soon as he received a copy, he sent it to me, by a captain Rice, who, pointing to the above passage, said "Col. Oswald considers this a challenge." I coolly replied, "It was so intended, sir." He was proceeding to talk about time and place and other preliminaries, when I cut him short, and told him, I had nothing to do with those arrangements, and referred him to a French gentleman, a Mr. Marmie, of the house of Turnbull, Marmie & Co. to whom, presuming the affair would end in a duel, I had applied to act as my second. This interview was on Monday morning, the 16th of January 1786. The seconds fixed on Saturday the 21st, for the meeting. In an hour or two after the first visit, Capt. Rice called on me a second time, and told me that the affair had made a great noise—that there was danger of our being arrested, and bound over,—and that therefore it was necessary to anticipate the time. Although there was a great impropriety in his calling on me, instead of Mr. Marmie, I assented to Thursday. In another hour or two, he called again with the same story, and wished a further reduction of time. I was, as may be supposed, exasperated at being treated as a child, and replied in a passion, "It is the part of a bully to bring such different messages." (I meant to have said send, but passion frequently does not allow time to choose the most appropriate words.) The captain took fire at this expression, which implicated him—and said he did not understand such language. I told him, as my warmth had not abated, that he might understand it as he pleased. But on a moment's reflection, knowing that I had no right to hurt his feelings, and had not intended to do so, I explained my mistake, and distinctly stated, that the offensive expression was not intended for him, but for his principal. This was satisfactory. I then agreed to meet on Wednesday.

On Wednesday morning, I must candidly confess, that I felt somewhat qualmish about the result. I had before been, or supposed myself to be, in danger of my life—once, as I have stated, on the Brandywine shoals—another time, when, crossing the river Delaware, on the ice, I fell into an air hole, without any person near to assist me, but a cowardly boy, and when I scrambled out, I scarcely know how. In both those cases I had been calm and collected. But to stand up in a field to be shot at like a crow, c'etoit une autre affaire, and had a far more menacing aspect. Candour calls on me to avow, that I took a couple of glasses of wine in the morning, to fortify my nerves, lest my courage should, like that of Bob Acres, "ooze out at my fingers' ends." On one thing, however, I was resolved, that if I displayed the white feather, I would never more see Philadelphia.

The place of meeting was in New Jersey, opposite the city. The principals and seconds, and I believe, but am not certain, Dr. Jones, passed over in a ferry boat. From the moment I entered her, till the affair was over, I found that the wine had been wholly unnecessary; and that I was as cool and collected, as if I had been engaged in duels all my life. When we came to the appointed spot, we found at the fence eight or ten persons, whom curiosity, and a report of the intended rencontre, had brought there.

It has rarely happened that a greater disparity has existed between two combatants. I had never drawn a trigger but once, and that was to try a pocket pistol, with which I had provided myself, having been informed that Col. Oswald intended to horsewhip me in the street. My antagonist was a military character, who had, I believe, served throughout the revolutionary war, and been more than once engaged as a duellist. While the pistols were charging—the ground marking out—the other preliminaries arranging—and Col. Oswald and I were walking by each other, he made a sort of overture for an accommodation. "Mr. Carey," he observed, "it was never my wish to come to this issue with you." To this I replied: "Colonel Oswald, you must have known, from the nature of your attacks on me, and the great disparity of physical force between us, that it could never come to any other issue."

I would have cheerfully met his overture, (if it was so meant, as doubtless it was,) half-way, but that knowing he had a powerful party to support him, he would make the world believe that I had made advances and concessions to him, an idea that I could not endure. I assure the reader that the leading sentiment of my mind, and which gave me considerable uneasiness, was, the utter inequality in which we stood in regard to connexions. My antagonist had a wife and five or six children depending on him; whereas there was not a person in America who had a drop of blood kindred to me in his or her veins. This reflection exacted a pang.

We stood at the distance of ten paces. As soon as we had taken our stations, Captain Rice, Colonel Oswald's second, cried out in a voice of thunder—"Gentlemen, if either of you steps beyond the line, by —— I will blow his brains out." I was horror struck at the idea this speech conveyed, as if we were murderers—and the impulse of the moment was, to throw my pistol at his head.

We fired at the word of command. My pistol, as might have been expected, was harmless. Col. Oswald shot me through the thigh, a little above the knee. It was reported and currently believed, that he said he fired low, as he did not wish to kill, but merely "to wing" me. His long experience with fire arms, renders this idea probable. Had his ball been half an inch or an inch lower down, it would have struck the joint, and rendered amputation necessary. It went through the thigh bone.

I did not feel the stroke. The first knowledge I had of being wounded, was when I found myself on the ground, and the blood spurting out of the wound, as water spouts from a jet d'eau. Some of the spectators informed me afterwards, that when I was struck, I sprung from the ground half a foot or a foot into the air.

The wound was bandaged on the field, as well as it could be done in such circumstances. I was brought home and ordered to be kept quiet, and no visitors to be admitted. And here I performed a gratuitous act of justice, which was probably one of the best acts of my life, but which did me considerable injury.

During the course of the controversy, some of the correspondents of the Pennsylvania Herald, had thrown out strong insinuations against the courage of Col. Oswald, which I had published. After the duel, in which his conduct disproved the allegation, while smarting under a wound that endangered my life—a wound, the result of a wanton attack on my private character, I deemed it right to retract the accusation, which I did in the following words, in the Pennsylvania Packet:

"Having on Wednesday last had a rencontre with Col. Oswald, which to my great satisfaction has not terminated to his injury, and he having behaved himself as a gentleman and man of honour, I with pleasure embrace this opportunity of retracting what I have asserted, derogatory to his character."

Digitized by Google

Philadelphia, Jan. 20, 1786. M. CAREY.

This gave high offence to the Irish, who had taken great interest in the affair on my side, many of whom never forgave me for what they called a degradation. My second, Mr. Marmie, a man of a nice sense of honor, was unappeasably offended. He forsook me; and when I sent for him, and complained of his absence, he said, with the most perfect sang froid, that as I had taken the affair into my own hands, he would have no more concern in it. I never saw him afterwards.

By neglect and mismanagement, the cure of the wound was not completed till fifteen or sixteen months had elapsed, during a part of which time, I had to be lifted up and down stairs, and during the remainder, had to use crutches.

Here let me state a most curious fact.

During the controversy, I had advanced charges of plagiarism against Col. Oswald, which I had substantiated by quotations from Junius and the North Briton, which were taken in some instances verbatim, and in others with slight variation, by the Colonel; and many of which, however applicable they were to the Duke of Bedford and the Duke of Grafton, had no application whatever to me. I concluded the essay with the words: "I have now done with Colonel Oswald." A friend, to whom I showed the essay, advised me to retain that idea, as circumstances might arise that would render it necessary for me to resume the controversy. Accordingly, I took the paper, and altered the conclusion to read thus: "I would now hope I have done with Col. Oswald; but if I am rightly informed, there is in his composition, too much of the quality which, in good men and applied to good purposes, is termed perseverance, and in bad men and applied to bad purposes, is termed obstinacy, to allow me to be very sanguine on the subject." After the duel, as soon as I was allowed to read, the first book I took up, was Tristram Shandy—and I at once opened on the very same words applied to uncle Toby. It is easy to conceive my fright. The book dropped from my hands, and I was seized with a cold sweat, as I thought with what apparent justice the charge might be retorted on me. But I had not read Tristram Shandy for probably ten years. This extraordinary fact fully proves the truth of the maxim, that "Le vrai n'est pas toujours vraisemblable.

Philadelphia, Nov. 12, 1833. M. CAREY.

TO —— OF THE VALE OF TURENA.

BY MISS MARY EMILY JACKSON.

To some lone, dark, sequester'd spot,
Whose dark'ning shades affright me not,
I hie me at the twilight gleam,
Of by-gone joys and friends to dream.

I sigh for many a friend afar;
I ask the silver glittering star,
Where is that heart with friendship blest?
Where is that form I love the best?

I ask the moon when high in air,
Where is my friend, oh, tell me where?
She answers naught, but that her ray
On wild Turena's vale can play.

And when those glorious orbs above
Awake thy soul to joy and love,
Oh! let one thought for me be there
Amid thy hallowed evening prayer.

It is wise to do with the utmost kindness of manner a favor which you see to be inevitable, unless, indeed, you fear to encourage a future or frequent application.

From the Edinburgh Literary Gazette.

STANZAS.

I stood upon the sunless shore
Beside oblivion's sea,
And saw its sluggish waves break o'er
The bygone yesterday—
The last of the departed year
Joined in the lapse of time's career,
The past eternity.

It was a melancholy sight
To see it part from day,
And dim among the depths of night,
Fade with its dreams away;
And dark and shapeless with it go,
A thousand hopes once rich in glow,
Born in its hour's decay.

A cold thrill to my feeling taught
How much there was of mine
Gone with that year of perish'd thought,
And ill-delayed design,—
A part, too, of the vital gleam
Quench'd 'neath Time's incessant stream,
A march towards decline.

From out those waves no palmy isle
Uprears its sunny head,
Where shipwreck'd Hope may light her smile;
Boundless, and drear, and dread,
The billows break without a roar,
"Nameless" is stamped upon the shore;
And "Death"—there all is dead.

And Love turns trembling from the sight;
Hiding his face with fear;
And Beauty shrinks in pale affright,
And Fame stands silent near,
And Glory's laurels shrink and die,
Changeless along one brow and eye,
But they are of despair.

All watch the last skirts of the year—
The wreck of minutes done,
In those deep waters disappear
Forever from the sun;
Leaving a dead tranquillity,
As when a mighty ship at sea
Has just gone wildly down!

TIME.

Dark-dealing power, around thy way
The wrecks of human grandeur lay;
Oblivion's waters cold and black,
Roll onward in thy gloomy track,
And darkly hide from mortal ken
The traces where thy curse hath been.

The proudest things that earth hath known,
The gorgeous splendor of a throne,
The crest and kingly diadem—
Thy peerless arm hath scattered them;
The power that shook the world with dread,
Lies crush'd beneath thy mighty tread.

Successive years around thee flow,
Yet leave no traces on thy brow,
Revealing and destroying all,
As firmly now, thy footsteps fall,
As when at first thy course was given,
And thy dread limits mark'd by Heaven.

Mysterious power! still deep and strong
Thy tide of years shall roll along.
The sun shall leave his home on high!
The moon and stars of heaven shall die;
But thou shalt be the last to fall,
The conquerer and the end of all.

Digitized by Google

THE LETTER-DE-CACHET.

BY J. L. KNOWLES.

"It must come down!" exclaimed Julian, "Frenchmen will no longer endure it. It is enough to have one's life and liberty at the disposal of bad laws, without holding them at the caprice of a nobleman or a king! What's a man's life worth without security of person and property? I may possess health, I may possess honesty, I may be blessed with wife and children, my affairs may thrive, I may have friends on every side of me; and yet may end my days in a dungeon, if I happen to displease a man in power—It must come down!"

"What must come down!" demanded Monsieur le Croix, suddenly entering the apartment; "what must come down!" repeated he, in a still more authoritative tone.

"The Bastile," replied Julian, calmy raising his eyes, which at first he had dropped, and fixing them steadily, but respectfully upon his master. There was a pause.

"Julian," at length said Monsieur le Croix, "I have heard of this before. Do you know that you are talking treason?"

"Yes," replied Julian, rather doggedly, "but I also know that I am talking reason and justice."

"That is, as you conceive," rejoined Monsieur le Croix. He took a turn or two across the apartment. "Julian," resumed he, "you are a dissatisfied man, and there are too many such in France. You are a dangerous man, too; for you read, and talk of what you read, and unsettle the opinions of those who know less than you do; you are tainted with a feeling and jealousy and rancour, with which Frenchmen unhappily begin to regard the established and venerable institutions of the country. How came it that you treated with insolence, to-day, the valet of Monsieur le Counte de St. Ange?"

"Because he treated me with insolence," answered Julian—"he called to me to hold his horse while he alighted; as though I had been his master's groom!"

"Was it not rather because his master was a nobleman?" sternly interrogated Monsieur le Croix. "You have been insolent to the count, too, resumed he.

"He threatened to apply his whip to my shoulders," said Julian, "and I told him that he had better reserve it for his horse."

"And had he put his threat into execution, what would you have done?"

Julian was a silent.

"Answer me, sir," cried his master.

Julian folded his arms and still made no reply.

"Am I to be answered?" coolly demanded Monsieur le Croix. "I see the future traitor in you, Julian," continued he; "this insubordination is only mischief in the bud. 'Twill come to more and to worse."

"May be," said Julian.

"I command you to answer me!" impatiently exclaimed the former. What would you have done, had the count struck you?"

"Struck him again!" indignantly vociferated Julian, "though my hand had been cut off the very next moment."

"So the count thought," said Monsieur le Croix, resuming his coolness.

"I saw it," said Julian.

"How?" inquired his master.

"He changed colour," said Julian, "and he changed his mind too; for he applied his whip to the shoulders of his valet instead of mine, and walked into the chateau."

"And you think the count was afraid of you?" said Monsieur le Croix. "The count afraid of you! Do you know the power of a count?"

"I do," replied Julian; and the character of the count. He is not fit to be admitted into an honest man's family."

"How!"

"He is the most dissolute young nobleman in Paris."

"Dare you say so?"

"He is a libertine, sir! I can prove it!—what, then, should prevent me from saying it?"

"Respect to me," said Monsieur le Croix.—"Julian, you quit my service," cried he.

"Very well."

"You quit it to-night?"

"Very well."

"This hour!"

"This minute!" exclaimed Julian, walking coolly to the other side of the apartment, and taking his hat from a peg on which it had been hung. "Good bye, sir," said he—but he stopped as he was going out of the door, and turning stood and fixed his eyes full upon Monsieur le Croix: "I have been a faithful servant to you sir," resumed Julian.

Monsieur le Croix made no reply.

"I always respected you."

Still Monsieur le Croix was silent.

"I always loved you."

Not a word from Monsieur le Croix.

"I always shall love you," cried Julian, and turned to go.

"Stay," said his master, "you have lived with me eight years. You have been a faithful servant to me—up to this moment. But you are a dangerous subject. You have begun to think for yourself—to questions the rights of your betters—to make light of the distance which stands between them and you. Because a nobleman happens to lose his temper, you put yourself upon an equal footing with him—you give him word for word, and would give him a blow for blow—and in your master's house!" Monsieur le Croix took a purse from his pocket: "I settled with you this morning," continued he, "and thought we had commenced another year; that's out of the question now. Here, Julian, there are eight louis d'ors in this purse, take them for your fidelity. Better to reward it now, and stop; than go on, and have reason to reproach it." Julian mechanically took the purse, but still kept extended the hand which he had reached to receive it, looking his master all the while in the face.

"You think, if I continue to serve you," said Julian, "that I might prove unfaithful to you?"

"Your principles are undermined in other matters," remarked Monsieur le Croix.

"And you think they could be undermined with respect to you."

"When a part of a foundation gives way," ob-

Digitized by Google

served Monsieur le Croix, "there is danger of the whole."

"And your confidence in my fidelity is shaken!"

"It is," said Monsieur le Croix.

Julian, whose colour had been gradually mounting as he spoke, stood silent for half a minute, without once withdrawing his eyes from his master's face. At length he broke silence: "It is," echoed he.

"It is," calmly repeated Monsieur le Croix.

"Then perish your gold!" exclaimed Julian, dashing the purse on the ground, and rushing from the apartment.

Monsieur le Croix was an advocate for the old regime. He believed that, like the sun, it fitted the world now, as well as in the beginning—never taking into consideration the difference between the Creator of the one, and the framer of the other. He was at the same time a disinterested, conscientious, generous, and honorable man. He was handsome too, and of a graceful, commanding figure, though now in the fiftieth year. He was married,—and, strange to say, the object of a still ardent and devoted attachment to a wife, who was nearly twenty years younger than himself. Women are capable of such love. He had entered his fortieth year when his Adelaide had completed her twentieth one. From particular causes they were frequently thrown into one another's society, and the more intimate they became, the more coldly did Adelaide look upon many a youthful admirer who was a suitor for her hand. This was attributed to absorption in the prosecution of various studies, to which Monsieur le Croix had directed her attention; until the increasing pensiveness of the fair one too plainly indicated an occupation of the heart, far more active and intense than any of the mind could be. Monsieur le Croix was interested. He soon detected in him, symptoms of the first genuine passion he had ever felt; but not before he was too much fascinated to struggle successfully with wishes, which from disparity of years he at once concluded must be hopeless. Little did he dream of his good fortune: it came upon him like the arrival of a rich inheritance, to one who had lived in penury, and always thought to die so.

He entered his Adelaide's boudoir one day when she was so deeply absorbed that she did not perceive him. She was seated at a table with her back towards him, and she held in her hand something which she alternately gazed upon and pressed to her lips. Unconscious of the act of treachery which he was committing, he advanced on tip-toe a step or two—'Twas a miniature!—a step or two nearer—'Twas his own!—He could not suppress his emotions, he clasped his hands in an ecstacy of transport. She started up; and turning, shrieked at beholding him. He extended his arms, and she threw herself into them. In a month she became Madame le Croix. A son, their only issue, blessed their union. He was now nearly nine years old—a promising boy, whose sole instructors were, hitherto, his father and mother—as by preference, as well as full contentment in each other's society, they always resided in the country; receiving occasionally the visits of their Paris friends, among whom reckoned Monsieur le Comte de St. Ange.

Monsieur le Croix felt too much discomposed to rejoin immediately his wife and the count.—He turned into his study—"Julian is ruined!" exclaimed he to himself. "I am sorry for him; but there is no help for it. The moment one of his order begins to dispute, or even to examine the claims of those above him to his respect, he is fit for nothing but mischief, and sooner or later will think of nothing else. Not hesitate to strike the count!"

"Papa!" cried little Eugene, running into the room, "you are wanted."

"Who wants me?" inquired Monsieur le Croix.

"My mother."

"Did she send you for me?"

"No."

"Why did you come then, and what do you mean?"

"She threatened the count to call you."

Monsieur le Croix started from the chair into which, upon entering the room, he had thrown himself and stared upon his son.

"Threaten the count!—Why sir?" said Monsieur le Croix, lowering his voice.

"Indeed I don't know," replied the child, "but the count was whispering something to her, and she told him she would call for you; and as I thought she looked angry, I came of my own accord to tell you."

"Remain here, sir," said Monsieur le Croix, and left the study—in the act of shutting the door of which behind him, he heard a shriek which was immediately followed by the opening of the drawing-room door. As he was rushing up stairs, he heard a scuffling in the room, and presently a noise, as of a person violently thrown to the ground. Frantic with conjecture, alarm, indignation, he rushed in, his hands upon his sword. The count was stretched upon the floor, Julian was standing over him with rage and triumph painted in his looks; and on a chair reclined Madame le Croix, half swooning.

"Rise, villain, and defend yourself! vociferated Monsieur le Croix; but the count was either unable to rise, or pretended to be so. The room was presently filled with domestics, the count's attendants among the rest, who, obeying the signs of their lord, raised him, and conveyed him to his carriage.

* * * * *

"His life shall answer for it!" exclaimed Monsieur le Croix, pacing the room after his wife, who upon being left alone with him, had acquainted him with the insult which the count had offered to her.

"He has had punishment sufficiently," said Madame le Croix, "thanks to the brave and faithful Julian."

"Where is Julian?" exclaimed her husband. The bell was rung and answered—Julian was on his way to Paris. He had gone by the diligence, which at this hour every evening regularly passes the gate of the chateau.

* * * *

"A lovely sunset!" exclaimed Madame le Croix, sitting beside her husband, at a window which looked to the west, her head reclining

Digitized by Google

upon his breast, and her little boy the other side of him—"A lovely sunset?"

"Yes;" replied he, "though its beauty is waning fast. The moon however will soon be up. Come, throw on your shawl, and let us take a stroll in the grounds." Madame le Croix caught her husband's hand as she rose, and looked up anxiously in his face.

"You are afraid of the stranger, whom, for the last three nights they have observed about the grounds," said Monsieur le Croix. "What harm have we to apprehend from him?"

"What brings him here, and at night?"

"What mischief can he do, and alone?"

"He may have associates who are at hand;" said Madame le Croix, after a pause. "Did you not part in anger with Julian?" added she.

"Do you think 'tis Julian?" asked Monsieur le Croix.

"Julian could not meditate any injury to us," said Madame le Croix, musing.

"Do you think it is he?" repeated her husband more earnestly.

"Would you be uneasy if it was?" inquired his wife. "I should almost think so, from the tone in which you speak."

"He has taken up with companions, I fear," said Monsieur le Croix, "who are not very scrupulous in the respect which they pay to the laws—some of those vile bands of Republicans who have given rise to the recent ferments in Paris, and caused so much alarm to the court. Do you think it is he?"

"Jacqueline thinks so," replied Madame, in a whisper. At that moment a heavy and hurried step was heard in the passage, the door was burst open, and Julian stood before them! Madame le Croix shrieked, her husband half drew his sword, and the little Eugene instinctively sprang forward, and clasped Julian round the knees. The man had been always particularly fond of the boy.

"Conceal yourself, sir," cried Julian; "they are here!"

"Conceal myself from the bandits of Paris?" ejaculated Le Croix; "I'll perish first!"

"From the executioners of the Bastile!" rejoined Julian.

"What!" exclaimed Le Croix—Several steps were heard ascending the staircase.

"They are here!" cried Julian despondingly; "for these three nights I have been expecting them, and hoped to have time to give you warning; but they have taken me by surprise, and you are lost!" The door which Julian had shut after him, was rudely opened, and a band of armed men entered the apartment. Madame le Croix threw her arms about her husband, while the little boy, quitting Julian, ran back to his father, and caught him by the hand.

"Your business?" haughtily demanded le Croix.

"Your company?" replied the leader, whose sword was drawn.

"Your authority?"

"A Lettre-de-Cachet!" Imagine the conclusion of the scene.—That night Monsieur le Croix slept in the Bastile.

* * * * *

Monsieur le Croix stood at the gate of his chateau. How he regained his liberty he knew not, neither was he aware of the means by which he found himself there. He entered his grounds with a feeling of doubt that he was walking in them, and short as was the distance from the gate to the door of his mansion, he felt as if he should never traverse it. At length he arrived at the well-known portal, and it opened to him, but there was a strangeness in the countenance of the person who answered his summons, and let him in. He ascended the staircase, apprehending at every step that it would vanish from under him? On the landing place he saw Eugene, but scarcely did his eyes light upon him ere the boy was gone! He opened the door of the drawing room with an indescribable sense of incertitude and alarm. His wife and the count were there! They did not seem to perceive him, but to be wholly occupied with one another—how the heart of the husband beat! They spoke, but their words he heard not; he only saw what their looks discoursed—It was pleasure.—The next moment swords were drawn, and he and the count were engaged in mortal combat; but his thrusts were feeble and fell short; or if they reached his adversary, seemed to make no impression upon him. At last he closed with the count—they struggled—Le Croix was thrown by his more youthful and powerful antagonist, whose sword was now pointed at the prostrate husband's throat.—'Twas a dream!—Monsieur le Croix lay stretched and awake upon his pallet in the Bastile.

He fancied it was morning—not a blink of day was admitted to announce to him the coming or the going of the sun. He rose, and after taking a turn or two of his dungeon—with the dimensions of which an acquaintance of now three weeks had made him familiar—he sat down upon the side of the bed, his frame still vibrating with the effects of his dream. He could have wept, was it not far the presence of his own dignity. He started at the call of a sensation which warned him that the hour of his morning's repast had gone. He listened—not the whisper of a footstep! "To be starved to death in prison! Such a thing had occurred, and might occur again! Heaven! for an innocent man to be placed, by arbitrary power, in a predicament which would extract compassion for the most guilty one!" He paced his dungeon again. "What was intended?" He leaned against the wall, at the damp and chill of which he shivered, as they struck to his heart. He listened again,—"did he not hear something?—No!" He resumed his walk. "His wife and child unprotected!—ignorant whether he was alive or dead! a kingdom upon the verge of a convulsion! A people broke loose and wild!—Rapine! Murder!—Houses in flames!—All the combustion and havoc of a civil war!" He threw himself upon his pallet. "Well! he was entombed in the Bastile. The moral earthquake might shake the foundations of his prison, and throw down its walls—the very earth on which he stood—began to shake! He sprang upon his feet. "Was it thunder that he had heard above him? or the play of cannon?" He could almost hear his heart throb! Shock now followed shock incessantly, and with increasing violence.

Digitized by Google

"Was the Bastile beset?—It was!" He thought he could catch the sound of human tumult! He threw himself upon his knees in supplication, imploring heaven to strengthen the hands of the assailants! He could now distinctly, though faintly, hear the shouts of an immense multitude of people—and presently, all was comparatively still. "The Bastile has surrendered," exclaimed Monsieur le Croix, "or the military have overpowered the people!" He heard the sound of bolts withdrawn, and doors flung violently open—presently, of voices, numerous, loud, and confused, as of men in high excitation. He clasped his hands convulsively, he stirred not, he scarcely breathed! Footsteps were rapidly approaching, traversing the intricate passages of the underground portion of the prison.

A ray of light shot through the key-hole of his dungeon door. "Merciful Providence!" The broadest, brightest sunbeam he had ever gazed upon, had not a thousandth-part the glory of that little ray. The bolts flew!—the lock!—the hand of liberty swung, light as a feather, the massive door back upon its hinges—The vision of Monsieur le Croix, was drowned in a flood of light from the torches of his liberators. He could scarcely distinguish the figure of Julian, who, rushing forward, and clasping his almost insensible master in his arms, exclaimed, or rather shrieked,—

"'Tis down!—The Bastile is down!"

The following Hymn to Death, is from the German of Gluck. Nothing can be more sweet and touching. Like Sir Walter Raleigh's Address to his Soul, or the beautiful Spanish coplas, of Don Jorge Manrique, it breathes the very soul of poetry and religion.—What contemplative mind can read it without emotion and admiration?

TO DEATH.

Methinks it were no pain to die
On such an eve, when such a sky
O'er canopies the West;
To gaze my fill on you calm deep,
And, like an infant, fall asleep
On earth, my mother's breast.

There's peace and welcome in yon sea
Of endless blue tranquillity;
Those clouds are living things;
I trace their veins of liquid gold,
I see them solemnly unfold
Their soft and fleecy wings.

These be the angels that convey
Us weary children of a day—
Life's tedious nothings o'er—
Where neither passions come, nor woes,
To vex the genius of repose
On Death's majestic shore.

No darkness there divides the sway
With startling dawn and dazzling day;
But gloriously serene
Are the interminable plains:
One fixed, eternal sunset reigns
Over the the silent scene.

I cannot doff all human fear:
I know thy greeting is severe
To this poor shell of clay;
Yet come, O Death! thy freezing kiss
Emancipates; thy rest in bliss!
I would I were away.

THE FRENCH PRIVATEER.

Jacque Matthieu, in his little ballahoo, the Maringouin, or Musquito, has often annoyed ships of war, particularly the——frigate, for a whole day. Confident in the swift sailing quality of his vessel, Jacque would heave her to the wind, and there in the most unconcerned manner, until the ship of war had worked up so far to windward as to be within gunshot when the wiley rover would fill his sails, shoot off like an arrow, and by making one or two tacks, be sufficiently out of reach of the guns of the English ship to heave-to again; and so on alternately until the cover of the night when he would slip away unperceived! It must be observed, that all the labor and anxiety were on our side; such as setting and trimming sails, trimming the ship, working the guns, &c.; whereas the Frenchman, in his petite barque, had nothing more to do than to draw in or ease off his sheets, and to put his helm down. In the intermediate time, the crew were lying about in perfect repose, smoking cigars.

On the north side of St. Domingo (Hayti) to the eastward of Cape Francois (Cape Haytien) there is a singularly shaped hill, or rather rock, stretching into the sea, and almost insulated. It has been named by the Spaniards Monte Christo; but it is, with more propriety by the French called La Grange. There is a small port here, which affords shelter to the privateers when cruizing off the coast. Whenever chased they make directly for it, and seek protection under the guns of the fort. Our boats, however, in 1803, more than once, in despite of this protection, cut out several vessels under a formidable fire. In January, 1804, the —— frigate chased two privateers into this anchorage; and although every stitch of canvass that the ship could bear was set, we had no chance of success with them, as, unfortunately, the frigate which had been at a former period a swift sailer, no longer retained that first rate quality; and we had often the mortification of being baffled in our pursuit of the enemy's light vessels in consequence. Our frigates generally were not so successful as the smaller classes of vessels of war on this station, in capturing privateers. In fine weather and light winds, it was difficult for a square rigged vessel, even under a crowd of sails, to catch one of these little schooners, with no more than four or five sails set. The majority of instances, however, were unfortunate.

Two days after our successful essay (as stated above) we spoke an American schooner, the master of which informed us that, six hours before our speaking him he had seen a French privateer capture a British ship, and make sail to the westward. This intelligence instantly acted like a talisman; and although we had found such authority not always to be depended upon, yet, in a short time our gallant ship was under a press of sail in pursuit, according to the received information. Among the naval evolutions, there are perhaps none which produce a more beautiful effect than those of making and shortening all sail, when performed by a well disciplined crew. Our Yankee informant, who was leaning listlessly over the quarter bulwark of his little low vessel, close to us, seemed perfectly astounded at the rapidity of our movements. Indeed, the mere casual spectator, who views the slow and (from want of hands) awkward manner in which a merchant vessel sets and refuces her sails, can form no conception of the rapidity and simultaneous movement with which those of a man-of-war can be loosened and set, or reduced and furled. Jonathan appeared quite delighted at the noble appearance of the frigate, with her studding sails alow and aloft, and as we dashed by him, greeted us with a wish of success. During a delightful moonlight and a fine steady breeze, the old ship pressed her way to the westward. Many an anxious eye strained towards the horizon in that quarter; not a speck, however, met the view, until the open morn presented, in our line, a lofty sail. In an hour's time we were alongside of her. This vessel proved to be an English letter of marque, and had not been molested by any of the enemy's cruizers; consequently she was not the ship alluded to by the Americans. We therefore made all sail again, and in the forenoon captured a French feluca, having on board two thousand dollars. This little privateer had but recently been fitted out; the crew were novices, and her capture was occasioned by the want of their skill.

Digitized by Google

In March of the same year, we discovered a privateer under the land of Cape St. Nicholas, on the west side of St. Domingo, and immediately chased her. During the night we got sufficiently near to fire several shots at her, and were congratulating ourselves upon our unusual good luck—her capture appearing certain—when, most provokingly, the wind almost died away, and the arch rogue very soon evaded us by the use of his sweeps. The next day, to our surprise, we saw her at a long distance outside of us, when we had expected to see her hemmed in between the land and our ship. Our partial success the evening before had inspired us with vain hopes; and the moment the sea breeze permitted, we again made all sail in chase, and continued it for thirty-six hours, until we reached Cape Francois, when she fairly run us out of sight! In this chase there was a fine display of what can be performed by nerve and good seamanship. Our worthy young captain, now unhappily no longer among us, with the sterling qualities of a thorough seaman, possessing energy, activity, and intrepidity, in an eminent degree, conducted the duty throughout this long chase. We had, what was then considered unusual, a westerly wind; and, in following the privateer, we got close in with the western part of the Island of Tortugas. The little fugitive barely weathered it, but having done so, went off with a flowing sheet. Her object, that of drawing us so much into the bight as to oblige us to make a tack, had nearly been accomplished. Up to the last moment it was doubtful whether the frigate would weather the point. To take the channel between the Island and the main would not do, as the privateer would, on seeing this, haul her wind, and leave us, on emerging from the eastern extreme of the channel, dead to leeward, as the wind then was. The master thought the old ship could not accomplish the weathering of the point; to try it, however, the captain was determined. "She must do it," was often repeated; after which all was silent expectation until within a biscuit's throw of this bold projection, when, all being in readiness, the helm was promptly put down, and in a few seconds, after "shaking her clothes in the wind," and gallantly showing her stern to the rocks, the "Old Lady" was again in the wake of the astonished Frenchman, parallel with the shore.

The night set in; the moon, with her silvery light, was up behind the hill aback of Cape Francois; and the ship lay becalmed in the shadow of that high promontory, which, in its contour, at a certain point of view, bears some resemblance to the celebrated rock of Gibraltar, but its shape varies remarkably at almost every point of bearing. From one position it appears a huge mass of rock land, with several conical peaks; at another it forms a saddle mount, and again altering the line of view, it looks lengthened out like a vast lion reposing.

The gray morning had scarcely dawned upon us, ere the mast-head-man reported, with a cheerful voice, "sail, oh!" and in a moment after another, and another; and by the time the horizon became clearly exposed to view, we found no less than five privateers surrounding the ship, like as many sharks their expected prey. They doubtless had seen the ship at the close of the last day from their anchorage at Monte Christo, and believing her to be a merchantman, had sailed forth during the night in expectation of pouncing upon a good prize at day-break. They were, however, very soon undeceived, and began to exert all their nautical skill in manœuvre for their individual safety.

The sight was beautiful, and interesting to us in no common degree, but the bad sailing of the ship gave us little hope of success, nevertheless, as soon as the sea breeze afforded the opportunity, we set all sail possible in chase, and soon commenced firing from the main deck guns upon those that were within reach. By trimming and suspending the chests and shot lockers; sending part of the crew to bed, in order to make the ship more lively, her sailing was wonderfully improved; she tacked with unusual celerity, and afforded us occasionally some gleams of hope. In this state of anxious uncertainty we continued until noon, when the whole of the men were ordered down for a few minutes to their dinner; at this time we had one of the privateers on our lee-bow on the same tack, who in the most prompt and skilful manner put about with the design of trying for the weather gage by crossing our hause. It was a bold and hazardous attempt, but it was the only chance she had of escape, and she succeeded! The intrepidity of the French commander upon this occasion can never be obliterated from my memory: he sent all his men below, and he took the helm himself—there he stood like a hero and a veteran warrior, unmoved amid the showers of shot that fell around him; ripping up the decks of the little bark, and tearing his sails into ribbands—there stood Jacque Matthieu himself alone, and undismayed! Steadily he approached; and so close under our bows, that some of his ropes caught our flying-jib boom and made it bend like a bow; the instant this temporary check ceased, she sprung as it were, from us, and was soon out of reach of our shot; the forecastle guns and all the marines blazing away at the little floating thing. Jacque was in his glory—it was in hazardous and difficult situations that this clever and intrepid seaman shone most conspicuous, differing essentially in this point from the generality of his countrymen;—a man of less nerve and presence of mind would not have attempted it, and the correctness of his eye and the soundness of his judgment may be here inferred, from the success that attended his manœuvre. His escape depended upon the possibility of crossing to windward of the frigate without falling on board her—he had a moment only to decide, and the boldness of his conception and promptitude of action carried him through all; and as he slid rapidly by, he waved his hat, accompanying the action with a loud and steadily-delivered, "Bon jour, Messieurs!" This was most admirably performed, and every body laughed at the fellow's coolness, and admired his abilities, and turned their attention to the next nearest; she, however, not daring to follow the example of the gallant Jacque, soon convinced us that her commander was not equal to the difficulty he was placed in, by bearing round away, as a dernier resort, and running up all his flying-sails, he committed an error in judgment, that cost him his vessel, although, as it was, she held us a tug until six o'clock in the evening, when we had the satisfaction of capturing a very beautiful vessel. She was subsequently scuttled and sunk into the bottom of the deep, as we could spare no men, without weakening the ship's crew, to navigate her to Port Royal, thus sacrificing, and very properly, individual profit for the public good.

Digitized by Google

Resuming our station off Cape St. Nicholas, we again fell in with the French schooner privateer, and chased her into the Bight of Leogane. As the night drew on, the cunning rover kept his vessel close to the shore, not only because he knew we could not follow him in the ship, but in the hope that we should lose sight of him in the shade of the land; but our night inverting glasses were excellent, and the eyes at them well practised. At half past eight, the wind having died away, and perceiving that the chase had lowered her sails, the ship's anchor was dropped under foot, and the boats manned and armed, and sent after her. The opportunity appeared glorious to the young mids; their push forward-zeal knew no bounds; I never saw a pack so elated; the feeling whilst the uncertainty lasted may be defined, something like delight mixed with anxious impatience. Happy fellows—thrice happy days! Who would not grow old and wise, that could live on as cheerful and as thoughtless as a mid? From a splashing in the water we found that the privateer was using her sweeps; this gave increased energy to the boat's crews and they pulled away most lustily. At nine the sound of the sweeps was no longer heard, and we had no guide, but pulled on as near as we could guess along the line of shore; in a few minutes after, a strong smell of garlic and tobacco smoke warned us that we were near our enemy. Directly after, the indistinct appearance of her masts told us her position, and a smart fire of musketry was opened upon her, which was spiritedly returned. At this moment there was not a breath of wind stirring; the schooner, which was long and low, lay motionless—her sails down and her sweeps hauled in, in readiness to repel the boarders, and to act when the land wind came off. All our party were confident of success; the boats approached, and were in the very act of hooking on under a tremendous fire of muskets and musketoons, when in an instant, the whole of the schooner's sails were spread, a cold air from the land filled them, and she glided away in the most astonishing manner. The effect was singular; one could almost swear that the thing was endowed with life; the shade of night added to the effect that sort of sublimity which darkness throws over objects and scenes in themselves impossessed of that character. The oars were got out as speedily as possible, and the men pulled with great spirit after the fugitive; at the time the frigate passed us under all sail, firing her guns in rapid succession, some of the balls from which made a grand clatter among the rocks on shore. The noble frigate, as she dashed past our pigmy vessels like a huge leviathan, had something very grand and imposing about her, as seen through the dubious light; apparently, her size was greatly augmented; and the long white horizontal line of her painted side, just distinguishable through the obscurity, glided past like a winged serpent, darting through ether. As we advanced towards the open sea, the breeze became fresh, and in a little time we lost sight both of the ship and the schooner, and, as the cannonading had ceased, we were in doubt whether the chase had surrendered or escaped. On getting on board the ship at midnight, we found that the privateer had really escaped, although at one time fairly under the guns of the frigate; as the breeze freshened she drew away surprisingly fast, and at last she was suddenly lost sight of, and it was concluded that she had gone down.

A nearer chance of capture never, perhaps, occurred; the boat I was in had fairly got alongside the enemy's schooner, and another boat was in the act of hooking on by the rudder to haul up, at the moment I have described, that she slid past us, as it were by magic! Our third lieutenant, lieutenant of marines, and several seamen were wounded. A day or two afterwards we learned from an American that he had spoken the privateer almost in a sinking state, making her way to Monte Christo; great part of her deck was torn up by the 32 pound shot from the frigate's quarter deck guns, and many of her men were killed and wounded; but the spirit of the commander, remained unsubdued; he could be no other than our old acquaintance Jacque.—United Service Journal.

The difference between rising at 5 and 7 o'clock in the morning for the space of 40 years, supposing a man to go to bed at the same hour at night, is nearly equivalent to an addition of 10 years to a man's life.—Doddridge.

Digitized by Google

THE LAST BACHELOR.

It was on New Year's Eve in 1820, that twelve young professional men sat around the table of a club room at supper. The cloth had been removed, and nothing was left upon the mahogany but an expressive black bottle, and a single thin spiritueile looking glass to each member.

The Old South struck eleven, and the last hour of the year was hailed with an uproarious welcome.

"A bumper, gentlemen," said Harry St. John, the "sad dog" of the club, "brim your beakers, my friends, and let every man be under the table when the ghost of the old year passes over."

"No, no!" timidly remonstrated Earnest Gourlay, a pale graduate just from the University, who sat modestly at the bottom of the table, "no, no! it is a sad hour not a merry one! Cork the bottle till after twelve! We have lost too many hours of the year to throw away the last! Let us be rational till the clock strikes, at least, and then drink if you will. For my part, I never pass these irrevocable periods without a chill at my heart. Come, St. John, indulge me this time! Push back the bottle!" The dark eyes of the handsome student flashed as he looked around, and the wild spirits of the club were sobered for a moment—only!

"Good advice," said Fred Esperel, a young physician, breaking the silence, "but, like my own pills, to be taken at discretion. Sink moralizing, I say. There are times and places enough when we must be grave. I, for one, will never mope when I can be merry; what say, O'Lavender? Fill your glass and trump my philosophy."

"Bother me! but you're all wrong," hiccupped the dandy, who was always sentimental in his cups, "Gourlay, there,—I am shocked at your atrocious cravat, by the way, Earnest—Gourlay is nearer to it—but—but he smacks of his vocation! No preaching, let us be—pass the bottle, Tom—sober. Send for a dozen 'white-top,' and when the clock strikes twelve—how those olives make me stutter!—seal it up, solemnly, for the last surviving m-m-member—solemnly, I say!"

"What's the use thundered Tom Corliss," who, till the third bottle, had not spoken a word, and from sundry such symptoms was strongly suspected to be in love, 'who would drink it? not I, faith! What, sit down when eleven such fellows 'slept without their pillows,' to drink! It's an odd taste of yours, my dear marcaroni! It would be much better to travestie that whim, and seal a bottle of vinegar for the last bachelor!"

The proposition was received with a universal shout of approbation. The vinegar was ordered, with pen, ink and paper. Gourlay wrote out a bond by which every member bound himself to drink it, in case it fell to his lot, on the night the last man, save himself, was married; and after passing round the table, it was laid aside with its irregular signatures, till twelve.—As the clock struck, the seal was set upon the bottle, and after a somewhat thoughtful bumper, the host was called, and the deposit with its document was formally charged to his keeping.

* * * * * * *

It was on the last night of 1830, that a gentleman, slightly corpulent, and with here and there a gray hair about his temples, sat down alone at the club table in —— Street, with a dusty bottle and single glass before him. The rain was beating violently against the windows, and in a pause of the gust, as he sat with his hands thrust deeply into his pockets, the solemn tones of the old South, striking eleven, reached his ear. He started, and, seizing the bottle, held it up to the light, with a contraction of the muscles of his face, and a shudder of disgust quite incomprehensible to the solitary servant who waited his pleasure.

"You may leave the room, William," said he, and as the door closed, he drew from his pocket a smoky, time-stained manuscript, and a number of letters, and threw them impatiently on the table. After sitting a moment and tightening his coat about him in the manner of one who screws up his resolution with some difficulty, he filled his glass from the bottle, and drank it with a sudden and hysterical gulp.

"Pah! it cut like a sword. And so here I am—the last bachelor! I little thought it ten years ago, this night. How fresh it is in my mind!—Ten years, since I put the seal on that bottle with my own hand. It seems impossible. How distinctly I remember those dozen rascally Benedicts who are laughing at me to-night, seated round this very table, and roaring at my proposition! All married—St. John, and Fred Esperel, and little Gourlay, and to-night, last of all, O'Lavender has got before me. And I am—it's useless to deny it—the old bachelor. I, Tom Corliss, that am as soft in my nature as a 'Milk diet!' I, that could fall in love any time in my life, from mere propinquity! I, that have sworn—and broken—more vows than Mercury! I, that never saw a bright eye, nor touched a delicate finger, nor heard a treble voice without making love presently to its owner! I, Tom Corliss, an old bachelor! Was it for this I flirted with you, —— ——? Was it for this I played shadow three nights successively to you, —— ——? Was it for this, oh —— ——, that I flattered you into the belief that you was a wit, and found you in puns a fortnight to keep up the illusion? Was it for this I forswore laughter, oh serious —— ——, and smothered your mother with moral saws? Was it for this, I say, that I have danced with time-out-of-mind-wall-flowers, and puckered my wits into birth-day rhymes, and played groomsman monthly and semi-monthly at an unknown expense for new kerseymeres and bridal serenades? Oh, Tom Corliss! Tom Corliss! thou hast beaten the bush for every body, but hast caught no bird thyself!

And so, they have each written me a letter, as they promised. Let me see:

DEAR TOM—How is the hippocrene? I think I see you with the bottle before you! Who would have dreamed that you would drink it? I am married as you know, and my children sing 'we are seven.' I am very happy—very. My wife—you knew her—is a woman of education and knows everything. I can't say but she knows too much. Her learning does pester me, now and then—I confess I think if I were to marry again, it would be a woman that did'nt read Greek. Farewell, Tom. Marry and be virtuous. Yours, HARRY.

Digitized by Google

N. B. Never marry a 'woman of talents.'

Ha! ha! 'happy—very happy.' Humbug my dear Harry! Your wife is a blue, and virulent as verdigris, and you are the most unhappy of Benedicts. So much for your crowing.—We'll see another:

Tom, I pity thee. Thou poor, flannel-wrapped, forsaken, fidgetty bachelor! drink thy vinegar and grow amiable! Here am I, blest as Abraham. My wife is the most innocent—that's her fault, by the way—the most innocent creature that lives. She loves me to a foolish degree.—She has no opinion but mine, no will of her own—except such as I give her, you understand—no faults, and no prominent propensities. I am as happy as I can expect in this sad world.—Marry, Tom, marry. 'The world must be peopled.' Thine ever,

FRED.

N. B. Don't marry a woman that is remarkable for her simplicity.'

I envy not thee, Fred Esperel! Thy wife is a fool, and thy children, egregious ninnies, every one! Thou wouldst give the whole bunch of their carroty heads for thy liberty again. Once more:

Tom, my lad, get married! 'Matrimony,' you know, 'is like Jeremiah's figs, the good very good'—the rest of the quotation is inapt. My wife is the prettiest woman in the parish. I wish she was'nt, by the way!—my house is the resort of all the gay fellows about town. I'm quite the thing—my wife is, that is to say—every where. I am excessively happy—excessively—assure yourself of that. I grow thin, they say, but that's age. And I've lost my habit of laughing, but that's proper, as I'm warden. On the whole, however, I'm tolerably contented, and I think I shall live these ten years, if my wife settles down, as she will, you know. God bless you, Tom. How is the vinegar? Well, marry! mind that. Yours always, G.

N. B. I would'nt marry a beauty, Tom.

Poor Gourlay! His wife's a belle, and he's as jealous as Bluebeard—dying absolutely of corrosion. It's eating him up by inches. Hang the letters! they make me melancholy. One more, and I'll throw the boding things into the fire.

MY SWEET TOM—I hope the gods have promised thee a new weasand. The vinegar improves, doubtless, by age. It must be a satisfaction, too, that it is nectar of your own bottling. Here I am, the happiest dog that is coupled. My wife—I took warning from Gourlay—is not run after by a pack of puppies. She's not handsome, heaven knows—I wish she were a trifle prettier—but she's as good as Dorcas.—Ah! how we walk and talk, evenings. I prefer that time, as I can imagine her pretty; when I do'nt see her, you know, Tom. And how we sit in the dim light of the boudoir, and gaze at each other's just perceptible figure, and sigh! Ah, Tom! marry, and be blest, as I am!

Yours truly, PHIL.

P. S. Marry a woman that is at least pretty, Tom.

The gods forbid that I should marry one like yours, Phil! She is enough to make one's face ache! And so you are all discontented—one's wife is too smart, another's too simple, another's too pretty, and another's too plain! And what might not mine have been, had I too been irreparably a husband!

Well—I am an 'old bachelor.' I didn't think it though, till now. And is it my lot, with all my peculiar fitness for matrimony, with all my dreams of woman, my romance, my skill in philandering, is it my lot to be laid on the shelf, after all? Am I to be shunned by sixteen as a bore, to be pointed at by schoolboys as an old bachelor, to be invited to superannuated tea-drinkings, to be quizzed with solicitations for foundling hospitals, to be asked of my rheumatism, and pestered for snuff, and recommended to warm chairs? The gods pity me!

But not so fast! What is the prodigious difference! What if I were married! I should have to pay for a whole house instead of a part, to feed heaven knows how many mouths instead of one, to give up my whole bed for a half or quarter, to dine at another's hour and not my own, to adopt another's friendship and submit my own to her pleasure, to give up my nap after dinner for a room with a child, to turn my library into a nursery, and my quiet fire into a Babel, to call on my wife's cronies, and dine my wife's followers, and humor my wife's palate, at the expense of my own cronies, followers, and palate. "But there's domestic felicity," says the imp at my elbow, "and interchange of sentiment, and sweet reliance, and the respectability of a man with a family, and duty to the state, and perpetuation of name, and comfort, and attention, and love." Prizes in a lottery—all! and a whole life the price of a ticket!

And why not live single, then. What should I have then, which I cannot have now. Company at my table? I can have it when I like, and what is better, such as I like. Personal attention? Half a wife's pin-money will purchase the most assiduous. Love? What need have I of that? or how long does it last when it is compulsory? Is there a treasure in my heart that will canker if it is not spent? Have I affections that will gnaw like hunger if they are not fed? Must I love and be beloved? I think not. But this is the rub, if there be one. I'll look into it the first day I feel metaphysical.

Men with Dogs' Heads, Tails, and Fountains of liquid Gold.—Pliny tells of men in India with dogs' heads; others with only one leg, though perfect Achilles for swiftness of foot; of a nation of pigmies; of some who lived by the smell; of tribes who had only one eye in their forehead; and of some whose ears hung down to the ground. Ctesias, as cited by Photius, talks of fountains of liquid gold, and of men with tails in India—true, we ought to remember, that Fernando Alarchon, a Spanish voyager, of undoubted credit, saw men with tails on the coast of California, and that several others have seen them with dogs' heads. Mosheddo rejoiced at this testimony, although Alarchon tells us, that these tails were discovered to be fictitious: and we are also assured, that the dog-headed men were found to wear vizards. As to the foundation of gold, the Indian legends say so metaphorically, and so they are credited as real.

Digitized by Google

From Harper's Family Library, No. 61.

MARRIAGES IN ABYSSINIA.

Nothing in truth appears to be more insecure than the marriage tie in Abyssinia. Perhaps it might be asserted, that there are no other obligations than such as are contracted by mutual consent, and which subsist only as long as both parties are inclined to respect them. After separation these engagements may be again renewed, again violated, and a third time repeated. Bruce met at Koscam, in the presence of the queen-mother, a lady of great rank with seven men who had all been her husbands, and no one of whom could claim her for wife at that particular juncture. When married individuals agree to part, they divide the children according to certain rules. The eldest son falls to the mother, and the eldest daughter to the father. If there is but one girl, and all the rest boys, she is assigned to the male parent; and if there is but one son, and all the others girls, he is the right of the mother. If the numbers are unequal after the first selection, the remainder are distributed by lot. From the king to the beggar there is no distinction between legitimate and illegitimate offspring; there being in fact no principle on which the preference could be made to rest, except in the case of the royal family, where the mother of the heir is previously selected and usually crowned.

In his ordinary marriages the king uses no other ceremony than the following: He sends an officer to the house where the lady lives, who announces to her that it is the king's pleasure that she should remove instantly to the palace. She then dresses herself in her best manner and immediately obeys. Thenceforward he assigns her an apartment in the royal dwelling, and gives her a house elsewhere in any place she may choose. There is an approach to a regular marriage when he makes one of his wives Iteghe; for on that occasion he orders a judge to pronounce in his presence that "the king has chosen his handmaid for the queen." The crown is then applied to her brows, but she is not anointed. The beautiful story of Ahasuerus and Esther will occur to the recollection of every reader; for it was when she "had found grace in his sight more than the other virgins, that he placed a golden crown upon her head." This coronation in Abyssinia conveys a great political privilege, constituting her majesty regent during the nonage of her son; a point of correspondence which history does not enable us to trace in any of the mighty kingdoms that covered the Banks of the Euphrates.

The ordinary method of contracting the matrimonial union among people of condition and "such as fear God" is the following: A man, when he resolves to marry a girl, sends some person to her father to ask his consent. When this is granted the future husband is invited to the house, and an oath is mutually taken by the parties that they will maintain due fidelity to each other. Then the parent of the bride presents to the young suitor the fortune that he intends to give; consisting usually of a particular sum of gold, some oxen, sheep, or horses, according to their circumstances in society. The bridegroom, however, is obliged to find surety to the amount of the goods, in case he should dismiss his wife, and prove unable to restore all that he has got. He is also obliged to secure an additional sum of money, or its equivalent in effects, to the lady, lest he should choose to separate from her without any valid reasons.

A certain period, twenty or thirty days, is also determined by a reciprocal oath, before the expiration of which they vow to go to church together and receive the sacrament. When the time appointed for the marriage arrives, the intended spouse appears again at the bride's residence, examines in her company the movables and clothes which she is to carry with her, and swears again that he will respect her property, use her well, never leave her without food and raiment; keep her in a good house, and discharge faithfully all the duties incumbent upon him as the head of a domestic establishment. His surety or sponsor likewise binds himself to see all these obligations punctually fulfilled. Matters being suitably adjusted, the bridegroom takes his wife on his shoulders, and carries her to his own house if in the neigborhood; but if not, he limits the procession to a complete circuit of her father's dwelling; after which he sets her down, and conducts her into it. No sooner is this ceremony performed than a solemn banquet takes place, consisting of raw beef and bread, honey-wine, and another beverage called bouza, extracted from fermented grain. The feast being ended, the parties mount on mules and ride to the gentleman's abode, where are concluded all the rites necessary to marriage before they live together. When they have completed the specified term, they appear in church, and declare before the priest that they are husband and wife, and that they are come to receive the sacrament. The clergyman satisfied with these assurances, performs mass; the young couple communicate and return home.

This, we are told, is the established form of those marriages which are celebrated canonically, or according to ecclesiastical rules. But it is clear that the peasants and soldiers do not encumber themselves with so much ceremony. No settlement, surety, or oath, being necessary, they kill an ox or some sheep, which they eat raw, drink a great deal of bouza, dance, shout, and practise various kinds of fooleries; and if a priest be at hand he sprinkles them with holy water, and repeats a hallelujah. The company join in the benediction; and, as we might suppose in such circumstances, this slight formality is distinguished by a greater degree of mirth than delicacy of manners.

The usage at the marriage of a prince or princess is described in these terms: The match having been previously settled according to the views of the court, preparations are made for the festival, which is generally held during the rainy season, while the country is secure and abandoned to pleasure. The King being seated on his throne in the large hall of audience, the parties are introduced into his presence with their respective attendants. After kissing his hand they are all magnificently clothed in dresses of brocade or other rich stuffs. The crown is sometimes set on their heads; they receive the benediction of the Kees Hatze, or royal almoner; after which they retire clothed with the cattan. Having mounted horses given them by his majesty, they ride in great state, in the midst of loud acclamations, to the house of the husband. A dinner is prepared, in the course of which many oxen are slaughtered at the door in order to furnish brind, which is served up reeking and quivering from the body of the animal. Deep drinking then commences, in which the ladies and gentlemen indulge to a degree which to a European appears altogether incredible. These marriages, it is added, are by no means permanent; many of the Ozoros entering into new engagements as often as they please, and dissolving the preceding contract at the suggestion of convenience or fancy.

Pearce mentions a singular practice, which he remarks might appear fabulous to any one who had not witnessed it. When a woman has lost two or three children by death, she is induced, in the hope of saving the life of another just born, to cut a piece from the tip of the left ear, roll it up in a piece of bread and swallow it. "For some time," says he, "I was at a loss to conjecture the reason why a number of grown people of my acquaintance had one ear cut; and when told the truth I could scarcely believe it, till I went into the house of a neighbour, though contrary to cus-torn, purposely to see the operation. An old woman cut off the tip of the ear, and put it into a bit of cold cooked victuals, called sherre, when the mother of the infant opened her mouth to receive it, and swallowed it, pronouncing the words, 'In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost!" They have recourse to many other superstitions and whimsical practices to prevent children from dying.

Digitized by Google

I Would not Live Alway.

I would not live alway: I ask not to stay,
Where storm after storm rises dark o'er the way;
The few lurid mornings that dawn on us here,
Are enough for life's woes, full enough for its cheer.
I would not live alway, thus fettered by sin
Temptation without, and corruption within;
E'en the rapture of pardon is mingled with fears,
And the cup of thanksgiving with penitent tears.
I would not live alway; no—welcome the tomb,
Since Jesus hath lain there, I dread not its gloom;
There, sweet be my rest, till he bid me arise
To hail him in triumph descending the skies.
Who, who would live alway, away from his God;
Away from yon heaven, that blissful abode,
Where the rivers of pleasure flow o'er the bright plains,
And the noon-tide of glory eternally reigns;
Where the saints in all ages in harmony meet,
Their Saviour and brethern, transported to greet;
While the anthems of rapture unceasingly roll,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul!

CODE OF POLITENESS.

In addition to those we have cited, a number of the maxims of Madame Celnart are so just that we must take leave to adduce more, in order to refresh the memory or confirm the practice of all actual or would be members of "good society." And by good society we do not mean any particular coterie, or exclusives of fashion; but every circle wherein claim is preferred to moral worth, intellectual culture and refined manners. Sound constitutional rules of demeanour being rendered common to all respectable circles, there will be less pretensions or right to superiority to any;—all will compose the haut ton, that distinction which is so often thought equivalent to any advantage of mere opulence and worthy of the most persevering pursuit.

In Paris, according to Madame, a lady does not say my husband, except among very intimate acquaintances. She speaks of him and addresses him by his proper name, Mr. &c. It is an "axiom," that, in conversation, we speak as little as possible of ourselves, and as much of the other party and all that interests that party directly. Whatever you relate, you must never use phrases which imply that you suppose your veracity may be doubtful. Dispute rarely or never;—yield, with a good grace, when you find yourself wrong:—yield also though you be right, when the point is of no great moment, and, always, when your antagonist is a lady. Abstain from all discussion with people possessed by the spirit of contradiction. Beware of indulging keen sarcasm or severe raillery; malevolence is the opposite of politeness;—stinging pleasantry or pungent wit prevents social intercourse and makes enemies. Sportive humor, that is kind and occasional, may be indulged. Hoaxing is vulgar and foolish; persiflage is a bad habit, but sometimes serves as a salutary corrective of the impertinence of coxcombs, and the presumption of dunces. As for indecent witticisms, no true gentleman or lady will hazard them any where. There are delicate shades of character which distinguish both, and to which attention is due in every situation, lest they should imperceptibly be lost. To shine by eloquence, or repartee, or smart talk in society, is of less consequence, than to maintain an invariably refined and amiable tone. Diversify your topics with ladies; they have too active an imagination and too versatile a spirit to support conversation for a long time on the same subject.

It is sometimes an incivility, a want of delicacy, to pay postage when we write to a friend, an acquaintance, or to persons of small fortune whose feelings may be wounded. We should pay when we write to strangers upon our own business, or to ask a favor. In Europe, an envelope and sealing wax are deemed indispensable for letters of form or addressed to persons to whom we would show particular respect. "If a person brings you a letter, you should not be in a hurry to open it, but see whether it concerns the bearer at all, or only yourself. In the first case, you should open and read it while he is present; in the other case, you should lay it aside."

Presents should be made with a little mystery, so as to excite pleasure and surprise. When made, nothing should be said by the giver to draw attention to them, or to render them of any consequence. The satisfaction or complacency with which they may have been received, is full requital. We should not refuse arbitrarily or prudishly what is offered from good will and without ostentation. Simple and gracious acknowledgment is enough. To ladies, the most suitable presents are entertaining volumes, bouquets or plants, music, engravings, fancy articles for the toilet, and so forth. Address objects, as much as you can, like your discourse, to their understanding and taste. Make what you offer or you say, as frequently as you can, a means of their improvement, without seeming to have that aim directly. Conversation occupies a large share of the time of the fashionable world in particular; those are not faithful to their own interests and duty, who do not endeavor to convert it into a beneficial exercise for their minds and hearts. Perpetual light gossip fritters away the intellect and dissipates sensibility. Excite others from time to time to serious and instructive remarks; by degrees, you will come to relish them; they will fructify in your thoughts when you retire.

Do not obtrude advice; when it is asked, give it frankly; be candid, let the consequences be what they may. Zeal in the cause of a friend when counsel or aid is solicited, has a lasting effect upon his gratitude. Indifference on the other hand, or timidity, disgusts and estranges.—Moral courage is a trait of which respect and regard are the certain rewards. Secrets are not to be explored; but when discovered or divulged into professed confidence, they must be religiously kept. It is incredible how much mischief and injustice is done by disclosing to one acquaintance, or in the family circle what has been thus learnt. When we do not, ourselves, practice perfect discretion, how can we expect it in others; and when we once set the secret of our friend afloat, how do we know where it will stop, or what shape may not be given to it? Polite fellow-travellers give as little trouble and as much assistance to their companions as they can. Ladies are to have every advantage and accommodation; but on their part, "they ought not to require too much, nor put the complaisance of gentlemen to a severe test." The Escorted Lady of Miss Leslie is an admonitory and amusing, though exaggerated picture. In general, the female character, in our country, is not at all prone to the exertion of civility, or inordinate demands; but rather to make sacrifices or show passiveness. The sense of gallantry, that is, polite devotion to the sex, is common and active with all classes of Americans. Females have greater security in all public conveyances and promiscuous assemblages, in these United States, than in any other country whatever.—They can protect, if they will respect, themselves, in almost every instance.

Digitized by Google

Madame Celnart expatiates on the rules applicable to Entertainments, Promenades, Parties and Amusements. We have known very estimable and modish folks, who needed, at times, mementos such as the ensuing—"When we intend giving an entertainment, we begin by selecting such guests as will enjoy themselves together, or at least, tolerate one another."—"When we receive a written invitation, we must answer immediately whether we accept or not, although silence may be considered equivalent to an acceptance." "Having once accepted, we cannot break our engagement unless for urgent cause"—"An invitation specifies the hour of meeting, and you should arrive at that hour or very little later." "We should avoid putting next one another, two persons of the same profession, for that results in aside conversation, which always interferes with general conversation and general conviviality so much to be desired at table." "Remove near relations and cronies as far from one another as possible."—"Guests are never to be urged to eat, though a dish of particular gout or which they are known to prefer may be pointed out to them." "Singing at table after dinner is never practised in houses of people of fashion." Madame states that each guest should pay a visit to the hosts during the week which follows a grand entertainment. This attention is called visite de digestion. "When any of your acquaintance is ill, you should regularly send a domestic to inquire after their health, every day or every other day, according to the severity of the illness." We do not quote any of the fibs or White Lies which the Parisian monitress recommends; because we think they are far from being essential to Politeness, and we recollect that Mrs Opie has written a book against them, which might then be opposed to our Book.—National Gazette.

Wedlock.—When I asked Mrs. Inchbald why she had not married again, her answer was,—"That for wedlock friendship was too familiar, and love too precarious."

From the Saturday Evening Post.

FROM THE HEART.

I stood on pleasure's dizzy beam,
Free from care, from pain or sorrow,
Nor thought its height an idle dream,
To banish with the morrow.

I said to care, begone, thy pace
Suits not a heart of glee;
Grave melancholy, keep thy face,
For sadder souls than me.

The world's a garden fair and wild,
Where flowrets sweetly bloom,
Variety's a sporting child,
Who laughs at care, and gloom.

Then let me gather ev'ry flower,
Unmix'd with thorns or ill;—
I'll bask upon the morning hour,
Of youth, and beauty still.

But ah! tho' wand of fate dispels
The fairest tints of joys
Her iron grasp, and frown foretells,
My brightest hope destroys.

That ray of Hope, so gay, and bright
That danced on pleasures' beam,
Now set in clouds of endless night
Nor left one parting gleam.

ERNESTINE.

THE MARRIAGE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

To begin at the beginning:—When the Marquis of Downshire, about fifty years ago, was about to proceed on his travels, he begged some letters of introduction, amongst others, from the Rev. Dr. Burd. This gentleman communicated to this lordship one letter, recommending him to the favourable notice of almost his only continental acquaintance, Monsieur Carpentier of Paris, an individual who held the lucrative office of provider of post-horses to the royal family of France. The unhappy result of this new association was the elopement of Madam Carpentier, a very beautiful woman, in company with his lord-ship. The only step taken by the husband in this case, was to transmit his two children, a boy and a girl, to his frail wife, with a desire, signified or implied, that she would undertake the duty of bringing them up. The children, accordingly, lived for some years with their mother under the general protection of Lord Downshire, until at length the lady died, and the young nobleman found himself burdened with a responsibility which he probably had not calculated upon at the time of his quitting Paris. However, he placed the girl at a French convent for her education, and soon after, by an exertion of patronage, had the boy sent out on a lucrative appointment, his name having been previously changed, on his naturalization as a British subject, to Carpentier. It was a stipulation before the young man received his appointment, that 200*l.* of his annual salary should fall regularly every year to his sister, of whose support Lord Downshire was thus cleared, though he continued to consider himself as her guardian. Miss Carpentier in time returned to London, and was placed under the charge of a governess named Miss Nicholson, who, however, could not prevent her forming an attachment to a youthful admirer, whose addresses were not agreeable to the Marquis. His lordship having learned that a change of scene was necessary, wrote hastily to Mr. Burd, requesting him to seek for a cottage in his own neighbourhood among the Cumberland lakes, fit for the reception of two young ladies, who could spend two hundred a-year. Mr. Burd having made the desired inquiries, wrote to inform his lordship that there was such a place near his own home, but that it would require a certain time to put it into repair. He heard no more of the matter, till, a few days after, as he and Mrs. Burd were on the point of setting out for Gilsland Wells, on account of the ill health of the latter individual, they were surprised by the arrival of two young ladies at their door in a post chaise, being the persons alluded to by the Marquis. His lordship had found it convenient to send them off to the care of Mr. Burd, even at the hazard of the house not being ready for their reception. This was at the end of the month of August, or beginning of September, 1797. The dilemma occasioned by the unexpected arrival of the young ladies, was of a very distressing kind, and Mrs. Burd was afraid that it would, for one thing, put a stop to her intended expedition to Gilsland. Her husband, however, finally determined that their journey thither should still hold good, and that, to place his guests above inconvenience, they should join the party proceeding to the Spa.

Digitized by Google

Having duly arrived at Gilsland, which is situate near the borders of Scotland, they took up their residence at the inn, where according to the custom of such places, they were placed, as the latest guests, at the bottom of the table. It chanced that a young Scotch gentleman had arrived the same afternoon, though only as a passing traveller, and he, being also placed at the bottom of the table, came into close contact with the party of Mr. Burd.

Enough of conversation took place during dinner to let the latter individuals understand that the gentleman was a Scotchman, and this in itself was the cause of the acquaintance being protracted. Mrs. Burd was intimate with a Scotch military gentleman, a Major Riddell, whose regiment was then in Scotland; and as there had been a collision between the military and the people at Tranent, on the militia act,* she was anxious to know if her friend had been among those present, or if he had received any hurt. After dinner, therefore, as they were rising from table, Mrs. Burd requested her husband to ask the Scotch gentleman if he knew any thing of the late riots, and particularly if a Major Riddell had been concerned in suppressing them. On these questions being put, it was found that the stranger knew Major Riddell, and he was able to assure them, in very courteous terms, that his friend was quite well. From a desire to prolong the conversation on this point, the Burds invited their informant to drink tea with them in their own room, to which he very readily consented, notwithstanding that he had previously ordered his horse to be brought to the door in order to proceed upon his journey. At ten their common acquaintance with Major Riddell furnished much pleasant conversation, and the parties became so agreeable to each other, that in a subsequent walk to the wells, the stranger still accompanied Mr. Burd's party. He had now ordered his horse back to the stable, and talked no more of continuing his journey. It may easily be imagined that a desire of discussing the major was now the minor bond of union between the parties. Mr. Scott—for so he gave his name, had been impressed during the earlier part of the evening with the elegant and fascinating appearance of Miss Carpentier, and it was on her account that he was lingering at Gilsland. Of this young lady it will be observed, he could previously have known nothing; she was hardly known even to the respectable persons under whose protection she appeared to be living. She was simply a lovely woman, and a young poet was struck with her charms.

Next day Mr. Scott was still found at the Wells—and the next—in short, every day for a fortnight. He was as much in the company of Mr. Burd and his family as the equivocal foundation of their acquaintance would allow, and by affecting an intention of speedily visiting the lakes, he even contrived to obtain an invitation to the dean's country house in that part of England. In the course of the fortnight the impression made upon his heart by the young Frenchwoman was gradually deepened, and it was not improbable, notwithstanding the girlish love affair in which Miss Carpentier had been recently engaged, that the effect was in some degree reciprocal. He only tore himself away, in consequence of a call to attend certain imperative matters of business at Edinburgh.

It was not long ere he made his appearance at Mr. Burd's house, where, though the dean had only contemplated a passing visit, as from a tourist, he contrived to enjoy another fortnight of Miss Carpentier's society. In order to give a more plausible appearance to his intercourse with the young lady, he was perpetually talking to her in French, for the ostensible purpose of perfecting his pronunciation of that language under the instructions of one to whom it was vernacular.—Though delighted with the lively conversation of the young Scotchman, Mr. and Mrs. Burd could not help feeling uneasy about his proceedings, being apprehensive as to the construction Lord Downshire would put upon them, as well as upon their own conduct in admitting a person of whom they knew so little to the acquaintance of his ward. Miss Nicholson's sentiments were if possible of a still more painful kind, as, indeed, her responsibility was more onerous and delicate. In this dilemma, it was resolved by Mrs. Burd to write to a friend in Edinburg, in order to learn something of the character and status of their guest. The answer returned was to the effect, that Mr. Scott was a respectable young man, rising at the bar. It chanced at the same time that one of Mr. Scott's female friends, who did not, however, entertain this respectful notion of him, hearing of some love adventure in which he had been entangled at Gisland, wrote to this very Mrs. Burd, with whom she was acquainted, inquiring if she had heard of such a thing, and "what kind of a young lady was it, who was going to take Watty Scott?" The poet soon after found means to conciliate Lord Downshire to his views in reference to Miss Carpentier, and the marriage took place at Carlisle within four miles of the locale of first acquaintance of the parties.

The match made up under such extraordinary circumstances, was a happy one; and a kind and gentle nature resided in the bosoms of both parties, and they lived accordingly in the utmost peace and harmony. The bounteous but unostentatious beneficence of Lady Scott will long be remembered in the rural circle where she resided, and though her foreign education gave a tinge of oddity to her manners, she formed an excellent mistress to the household of her illustrious husband, and an equally excellent mother to her children. One of the last acts of Sir Walter Scott, before the illness which carried her to the tomb, was to discharge an attached and valued servant who had forgot himself one day so far as to speak disrespectfully of his mistress. He lamented the necessity of parting with such a servant, and one who had been so long with him; but he could not overlook an insult to one whom he held so dear.

* The Tranent Riots took place 28th August, 1797.

THE STOLEN KISS.

If when from thee I steal a kiss
With frowns thy brow assail me,
And thou dost chide me for the bliss
My lips have stolen from thee;
If thus 'mong frowns I taste of bliss,
How happy will that time be
When thou, repaying kiss for kiss,
Hast ceas'd for'er to chide me!

Digitized by Google

FILIAL AFFECTION OF THE MOORS.—A Portuguese surgeon was one day accosted by a young Moor, from the country, who addressing him by the usual appellation of foreign doctors in that place, requested him to give him some drouges to kill his father, and as an inducement, promised to pay him well. The surgeon was a little surprised at first, as might be expected, and was unable to answer immediately; but quickly recovering himself, (for he knew the habits of the people well,) replied with sang froid equal to the Moor's, "Then you don't live comfortably with your father, I suppose?" "Oh, nothing can be better," returned the Moor; "he has made so much money; has married me well, and endowed me with all his possessions; but he cannot work any longer, he is so old, and seems unwilling to die." The doctor, of course appreciated the amiable philosophy of the Moor's reasoning, and promised to give him what he desired. He accordingly prepared a cordial potion, more calculated to restore energy to the old man, than to take it away. The Moor paid him well and departed. About eight days after he came again to say that his father was not dead. "Not dead!" exclaimed the apothecary, in well feigned surprise; "he will die." He composed, accordingly another draught, for which he received an equal renumeration, and assured the Moor that it would not fail in its effects. In fifteen days, however, the Moor came again, complaining that his father thrived better than ever. "Don't be discouraged," said the doctor, who doubtless found these periodical visits by no means unprofitable; "give him another potion, and I will exert all my skill in its preparation." The Moor took it, but returned no more. One day, the surgeon met his young acquaintance in the street, and inquired the success of the remedy. "It was of no avail," he replied mournfully; "my father is in excellent health. God has preserved him from all our efforts; there is no doubt that he is a Marabout"—(a saint.)

THE GOLD WATCH.—I have now in my hand a gold watch, which combines embellishment and utility in happy proportions, and is usually considered a very valuable appendage to a gentleman. Its hands, face, chain, and case, are of chased and burnished gold. Its gold seals sparkle with the ruby, the topaz, the sapphire, the emerald. I open it, and find that the works, without which this elegantly dressed chase would be a mere shell—these hands motionless—and these figures without meaning, are made of brass. I investigate further, and ask, what is the spring, by which all these works are put in motion, made of? I am told that it is made of steel. I ask, what is steel? The reply is, that it is iron, which has undergone a certain process. So then I find that the main spring, without which the watch would be motionless, and its hands, figures, and embellishments but toys, is not of gold, that would not do—but of iron. Iron is, therefore, the only precious metal; and this gold watch is an apt emblem of society. Its hands and figures which tell the hour, resemble the master spirits of the age, to whose movements every eye is occasionally directed. Its useless but sparkling seals, sapphires, rubies, topazes and embellishments, the aristocracy. Its works of brass the middle classes, by the increasing intelligence and power of which the master spirits of the age are moved; and its iron main spring, shut up in a box, but never thought of, except when it is disordered, broke, or wants winding up, symbolizes the laborious classes, which are ignorantly and superciliously miscalled the lower classes, which, like the main spring, are wound up by the payment of wages; which classes are shut up in obscurity, and though constantly at work, and absolutely necessary to the movements of society as the iron main spring is to the gold watch, are never thought of except when they require their wages, or are in some want or disorder of some kind or other.

THE TEMPLE OF MEMPHIS.—When Pythagoras, the philosopher of Samos, abode in Egypt, to draw wisdom out of ancient holy mountains, the priests conducted him into the temple of Memphis. Quietly and immense the stately edifice stood there, like a mountain in the twilight of morning.

How is it possible that human hands have raised this mass of rocks? exclaimed the Greek, full of astonishment.

United strength, answered the priest, can accomplish any thing, if genius directs it.

Now they opened the high gates of the temple, like the gates of the spiritual kingdom. They walked in and stood in silence between the lofty pillars, and a low sound went through the immense hall, like the voice of a spirit.

And terror seized the young philosopher of Samos, so that he trembled, and he leaned against the stone wall and wept:

Then a priest approached him and said, Why do you weep.

But Pythagoras was silent. After a while he replied, Oh leave me! Do I not feel myself in the presence of the Being whose name I dare not speak!

And the priest said, may it be well with you, my son, in your humility! It will lead you to the divinity for whom this sanctuary was built. Come, may the lofty appearance of the edifice lead you back reconciled to mankind.

Remember, that this temple was in the human breast before it arose out of the rocks. Dry your tears, and depart in joy!

STRIKING AND TRUE STORY.—Two young German noblemen having finished their College Session, resolved on making together an excursion of pleasure in the Hartz mountains. Having been occupied one day in a wild part of that wild district in gathering specimens of minerals, they were overtaken by a storm and benighted. Having lost their way they wandered about for some hours, when, wet and cold, they came to the ruins of an old castle, where they entered to try and find shelter for the night. In a low-vaulted room they were surprised and alarmed to find the embers of a fire still burning. Fearing robbers, they agreed that one should watch while the other slept; and, loading a pistol, which they happened to have with them, they heaped wood upon the fire, and one of them, wrapping himself in his cloak, lay down to take his turn of sleep. His companion, placing the pistol beside him, was passing the time in tracing resemblances of faces in the embers of the fire; when all at once, a secret door seemed to open in the wall opposite to him, disclosing several armed men sitting round a table. One of these advancing, ordered him to follow him, saying that resistance was in vain. The young man, starting up, seized and fired the pistol; the man fell, when horrid to relate, he found that he had awoke from a dream, and shot his friend through the heart.—Greenock Intelligencer.

Some stupid people suppose that imagination and philosophy are incompatible. Blockheads! Was not Bacon the greatest of philosophers, one of the most imaginative of men? There is more true philosophy in the writings of Shakspeare, Milton, and Scott, than in those of all the metaphysicans that ever existed.

Never praise or talk of your children to other people; for, depend upon it, no person except yourself cares a single farthing about them.

Digitized by Google

THE PROUD LOVER.

Digitized by Google

2

Yet I'll not think thee bid the gem
That sparkles in thy zone,
Less radiant for its rich-chased hem—
Though like thee, fair, alone!
Oh! 'tis but souls of earthly sway,
And hearts of meanest mould,
As with the worthless stone, whose ray
Is made or marred with gold.

3

There's not a coinless son of Song
But what would spurn the lyre
His fervid finger sweeps along,
If gilded were the wire!
There's not a drop that warms my breast,
But what turns proudly cold,
As shrinking from the thought unblest,—
To woo, or wed for gold.

Digitized by Google

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

A person who knew a scrap of French, and was excessively vain of his accomplishment, accosted a gentleman in the street, with Quelle heure est il? i. e. What is it o'clock? The gentleman replied in Latin Nescio, i. e. I know not. God bless me, said the other, I did not know it was so late, and ran off as if on some very important business.

A Toast.—During the Administration of the elder Adams, the following was given by a gentleman more noted for ignorance than for information: "Our President, John Adams; May the mantil-piece of George Washington fall upon his head. He meant Mantle.

Is the Moon Inhabited?—Telescopes must yet be greatly improved before we can expect to see signs of inhabitants, as manifested by edifices or by changes on the surface of the soil. It should, however, be observed, that owing to the small density of the materials of the moon, and the comparatively feeble gravitation of bodies on her surface, muscular force would there go six times as far in overcoming the weight of materialness on the earth. Owing to the want of air, however, it seems impossible that any form of life analogous to those on earth can subsist there. No appearance indicating vegetation, or the slightest variation of surface which can only be ascribed to change season, can any where be discerned.—Sir J. Herschel on Astronomy.

Young girls, of from fourteen to seventeen, are fond of aping the woman in their dress, and are partial to long shawls, which give the young things a matronly appearance. When they become women in reality, they are rather too apt to go upon the opposite tack, and to assume the dress and airs of the girl.

Among other notions of Frederick William, he believed that he possessed a taste for painting. During his fits of the gout, he used to amuse himself in practising this art. One of his own Grenadiers was usually the model from which he copied, and when the portrait was more or less coloured than the original, he had the soldier's face painted so as to resemble the picture! He used to exhibit his paintings to his courtiers, who of course praised them. "Well," said he one day, to an attendant who was admiring one of his pictures, "how much do you think that picture would bring at sale?" "Sire, it would be cheap at a hundred ducats." "You shall have it for fifty," said the King, "because you are a good judge, and I am therefore anxious to do you a favor." The courtier was obliged to become the possessor of the miserable daub, and pay the fifty ducats.

Mr. Thomas Hull the actor, was the original projector of the Theatrical fund for the benefit of decayed performers. A whimsical anecdote is told of him.—During the fanatical riots of 1780 in London, the mob attacked his house; in order to appease them, he sent them out a barrel of table beer untapped—which they did not like, and exhibited such resentment by pelting his house with stones. It appears Hull had always valued himself upon making the best apologies to the public to excuse any accident during an evening's performance at the Theatre. This habit was so deeply rooted into his nature, that he addressed the children of riot who were attacking his house, as follows—"Ladies and gentlemen—Upon my honor I have sent to Giffard's Brewhouse for some porter, and in the mean time I must humbly solicit your usual indulgence."

A GOOD STORY.

There lived lately in one of mountainous counties in Western Virginia many Dutchmen, and, among them, one named Henry Snyder; and there were likewise two brothers, called George and Jake Fulwiler—they were all rich, and each owned a mill. Henry Snyder was subject to fits of derangement, but they were not of such a nature as to render him disagreeable to any one. He merely conceived himself to be the Supreme Ruler of the Universe; and, while under the infatuation, had himself a throne built, on which he sat to try the cause of all who offended him; and passed them off to heaven or hell, as his humor prompted—he personating both Judge and culprit.

It happened one day that some difficulty occurred between Henry Snyder and the Fulwilers, on account of their mills; when, to be avenged, Henry Snyder took along with him a book in which he recorded his judgments, and mounted his throne to try their causes. He was heard to pass the following judgments.

Having prepared himself, (acting as Judge and yet responding for the accused,) he called George Fulwiler.

"Shorge Fulwiler, stand up. What hash you been doin in dis lower world?"

"Ah! Lort, I does not know."

"Well, Shorge Fulwider, has'nt you got a mill?"

"Yes, lort, I hash."

"Well, Shorge Fulwider, didn't you never take too much toll?"

"Yes, Lort, I hash—when der water was low, und mien stones wash dull, I take a leetle too much toll.

"Well, den, Shorge Fulwider, you must go to der left, mid der goats."

"Well, Shake Fulwider, now you stand up. What you been doin in dis lower world?"

[The trial proceeded throughout precisely like the former, and with the same result.]

"Now I tries mineself. Henry Shnyder! Henry Shnyder! stand up. What hash you been doin in dis lower world?"

"Ah! Lort, I does not know."

"Well, Henry Shnyder, has'nt you got a mill?"

"Yes, Lort, I hash."

"Well, Henry Shnyder, did'at you never take too much toll?"

"Yes, Lort, I hash—when der water wash low, and mien stones wash dull, I hash taken a leetle too much toll."

"But, Henry Shnyder, vat did you do wid der toll."

"Ah! Lort, I gives it to poor."

(Pausing.) "Well, Henry Shnyder, you must go to der right mid der sheep; but it is a tam tight squeeze!"

Patriotism.—When the Chancellor d'Aguesseau, who constantly resisted the encroachments of Louis XIV. on the liberties of the people, was sent for to Versailles by that monarch, he was thus encouraged by his amiable wife: "Go," said she, "forget in the king's presence your wife and your children,—sacrifice every thing except your honour."

Dr. Johnson complained of the disappointment which an intimate acquaintance with eminent men often occasioned. "At a distance," he said, "we see nothing but magnificence, and sublimity, and state; but upon a close and familiar approach, we discover narrowness, meanness, and insignificance."

An eccentric was used to say that it was not wicked to lie, swear, cheat or steal, and that he could prove it by scripture. Thus, it was not wicked to lie on a bed; to swear to the truth; to cheat the devil, or to steal from bad company.

Digitized by Google

A Marvellous Story.—I was bred up in a dislike of the marvellous, or the stupid wonderful, as my uncle called it. I must relate an anecdote in point. Some gentlemen were dining together, and relating their travelling adventures; one of them dwelt so much on the marvellous, that it induced another to give him a lesson.

"I was once," said he, "engaged in a skirmishing party in America; I advanced too far, was separated from my friends, and saw three Indians in pursuit of me; the horrors of the tomahawk in the hands of angry savages, took possession of my mind; I considered for a moment what was to be done—most of us love life, and mine was both precious and useful to my family; I was swift of foot, and fear added to my speed. After looking back—for the country was an open one—I at length perceived that one of my enemies had outran the others, and the well known saying of "Divide and conquer," occurred to me. I slackened my speed, and allowed him to come up; we engaged with mutual fury—I hope none here (bowing to the auditors) will doubt the result—in a few minutes he lay a corpse at my feet. In this short space of time the two Indians had advanced upon me, so I took again to my heels—not from cowardice, I can in truth declare—but with the hope of reaching a neighbouring wood, where I knew dwelt a tribe friendly to the English—this hope I was, however, forced to give up; for on looking back, I saw one of my pursuers far in advance of the other. I waited for him, recovering my almost exhausted breath, and soon this Indian shared the fate of the first. I had now only one enemy to deal with; but I felt fatigued, and being near the wood, I was more desirous to save my own life than destroy another of my fellow creatures. I plainly perceived smoke curling up among the trees—I redoubled my speed, I prayed to Heaven—I felt assured my prayer would be granted; but at this moment the yell of the Indian's voice sounded in my ears—I then thought I felt his warm breath—there was no chance—I turned round——Here the gentleman who had related the wonderful stories at first, grew impatient past his endurance; he called out, "Well, sir, and you killed him also?" "No sir—he killed me."—Memoirs of a Gentleman of the Old School.

One Tokens of Kindness.—"Sometimes," says Mademoiselle Avrillion, "the Emperor (Bonaparte) would give us a slap, or pull our ears; but these were favours which he did not bestow upon every body, and we could judge of the degree of his good humour by the greater or less pain he put us to. One day, when he seemed to be in better humour than usual, he pinched my cheek so hard as to make me scream, and, as I was plump, I retained for several days a visible mark of his Majesty's satisfaction. I need hardly say that the Emperor had no intention of hurting us on these occasions. He often used the Empress in the same way, while we were dressing her. He preferred slapping her on the shoulders, and though she continually exclaimed, "Have done, have done, Bonaparte," yet he continued this amusement of his as long as he pleased. The Empress forced a laugh, but I have more than once seen him bring tears into her eyes."

Spoiling the Marriage Ceremony.—The following statement is no jest but a positive fact:—"A young man, in business, in Liverpool, led his blushing bride to the altar in the Old Church of that town, and when the question was asked, 'Wilt thou love and cherish' &c., he answered as it is customary—and added, 'When she needed, he'd bang her.' The girl immediately stopped the clergyman, and asked if it was too late to retract. On being told that it was not, she turned upon her heel, and quietly walked out of the church, saying that 'A man who could say what he had said at such a moment, in jest, was most likely to put his threat into execution, and bade him choose another mate.—Manchester Paper.

If a man pronounces you a liar, it is very absurd to call him out for the same. This ceremony does not prove that you are not a liar; it only shows that you possess sufficient courage to stand at the distance of twelve paces, while a pistol—probably a leadless one—is fired at you.

Alexander one day, expressed to Duroc the intense desire he had to possess a pair of breeches of the emperor Napoleon—Duroc sounded his master on this extraordinary subject. Napoleon laughed heartily and said, "give him all I have, excepting you must leave me a pair for a change." This is authentic. The Emperor of Russia is said never to have worn any other breeches during the campaigns of 1813 and 14.

LORENZO DOW.

The Hillsborough, Ohio, Democrat relates of Lorenzo, that when he was on a western tour, some years ago, in holding forth to one of their congregations, he dwelt with unusual pertinacity upon the wickedness of mankind, observing that "many persons become so extremely wicked, that they actually swelled and burst-ed, and brought forward numerous instances to substantiate the truth of his declaration. During the whole of his sermon, he had been patiently listened to by a gentleman, whose abdominal rotundity and corpulent dimensions, bespoke him rather a Falstaff than an Edson, who treasured up the words of Dow, for his future benefit, little dreaming that he himself, should be the unhappy victim of Divine wrath, and this too in so short a period.

The sermon being ended, the gentleman repaired to the inn, where he put up for the night, and was shown to an apartment in which a number of other gentlemen also lodged, where he betook himself to balmy slumber. The impression, however, which had been made upon his mind, by the language of the preacher, was such as to disturb his nocturnal repose to such a degree, that it was impossible for him to sleep; he already fancied himself swelling to an enormous size, and awaking in great agony, found himself perspiring freely; and being unable to chase the false delusion from his mind, he sprung from his bed, resolved to have "light" upon his perilous condition. He seized his unmentionables, and eagerly drawing them on, was further surprised to find that it was with the greatest difficulty that he could force his monstrous legs into the lower parts. He succeeded in that; but, alas! imagine his consternation upon finding that the waistband would not encircle his prodigious body by about twelve inches!—Being now certain that his was "a gone case," and expecting soon to be called from "time to eternity," the landlord was awoke, and a light brought into the room; when to the great relief of the gentleman, and the singular gratification of the host and his other guests, it was discovered that he had through mistake, forced on the garment of a man about half his own size!—It may be proper to remark, that the gentleman still lives to amuse his friends by the recital of the story, and has neither increased or diminished in size since the occurrence transpired.—Spy.

During a cause in which the boundaries of a piece of land were to be ascertained, the counsel of the one part stated, 'we lye on this side,' my Lord; and the counsel of the other part, 'said we lye on this side.' The Chancellor stood up and said, if you lie on both sides, whom will you have me to believe?

Digitized by Google

THE METEORIC PHENOMENON.

The negroes stared: old women stood amazed
And wild little boys with fright were crazed,
As the fiery meteors shot on high,
Like rockets quick streaming through the sky,
And many trembled—as well they may
For they thought 'twas the dawn of the Judgement day.

"Alack! alack! quoth the gaping slave,
White man now pale—he no be so brave,
Come Ned and see how de stars do fall,
Lord! look what a great big fiery ball,
Ah! Massa no beat me more—eh?
He 'fraid—for he know 'tis de Judgement day."

The old maid lay in her sleepless bed,
With a thousand vexing thoughts in her head,
Of beaux and parties nor more for her,
But she saw the meteors shooting—"Pshaw!
"Why for trifles do I weep this way.
When stars are falling—'tis the Judgement day."

The urchin waked by the stir around
Leap'd from his bed at a single bound—
As he saw the meteors shooting afar
He shriek'd with terror "oh my! Mamma!
Get up, Mamma! oh! get up and pray,
The world's at an end—'tis the Judgement day."

The brave men looked on the blue expanse,
And a thousand meteors met his glance,
"Well! the stars are falling—I'll declare!"
He saw a crowd "is a white man there,
If so, I wish him to witness with me,
When to-morrow I swear 'tis the Judgement day."

The wise man gazed on the beautiful light
Coolly and calmly, with pious delight,
And his warm heart glow'd with fervent praise
As he thought of his great Creator's ways.
Then he slept 'till the dawn without dismay,
For he thought not once 'twas the Judgement day."

THE BELL AND KNOCKER.—A would-be wit, the other evening, experienced an improvement on the old pun of ringing the bell. After repeating the anecdote to an elderly matron and her three daughters, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, the mother jocosely observed, "Well, sir, here are three belles. Which of them will you ring?" "O pardon me, madam," he replied, "I am in no hurry, I assure you, to reduce the pun to practice." "Indeed, sir!" cried the youngest, a pert little miss of sixteen, "then, since you don't choose to ring the belle," (pointing to the eldest,) "suppose you try the knocker." Suiting the action to the word, she gave him a smart box on the ear, for the want of gallantry.

MISS POLLY GRIMES.

Miss Polly Grimes is still a maid;
She says she ne'er will wed:
Her week-day frock's blue calico,
Her Sunday one is red.

Her cheeks are blooming as the rose—
Her eyes are heavenly blue:
She does not wear a "dunstable"
To hide her face from view.

She never lets her beaux "make free,"
Nor listens to their vows:
When she gets up she makes the beds—
At evening milks the cows.

Nor does she like affected belles
Attempt to poetise:
She's busy every baking day,
At making cakes and pies.

She's always up at six o'clock,
In time to skim the milk:
Her bonnet's made of yellow straw—
And neatly trimmed with silk.

Her mind is of a serious turn,
She often thinks of death:
She does not lace her stays so tight,
They make her gape for breath.

Her mother thinks there never was
One like her in the world:
Her hair is parted o'er her brow—
She never has it curled.

Beloved by all her female friends
She leads an easy life,
And any man in town would jump,
To get her for his wife. COMUS.

It is Hard to Regain Reputation.

"You know you're a tief, Pat!" "I know I have been
But my folly and wickedness fully I've seen;
Yet no one will trust me to work or to starve,
And if I stay here, I must steal or must starve.
If you a good word to the captain will spake,
That I may a trip to America take,
You shall find I'll be honest, for all the old stain,
Nor disgrace the green isle of the ocean again."
Kind Dennis consents, and poor Pat is receiv'd;
The word of strict Dennis was aptly believ'd.
Escap'd from his guilt and escap'd from his shame,
In a new world poor Pat hoped to earn a new name.
He was kind to the crew, to the captain obedient,
To please he was never without an expedient.
He work'd and he sung, morning watch or midnight,
And Pat of the crew was the life and delight;
Even Dennis (at first not a little suspicious
That Pat's new-found honesty might be factitious)
Felt easy respecting the pledge of his word,
And rejoic'd that his friend was to honour restor'd.
When one day, while Patrick the ship's deck was washing,
And with bucket drew sea-water up for more splashing;
Relying too much on the hold of his foot,
And reaching and bending his whole body to
The ship gave a heel—Patrick's balance was lost,
And himself and his bucket to old Davy tost.
"Man overboard! out with a rope!" was the cry—
When Dennis on Pat, mid the waves, cast his eye.
"Catch the spalpeen," roar'd Dennis, "he's made me a liar!
And so devil roast him before his great fire!
To strive against bad edication's in vain!
Och! the tief, how he's got at his old tricks again!
If I saw not, I wouldn't believe how he took it!
Only look how the tief swims away with the bucket."
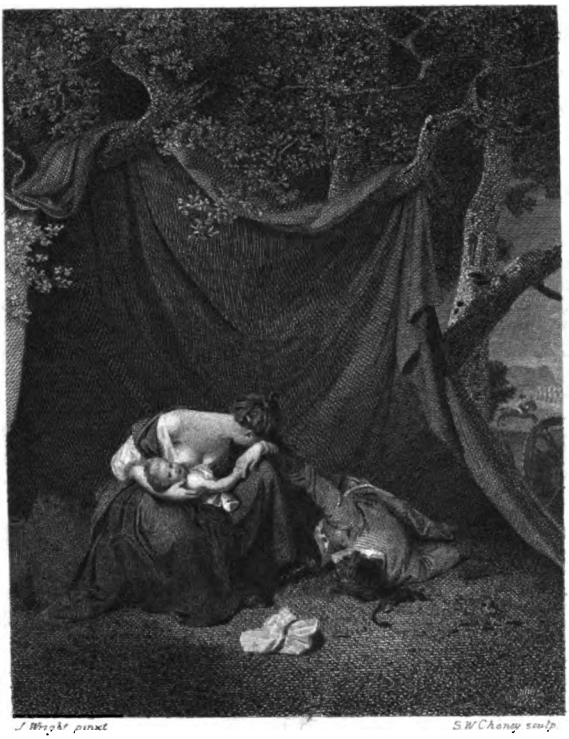
W. D.

CURIOUS CLOCK.—The most curious thing in the Cathedral at Lubeck, is a clock of singular construction. It is calculated to answer astronomical purposes, representing the places of the sun and moon in the ecliptic, the moon's age, a perpetual almanack, and many other contrivances. The clock, as an inscription sets forth, was placed in the Church on Candlemas-day, in 1405. Over the face of it appears an image of our Saviour, and on either side of the image are folding doors, so constructed as to fly open every day when the clock strikes twelve. At this hour, a set of figures, representing the twelve apostles, come out from the door on the left hand of the image, and pass by in review before it, each figure making its obedience by bowing as it passes that of our Saviour, and afterwards entering the door on the right hand. When the procession terminates the doors close.—Clark's Travels in Scandinavia.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google



THE DYING SOLDIER.

Published by S.C. Atkinson.

Digitized by Google

ATKINSON'S

CASKET

OR GEMS OF

LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

Gallant in strife, and noble in their ire,
The battle is their pastime. They go forth
Gay in the morning, as to the summer's sport:
When evening comes, the glory of the morn,
The youthful warrior is a clod of clay.

No. 3.] PHILADELPHIA.—MARCH. [1834.

THE DEAD SOLDIER.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

Soldier!—She's near thee now,
For whom thy latest prayer
Was but to gaze upon her brow,
And bless her faithful care;
The death-shot in thy breast;
The death-mist o'er thine eye,
For this, thy faultering footsteps prest
On, toward thy tent, to die.

She's kneeling at thy side,—
Her face of anguish, see!
How changed that bright and blooming bride
Who left her home for thee.
The battle-smoke curls high
Above yon reeking plain,
Thy comrades raise the victor-cry,
Wake, Soldier!—'tis in vain!

Mourn! mourn, thou desolate one,
No more thy path forlorn
Shall glow with earth's refulgent sun,
It hath no second morn:
Go in thy deep despair
Down to thy husband's tomb,
And lay thy young affections there,—
They know no second bloom.

Babe! Sorrow hath no power
O'er innocence like thine,
And thou must gild her lonely bower,
A star from Mercy's shrine.
Thy sweetly slumbering breath
That o'er her cheek shall stream,
Can chase the forms of war and death,
That haunt her nightly dream.

Still with thy cherub art
Her misery beguile,
And when the grief-pang rends her heart
Wear then thy father's smile;
None else thy skill can share,
None else such balm bestow,
For thou canst bring a mother's care
To heal a widow's woe.

BYRON'S PRAYER.

BY J. MALCOLM.

My soul is sick of this long day,
I'm weary of its lingering light—
And loathing life I turn away
To weep and wish for night.
I long to lay me gently down
In slumber on my mother's breast—
And would exchange an empire's crown
For everlasting rest.

Though but in manhood's morn I stand—
I've lived the laurel wreath to gain—
My songs are heard in every land,
And beauty breathes the strain.
Her smiles and sweetest tears are mine,
And yet of love—youth—fame possess—
Oh! gladly would my heart resign
All—all for endless rest.

The dreams for which men wish to live
Or dare to die—the gilded cloud
Of glory o'er the tomb I'd give
For silence and a shroud.
I ask no paradise on high—
With being's strife on earth oppress—
The only heaven for which I sigh
Is rest—eternal rest!

My natal day with tears I keep,
Which I rejoiced in when a child,
And each return the birth I weep
O'er which my mother smiled.
Bid heaven take back the birth it gave,
That I a cold and silent guest,
Within my father's house the grave,
May find a long—long rest.

Without my own consent I came,
But with my wildest wish I go—
For I would fainly be the same
I was—ere born to wo.
My cold hush'd heart, with no pale gleams
Of consciousness to wake or waste,
I would have slept within its dreams,
And rest—eternal rest.

Digitized by Google

Written for the Casket.

GAMBLING.

In the dreadful phalanx of vices, which darken the prospects of human happiness, and throw a blight over the fair hopes of society, GAMBLING stands among the foremost:—the more dangerous, it may be, because in its earliest movements it presents itself, not in the form of an enemy, against whose attack the heart might guard itself, but under the specious semblance of friendliness, and assuming the name of amusement, harmless, innocent, nay, possibly even profitable amusement.

Advocates for the convivial card party may contend that cards, when used without any reference to pecuniary hazard, or advantage, may be used, to say the very least, innocently, since the playing of a game of cards involves in some degree the exercise of mind, and therefore may conduce to the strengthening and improvement of the mental powers. Our business lies not here, however we may disapprove of card playing, as calculated to induce the habit, and the love of gambling; it is not simply card playing, as practised at mixed evening parties, which will here be brought under consideration. We would only remark, that many a youth of promise, who has begun with card playing, has ended with the destructive crime of gambling; and we may be permitted to caution those who indulge in this amusement, to beware of its tendency.

In considering the subject of Gambling, that fell destroyer of private virtue—that cruel bane of domestic peace—we have but to look at its consequences, to stamp us with its character. It is gambling, in its effects, which is to be brought into view. Here the enemy is disrobed of that specious covering, called innocent enjoyment, which concealed its deformity. Here, in its results, it is presented as a cruel demon—a foe to social order—to social virtue and happiness. Who that has witnessed the deleterious influence of gambling, on the morals of our young men, and, of course, on the welfare of society, but must deprecate the practice, as a bane to the happiness of mankind at large, and as a poisonous fountain, opened in the bosom of our country, to blight, with its dark waters, those goodly plants, which have arisen and flourished in the fair garden of our national prosperity; giving promise of future shelter and protection, when time shall have laid in dust our towering cedars, and our hearts of oak.

Could we look into the arena of dissipated life, and behold, in a group, the immediate, and the more remote victims of this vice,—where could we find language to express our grief—our indignation? Behold that countenance, convulsed with rage, expressing demoniac hatred, and revenge thirsting for life! That countenance was once dignified by the grace, and the beauty, of human feeling!—that being was once susceptible of the generous sympathies of our nature, he was once happy in the exercise of those charities which constitute a source of man's purest bliss! What fiend has wrought this deplorable change? Gambling!—Hark!—that dreadful report, and that despairing groan have told a story of death! The crime of gambling has sent an unprepared spirit into the indescribable light of ETERNITY! The man was a husband, a father, a son! Behold the wife of his youth, overwhelmed with unutterable agony, sink to the grave, the victim of another's crime! See those innocent and helpless children, for a father's guilt, homeless wanderers upon the face of the earth, a prey to want, and wretchedness, and sin! Behold that broken-hearted mother, doomed to death by the child for whom she has suffered, and watched, and toiled! The hand of her beloved, her cherished son, has prepared her premature grave! See that aged man, descending in sorrow to the dark chambers of death!—his tottering steps hastened thither by the unnatural cruelty of his son; for whom he has spent days and years of care and toil! Oh! the arm on which he had depended, has given the death blow to the bosom of parental affection! Gambling has stamped on the soul of its wretched votary, the tremendous crime of parricide! Who then can speak its horror! Now turn your eye to yonder gallows, erecting on an eminence, that the world may witness the dreadful consequence of guilt. That ignominious death is preparing for one who entered life with the fairest prospects of usefulness, respectability, and happiness. "How is the fine gold changed!" Gambling has been the ruin of that man! He began with risking small sums in play. The unwary steps of youth descended the slippery paths of vice—The man who might have been a pillar and an ornament of society; who in his example, and in the extending influence of that example, might have proved a blessing to his cotemporaries, and to unborn millions—that unhappy man became a gambler! The Gambler, wrought to madness by unsuccessful hazard, became a murderer!—and now he dies!—cut off by the hand of justice from all the dear charities of our nature, sent away in the meridian of life, through the land of the shadow of death, leaving behind him blasted hopes, withered affections, and broken hearts; the groans of the widow and the wailings of the orphan. And where is he?—tremendous question! His disembodied spirit has entered that world, whose dread realities he disregarded—in the light of that LAW, holy and just and good, whose awful and glorious sanctions he slighted and abused. An immortal spirit, sent to eternity, beneath the dreadful weight of neglected privileges, of abused gifts, of misapplied talents, of murdered affection! What heart can conceive the horror of such a departure?

Behold those young men engaged in deadly strife. They were friends. They became gamblers. The infatuation of vice blinded reason, so that they called crime, honour! The gamblers have become duelists. Many hearts are involved in the misery of their last dreadful act. Death shuts to mortal eyes the awful scene; or if one survived, the curse of the first murderer rests upon him—a fugitive and a vagabond, he wanders over the earth, with blood upon his soul!

See that abode of poverty and wretchedness; domestic peace once smiled within those walls. The husband and the father became a gambler; and with demoniac cruelty, he now stabs the heart which once he loved. See that pale, wan countenance, that fragile form, bending beneath the weight of grief, the bitter grief of unrequited, abused affection. She would die for the peace of him who has forgotten his vows to cherish her happiness. That being, so fair, so comfortless, now watches, in the paleness of her faded beauty, the midnight taper, counting the long, long minutes, till the return of her abandoned husband may give to her breaking heart the bitter satisfaction of knowing that for a few more miserable hours, he is comparatively safe, within the protecting walls of his changed and abused home. The first faint glimmerings of day are seen in the east; and now the tottering step of the self-ruined man is heard at the door. It is opened by the gentle being, who even in ruin, still loves the betrayer of her peace. No word of reproach escapes her lips; nay, she smiles! Oh! crime has changed that heart to adamant, or he would feel that smile. But dreadful passions have set their mark upon his once open and noble brow. His voice has lost all the sweetness of humanity; that last cast of the dice, rendered him pennyless; and on the innocent, he wreaks the madness of his rage, he spurns the affection, which has watched in its patient love. With boisterous and cruel language, he accosts that meek spirit, who so often has prayed for his peace; with horrible imprecations, he invokes eternal woe upon the mother of his children!

Digitized by Google

And now, for a little while without hope, exhausted nature sinks to starting and unrefreshing slumber; but his spirit is awake to horror; and hateful to him is the returning light of day. He rises, in dreadful gloom, and in the maddening tortures of self-reproach, he hears his helpless babes cry to their mother for bread, which she has not to give. To him they turn not in the innocence of their affection; for they have often trembled before his fury. With horror, he remembers that gambling has been his destruction, and the ruin of his family. O! if he be not dead to moral feelings, he must experience the madness of regret. O! to return to what he once was—to begin anew the career of life.—But that may not be. He plunges in the inebriating cup the remains of reason and conscience; he winds his spirit up to the madness of desperate courage, and dies by his own hand. Tremendous goal to the mortal career of an accountable, a deathless spirit! What human power of calculation can compute the dreadful consequences of Gambling! In its slow, but deadly progress, it poisons the healthful streams of moral existence. It changes to a desart, infested by demons, and the monsters of passion, the paradise of domestic life. It renders the heart callous to the refined, delightful, and ennobling sensibilities of humanity; it paralizes the lofty powers of the mind; it degrades and debases the spirit of man. It changes the voice of friendship to discord wild. It pierces, as with a barbed arrow, the heart of affection. It is followed by poverty—not that which GOD in his wisdom sometimes suffers to fall upon those who love his Law: Not respectable, confiding poverty, smiling in its holy submission; but the ragged, comfortless, guilty penury, induced by multiplied crime. It presents to its deluded, disappointed votary, the poisoned bowl of intemperance—the pistol, and the dagger of murder, and of suicide. Crimes of other names, and of multiform shape, follow in its deadly train—and oh! who can utter the dreadful, the amazing responsibility, resting upon talents sacrificed to a debasing vice; talents which might have been consecrated to the holy cause of virtue, to the glory of GOD, and the happiness of man. Who can tell the infinite value of those powers, which, rightly applied, might, by the blessing of heaven, have prepared immortal souls to shine as the stars of the firmanent, forever and ever. Who can appreciate the amazing loss of one indestructible spirit; which, in its day of probation, gave itself over to the dominions of an infatuating and degrading vice.

If there are tears in Heaven, angels might weep
At such a sight as this.

And the influence, the dreadful influence of such an example. Its effect dies not with the self-destroying gambler. The half is not told! What mortal voice can speak the extent of this influence on future generations—on distant nations—on the awards of ETERNITY! MARY.

EARTH'S WEARY ONES.

BY MRS. JANE E. LOCKE.

Open the grave, the vaulted grave,
For the weary ones of earth—
They are pressing on, and their bosoms heave
For the morn of heavenly birth:
They are pressing on,—in the mockery
Of joy and of hope—they long to die:
They are pressing on, in the strength of power,
And the pride of wealth—they wait the hour.

Ye may trace them in the hall of song,
By the lamp's high flaming light,
Where pipe, and tabret their notes prolong,
And jewels are sparkling bright.
In the show of beauty, of mirth, and pride,
Light down the mazy dance they glide;
By the pallid cheek neath the smiles they wear,
And the smothered sigh, ye may trace them there!

They are decked in the ruby's ruddy glow,
And wealth of the far down sea;
And the diamond shines but to mock their wo,
And proclaim the spirit free.
But alas, alas, for the fond hopes crushed,
For the tones of love in the dark tomb hushed,
For affection changed and vows forgot—
Nor gems, nor pearls, can that memory blot.

Raise ye the veil at the festal hour,
From that fair unfurrowed brow;—
A bride!—but wo for the bridegroom's power—
The grave ye may open now:—
From the glittering robes of royalty,
Peers the broken heart thro' the sunken eye;
And the wreath of fame crowns the weary band—
Mid the honored crowd, the hopeless stand.

Ye may trace them in the house of prayer,
On the lowly bended knee—
With uplifted eye and a brow of care—
The burthened soul to free.
Then open the grave—they are pressing on,
In beauty and youth, but a visage wan;
In festal halls—neath the laurel's wave,
They are weary of earth—open the grave.

Many people are praised for a giddy kind of good humor, which is as much a virtue as drunkenness.

Digitized by Google

From B. Hall's Fragments of Voyages and Travels, 2 vols. Published by E. C. Mielke, Philada.

Visit to the Sultan of Pontiana, in Borneo; By Admiral Sir Samuel Hood.

In the summer of 1814, Sir Samuel Hood made a voyage, in his majesty's ship Minden, to the eastern parts of his station. We called first at Acheen, on the north end of the island of Sumatra, where we held some very amusing intercourse with the king of that district, whose capital the admiral visited. From thence we steered over to Pulo Penang, or Prince of Wales's Island, and thence down the Straits of Malacca, entering the China Sea by the beautiful Straits of Sincapore. The admiral's chief object was to visit Java; but as there lay three routes before him to choose between, viz. the Straits of Gaspar, the Straits of Banca, and the Caramata passage, he preferred taking the last and widest, which also led him near the western shores of the immense island of Borneo. On reaching the equator, he steered for the mouth of the great river Lava, which passes the town of Pontiana. The weather being very favourable, the ship was anchored, and the barge got ready for an expedition.

* * * * *

In the mean time, as there existed no dispute about the navigation of the River Lava, we rowed up very peaceably towards the great city of Pontiana. On our meeting a canoe with a Malay in it, the admiral, who had been studying Marsden's dictionary all the way, stood up in the barge, made the men lie on their oars, and to their great astonishment, and probably to that of the native, called out, in the Malay tongue,

"Which is the way to the sultan's house?"

To Sir Samuel's unspeakable delight the man whom he addressed understood him, and after offering to show us the landing-place, paddled off ahead of us. Our fellows gave way as hard as they could, but the Malay kept the lead; and as we shot past the Chinese towns, one on each bank, the natives crowded to the beach, as much astonished, no doubt, with our strange cocked hats, swords, and oddly shaped boats, as we could be with their long tails and wild-looking junks, or with the creases which every Malay carries by his side. The fierce-looking weapon is not, in form, unlike the waving sword one sees in the pictures of the angel Michael, though it is not above a foot and a half in length.

The sultan's cousin received the admiral and his party at the gate of the palace, and led him by the hand along the causeway of flag stones to the residence of the monarch. Directly in the middle of the gateway, which was only ten feet wide and about as many in height, there stood a 24 pounder gun. On the top of the arch there was built a small square room, from holes in which peeped out the muzzles of five or six field-pieces, the whole affair resembling very much that part of a child's box of toys which represents the stronghold or castle. Within the high wall surrounding the palace, we counted innumerable large guns scattered about, apparently with no other object than to be seen—as if the mere look of a cannon were expected to do the work of a fight! The same number of mock barrels of gunpowder, similarly disposed, would have answered the purpose equally well, or perhaps better, for there appeared no way in which the guns could be fired, without doing more injury to the besieged than to the besiegers.

On we went, till we were met by the sultan himself, at the inner side of the quadrangle. He courteously conducted the admiral to a large room or hall of audience, and having begged his guest to sit down at a small table, took a chair by his side, and began a conversation as if they had been long acquainted. Of course, in spite of the admiral's proficiency, this could not be accomplished without an interpreter; and the services of a very clever Malay boy, whom we had brought with us from the ship, were brought into requisition. The hall, in which we were first received, might have been about fifty feet square, bleak, unfurnished, and comfortless, with an uncovered mud floor. It was so feebly lighted by a few windows almost hid by Venetian blinds, that we could only discover the roof had been left bare and unfinished. After sitting for about ten minutes, the sultan rose and led the way to another apartment, apparently of still larger dimensions, but literally so dark, that, had it not been for the light entering by the door we had left, and the one ahead of us, we could not have moved along without breaking our shins over the stones, sticks, and other rubbish lying in the way. We had next to make rather a difficult transit along a precarious kind of bridge, formed of a single plank laid across an ominous-looking pool or puddle of mud, which divided these two branches of the palace from each other.

All at once we were ushered into a splendid room, seventy or eighty feet square, brilliantly lighted and not ill furnished, and strongly contrasted with the darkness of the suite we had passed through. This total want of keeping, it may be mentioned, is quite in Oriental taste. They know tolerably well how to be magnificent on occasions; but they never learn how to be uniformly decent. The Asiatics, and even some other nations which might be named nearer home, can seldom afford to be taken by surprise. Indeed, I am not sure if more than one country can be alluded to, in which the people are at all hours ready to receive strangers, and have no occasion to make a fuss, or to change any thing when a rap comes to the door.

In the centre of this gorgeous room, on a part of the floor raised to about a foot and a half above the level of the rest, and laid with a rich Turkey carpet, stood a long table, at the top of which the sultan placed the admiral, and then made the signal for tea. First entered an attendant, bearing a large tray, on which were ranged several dozen of exceedingly small cups. This he placed on the carpet, and then squatted himself down cross-legged, beside it. Another attendant soon followed bearing the tea-pot, and he likewise popped himself down. After a conjuration of some minutes the cups were brought round, containing weak black tea, exquisite in flavour, but marvellously small in quantity.—There appeared no milk, but plenty of sugar candy. Some sweet sherbet was next handed round, very slightly acid, but so deliciously cool, that we appealed frequently to the vase or huge jar from which it was poured, to the great delight of the sultan, who assured us that this was the genuine sherbet described by the Persian poets. It was mixed, he told us, by a true believer, who had made more than one pilgrimage to Mecca.

Digitized by Google

At the upper end of the apartment, in a deep recess, partly hid from our view by a rich festoon of shawl drapery, we could just discover the sultan's bed, flanked by large mirrors, beyond which, in an adjacent chamber, was probably stowed away the sultan's most favoured wife.—But all this department of the establishment was thrown into such deep shade, that we could see none of the ladies, nor any of his highness's progeny, except one little boy, whom he introduced to us at supper. He appeared to be about five or six years old, very like his papa in miniature, rigged with turban and robes of cloth of gold.—At first the little fellow looked somewhat startled, but he soon recovered his dignity, and sat on our knees, without much apprehension of being swallowed up.

Both the upper corners of the room were screened off by white curtains, eight or ten feet high, so as to form smaller chambers. One of these served the purpose of a pantry, or subsidiary kitchen, at least we observed the dishes issuing from it, and thought we could distinguish the well-known sound of the cook's angry reproaches—a note which, like that of muttering thunder, is nearly the same in every climate. The other corner was soon made out to be a sort of temporary nook, from which the ladies of the palace and the young sultans and sultanas might spy the strangers. This we ascertained from seeing sundry very pretty faces thrust out occasionally between the folds of the curtain, and by the sound of many an ill-suppressed giggle amongst the peeping damsels.

A half-choked squall from some rebellious baby, or a sound thwack on the pate of an overcurious urchin, betrayed the nursery in terms not to be mistaken. Indeed, I do not wonder at their eagerness to look at the admiral, whose very appearance, in any company in the world, or under any circumstances, must have claimed no small share of admiration. The characteristic prominence of the Hood nose, so well known for a glorious half century in the navy, with the tall and gallant bearing of our lamented chief, to say nothing of the Nelson-like circumstance of his right arm having been shorn away in battle, and I may add, the peculiar sweetness of his voice and the benignant expression of his countenance, which, while they won all hearts to him, showed a mind entirely at peace with itself. Every thing, in short, that was great and amiable, conspired to render Sir Samuel Hood one of the most interesting officers of his time.

The sultan appeared to enter into his guest's character at once, and neither overloaded him with attention, nor failed to treat him as a person to whom much respect was due. I heard Sir Samuel say afterwards, that he was particularly struck with the sultan's good breeding, in not offering to assist him in cutting his meat. The sultan merely remarked, that few people were so expert as his guest even with both hands: adding, neatly enough, that on this account the distinction which his wound had gained for him was more cheaply purchased than people supposed. While the admiral was hunting for some reply to this novel compliment, his host remarked, that in Borneo it was considered fashionable to eat with the left hand.

The supper, which soon followed the tea, consisted of about a dozen dishes of curry, all different from one another, and a whole poultry yard of grilled and boiled chickens, many different sorts of salt fish, with great basins of rice at intervals, jars of pickles, piles of sliced pine-apple, sweetmeats, and cakes. Four male attendants stood by with goblets of cool sherbet, from which, ever and anon, they replenished our glasses; besides whom, a number of young Malay girls waited at a distance from the table, and ran about nimbly with the plates and dishes.

All persons who approached the sultan fell on their knees, and having joined their hands in the act of supplication, lowered their foreheads till they actually touched the ground. The sultan held out his hand, which the people eagerly embraced in theirs, and pressed to their lips.—What they had to say was then spoken, and after again bending their foreheads to the ground they retired. This ceremonial took place only in the outer room or hall of audience, for no one, except the strangers and one or two of the principal officers of state, was permitted to approach nearer than twenty or thirty feet of the raised part of the floor where we sat. At that distance, a group of about twenty persons, probably the nobles of the court, sat cross-legged on the ground in a semicircle facing the sultan, and in profound silence during the whole supper, no part of which appeared to fall to their share.

Soon afterwards the cloth was removed, and a beautiful scarlet covering, of the texture of a shawl, substituted in its place. This might, perhaps, give us a hint for after dinner. Instead of dull mahogany, or dazzling white, why might we not spread over the table a cloth couleur de rose for the benefit of the complexions of the company?

The sultan now produced a letter which he had received from Lord Minto, when governor-general, thanking his highness for the friendly disposition he had always manifested towards the English people trading to the great city of Pontiana, and in a particular manner expressing his obligation for the manner in which Mr. Palmer, a wealthy merchant of Calcutta, had been received by the sultan, when his ship was wrecked on the west coast of Borneo.

"Mr. Palmer," said the sultan, "lived for some weeks with me, and on returning to Calcutta, sent me these beautiful mirrors and chandeliers. But," added he, pointing again to the governor-general's letter, "much as I value embellishments so splendid, I esteem far more this little signature, and these few words from Lord Minto. Still," continued his highness, "my wishes in this respect have never been fully satisfied. I have long desired to possess a specimen of Sir Samuel Hood's writing; and though I never ventured to hope that I should have had an opportunity of seeing his signature written with his own hand, I have always felt how essentially that circumstance would add to its value in my estimation."

Digitized by Google

It was wonderful how well the shrewd little Malay interpreter expressed all this rigmarole to the admiral, who cheerfully agreed to the proposal, and desired me to send for his writing case. As I rose, the admiral whispered to me, "I wish you would contrive, at the same time, to see what the boat's crew are about. Try, also, if you can get them something to eat; the fellows must be hungry enough by this time—but mind they don't get too much toddy."

I found the crew seated on the mud floor of a large room close to the beach, and open on all sides, like a tent without walls. The Johnnies were in such high glee, that I feared they had already trespassed too deeply on the toddy pot; but I was glad to find that their satisfaction arose from a safer source, in the shape of a glorious hot supper, which Jack was tucking in, to the delight and astonishment of the natives, who had been ordered by the sultan to supply them with as much curry and rice as they chose to eat. The cook had no sinecure of it that evening!

I soon returned to the palace, and the admiral having written several lines for his host's album, expressed his wish to retire to rest. The sultan instantly rose, and having conducted his honoured guest to the outer door, he left him in charge of half a score of the principal officers of the palace, amongst whom were several of the sultan's own near relatives. This guard of honour accompanied Sir Samuel to his bed-room, and it cost him a good deal of trouble and some address to free himself from his company—their intention evidently being to bestow their tediousness upon his excellency all night.

Scarcely was this party dismissed, when to our great surprise, the sultan himself came to the door of the house in which the admiral and his suite were lodged. Sir Samuel feared that he might possibly have given offence to some of the worthy connexions of the sultan by dismissing them too abruptly, and that the sultan had called for "an explanation." The honest Asiatic had no such gunpowder fancies in his head. On the contrary, the object of his visit was to press upon the admiral's acceptance two large and beautiful diamonds. The poor admiral was now reduced to a great dilemma. He could not, he thought, with any official propriety, accept the present; and yet he felt very unwilling to hurt the generous sultan's feelings, especially as his highness had paddled at midnight through the mud of his own approach to make the offer. The sultan saw at a glance what a mistake he had made, and instantly withdrew, laughing, however, and saying such was the custom of his nation. I think the admiral was sorry afterwards that he had not carried in the boat some trinkets of correspondent value, or that he had not accepted the diamonds, and afterwards sent something still more precious to the sultan.

Very early in the morning, long before there was the least peep of dawn, the admiral roused us all out of bed, ordered the boat to be manned, and declared his intention of dropping down the river while it was yet cool, so as to reach the ship before the fierce heat of the sun had set in. I suspect, also, that he wished to escape the salutes and other fussifications, of which he had seen some preparations over night. But in this he partly reckoned without his host, for scarcely had he gained the distance of two or three hundred yards from the shore, when the heavy guns of the batteries began to fire a royal salute.—The night was uncommonly dark and still, and the successive flashes and reports of the cannons were followed by a long series of echoes from the edges of the damp forests lining the banks of the three different branches or forks of the river. The admiral, who had the finest perception possible for all that was picturesque or beautiful, was exceedingly struck with the grandeur of this nocturnal salute, and having made the men lay their oars across the boat, while she drifted quickly down the river, he stood up in the stern-sheets in order to enjoy the scene more completely. At each of the first dozen discharges we were near enough to be illuminated by the flash, and a smile of delight could be seen on the veteran's countenance as sounds so dear to him once more caught his ear. It is not improbable that they recalled to his memory the glorious night action of the Nile; in which it is not too much to say, that amongst all the distinguished warriors whom Nelson had gathered round him, there was not one on whom this great chief more firmly relied in battle, or to whom, personally, he was more attached in private life.

A trifling incident occurred shortly afterwards, which suggested to our thoughts another important service of Sir Samuel Hood's, which, although it be familiarly known in the navy, may not be so fresh in the recollection of persons on shore. A question arose in the boat as to whether or not the land-wind was blowing. Some said there was a breeze up the river, while others maintained that the wind blew down towards the sea. The admiral let us go on speculating and arguing for some time, and then said, "You are both wrong; there is not a breath of air either up or down the river. At all events we shall soon see, if you will strike me a light." This was done accordingly; and the admiral, standing on the after-thwart, held the naked candle high over his head, while the men ceased rowing.

"There, you see," exclaimed he, "the flame stands quite upright, which proves, that if there be any breeze at all, it blows no faster than the stream runs down."

As he yet spoke, the flame bent from the land, and in the next instant was puffed out by a slight gust from the forest.

* * * * *

It would be quite impossible, within any moderate compass, even to enumerate the important services which Sir Samuel Hood rendered to his country, both before and after the time alluded to; nor can it be necessary to do so, for they are still so fresh in the recollection of the navy that they are often quoted as examples in every walk of duty. His forte appears to have been that invaluable quality of all great commanders, promptitude in seeing what was best to be done, and decision of purpose in carrying it into execution. At the moment of greatest doubt and difficulty, and when scarcely any one else could see through the confusion, he appears invariably to have taken those useful practical views which the calmest subsequent reflection proved to have been the most expedient.

Digitized by Google

One of the most important, and also the most amusing instances of the effect of his resolute and characteristic presence of mind and boldness of manner, occurred in the summer of 1797, when Nelson attacked the town and fortifications of Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe. The enterprise failed; Nelson was wounded and carried on board in the only boat not captured or destroyed, while the remaining officers and men were necessarily left without any means of defence or escape. Sir Thomas Troubridge and Captain Hood now found themselves in the very heart of the town, at the head of only a handful of seamen and marines carrying merely a few pikes, but surrounded by several thousands of well armed Spaniards. As the boats had been all demolished in the surf, or knocked to pieces by the fire of the batteries, retreat became impossible, and capture or destruction would inevitably have awaited them the moment daybreak showed their small numbers and wretched plight. In this dilemma Captain Hood went forward alone to the Spanish governor, and said he was sent by the commanding officer of the British troops and seamen within the walls to state, that as they had been disappointed in their expectation of finding treasure in the town, they were disposed to return peaceably to their ships, if boats were provided them for that purpose, but that should any means be taken to molest or retard them, they would then set fire to the town in different places, and force their way out of it at the point of the bayonet. With the utmost deliberation, and without betraying the smallest haste or anxiety, he then pulled out his watch, and said, "I am directed to give you ten minutes to consider of this offer."—See the Naval Chronicle, volume xvii. page 19.

Don Antonio, the governor, looked amazed at the coolness of this proposal from persons whom he conceived—and with good reason—to be his prisoners. He proposed to hold a council of war immediately, and let the British commander know their determination in the course of an hour; but Captain Hood saw the impression which his argument had produced, and again holding up his watch, declared he could not spare his excellency a single second; and as the fatal minute approached, he turned round and prepared to rejoin his shipmates. The governor, alarmed at the possible consequences of driving men so commanded into extremities, acceded to the proposals made by Captain Hood, and agreed to provide the defeated party with boats.

Next morning, accordingly, the Spaniard, having once pledged himself to certain terms, kept good faith, and not only allowed them all to return to their ships, but, previously to the embarkation of the invaders, he considerately furnished each of the sailors with a bowl of wine and a biscuit, filled their boats with fruit and other refreshments, and gave orders that such of the British as had been wounded should be received into the Spanish hospital!

ELECTRICITY.

It is very common for a lecturer upon electricity, after explaining fully to his class the fact, that when a communication is formed between the inside and outside of the jar, the fluid passes from one to the other, to request them to form a line by joining hands and to allow the charge to pass through them all, so as to observe who feels the effect soonest. But when the line is formed, and one extremity connected with the outside of the jar, and the individual who stands at the other extremity, touches the knob connected with the inside, the start of the whole line is precisely simultaneous. At college, this experiment is sometimes tried with some hundreds of students arranged in a long line in the college yard. The one at the extremity most remote from the jar takes hold of a chain which, supported at intervals, returns to the jar, and thus the fluid has to pass through a distance of many hundred feet, but no perceptible difference in time is to be observed.

Another interesting way for exhibiting the instantaneousness of the motion is this:—A wire connected at one end with the outside of the jar, is passed around the room, by fastening it against the wall, so that at last the other end returns near the table. At any remote part there may be a short interruption, across which the electricity will pass by a visible spark, at the precise instant in which the returning end of the wire is connected with the knob of the jar.

Some English philosophers tried the experiment on a still larger scale. They extended wires, supported by silken strings which they fastened to stakes set in the ground, several miles in length. The discharge was effected through these, and not the slightest difference between the entrance of the fluid at one end of the wire, and its return through the other could be perceived, though in the interval it must have passed six or eight miles. The motion of electricity may, however, be progressive—it may consume time,—and yet not be perceptible in so short a distance. Light requires time to pass across any space. This time is very perceptible in its crossing the earth's orbit, but in going ten miles, it would occupy only the two millionth part of a second—a period altogether imperceptible to man.

The following extracts from the Article on Electricity, contained in the English Library of Useful Knowledge, states some interesting particulars in relation to this part of our subject.

"By accurate experiments, it appears that the force of the electric shock is weakened; that is, its effects are diminished, by employing a conductor of great length for making the discharge. But it is difficult to assign a limit to the number of persons through which even a small charge of electricity may be sent, so that all shall experience the shock, or to the distance along which it may be conveyed by good conductors.

"At an early period of electrical inquiries, much interest was attached to the determination of these points. The Abbe Nollet passed an electrical shock from a small phial through a hundred and eighty of the French guards, in the presence of the King; and at the Carthusian convent in Paris, the monks were formed into a line above a mile in length, by means of iron wires held between them: on the discharge of the jar, the sensation was felt at the same moment by all the persons composing this vast circuit. Many experiments were made, both by the English and French electricians, with a view to ascertain the space which a discharge can be made to traverse, and the velocity with which it is transmitted. Of these, the most ingenious and satisfactory were the experiments planned and executed by Dr. Watson, with the assistance of the leading members of the Royal Society. A circuit was formed by a wire which extended the whole length of Westminster bridge, at a considerable height above the river. One end of this wire communicated with the outer casting of a charged phial or jar, the other being held by a person on the opposite side of the river, who formed a communication with the water by dipping into it an iron rod held by the other hand. The circuit was completed by another person who stood near the phial, and who likewise dipped an iron rod into the river with one hand, and was enabled by means of a wire held in the other, to effect a contact with the knob of the phial. Whenever the discharges took place, the shocks were felt by both persons; thus proving that the electric fluid must have been in motion along the whole line of the circuit, including both the wire above and the river below.

Digitized by Google

"In another experiment, made on Shooter's Hill, at a time when the ground was remarkably dry, the electricity was made to perform a circuit of four miles; being conducted for two miles along wires supported upon baked sticks, and for the remaining distance also of two miles, through the dry ground. As far as could be ascertained by the most careful observation, the time in which the discharge was transmitted along that immense circuit was perfectly instantaneous; nor has any other trial that has yet been made afforded the least approach to a measurement of the velocity with which electricity moves.

"On this subject, however, an important distinction should be made between the actual movement of each individual parcel of electric fluid, and the transmission of an impulse along a series of such particles, for the one may bear hardly any proportion to the other, just as we find that sound proceeds with a velocity incomparably greater than that of the particles of air which are concerned in its propagation. In like manner, the portion of blood which raises the artery at the wrist, where the pulse is felt, is not the identical portion of blood which is thrown from the heart by the contraction of that organ producing the pulsation; the impulse in all the cases being propagated like a wave, from one particle to another. There is, therefore, no reason to suppose that the same particles of electric fluid, which enter at one part, have traversed from one end to the other of the whole line of conducting substances."

Nothing is so agonizing to the fine skin of vanity, as the application of a rough truth.—Devereux.

Written for the Cabinet.

THE DEATH OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

BY HANNAH F. GOULD.

Dead? is he silent! and pale! and cold!
Like common, unenvied clay?
The golden bowl broken—and loosed the hold
Of the silver cord? as a tale that is told
Has his life past away.

Dead? is a period put to him,
With the thousands that were forgot,
Till the midnight lamp he waked to trim?
Has that bright planet at length grown dim?
Have we buried Sir Walter Scott?

Gone? has the great magician resigned
The wand that he used at his will,
To move the spring of the strongest mind,
The deepest fount of the soul to find,
And the world by its touch to thrill?

It broke the seal of the secret tomb!
It opened the graves of men!
And made their ashes the fire resume,
It touched them with beauty and life and bloom,
Till they breathed and they moved again.

It parted the sable waves that sweep
Across oblivion's sea;
It brought up to light from that darksome deep,
The things that for ages it had to keep!
And is he to go down? not he.

Time! what hast thou to do with one
Who knew not a wasted hour;—
Whose pen with the sands of thy glass could run,
And show at each turning, a miracle done!—
A work that defies thy power.

And bright is the lustre his hand has shed
On a world that must claim him still;
For tho' from our vision his form has fled!
His mind is here! and we own not dead,
What death is too weak to kill.

No! while the earth for the tale of woe
Has a bosom to heave a sigh;
An eye to beam, or a heart to glow
At the debt of joy that to thee we owe,
Sir Walter, thou canst not die.

Thou'lt yet give wings to the lonely hour,
A spell to the still retreat;
Thou'lt be the charm in the lady's bower,
And life's rude path with many a flower
Bestrew for the pilgrim's feet.

We give great spirit, most warm and free,
Our thanks for so blest a lot,
As marked our day upon earth with thee;
And thousands, and thousands yet to be,
Will honour the shade of Scott.

PERSIAN SUPERSTITIONS.—All household matters journeys, &c. are dependent for their success on the days on which they are commenced. Thus we are told, linen, cotton, and earthen vessels should not be brought into the house on Sundays and Tuesdays; on Wednesdays, the lamps should not be lighted. Friday is proverbially an unlucky day; neither bread nor wood should be purchased, nor cloths and furniture washed on that day. It is unfortunate to visit the sick on Sundays and Tuesdays. Those who are in one place on Saturday night must be in the same place on the night of Sunday; and in this manner every person who passes Thursday night in one place, must pass Friday night there also.

Digitized by Google

Written for the Casket.

QUEEN EASTER'S ROCK.

"They spoke not a word,
But like dumb statues or breathless stones
Stared on each other, and looked deadly pale."
KING RICHARD.

"See, see, what a treasure I have found in Aunt Matty's satchel," cried our little pet, Bell, holding up a small piece of reddish coloured stone, which her busy fingers had drawn forth from the remotest corner of a large velvet sack, to the no small disturbance of sundry broken pipes, balls of thread, and small bits of antiquated gowns, the last sad relicks of Aunt Matty's former glory, and whose soiled and mutilated forms were in the habit of being treated with rather more ceremony, than the lawless young rummager had used in endeavoring to obtain the object of her present wonder—"You will tell us all about it," continued she teazingly, how Captain Symmes sent it to you all the way from the north pole, and how—My dear, my dear, interrupted the old lady, I'd put it right away back again where I found it, and be careful too, it's something I am pretty saving of, though I dont like to look at it much, 'tis a piece of Queen Easter's Rock.

She put a kind of low marked emphasis upon the last words, which made me raise my eyes to see what could be the important singularity in question. There was nothing remarkable in its appearance, to distinguish it from any other fragment of common rock; save that two or three dark glossy spots of the colour of blood, were discernible on its surface.

And pray, what may be the history of the marvellous thing, which you dignify with such a royal appellation, (I asked,) who is Queen Easter? I spoke pretty loud, as I usually do, and was surprised to find myself answered by a deep moan of distress, from Aunt Matty's insane companion, crazy Rose, as she was called, and one whom I had never seen give the least evidence of rational understanding. "Miserable creature," exclaimed Aunt Matty, in reply to my enquiring looks, "poor miserable creature, that she is, nothing has ever seemed to penetrate the midnight cloud, which has for more than forty years, hung over her once brilliant mind, save that name, that most detestable of names, Queen Easter; and God knows, she has reason enough to remember that."

The reader would perhaps like to know more of the history of the persons here introduced, and the relationship existing between them, than the above brief items have developed. And as I am always very quiescent in receiving favours from others, and (Franklin like) believe in the doctrine of reciprocity, I will very accommodatingly relate all the few particulars with which report had then made me acquainted, and the story appended may furnish the rest.

Matty Somers, or rather Matilda Somers as it is said she was christened, was my Father's eldest sister. And dearest, I might say too, for he always spoke of her in terms of the supremest affection. She had ever since my earliest recollection, resided in the same old picturesque cottage, with slate coloured doors, yellow blinds, a long old-fashionable front stoop, with a splendid row of blue painted dove houses, suspended against the wall; and the whole, doves, doors and windows, sweetly shaded by thick clustering hops and mock oranges,' with only an occasional opening for the sun.

Aunt Matty possessed one of the kindest hearts imaginable. But as I have heard that the like expression is frequently made by those young portionless Misses, who are in hopes of receiving a small jointure on their marriage day, from some half-crazed maiden aunt by dint of flattery, I would just mention (in order to clear myself in the reader's eye, of the charge of selfishness) that my own dear Pa is quite a Girard in point of property, and should I make choice to suit him, which I calculate by all means to do, I shall be abundantly supplied with this world's good, without resorting to any measures to procure them, save that of being a very obedient child. And now that I have given this explanation, I can again look you boldly in the face, and say, with positive emphasis, that Aunt Matty was one of the kindest creatures living; she was extremely fond of children; which is said to be a very unusual thing with old maids, (though I always believed it to be a gross slander upon the good long faced sisterhood) and the affectionate caresses she used to lavish upon us, together with the fine creamed strawberries, and other little delicacies with which she used to treat us, made her smiling cottage a most delightful retreat for the little city cousins, as she very flatteringly denominated myself and sisters. It was stated that in early life, she had been possessed of uncommon intellectual powers, but the then distracted state of the country, forbade their improvement by systematic education; nor could these faculties have been much impaired by age, for she was acknowledged by all, to be an unusually intelligent old lady. The ever varying expression of her dark, and still lustrous eyes, spoke quick, and deep sensibility; and though her general manner was quiet and common place, there were yet some subjects, in dilating upon which she astonished the listener with a rich, and almost overpowering flow of eloquence; great was the contrast between her and the helpless idiotic being by her side, who sat from day to day, and from year to year, with her thin attenuated hands crossed mechanically upon her breast, and her dim inexpressive eyes, always fastened upon vacancy.

Though Aunt Matty generally evaded any questions relative to her charge, it was pretty well understood that Crazy Rose was related to her by an early marriage with her favorite brother, and that her insanity was caused by the dread trials through which she passed, at the time of the Wyoming massacre. Void as were the features of this unfortunate of any thing like intelligence, there was still a something about them which riveted the eye of the beholder, and burdened the soul with a kind of indescribable sadness; her long and almost closed eye lashes, were always suffused with tears; though the unchanging muscles of the face, gave no indication of any internal workings. In gazing upon her, one felt as if viewing the remains of what had once been a beautiful picture, which time had reft of all its glowing colours, not leaving even its immortality of expression.

Digitized by Google

"Well, who may be, or may have been, this dreaded Queen Easter, I again enquired, (taking care, however, to speak the magic name in a whisper, lest the same unearthly sound should again greet my ears) you have raised my curiosity to the highest pitch, and will surely gratify me? "My dear," replied the old lady, while an involuntary shudder ran over her features; "it is a long and a bloody story, it would wither the rose upon your cheek, and drive the warm blood in frozen icicles to your heart: no, let it pass, Juliet, let it pass untold." But they say I inherit my beloved Aunt's fortitude. "Why perhaps you may, though Heaven grant you may never have to exercise it in the way I have had to; oh! I see you are determined, and I shall have to give you the dreadful details, though it will be at the expense of many a heart-ache from both of us, I promise you."

"My Father had been for many years, a resident of the beautiful valley of Wyoming, now called Wilkesbarre. When he emigrated from Connecticut, he left myself and eldest brother in care of her uncle, with whom he was then engaged in trade, and whom he expected in a few months, to remove near to where he himself lived. A short time before the dreadful disasters which I am about to relate, took place, we visted Wyoming, and my brother purchased a small farm adjoining my father's; and on our return to Connecticut, married my sweet young orphan friend Rosette Wilmer; ah! how well did I love that fair friendless creature; Indeed she was just such a being as one would feel guilty in not loving; artless and amiable; possessing an uncommon share of beauty, without a particle of vanity; a soul, all generosity and devotion; and a voice, whose tones of kindness came forth like the notes of a silver bugle, over a calm lake; she was certainly an almost perfect being; and I think was never happier than when the priest pronounced her my brother Philip's wife; and no doubt, he would very willingly have acknowledged the same.

In a few days after the celebration of their nuptials, we bade adieu to our many puritanical friends, and started on horse-back for Wyoming.

'Tis true we had heard slight rumours of the disturbances among the Susquehanna settlements; but nothing for a certainty, and nothing at any rate sufficiently alarming to warrant a delay of our journey. Our route was a very circuitous one, making the distance perhaps double to what it now is. The road or rather path, was most of the way, extremely narrow, so that we could seldom ride abreast; and there were sometimes whole days, in which our eyes beheld nothing but the deep wilderness; varied however with an occasional opening or dingle, where the startled deer threw his shrill breath upon the wind, and was answered by the long disappointed whoop of the red hunter.

I must not here forget to mention a circumstance, which though slight in itself, has a direct reference to the after incidents of my narrative. I was always extremly fond of the wildly picturesque; and this lonely tour, afforded me many opportunities for the indulgence of my besetting propensity. Often while my companions were busily engaged in laying plans for future happiness, did I linger behind to gaze down some dark unfathomable ravine, where the owl sat flapping his wings in eternal solitude, and mingling his hoarse shriek with the monotonous murmers of the subterranean stream. I had stopped one day as usual, at a spot where the roads were broken by a small hidden current of water, and a few logs thrown across, so that our horses with much care were able to pass. I stood some time, listening to the rushing voice of the unseen cataract, when I thought I could distinguish above the roaring of waters, a cry resembling the moan of an infant; it continued, and I rode forward and got my brother to come back, and descend the precipitous recess. He soon returned, bearing in his arms a little unearthly creature, with jet hair, staring black eyes, and skin of a shining copper. We were at no loss to discover that our prize was a young papoose, apparently three or four years old, who had probably been lost, and had fallen to the spot from whence he was taken, for there were many contusions upon his head, and we found upon further examination, that his left arm was broken; Philip fixed the bone to its place, and Rosette very humanely bound her fine handkerchief about the arm, while I fed him with cake from my basket, which he swallowed in right Indian style. But what should we do with him? our doubts were soon removed by a tall stern Indian, coming directly before us. At first he grasped his tomahawk; but after he saw what we had done for his child, he clapped his hands in token of great thankfulness, and flinging the little fellow over his shoulder, he ejaculated as he passed us, "white faces good, long bow, much friend, no forget good." We passed through many Indian villages, and observed that in Wappasening, Sheshequin, and Wyoux, the male part of the population were all absent, although we did not then know the reason. The women manifested a determined hostility towards us, many of them following and menacing us, with long glittering knives. These appearances were certainly ominous, and we greatly feared all was not right in the settlements below. It was nearly dark on the second evening of July, when we arrived at our place of destination. Instead of the cordial and happy welcome we had anticipated, we met nothing but looks of anxiety and hurried explanations about approaching evils. My father's house was entirely deserted. And we learned from a neighbour who was accidentally passing, that my father had been many weeks with Washington, at Valley Forge; and that our mother terrified at the threatening aspect of war, had, with her family, removed to the Fort, across the river.

Thither then, we immediately bent our course, and were soon admitted within its fortified walls. This Fort had been built and defended some years before by forty of the settlers, and this circumstance gave it the name of Forty Fort. It had undergone recent reparation, and was very well fitted for the accommodation of several families. Many had already removed there with their principal effects. But some, supposing in case of an attack, that the force of the enemy would be there concentrated, and that their superior numbers would cause an immediate surrender; preferred the safety promised by their own dwellings. We found our dear mother weeping bitterly over the probable destiny of her little ones, who were clinging around her in tearful surprise, while my second brother George, was vainly endeavouring to inspire her with confidence in the issue of the perils which surrounded them. Mother, dear mother, cried Philip, advancing, while we followed silently along, will you not welcome your wanderers back! Sister Matty, aye, and I have brought you another daughter, who will love you as she, the wife of your Philip, mother. Oh! my children, my children, exclaimed she, rising and flinging her arms wildly around us; it will indeed sound cruel for a mother to say she is not glad to see the darlings of her bosom, but I do wish to heaven you had staid away; You have only come to swell the crimson tide, which will ere long deluge these devoted shores. "With God's leave, no," muttered Philip, while the flush of pride and conscious valour, mantled his high forehead, "with God's leave no; say that we have come to swell the shout of victory, which will soon thunder in the ears of the accursed Brandt and Butler, telling them that their bloody career is over; have courage dear mother, we have much to hope, our"—He was interrupted by a cry of "to order" from a distant part of the Fort. The officers were holding council, to decide upon the most efficient measures to be adopted in their present straitened condition, and the gallant young Capt. Stewart had just risen to speak. He went through with a brief recapitulation of the former difficulties of the settlements, and then dwelt at more length upon the dangers with which they were now threatened, and the only means by which he thought they could be overcome.

Digitized by Google

John Butler with an army of about 800, consisting of British tories and Indians, had taken possession of Fort Wintermoot, situated about a mile above the head of the Valley, and was continually annoying the inhabitants by plundering them of their property, and was now apparently making preparations for a general massacre. Expresses had been sent to Valley Forge nearly a month before, (while the invaders were quartered several miles up the river,) intreating the commander in chief, to permit the immediate return of Captain Somers, (my father) and his troops to their assistance. The time had long ago expired when reinforcements, if any had been despatched, would have arrived. The enemy's force was fast increasing, by numerous disaffected Indians pouring in from the East; the harvest was nearly ripe, when it would of course be destroyed by the savages, and should the helpless women and children escape the tomahawk, they would still be left without any means of subsistence. Thence it was argued by a majority of the council, that an immediate battle should be hazarded, and the next day was fixed upon for its commencement. Many and sorrowful were the adieus exchanged in the Fort, on the morning of that fatal day, and the broken "God bless yous," came forth from hearts which seemed almost bursting with grief. Poor Rosette clung convulsively to Philip, when he came to take leave of us, and it was with much difficulty we prevented her from following him to the field. It was a mournful sight to behold that little band of brothers marching forth, as it were to their graves. And there was a solemnity too, in their steps, which (though it spoke courage and determination,) argued that their hope was one long deferred, and against all probability of success. The sun did not shine that day, and consequently, there was no gleaming of swords or flashing of bayonets, but the continued roar of musquetry, together with a cloud of smoke away to the north, pointed out to us the place of mortal combat. Colonel Denison anticipating the anxiety we should feel, had runners stationed between the Fort and battle ground, so that we could learn almost momentarily the progress of the contest. At first the coolness and determined bearing of the settlers, (although their numbers were not half those of the enemy,) seemed about gaining the mastery, but through the management of Brandt who commanded the Tories and Indians, a party of concealed savages rushed from their ambushes and surrounded our left division, while Butler doubled his right wing in order to diminish it to the exact distance of the scanty row of settlers, and thus, our whole line was thrown into the utmost confusion, and a most horrid slaughter commenced. It was with the greatest difficulty that Col's. Z. Butler and Denison, escaped to tell us, that our brave friends were all either slain, or prisoners, to an enemy who knew as little of mercy as the Tigers of India. Consternation and dismay now reigned throughout the Fort, which was soon increased by the appearance of Butler and Brandt without, demanding an instant surrender. Articles of capitulation were quickly drawn up and signed by the two opposing officers, in which the garrison with its military stores, were to be given over to the victors, but the lives of its inmates were to be spared, except those who had been engaged in the battle, to such, no promise of safety was given. The gates were thrown open, and a scene of confusion began, which it would be impossible for me to describe. Shouts of triumph from the dark swarthy creatures, who came glaring fiercely upon us from every quarter, the shrieks of the terrified children, who clung wildly to their mothers for protection, and the bitter wailings of those bereaved mothers for their husbands and children, all mingled together sounded absolutely appalling. I scarce knew whether I were indeed dead or alive, till I found myself in a large boat in the act of crossing the river. My youngest sister Anne, a sweet little creature of only two years, stood with her tiny hands clasped tightly around my neck, and at my side, like some pale lifeless statue sat poor Rosette, gazing with a stare of unconsciousness, upon the long wake of the boat. But where was our beloved mother? The faces around me were all strange and unknown. Where could she be? The crowd must have separated us, and my heart sickened at the thoughts of the dangers to which she, and her three helpless little ones were exposed. We were soon across the river, but where next should we go? I had too little faith in Indian or Tory promises, to suppose that either the property or persons of the vanquished would be held sacred any longer than till the shades of night should give freer scope to plunder and outrage; unknown and unprotected, I could think of no place, where we could pass the night with even a hope of safety, except the woods, the dark and solemn woods.

Digitized by Google

With little Anne in my arms, and a few words of encouragement to Rosette, we struck into a foot-path leading east, and soon found ourselves standing amid the eternal shadows of the forest; sad and fatigued, we sat down upon a bed of soft green moss, with a dark rustling canopy of laurel above us. Poor Anne cried for her accustomed cup of milk, and I could only pacify her by promising some on the morrow. But the tears which I could not restrain, made the discouraged child call for the frequent renewal of a promise which I had in reality, but little hope of fulfilling. It was now near nightfall. The grey tresses of twilight streamed dimly through the clustering hemlocks, and heightened the sadness which clouded the features of my disconsolate companion.

"We shall have quiet rest to night, I observed, this downy moss will make such a sweet pillow, and we have such a rich dark curtain above us, and then we shall be so safe, away from that dreadful crowd."

"Yes, yes, but where, oh! where will Philip sleep; there is a dreadful feeling at my heart, Matty; think, think if he be fallen alive into their hands? were he dead at my feet, I could endure it, I could be composed; but alive and to suffer their tortures, oh! Matty, the very thought will suffocate me."

The flood gates of feeling so long confined, now gave way, and the poor girl wept aloud, in the bitterness of her soul. I could say nothing to soothe her, for it required a powerful effort to suppress the rebellious outbreakings of my own o'er mastered heart; and I knew that every thing, perhaps our lives, might yet depend upon my own coolness and self-possession; all soon became quiet again; poor Rosette had ceased weeping; little Anne had forgotten all her childish cares in sleep; and I myself was just entering the territory of dreams, when I was startled, by the sound of half smothered voices. Hist! "hear you that," whispered Rosette? "Alas, my poor foolish grief has betrayed us; we shall be murdered and all for me." I tried all I could to calm her apprehensions. The whispering increased audibly in loudness, though it did not appear to me that the speakers were any nearer than at first, a large clump of birch trees rose directly before us, and I thought the sound came from behind that. They did not speak loud enough for me to learn the subject of their conversation, but I could distinguish their different intonations, and I thought if the human voice was a criterion, by which to judge the heart, there was at least one villain among them. Rosette grasped my arm, "as I live" exclaimed she, (while a gleam of joy shot across her pale features) "as I live, that voice is Marcus Wilmer's, my cousin Marcus, oh! we shall have a protector now, and who knows but he can tell us something of our dear, dear"—but, I interrupted, is he not the one who sought your love Rosette, and whom you rejected? "And what of that, he is the son of my father's own brother, and"—But dare you trust him? you know many have turned Tories. "Matty" she replied reproachfully, "I thought you were too well acquainted with the noble blood of the Wilmers, to suppose it tainted with Toryism, but he shall answer you this charge: Marcus, Marcus Wilmer," she shouted at the top of her feeble voice. Three darkly painted savages came immediately before us. Ha! cried the foremost, my pretty Rosette, "my sweet cousin Wilmer?" yes Wilmer, for you have not married that accursed scoundrel, as they said. I could not brook this; She has the honour, sir, I replied, to be the wife of my brother, Philip Somers; and those who audaciously call him scoundrel, would do well, perhaps, to recollect that none better deserve that appellation, than such as (under the show of savage colours) act a part which the meanest of that class would scorn. Ah! a fine sprig of chivalry, we have got here, say, hark ye my Madam Quixotte, will ye take a verbal challenge, or must I employ a secretary? Here you, ye-chaw. But mayhap she would like her brother for a second, aye her brother, if he be indeed possessed of the hand which I once begged for on my knees, and be alive, and within an hundred miles, she shall see him, yes and he shall die, he shall die Rosette, and I will see if witnessing his death will soften the heart which my tears have failed to move. Come ladies, you have confidingly selected me for a protector, and have a right to the hospitality of my dwelling. The taunting wretch very familiarly took the arm of the almost fainting Rosette, and as resistance was vain, I was obliged to follow along between the other two. I now lamented my rashness in disclosing Rosette's marriage, but repentance came too late, and I felt that our prospects were indeed wretched. We were not permitted to pause again till we had reached the summit of a long range of hills, overlooking the little village of Wilkesbarre, and then what a magnificent scene was spread out before us. The faithless enemy had set fire to that devoted town, and there was sufficient wind to connect the red flames in one long unbroken chain, showing the exact length of the village. The intenseness of the light made objects (which from the distance we might not have been able to see at all in the day-time,) distinctly visible, and I could see women and children running from house to house, in the greatest apparent confusion. Our dark companions seemed in an ecstacy at the sight, and the hill was in a few moments literally swarming with Indians, assembled to witness the work of destruction. Their long protracted whoops mingled with the oft repeated names of Brandt and Butler, pealed in startling echoes along the mountain's caverned recesses, and it seemed as if Asrael were winding his first fearful blast, to waken the slumbering ones of the earth. In a short time however, the wild column of flame settled down to small flickering lights, like benfires, and the dense waves of smoke rolled off to mingle their dusky folds with the clouds of the west. "Our sport is all over now," exclaimed our long leader, "and with your leave ladies, we will resume our walk." He continued his inimical attentions to Rosette, though she appeared to shrink from him, with a kind of instinctive horror. An hour's walk brought us within sight of an Indian encampment. A large pile of mouldering logs was surrounded by some fifteen or twenty Indians, who received Wilmer with much apparent joy, and with whom he seemed to be a great favourite. Three or four wigwams stood away to the right, and in the corner of one, with a mat of sweet fern for a bed, was pointed out our place of rest. Little Anne slept soundly, with her head in my lap, and poor Rosette too, after offering a fervent prayer to Heaven for our protection through the night, once more revelled amid the visions of happier days. My own harrassed imagination alone, seemed alive to the realities of our situation. Sleep did not visit my eyelids that night, and my distempered fancy conjured up horrors upon horrors, till I felt as I sometimes have, when labouring under the suffocating effects of the nightmare. Dread gigantic forms, with dark features, and sad gleaming eyes stood around me, long glittering knives with bloody hilts hung over my head. I could see the lifeless features of my dear sisters scarred with the tomahawk, and the cold sweat fell from my forehead till it seemed as if I were actually turning to a pillar of ice. The sun shone clear and warm through the openings of our cabin the next morning, and my fatigued companions had not yet awoke. There was a slight bustle at the door, and the stern voice of Wilmer called to us immediately to rise, we obeyed, and were placed with our hands tied, in the centre of dozen squaws and Indians, whose countenances expressed the pleasure of some anticipated event; at about a quarter of a mile from where we started we were ordered to stop. The place was a small hollow, surrounded except on one side, with a gentle bank covered with tall slender pines, and in the centre was a huge brown rock, whose sides were coated with yellow moss, and on whose top lay a large glittering tomahawk. Oh! Heavens thought I, and is this the altar of sacrifice, and are we to be the victims? The thought had scarcely entered my mind, when my attention was arrested by a wild thrilling shout, which pealed along the ravine leading into the hollow on the south, and which was immediately answered by a corresponding sound from nearly fifty of the savage tribe, who had begun to form themselves into a ring around the grassy enclosure. A double file of gorgeously tattooed Indians, were soon discovered coming along the ravine. with twelve or fifteen white prisoners led between them, whom they placed in a sitting posture within the circle of savages, with a couple of stout Indians standing at the shoulders of each. There were no cowardly quailings, no vain womanly fears to be seen in the faces of those brave soldiers, although some of them appeared to be young, very young. They looked like men who had anchored their hopes in heaven, and who were prepared to meet death without flinching. I recognized two or three distinguished officers, whom I had seen marching forth with high hopes, the day before, to battle; and at last as my eye ran along to the last of the doomed number; think, oh! think Juliet, of the deadly pang which seized my chilled heart, to meet the mournful gaze of my beloved brother Philip. The villainous cold blooded Wilmer, stood triumphantly beside him, and directed an occasional glance of revengeful joy towards poor Rosette. But she did not see him, anticipating some dreadful catastrophe, she had covered her face with her hands, and prayed to heaven she might not look up, for I knew that a knowledge of Philip's situation would distract her. "Queen Easter, Queen Easter," presently burst from the lips of all, and a tall painted squaw strode within the circle and sprang at one bound upon the centre of the rock. Her form is still strongly painted in my memory, but I know that I cannot half describe it. A large crimson-fringed blanket was fastened about her tawny neck, with a kind of loop, and confined again at the waist with a belt of various coloured wampum, and from thence descended a short slip of blue stuff decorated at the bottom with large scarlet patches. Her coarse jet hair almost trailed on the ground, and her wrinkled forehead was girt about with the skin of the yellow rattle snake, which looked as if recently torn from the body of its owner. to garnish a still more loathsome form; her face I will say nothing about, it was too odiously terrific to admit of a description, it seemed to me a very camera obscura of distorted ugliness. She immediately (upon gaining her conspicuous station) seized the heavy tomahawk, and began dancing a kind of Indian whirligig. She commenced by flourishing her formidable weapon aloft in the air, and shrieking and called upon the name of Coshmoo, (whom I afterwards learned was her son, slain the day before in battle,) till the white froth fell in bubbles from her frenzied lips. Then there was a sudden and deathlike pause, and the next instant the hatchet descended upon the naked rock with a force, that fairly shook the solid ground beneath it, and scattered fragments of the splintered stone in every direction. One piece (the same which roused little Bell's curiosity,) entered the sleeve of my dress, and hung there, while the blood dripped from its ragged corners upon my hand. This maddening ceremony over, Queen Easter descended, and then came the reality. She, she —but I cannot—oh!—I cannot describe that most horrid transaction, but I saw it all, all. I tried to close my eyes, but their lids were literally frozen back, and every thing seemed magnified to a frightful distinctness; an agonizing shriek and a prostrate form at my side, told me that Rosette too, had witnessed the slaughter of some of those resistless victims. Alas! merciful heavens, would that that dread scene might be forever blotted from my memery. Miraculous as it may appear, Philip absolutely broke from those who held him and effected an escape. A loud hue and cry warned me of their intention to pursue, and I saw Wilmer was foremost in the bloody chase. We were now ordered back to the wigwam, and Rosette being still in a swoon, they were obliged to carry her. "The daughter of the pale face no sleep to night," whispered a half familiar voice in my ear as we entered the cabin. Long Bow remember, Long Bow save. I immediately recognized the hunter, whose child we had found in our journey. The kindness with which these few words were spoken, quite affected me, and for the first time since our confinement, I enjoyed the luxury of tears. Night came. Little Anne had fallen into a quiet slumber, and Rosette sat upright beside me; she had not spoken the whole day, her eyes were dull and inexpressive, and I could not help fearing that the terrors of the morning had disordered her mind. All had become perfectly still about the encampment, when the dark form of the hunter stole stealthily through the cabin door. He carefully severed the cords with which we were bound, and motioning extreme caution, bade us follow. I hugged my litte sleeping sister closely to my bosom, and grasping Rosette's arm, we were soon beyond the reach of immediate danger. At the base of a small hill, our guide removed a handful of brush wood from the mouth of a narrow cave, and bade us enter, nor for our lives to attempt coming out, without his permission. In a few hours he returned, and gave me the chilling information of my brother's recapture. He called me out of the cave, and putting a hatchet in my hand asked me if I loved my brother? I immediately comprehened his meaning and assuming his own peculiar style, I replied "does the wigwam of the red hunter hold a daughter? and has that daughter a brother?" "Yes, there is light in the cabin of Long Bow, for the red Fawn is there, like a bright star, her step is like the spring of the wild cat, and she fears not to speak with the tomahawk. But the heart of the white girl is pale. she trembles at the sight of blood, and the hatchet would fall from her hand." "Oh! but the love of the white girl is strong, she has great love for her friends, she could do all things for her brother." He said no more, but proceeding noiselessly along the beaten path, we were soon in sight of the lodge. A few steps aside from the circle of dusky sleepers, sat my poor brother, strongly bound to a fine sapling, and by his side (as the faint rays of the moon discovered) his inveterate foe Wilmer, and another equally athletic figure apparently in a sound sleep. I saw that Philip was awake, but did not stir. The red hunter carefully cut the band which bound the prisoner to the tree, and bidding me strike the Indian while he despatched the Tory, he raised his arm. Now was the trying moment, the moment of deep and deadly peril, for a single struggle or groan might betray us, and then would ensue the long routine of inquisitorial torture, and should we succeed, the life of a human being, the blood of a fellow creature would be upon my head; my breath almost ceased at the thought. But then the life of a brother, a dear, dear brother was at stake, and could I hesitate? I felt my arm descending with power, but my senses fled, and I knew no more till I found myself in the cave with my brother hanging in speechless anxiety over me. Thank God she lives! exclaimed he, as I once more opened my eyes upon the light of day. The sun shone dimly through the uncertain vistas of our retreat, and I felt when I looked upon the pale haggard features around me, as if I had awaked in the land of spirts. Little Anne seemed overjoyed to hear me speak again. But poor sister Rosette did not appear to notice the least thing, and her pulse indicated a high fever.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Philip had promised our deliverer that he would not attempt to leave the cave in two days, without his special advice, as there was no doubt but that the woods would be scoured in every direction to discover us. And so they were, as the sound of footsteps and busy voices declared to us. We heard them around us venting their angry threats, in words which made me faintly gasp for breath. Some one enquired if there was no cave in which they could be secreted? "At the big run," answered a quick voice, which I knew to be the red hunter's. Some seemed turning away at this information, when "a trail, a trail," from the same friendly voice, withdrew them altogether from our covert, and we once more ventured to breathe. All that day and night we dared not hazard even a whisper, so great was our fear of discovery, and we knew that scarce a stone would remain unturned, in the untiring search. Our situation on the second day, became distressing in the extreme. We had nothing to eat, and poor Anne had become so weak for the want of nourishment, that she could scarcely raise her head from my arms. My unfortunate sister in law, grew rapidly worse. She raved deliriously of Philip and Queen Easter, and alas! we could not help her, we had not even a glass of water with which to moisten her parched lips. "Thou wilt die here, my poor Rosette," murmured Philip, while he imprinted a kiss upon her burning temples, "thou wilt die, my sweet one, and I shall, oh! no! I shall not live long, but I shall witness thy last struggle, and life's strange principle will still for a while be within me. Had I but left thee amid the beautiful Vallies of the East, with thy young heart's dear associates, Rosette.—Oh! I have placed my trembling dove in the heart of a vulture—Matty, Matty, he continued in a low sepulchral tone, I am very fearful, she breathes hard, do, do see if she is not worse." She was indeed, her respiration grew short and difficult, and I lost not a moment in removing the rubbish from the cave's entrance, and getting my expiring friend to the open air. I thought not of risk, I thought only of the horrors of death in our confined prison house. Oh! how bright and glorious appeared once more the prospect of the soft blue skies, and richly clothed wood lands. The air of the forest in summer is always cool and balmy, but it seemed doubly luxuriant then, and had our situation been any other than it was, I thought I could have exclaimed with Willis that "existence was a blessing." It was beginning to be sunset, and the deep yellow rays fell idly upon the grey moss where we had laid the almost inanimate Rosette. The stirring air and the warm sunshine seemed to arouse her dormant faculties, for she partly opened her heavy eyes, and moved her lips with a faint smile, "Oh! Matty!"

Digitized by Google

she sighed almost unaudibly, "let us go, they will murder us here! They have no hearts, Wilmer, Wilmer, oh! it is not my cousin Wilmer, he was no fiend, no vampyre draining heart's blood. Spectre, thou art not Marcus, away away, thine hand (she continued fixing her glassy eyes full upon me) do you see? A pagan invoking his deities, wretch, thy God's name is Queen Easter! Thy axe is sharp, and there, thou hast warm blood upon it, large purple drops, and thou wilt stain the face of my Philip, death death," and she clapped her hands over her eyes, as if to avoid the dreadful sight. My wretched brother vented the agony of his soul in tears, and I could not help doing the same.

"Is that the wind?" asked Philip; I listened; it was a low rumbling sound like the distant voice of the storm spirit, but it grew nearer and I thought it was a waggon: could it be, were we near any road! the bare possibility of escape from our fast accumulating miseries inspired me with new life. My pale brother was so weak from loss of blood, that he could scarcely stand, so it remained for me to ascertain the foundation of our new life. I started and hurried on in the direction indicated by the sound—a large waggon now came in sight, loaded not with odious savages, but, with dear beautiful white people. The driver saw me and stopped the horses, for I could not speak, so wildly did my head flutter with expectation, "What ails thee child?" exclaimed a kind voice, and oh! that voice, Juliet—it was, it was my own dear father's.

Hearing of the fatal termination of the war at Wyoming, he had left the troops at Strandsburgh, and hastened to learn the fate of his family, and now he had found them all except my brother George, who was slain in battle. My excellent mother wept tears of joy over her lost and found, and little Susan fairly danced in an ecstacy of bliss. A short journey brought us to the place where my father commenced a settlement. It was the very spot, Juliet, on which your own Pa now lives; but troubles still attended us, for four long weeks were we obliged to watch by the sick bed of poor Rosette. At the end of that time the physician pronounced her convalescent, but alas! alas! she was no longer the beautiful, the intelligent Rose Wilmer of other days. The lustre of the bright eye had departed for ever, and the stare of vacant idiocy sat in the place of an expression which was wont to entrance every beholder. My brother, my wretched, my distracted brother, could not bear this blighting of his soul's fondest hopes. He was broken hearted; a few short months saw the silver cord parted; and the solemn words, "dust to dust," were spoken over our beloved Philip's grave. The wife of my perished brother has been ever since that time, just as you see her now, an unconscious fragment of that history, which I alone live to relate."

There is nothing more dreadful to an author than neglect; compared with which, reproach, hatred, and opposition are names of happiness; yet this worst, this meanest fate, every one who dares to write has reason to fear.

FIELD FLOWERS.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL.

Ye field flowers! the gardens eclipse you, 'tis true,
Yet, wildings of nature, I doat upon you,
For ye waft me to summers of old,
When the earth teemed around me with fairy delight,
And when daisies and buttercups gladdened my sight,
Like treasures of silver and gold.

I love you for lulling me back into dreams,
Of the blue highland mountains and echoing streams,
And of broken glades breathing their balm,
While the deer was seen glancing in sunshine remote,
And the deep mellow crush of the wood-pigeon's note,
Made music that sweeten'd the calm.

Not a pastoral song has a pleasanter tune,
Than ye speak to my heart, little wildings of June:
Of old ruinous castles ye tell,
Where I thought it delightful your beauties to find,
When the magic of Nature first breathed on my mind,
And your blossoms were part of her spell.

Ev'n now what affections the violet awakes,
What loved little islands, twice seen in their lakes,
Can the wild water lily restore:
What landscapes I read in the primrose's looks,
And what pictures of pebbled and minnowy brooks,
In the vetches that tangled their shore.

Earth's cultureless buds, to my heart you were dear,
Ere the fervour of passion, or ague of fear,
Had scathed my existence's bloom:
Once I welcome you more, in love's passionless stage,
With the visions of youth to revisit my age,
And I wish you to grow on my tomb.

THE PALMER'S HYMN.

The following beautiful lines are from the pen of the "Ettrick Shepherd." They are designed to represent the morning prayer of a maniac who voluntarily became an outcast of the desart.

Lauded be thy name forever,
Thou of life the guard and giver,
Thou canst guard thy creatures sleeping,
Heal the heart long broke with weeping.

* * * * * *

God of stillness and of motion,
Of the rainbow and the ocean,
Of the mountain, rock and river,
Blessed be thy name forever.
I have seen thy wondrous might,
Through the shadows of the night,
Thou who slumb'rest not nor sleepest,
Blest art they thou kindly keepest.

* * * * * *

God of evening's yellow ray,
God of yonder dawning day,
That rises from the distant sea,
Like breathings of eternity.
Thine the flaming spheres of light,
Thine the darkness of the night,
Thine are all the gems of even,
God of Angels! God of heaven;
God of life that fade shall never!
Glory to thy name forever!

Digitized by Google

Written for the Casket.

THE LUNATIC, A PRIZE TALE.

"Elle etoit de ce monde ou les plus belles choses
"Ont le pire destin;
"Et rose elle a vecu ce que vit une rose,—
"L'espace dun matin."

MALHERBE.

Twenty-one years have now been added to "those beyond the flood, since the burning of the theatre in my native town of Richmond. Two years after that awful tragedy, I was in Philadelphia; one evening, I found myself by chance near the Lunatic Hospital, and impelled by one of those sudden and mysterious impulses which hurry us whither they will in spite of ourselves, I sought entrance within those sad precincts, whose sovereign, insanity, surrenders her empire only to Death. 'Tis not my purpose to dwell on the general aspect and inmates of the place; the gloomy horrors which marked some cases—the melancholy and appealing interest attendant on other patients—all were deadened and disappeared before the powerful impression produced by one engrossing object. Passing by a glass-door, situated at the remote end of a long passage, and partially shaded by a green silk curtain, I was all at once arrested by a strain of music so soft, so sweet, and etherial, that, in the enchantment of the moment I could have "Deemed that spirit from on high,

"Round where some hermit saint was laid,
"Were breathing heavenly melody."

I held my breath to listen, and recognized the notes of a piano on which a hand as masterly as Scarlatti's, performed in unison with a celestial voice an air belonging to the vesper service of the Romish church. The gentleman, who politely showed me through the establishment, stood at my elbow, and motioned me to silence, as cautiously approaching on tip-toe, I took note through the panes, that were left unscreened, of the hapless minstrel, whose surpassing skill seemed thus exercised in triumph over madness. I saw before me a perfect personification of rapt and reverential devotion in the figure of a man, young, tall and thin, but of proportions as matchless as those of 'the Sun in human limbs arrayed;" the face was turned from us as he bent over the instrument, whose full and solemn chords rolled in sublime harmony from beneath his touch; but the exquisite head thrown back in such ecstacy of upward gaze—the swaying form loosely wrapped in dark flowing vestments, and dilated beyond the ordinary size of life by the intensity of fervent feeling,—the impassioned tones of the pious chaunt each expressed, and attested the very depth of religious abstraction as exalted and sincere as that of a St. Augustine or a Pascal. At length the holy hymn was at an end; symphonious blending of song and accompaniment died away; the performer ceased, and memory began in me to dissolve the spell of immagination. There was something in the action, the voice, the person of the gifted but unhappy sufferer before me, familiar and yet strange, as the wild perplexities of a troubled dream. He had dropped his folded arms on the piano, and sat with his head resting on them so as to hide his face completely from my view; but my eyes, as they glanced for a moment from him around his prison, encountered fresh memorials to aid an uncertain recollection of its interesting tenant. The apartment was of small dimensions, but fitted up with the nicest regard to comfort; and the many fanciful decorations pendant on the walls and scattered throughout, indicated an elegant rather than a disordered mind. One compartment, covered with the rarest butter flies in fine preservation, gave token of a taste for that branch of natural history; another was hung with a series of little maps superbly colored; an old cremona violin lay in its upper case on a table beside the piano forte, and a window seat was occupied by an Eolian harp, on which the winds of heaven, as they came loaded with fragrance from the beds of a flower-garden beneath, "discoursed most excellent music." A profusion of exotics, evidently tended by a careful hand, perfumed the chamber, one side of which exhibited on a small altar standing in a recess the sacred emblems of his picturesque faith—a crucifix delicately carved in ivory and ebony, the chalice of holy water, a missal in splendid bindings, and several choice paintings of female saints

"That knelt in pictured prayer," but my attention was chiefly drawn to an antique cabinet wherein were displayed various landscapes in minature of the liveliest tints, and executed with the ingenuity of a practised mechanician. One in particular enlivened by a mill in full motion, struck me as a transcript of one of the most beautiful scenes near Richmond; but my observation was quickly attracted from it to the movements of its accomplished and unfortunate artist. As the breeze moved the responsive strings of the lyre near him, the sound started him from his recumbent posture; he rose—and advanced, but with his back still towards us, to the window: there he stood in an attitude of negligent grace, while the bright rays of the setting sun, shooting suddenly from under a gorgeous cloud, fell through the casement—and gleaming on the chesnut curls, that clustered in rich luxuriance over his brow, crowned him with a glory like that playing in old pictures about a canonized head. At last he spoke—and in accents that fell on my ear like the echo of some faint and half forgotten song, poured forth as if in converse with an imaginary being, a torrent of fond and passionate words. After a while dissuasion succeeded protestations, and we could hear him through the door, which I had ventured to unclose a little way—murmur out, "Then you will go Sophie; you dont love me well enough to give up one play for my sake. Consider its the first I have asked you to forego, while I resign all for the luxury of being near you; of gazing on you. See you star just rising bright, so pure, the dewy type of thy beauty and thy destiny; last night, while all slept save my love, I watched it in pride and joy as the lustrous regent of thy fate appeared to smile down upon me: at once a cloud as black as death, as swift as thought, interposed between me and the star I worship; it vanished from my sight—that one alone of all the starry scroll, was blotted out---and the darkness of the grave usurped the regions of its reign. Say, Sophie, sweetest, what may this portend," then stopped as if hearkening for a reply; then went on with the most impressive gestures. "Then, dearest, since you must go, smile once more on me and I'll think it but the chaos of a brain that doats to madness, adieu! adieu! I must not linger thus, yet, Sophie, stay; give me that rose that impearls thy hair, and if to-morrow is peace and brightness on us, I'll bring it back and replace it midst those tresses." Another pause---"Sophie, one moment more; look at thy lovely orb; how propitious now her light! so may she shine on my vigil and be the mirror to foreshow thy fair and favouring fortunes. But if aught dark or disastrous again dim her ray, call me not visionary; chide not my trespass, if I come even at midnight to thee to learn the worst! Sophie, you will go; my heart forbodes an awful crisis in our loves. Sophie! what if we never meet again? you frown upon me. Good night; good night! Forever!" was repeated in the low tones of tenderest emotion. He turned from the window, carefully inshrining a white rose in his bosom; and as the last beam of day fell on features like those which Janey ascribes to Adonis or Joseph, I identified with a most painful thrill of surprise and horror an early companion, noted as the "admirable Crichton" of the circles in which we had known each other. I had last seen him in the full energy of health and reason; I now beheld him a confirmed but generally harmless lunatic: he had been brought to the mad-house by that dreadful catastrophe alluded to in my first lines.

Digitized by Google

Augusta, or (as we Americans called him) Augustus Pelisson, the son of an emigrant from Strasburg, in much esteem at Richmond as an eminent music master and respectable man---was looked on and cherished from his cradle as a prodigy of talent and beauty. In person as well as in mind he combined the peculiarities of two nations---the fine, versatile and ardent genius of the Italian (his mother being one) with the morbid sensibility, and addiction to mysticism and abstruse study, characteristic of the German blood. The refinement of taste and complexional warmth of temperament, denoting his affinity to the classic natives of the "sunny south," shone in strong and pleasing contrast with a poetical turn of imagination and fund of sterling integrity and worth, which proved him the son of his Fatherland: the like harmonious mixture of properties in his bodily presence, rendered him a most superior specimen of manly comeliness, with an aptitude to all arts and sciences, alike proper to his descent on both sides, early displayed itself as the master passion of his soul, and was pursued with an assiduity and success which made him, while yet a child, renowned throughout the state as a miracle of skill both on the piano and violin. His father who foresaw in him the musical lion of the age, reared him to his own vocation, though with infinite difficulty; for Augustus, proud as he was pre-eminent, recoiled from the drudgery of elementary tuition, and was only reconciled to the arrangement which charged him with the superintendence of practisings, by the lively greetings, and cordial glances with which the ladies always smiled on his approach. Full of that romantic gallantry, which deifies the sex, he could not be insensible to those involuntary courtesies which so gracefully acknowledged the supremacy of a dazzling appearance over the casual distinctions of rank and fortune; and the young Pelisson, as polite as he was handsome, was admitted on a familiar footing into the first houses in the town. But though feasted and admired there as much as Rosiii in London, he became not enslaved by any one of his fair entertainers; the heart of the elegant musician, formed to feel that excess of passionate attachment, immortalized by Petrarch and Rousseau, already beat with love strong as death, for one not as transcendant but as comely as himself.

Among the friends of the Pelisson family, there was a French refugee from San Domingo by the name of Vernier, with his wife and three daughters. To the second of these, just bursting into womanhood, was rendered by all who saw her, that spontaneous homage with which mortality might bow before a celestial visitant; for seldom or never was daughter of our earthly sphere so fraught with all that bespeaks an origin from on high---as fair, as gentle, and as simple as Eve in her first dignity of innocence, was Sophie Vernier. There was nothing of the Juno, or the Venus about her—nothing brilliant or commanding to sparkle or impose; and the charm of that heavenly face, perfect as it was in contour, colouring and feature,—yet lay in its transparent reflection of such inward sanctity and singleness of heart as carried back the mind to the image of our common mother walking in the freshness of virgin beauty amid the shades of Eden. Thrown often together, though under those restraints which among the French always guard the intercourse between young men and maidens, there was nothing so natural as for Sophie and Augustus to reciprocate

> "The charming agonies of love
> "Whose misery delights."

He felt the passion in such guise as Byron's burning pen has shadowed forth in his immortal "Dream;" in her t'was a sentiment chaste, soft and constant as herself. Long, timid and silent was the probation of the lovers; for Sophie trembled to analyze the tumultuous tremor of nerve and heart beneath which she was ready to sink in the presence of Pelisson, who on his part "owned by a thousand tender fears," misinterpreted her shyness, that surest mark of woman's love, as men are ever wont to do. At length one summer evening, when all was brightness balm and silence, accident threw them together in her father's little garden: Sophie immersed in a soft reverie, stood amid a bower of yellow jessamine that ornamented the centre; languid from heat and overpowered by the rich perfume around her, she plucked the flowers leaf by leaf, and blew them carelessly away with her breath; through the trellis of the fragrant screen, she saw him, who, at that moment employed her thoughts, sauntering slowly up the walk, with something in his hand which he passionately kissed over and over again. The bosom of the lovely girl panted so violently and as he drew near, that she remained rivetted to the spot, pursuing her childish sport with redoubled industry. Pelisson entered the arbour,—and on seeing her, started back in so much confusion that what he held dropped on the ground at Sophie's feet. Scarce knowing what she did, the agitated maiden stooped to pick it up, and in the object of caresses so tender and repeated beheld her own beauteous resemblance. One deep blush, "celestial, rosy red," that ever spread face, neck and hands, even to her fingers' ends ---one glance softly lightening from those large dewy, starlit eyes, as they were just raised from the picture to his and instantly withdrawn, and the whole secret was revealed, without a word on either side; in the rapturous triumph into which he was thrown by this mute and precious avowal, Augustus caught her to his breast, and held her there in speechless ecstacy, while impressing on her innocent lips

Digitized by Google

"A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth and love."

From that hour the hearts of the lovers were laid open to each other. But they rarely met alone—and neither thought of seeking solace by clandestine interview or written correspondence. Sophie would have shrunk from such a step as from sacrilege; and Augustus loved her too truly and honorably to dream of purchasing his own gratification by leading her into disobedience or impropriety. They were content to enjoy the few delicious moments, with which chance sometimes befriended them,—to look forward to their union as the epoch, whose advent was as sure as it was blissful,—and meanwhile sacredly to perform all that filial respect and decorous observance required of them. Both were aware that the opposition of their parents would be likely to impede their wishes, for a time; but when they were together, all difficulties would vanish before the amorous eloquence, with which the ambitious youth detailed his visions of professional distinction abroad, and Sophie's confidence in her powers of persuasion at home. Despite the natural violence of Pelisson's passions, and his strong tendency to jealousy, so implicit was his faith in Sophie's affection, and in Sophie's truth, that he was comparatively free from the various pangs attendant on the most prosperous love-suit. But one cloud ever gathered to darkle their clear horizon, and that the fair creature whom it threatened was apt to treat as the fantasm of a fond imagination. To the devotional turn of his maternal country, Augustus added the true German gusto for astrology, and all difficult and superstitious love. To these "demi-sciences," he applied himself incessantly after his engagement with Mlle. Vernier; and from planetary configuration and sympathetic coincidence—from the portents of celestial signs, and terrestrial phenomena, and of those dreams wherein he beheld the mystic adumbrations of futurity,—he drew omens and predictions of fair or dubious import, and disquieted or delighted himself, and not unfrequently her—as the result of his calculations seemed adverse or auspicious. Sophie was little given to these vain superstitions; the simple piety of her nature and the joyous heedlessness of youth, prompted her to enjoy the present good without anticipation of the ill which might come with the morrow; but little by little she became somewhat infected, with the anxieties and researches of the star-gazing lover,—and listened to his prophetic fancies, and mysterious sublimity jargon with alternate fear, and incredulity. One clear, large star, which his sidereal admiration indicated as the emblem and arbiter of Sophie's destiny, was watched, and waited on by the fond devotion of Augustus with more than chaldean belief and perseverance; still its pure and tremulous light beamed steadily, benignant, and many a fervent benison blessed the bright presage, as it pursued its appointed path along the blue, ethereal sky,—the symbol of a lot—not splendid, but serene as the mild virtues of the angelic vision to whose service the romantic astrologer had sworn himself. But even this auspicious promise failed to satisfy a mind swayed by the endless misgivings of a melancholy and enamoured fancy—or rather the national appetite for the obscure, and marvellous, "grew with what it fed on," till all other propensities, and well nigh all other feelings were absorbed and forgotten in the eagerness wherewith he delivered himself up to the bewildering illusions of his idle and unprofitable studies. Summer was gone; the mellow glow of autumnal pomp faded away from the lovely scenery, which, dispersed about the environs of Virginia's metropolis makes her the sylvan rival of the renowned English Richmond; and each season left the lovers growing gradually less gay, but Pelisson's restless pryings into futurity, came in aid of a constitutional gloom and potency of imagination; and their mutual re-action was fearfully increased by other causes. Augustus felt sick at heart from many disappointments; his impetuous idolatry of Sophie could ill brook the tedium of indefinite delay; and the irritable impatience with which he began to contemplate the long period inevitably intervening between his departure for Europe, and the attainment of such independence as might justify the lover in putting on the husband, led him, at times, to doubt and deny the possibility of ever arriving at that rapturous consummation. Besides the busy and festive season had set in with winter. The State Legislature was in session, within the walls of the Capitol—balls and parties rife in the fashionable world; the city swarming with gay and wealthy strangers, and all going "merry as a marriage-bell;" the theatre too, that neutral and favourable haunt of all classes, was open, and graced nightly with full and applauding houses. Old Vernier loved dramatic entertainments with more than a Frenchman's passion: so did the whole family, from the aged and still handsome grand-mother, whose words were reverenced as sacred oracles, down to the sprightly, little Cecile, the pet and play-thing of the happy house-hold: the play was therefore the regular fixture of each evening, to the great discomposure of the sensitive Augustus, who, though he loved to see his fair queen and the Reseu partaking of all diversions proper to youth, and innocence; loved not to have her rare and retiring charms so continually exposed to public admiration. Her father was intimate with all actors of celebrity,—the Coopers, the Greens, and Twaitses of that day; their most animated civili-ties, and elegant hyperbole of compliment were of course lavished at the feet of the exquisite daughter; and though the delicate lover well knew that Sophie shrunk from their expressive gallantries and witty flatteries in dismay and displeasure equal to his own, still the sight, the bare idea of her being thus beset, gave him so much pain that after a while he ceased to make one of the lively group, from which he never sought however to detach Mlle. Vernier. Under such disturbance of feeling, 'twas in vain that he had recourse to the occupations, that in other days, had pleasantly beguiled his leisure; painting, mechanics, reading, even music, once the master spell of his nature, had lost all power to dissipate or allay his troubled thoughts. Only in the abstract depths of astrology,—in the vague reconcilements, and laborious uncertainties of horoscope, divination by every sign, immaterial influences, and all the exciting horrors of German mystification, could his unquiet spirit find congenial fascination, and short respite from the image of his beloved, conspicuous amid the gay and promiscuous assemblage, into which she was nightly thrown, as a pure and spotless lily, standing in majesty in a parterre of gaudy hollyhocks. It was about this time that I obtained the fortune of an introduction to the surpassing being, in whom shone such gentleness and beauty as instantly transported my fancy to the interesting festival of Saency, and the floral crown there awarded to the fairest and most virtuous maiden. In truth she wore, at that moment, a wreath of white roses woven into those locks which, in length and richness, might have vied with Leila's "hyacinthine flow," by the hand of the romantic adorer, who forcedly envoked her as his "Queen of the Rose."

Digitized by Google

Separated in a manner from Sophie's society; the time of his foreign voyage near at hand; suffering under the corrosions of fastidious sentiment and a foretaste of the tortures of interminable absence,—it is not wonderful that the hue of Pelisson's musings darkened hourly. He began, in his distrust of every thing about him, to conceit that the star of his birth was retrograde; that though the radiant hieroglyphic of Sophie and fate yet kept its kindly aspect, there was some malign and counteracting ascendant among the superior heavenly bodies, menacing their final happiness. Once impressed with this ominous notion, he bent like other philosophers, each fact to fit his theory—till the chain of appalling prognosticks was almost complete in its links; at first, he strove against these ill-boding fantasies, and chided the unmanly weakness that encouraged them: but as proof seemed added to presentiment, and presage after presage glared in grim array on his excited imagination, he no longer made an effort to resist the evil effects of his own profane perversity of inquisition, but rather sought to strengthen and confirm them. The very intensity of his devotion to Mlle. Vernier rendered him but the more tremblingly alive to aught indicative of danger or disaster to her, and while gazing on that sweet brow where "clear chastity sat meekly enthroned," his over-burdened heart would relieve itself by whispering his tale of portents, and commentary of fears. Sophie had long been aware of this peculiar bias of mind, in Pelisson, and for some time paid but little attention to his discourse on these gloomy topics. Living and moving in the happy glee of a young and guileless breast, every thing connected with her life and love, was tinged couleur de rose, by fairy fancy, and awakened a joyous anticipation. Satisfied, and what true and modest woman is not? with the dear delight of loving and being loved again; and bred up in submissive respect to the ordinances of parental restriction,—of the two, the seraphic girl was by far least uneasy under the checks that fettered their amatory commerce. She knew that he whom she deemed the master of honor and fidelity, was well and near her; they met often in company—some times, and how precious was the interview, alone; thus much formed her simple felicity,—for the diffidence of her pure and timid nature blushed at daring to cherish a warmer wish. 'Tis true she trembled and wept at the thought of parting; but she had by no means an adequate conception of the length of his probable stay in France and Italy, much less of the temptations and difficulties certain there to bestrew his path. Hitherto her attachment had been to her a source of the softest pleasure; she had gathered and worn the flowers of love without being pierced with the thorns —but the time was now come when she was made to feel that they had only been hidden; not lost their point. Seeing the object dearest to her after heaven, downcast and disturbed, though by a visionary, and to her incomprehensible emotion; the fair Sophie could but exert her tenderest powers to soothe and animate; in consoling his sorrow she insensibly shared it,—while trying to combat his arguments and apprehensions, they often overcame her principled disbelief of them. Still there was a charm, beyond all of past experience, in thus ministering to his peace and solace; the father of passion succeeded and effaced the placid sensation of joy: and never were their hearts drawn so closely together as while both shuddered in horror at the prospect of being severed soon, and for ever. When apart from Pelisson, Sophie thought not, with dread; but in pity of his prophetic alarms; 'twas only in his presence that they proved themselves powerful over her; and if she yieldod to the contagion and he saw the bright tears "like pearls from diamonds dropt" gather in her eyes, as she listened to his melancholy language, it acted like magic in rousing him from his vain imaginings of woe.

Mid-winter had now passed; the theatre was about to close and the Verniers had not yet missed a single play. The benefits were mostly taken, and the amateurs of the scenic art, crowded to enjoy the last and best treats. The profit-night of Placide, a popular manager, was announced; a new piece translated for the occasion from the French by the learned professor Girardin, offered great attractions, as did a very superior corpse dramatique. The fond Sophie felt relieved by the near cessation in her attendance; for she knew that Augustus was miserable while she was there surrounded—and her health scarce permitted such constant dissipation. In all the stiller combinations or opposition which controlled or thwarted his reckoning, the "bright particular star," that governed her mortal course showed no sign of change; no ominous variance of token: and on this benign and beauteous sphere, the eyes and hopes of the unwearied lover alike rested through the long sad hours that his divinity spent, less by her own choice than the will of her friends, in apparent enjoyment at the play-house. On Wednesday a slight indisposition detained Sophie at home. Augustus was there in the early part of the evening, but of course retired when the family party went their usual way. That night as he gazed on the auspicious orb, and breathed orisons for her weal and safety, a thick black cloud suddenly passed over the fair star; and it was visible no more. Chilled to the heart at this most frightful prodigy, he stood aghast, like one stricken with thunder; when somewhat recovered from the first shock he stood shrinking from a hundred hideous surmises of superstitious dread—and watched, but in vain, for the reappearance of the lost star till the morning light surprised him there. The moment that he could hope to gain access, he hastened to the abode of Mlle. Vernier, whom he found smiling in peaceful happiness like an emparadised angel. No opportunity then occurred of speaking particularly to her; so he returned in the evening to relate his dark vision and consequent agonies—and to beseech as if pleading for his salvation that she would, for once, consent to stay at home and let him with any of her young female companions bear her company. But Sophie could with truth, assign no cause for declining to go with her friends; her slight indisposition had left no trace behind it; 'twas an old and special acquaintance of her father, who was that night to be patronised, and who had complimented them with seats in the manager's box: and so little was she moved by the fond entreaties and fore-boding fears of her agitated lover, that for the first time, she rallied him on them, and refused to resign her own judgment to his empassioned representations. They parted; she to accompany her parents to the theatre, he to be miserable till they met again.

Digitized by Google

A brilliant audience filled the play-house. The night was calm, soft and starry as if to tempt unusual numbers forth. How many went forth that evening in the pride of gaiety and beauty, and all the splendour of rich adornment! How many that evening enjoyed their first, perhaps their last play! How many eyes sparkled and hearts beat high, as the hour came that summoned to the most moral and fascinating of pastimes! within the crowded edifice, reigned lights and music, mirth and mimic show; without, all seemed to bespeak peace, harmony and repose,—though afterwards, omen and strange warning were remembered and recounted as visibly foreshowing the wrathful purpose of Heaven.

Twas midnight; all were sleeping save perchance some anxious mother who sat up beside the parlour fire, waiting the return of a sole daughter or young son, permitted in charge of some older relative to see the performance of the night. The tortured Augustus, writhing under the pangs of a superstitious expectation, and the dread of he knew not what, but something more terrible because unknown and indistinct, leaned from a high window in his father's house, which stood near the theatre. His straining eyes alternately beat on two objects, took cognizance of nothing else. All emotion besides was to him paralized and extinct; he beheld only the star, presiding over his idol's destiny, and the quarter, wherein stood the building which at that moment contained her. At first the pulsations of his heart might have been heard and counted at the other end of the room; but, by degrees, as hour succeeded hour, and the watches of the night wore heavily away, he felt less awfully shaken. His gaze was still upon the far and favouring planet—and still as the fatidical rays twinkled down upon him, soft and luminous and clear, they re-assured his lightened breast,—and though he still watched what was to him a sacred light, 'twas less in terror than in rekindling confidence. All at once a deep shade came over his vision—a dark dense body shot before the lovely star, and it was lost in primeval and utter darkness. At the same instant, Pelisson's desperate eyes caught the aspect of the East—he turned them on a strong glare of red light, bursting forth, and spreading over that quarter of the sky. An instant more, and he was in the open air, pursuing his frantic way with the speed of lightning towards the hideous conflagration. Another moment, and the late silent streets resounded with shrieks, and swarmed with people, flying in the same direction—the great barracks-bell rung out its rapid and awful peal, far echoing over all the surrounding country, while yet above the din of frenzied call on wife and husband, and child; of the clamor of the iron tongue that sounded its hasty larum, and the rushing tramp of hundreds, who ran they knew not whither, was heard from countless voices, the tremendous cry of "Fire! fire! fire! The play-house is in a light blaze—and a thousand people burning up in it!" Augustus heard nothing, furiously dashing aside whatever came in his way, he knew not that he drew his breath till he reached the fatal spot. There raged the confirmation of his fearful auguries. A radiance as if of day illuminated the whole atmosphere. A thousand blazes of living flame, crackling, hissing, roaring, and darting their forked tongues into the upward air, streamed around, and through, and within the devoted building, and the human victims that there met a fiery death, while from each door and window immense volumes of thick, sulphureous smoke broke forth, and ascending slowly, hovered in solid masses, like the huge black wings of the fire-demon, waving in exultation over his sure prey. Never was there before exhibited an emblem so terribly sublime and vivid of the scriptural hell—for from within came rending the ears, and wringing the hearts of the spectators the fierce yell of masculine despair, the faint appealing shriek of girl-hood and infancy, the last screech, uttered in mortal terror, and the loud, piercing, prolonged scream, with which some wretch essayed to spring aside, as the broad winding-sheet of flame came rolling onward and enwrapped them like a funeral garment.

Digitized by Google

Thousands stood around the burning pile, and yet no help was rendered, for earthly aid was powerless to save. All that the agonised lookers-on could do, was done by urging and imploring the frightened crowd, pent up within the blazing barriers, to throw themselves from any opening, and in rising and succouring as they fell one by one to the ground, the bolder ones who heard and obeyed the eager and encouraging appeal, many, alas! only encountered death in another form, or escaped horribly maimed and mangled by the fall. Here might be seen some maddened father, rushing amid the fierce, flaring torrent of flame, and hot suffocating steam, mixed with showers of sputtering sparks, to seek a helpless child; there a mother, trying in the energy of distraction to fling herself into death in rescue of her darling ones; young daughters just growing up to womanhood, were seen and heard by the parent, whom they vainly called upon to save them in that awful hour; sisters, and dearer yet than sisters, fell back from the windows into the fiery furnace, or were enveloped as they flew before the furious element, and brother and lover stood below, and beheld them perish unaided. No sight or sound of Sophie Vernier, greeted the maniac Augustus, as he burst with a mighty bound over each successive obstacle, and was lost to view in an instant. Ten minutes sufficed to finish the work of destruction, with a crash as horrible as the closing of the infernal gates, the staircase gave way, and fell beneath the hundreds heaped upon it; then with a noise like the loudest peal of splitting thunder, the roof tumbled in—the flames were smothered by it, and all was still within the smoking ruin, save the broken moans, heard here and there from some crippled, or half unconscious sufferer. But without arose from earth to sky, the wild, accusing cry, as the whole of the blazing and animated interior was buried beneath the falling beams and rafters: humanity shrinks in silence from the spot.

The morning dawned brightly over the calamitous city, and found the committees appointed to that duty passing from house to house, to ascertain who were missing. Seldom before did the fierce monster death seize upon his prey in a form so terrible and sudden. Ninety-six human beings, among them some of the first and fairest in the land were on that memorable Thursday, the 29th of December, burned to ashes, or scorched into a crispy mass of oily cinders. Among them, by the inscrutable decree of Providence, were numbered two of the Vernier family; the decrepid grand-mother; the stiff, unwieldy father, the elderly mother, were spared and set aside for life; the eldest daughter too escaped: not so the sweet Sophie, light as a vernal zephyr—the agile Cecile, that outran the mountain fawn—they perished together in the first blush of youth. There was no vestige, no imperishable memorial, whereby to identify the remains of that angelic being, who thus laid down her innocent life; they made part of the general gathering, over whom floods of tears were wept in pitying sorrow—but no holy drops of parental or kindred grief bedewed the mixed relicks.

My business is not with the multiplied ceremonies, that bewailed the shocking catastrophe, and attended the obsequies of the hapless sufferers. I left the frenzied Pelisson struggling with supernatural might to force his entrance into the burning play-house; he was borne back by the swaying movements of the crowd, trampled down and seen no more till next morning, when his bruised and bleeding body was found at a little distance from the smoking heap of mingled ashes. He was conveyed home, and carefully nursed into a recovery of sense and some corporeal strength, but the light of reason was lost forever. He recognized no friend and renewed no occupation. At first he awoke to raging madness, and the most severe methods were found necessary to curb his excesses. By degrees his violence subsided into a settled gloom and its paroxysms never re-appeared except when the implements of his astrological labors were presented to him in the hope that his complete oblivion of all former associations might not extend to a pursuit to which he had once so devoted himself. He then flew on the person, who held the offensive objects, tore him with savage ferocity, broke them into a thousand fragments and relapsed into a partial delirium. After the interval of a year, it was thought advisable to remove him to Philadelphia, where he had since continued. A younger brother—for there was no sister remaining with him, and to his affectionate care, was owing the neatness and agreeable arrangement of his chamber. Surrounded by the mementos of his past avocations and delights, and furnished with all means and appliances to multiply them—the unobservant Augustus knew nobody—recurred to nothing—memory was a blank, no trace of the past survived, save that each evening, at the twilight hour, he apostrophized his buried love in fondest repetition of the last discourse that passed between them, and lavished his caresses on a white rose always kept within his bosom, frequently renewed by Theodore.

All the rest of his time was employed in the duties of a devotion, now become his sole principle of action, and in executing with his most sublime powers, the fine music of the Catholic church services. How much or how little he remembered of her who was so cruelly taken from him, is not known. Her fate is aptly imaged in the lines prefixed to this faint sketch; his is to be read in the records of a mad-house: in pity and in admiration, I left him there a Lunatic.

E. C. S.

OLD BACHELORS.

He who alone would ever live,
Deserves to always live alone;
No sympathy has he to give,
No joys that he can call his own.

Like some uncultivated field,
His breast all tenantless doth lie;—
No fruitage the waste soil can yield,
And buds of hope but spring to die.

Mental pleasures never cloy; unlike those of the body, they are increased by repetition, approved by reflection, and strengthened by enjoyment.

Digitized by Google

From the Philadelphia Gazette.

WASHINGTON.

BY HANNAH F. GOULD.

When the clear sun comes o'er the eastern hills,
And his bright face the world with glory fills,
Where are the stars that gemmed the crown of night?
Drowned in the splendour! dwindled out of sight!
So earth's great names grow less, and one by one,
Fade, and retire from that of WASHINGTON,
Who took through life his high, untrodden way,
Unmatched, as o'er the skies, the orb of day!

Return, ye mighty, ye illustrous dead,
Whose shining deeds on history have shed
Its purest radiance—who, from age to age,
Have left your names as stars upon the page
Of the world's annals! now return and play
Your parts again: and who shall wear the bay?
The only wreath that has no blighted leaf,
Will bind the forehead of our nation's chief!

Bring out your swords ye warriors, from the hush
Of their long slumbers! while a thousand blush
For madly clashing in the useless strife,
With blood that tells of wanton sport with life,
One, nicely-tempered, shines without a stain!
Columbia's hero ne'er unsheathed in vain!
By noble means, he noble ends pursued,
Whose first, great conquest was himself subdued.

Ye Patriots come and all your breasts unveil
To show which had the flame the last to fail!
'Tis his who on our country's altar cast
His dearest private interests, to the last,
While self consuming for a people's right,
Rose in a cloud of incense to the sight
Of earth and heaven, till from a weary hand
The baffled foe-man dropped his harmless brand.

Statesmen and sages, come and cluster round!
Who aimed so high reflections so profound
As our great Counsellor! His mental view
Pierced every shade, and showed a people through.
He, a fair pillar by a master hand,
Sublime, towers o'er you, rock-based, firm and grand,
Wisdom, and strength, and beauty—these combined
To form the structure of his perfect mind!

Philanthropists, from every clime draw near,
While in your midst we set your high compeer,
Rehearse your lives, and prove, if any can,
Who honored God by purer love to man,
That glowed within the bosom that is laid,
In holy rest, beneath the cypress shade.
Where Vernon gives our deathless friend a tomb,
To slumber in his Laurels all in bloom!

Souls of the just made perfect! which of you,
More just and perfect—bade the world adieu,
Than our immortal Chieftain? While he bore
The high commission from his King, to pour
The oil of joy throughout a weeping land—
To give a nation being by his hand;
He, o'er the earth, with garments undefiled,
Walked before Heaven as a little child.

SPIRIT OF WASHINGTON! though often told,
The story of thy deeds must ne'er grow old,
Till no young breast remains to be inspired,
And virtue, valour, greatness have expired!
But should the land whose bondage thou hast broke,
Sport off her freedom for another yoke,
O, look not down upon her—she will be
Debased, nor worth a father's smile from thee!

From the New England Magazine.

AUTO-BIOGRAPHY OF MATHEW CAREY.

LETTER III.

Rochefoucauld, who probably saw as deeply into the inmost recesses of the human heart, as any man that ever lived, stated as an aphorism, that "no man was ever more unlike another, than he was occasionally unlike himself." Some other ethical philosopher said, to the same purpose, that "man is a bundle of contradictions." Alas! for the honour of human nature, there is too much truth in both remarks—and I am persuaded, that there hardly exists a human being, who does not frequently prove the truth of both. So far as regards my single self, "I plead guilty to the soft impeachment," and have, in the early part of my career, given full proof that I can claim no exemption. My coup d'essai, as a writer, was a violent tirade against the barbarous practice of duelling; and behold me, in a very few short years, running full tilt, and provoking a duel, which, according to the strictest laws of chivalry, I might have avoided, without dishonor. Behold me firing a pistol at a man, whom, notwithstanding my ignorance of the use of fire arms, I might have killed, and thus deprived a woman and five or six children of their natural protector, though I was conscious, at the very moment, of the enormity of the offence! I might well say, "I see the right, and yet the wrong pursue." Alas! Alas! I repeat, for poor human nature!

Having very few notes to guide me, and depending, therefore, as I do, almost altogether on my memory, in these loose sketches, I shall frequently omit to introduce incidents in their proper chronological orders; as events do not present themselves to my recollection in a regular, consecutive series. In all such cases I shall note down the items as they afterwards occur, without regard to anachronism.

Two or three circumstances, just now recollected, fall within this category, and ought to have been noticed in my first letter, if noticed at all,—perhaps the reader will think that they might just as well be omitted altogether.

I happened to be in Crow-street Theatre, Dublin, on the first representation of the Poor Soldier—and maugre the genuine humour of the piece, the excellent music of the songs, and the admirable performance of the actors, I was to the last degree indignant at the introduction on the stage, of an Irish coward. The offence was, in my estimation, infinitely enhanced by the writer being an Irishman. I wrote next day, and published in the Volunteer's Journal, a violent attack on the piece—on the writer—and on the manager, Mr. Daly, who had dared to insult an Irish audience by the representation of such a piece, the first in the British Drama in which an Irish coward is exhibited. British dramatists, when they introduced an Irishman on the stage, however they might have caricatured the character by bulls and blunders, and too often by low buffoonery, had never rendered an Irishman despicable by the display of cowardice.

Daly called upon me, and expostulated on the injury he would sustain, if, through my instrumentality, the piece should be damned; and urged, as an important consideration, the large sum he had paid for the permission to have it performed. He begged and prayed I would forbear any further attack upon it. I was inexorable—and pledged myself that whenever it was about to be represented, I would use the artillery of the press to decry, and exasperate the public against it. We parted on very ill terms.

Digitized by Google

Some days afterwards, it was announced,—and I renewed the attack, and urged the citizens to muster strong at the Theatre on the night of the performance, to prove their national spirit, and to convince the manager and his friends, that a Dublin audience was not to be insulted with impunity. Accordingly, large parties were made for the purpose, and we appeared in great force. Daly, however, was not wanting to himself. He knew the arrangements that were being made, and took the necessary measures to defeat the hostile forces. He gave innumerable passes, and hence a large majority of the audience was composed of his friends. The curtain rose—and as soon as Darby appeared, the party opposed to the piece, began a general hissing and yelling. But to our dismay, we soon found we were greatly outnumbered; and were obliged very reluctantly to cease our warfare. The performance of course went on peaceably; and such was the influence of the merits of the piece, that before it was half over, those who had gone with the determination to put it down, if possible, and I among the rest, united in loud plaudits.

The result was perfectly analogous to a circumstance that occurred in a very different place, and in an assembly collected for a very different purpose; where

"Those who came to scoff, remain'd to pray."

Another incident took place about the same time, in the same Theatre, of a much more serious character to the Manager, and which was in danger of producing fatal consequences. The Duke of Rutland, when he assumed the reins of government in Dublin, as viceroy, was one of the most popular lieutenants that ever were in Ireland. At the Theatres he used to be greeted with the most marked approbation, and "three cheers for the noble son of the illustrious Marquess of Granby," were re-echoed by the whole house, Boxes, Pit, and Gallery. But having urged forward some very obnoxious measure, his sun of popularity set forever, and he was among the most odious of those vicegerents. Having ordered a play, (the usual mode of intercourse between the Castle and the Theatre) on a particular night, parties were formed on a very extensive scale, to give him a strong and very unequivocal demonstration of the popular indignation and the general disapprobation of his conduct. Tickets were distributed by hundreds. Daly, from whom these hostile machinations could not be concealed, determined to spring a countermine, to blow the conspirators sky-high. Accordingly he distributed a still greater number of tickets, or passes, and the house was of course oppressively crowded. He had, moreover, half a dozen ruffians placed at the wings of the stage, with voices that could out-stentorize Stentor himself. As soon as the curtain rose, began the tug of war. Both parties exerted themselves with might and main; but the Dalyites put down the others, yet not so effectually as to prevent frequent growls to annoy the Duke and the auditory. The result was regarded as a signal triumph on the part of the adherents of the viceregal court, and mourned as a defeat by their opponents. The courtiers, elated with the victory, had a play ordered in about a week or ten days afterwards. Their adversaries were resolved to leave nothing undone to regain the ground they had lost, and made redoubled exertions. The Volunteer's Journal was not deficient in exertions to fan the flame, and serve the good cause.

At length arrived the night—"the awful night, big with the fate" of Rutland's popularity, and of Daly's career for the season. On the entrance of the Duke, the curtain rose, the orchestra struck up as usual, "God save the King," the actors and actresses made their appearance on the stage, and commenced the performance. But for any effect they produced on the tympanums of the spectators (not auditors, for auditory, as far as regarded the players and the music, there was none) they might as well have been on the summit of Kilworth mountains. Never was there a more complete conglomeration of hideous sounds and yells heard out of Pandemonium. This was the vocal part of the entertainment, to which, in melody, the orchestral part did not yield an iota. Corn-craiks, watchmen's rattles, whistles, small drums, and every other conceivable thing calculated to make a noise, united their powers to hail the appearance of the Duke of Rutland. The harmony of these musical instruments, was broken in upon by stentorian vociferations of "three groans for the degenerate son of the illustrious Marquess of Granby." And such groans were re-echoed through the house as would almost have sufficed to awaken the dead. Only think of 800 or 1000 persons screaming at the the top of their voices, "three groans," &c. It beat the confusion among the builders of the Tower of Babel.

After the players had been on the stage for 10 or 15 minutes, the curtain was lowered—and in a short time was again raised, in the hopes that the popular effervescence had subsided. But the hope was fallacious,—the same "dulcet harmony of sweet sounds" was renewed. The curtain was again lowered, and again raised, with the same hopes and the same success. But it being found that the audience were inflexible, the Duke, and his suite, and the grandees, left the theatre. All the rest of the assembled multitude (quorum parva pars fui) rushed out and chased him and his followers through the streets, shouting and groaning, till we were arrested in our career by the castle gates. Ten or a dozen Scotch horse were sent out of the castle yard among us, who had an easy triumph; for we fled with as much precipitation as a flock of sheep pursued by a hungry fox. It was a denouement for which we had made no calculation.

As the frog said to the boy in the fable, this was sport to us—but it was death to Daly. The theatre from that night forward during the whole season, became unfashionable, and was deserted. I have been in the boxes when Mrs. Siddons, who was engaged that season, played to less than one hundred persons. A custom had formerly prevailed, of dismissing the audience, and putting off the play, when there were but few persons present; but Daly had pledged himself never to put off a play, whatever number of persons might be in the house.

It is almost certain that there scarcely ever was a correct biography, whether penned by the party, or by friend or foe, in which there were not various episodes to Love, that universal passion. Some such adventures fell to my lot. Of these episodes, I shall pass over all but one.

As I was about to go into the country previous to my interview with the Marquess de la Fayette, I was two or three times in company with a young lady, a Miss Boys, (daughter of a commodore Boys,) of considerable attractions, with whom I was somewhat smitten. Her charms were, I confess, more personal than intellectual: but it is well known that at 24 or 25 the biped, man, more generally chooses a partner of the other sex by the eye than by the ear. I persuaded myself, perhaps without reason, as is not unfrequent occurrence in such cases, that my addresses would not be unacceptable. But in the uncertain state of my affairs, I scorned to attempt to gain her affections.—Before commencing my rustication, I was desirous of ascertaining how far, in the event of the arrival of my funds, my addresses would be acceptable to her father and family; and accordingly waited on her father; candidly revealed the whole of my situation; and stated that all my present means were confined to a few guineas; that I had reason to expect a remittance of £500; that if it arrived, I should commence the bookselling and printing business; that in the mean time, I proposed retiring to the country for a few weeks; and was desirous of knowing, whether, should my expectations be fulfilled, he would be satisfied to admit me as a suitor for his daughter's hand. This procedure was, I presume, perfectly fair and honourable, and entitled me to be favourably heard. Had he received me with a corresponding frankness, I should have announced my views to his daughter, with the same openness and freedom from disguise. He was, I believe, very poor, but proud and haughty as a Spanish Don Juan de Lopez de Mendoza de Olivarez. He told me that there had been a great many unfortunate matches lately made with foreigners; and that he could for the present say nothing on the subject. This was not very flattering. Had he said, that, provided he found my character and conduct correct and fair, he would be content to let me essay to make an impression on his daughter's heart, I would have been satisfied. It was all I could reasonably expect. But in addition to the uninviting sentiments which he expressed, his hauteur and manner were so cold and repelling as to chill me. My Irish blood was roused. Fortunately Cupid's arrow had not penetrated far. The wound was only skin-deep, and instantaneously cicatrized. I gave up his daughter almost without a struggle or a pang.

Digitized by Google

After I had commenced printing the Pennsylvania Herald, the young lady and her aunt came to my office on some frivolous business, apparently with a view to renew the acquaintance. But I was very cool on the subject. The hauteur of the old don had wholly effaced the very slight impression she had made. I never saw her more. She died shortly afterwards.

Philadelphia, Dec. 1833. M. CAREY.

From the Religious Souvenir.

PAUL BEFORE THE AREOPAGUS.

Come to the Hill of Mars, for he is there,
That wondrous man, whose eloquence doth touch
The heart like living flame. With brow unblanch'd
And eye of fearless ardor, he confronts
That high tribunal, with its pen of flint,
Whose irreversible decree must pale
The Gentile world. All Athens gathers near—Fickle and warm of heart, and fond of change,
And full of strangers, and of those who pass
Life in the idle toil, to hear or tell
Of some new thing. See hither throng the bands
Of Epicurus, wrapt in gorgeous robe,
Who seem with bright and eager eyes to ask,
"What will the babler say?" With front austere Stand a dark group of stoics, sternly proud,
And predetermined to confute, but still
'Neath the deep wrinkles of their settled brow,
Lurks some unwonted gathering of their powers
As for no common foe. With angry frown
Stalk the fierce cynics, anxious to condemn,
And prompt to punish; while the patient sons
Of gentle Plato bind the listening soul
To search for wisdom, and with reason's art
Building the fair mart.
Behold the throngs
Press on the speaker, drawing still more close,
In denser circles, as his thrilling tones Speak of the God who 'warneth every where Men to repent,' and of that fearful day
When he shall judge the world. Loud tumult wakes,
The tide of strong emotion hoarsely swells,
And that blest voice is silenced. They have mocked
The ambassador of Heaven, and he departs
From their wild circle. But his graceful hand Points to an altar with its mystic scroll—
'The Unknown God.'
Ah, Athens, is it so?
Thou who didst crown thyself with woven rays
As a divinity, and called the world,
Thy pilgrim worshipper, dost thou confess
Such ignorance and shame? The Unknown God!
While all thy hillocks and resounding streams,
Yea, every heast that beats within thy walls,
May choose its temple and its priestly train,
Victim and garland, and appointed rite;
Thou mak'st the gods of every realm thine own,
Fostering with boundless hospitality
All forms of idle worship. Canst be
That still ye found not him who is so near
To every one of us,—in whom we live,
And move, and have a being? He of whom
Thy tuneful poets spake with childish awe;
And thou Philosophy, whose art refined
Did aim to pierce the labyrinth of Fate,
And compass with thy fine spun sophist web,
This mighty universe, didst thou fall short,
Of the Upholding Cause?
The Unknown God!
Thou who didst smile to find an awe-struck world,
Crouch to thee as a pupil; wert thou blind?
Blinder than he who in his humble cot,
With hardened hand, his daily labor done,
Turneth the page of Jesus, and doth read,
With toil, perchance, that the trim school-boy mocks,
Counting him in his arrogance a fool;
Yet shall this poor way-faring man lie down,
With such a hope as thou couldst never teach
Thy king-like sages: yea, a hope that plucks
The sting from death—the victory from the grave.

L. H. S.

Hartford, Conn.

THE SAILOR'S SONG.

Forget me not, when midst the winds careering,
I pour my song of tenderness to thee,
When o'er the wave my joyous bark is steering,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, when million stars are beaming,
And the fair moon is shining tranquilly;
In thought's sweet vision, when my heart is dreaming,
Forget not me!

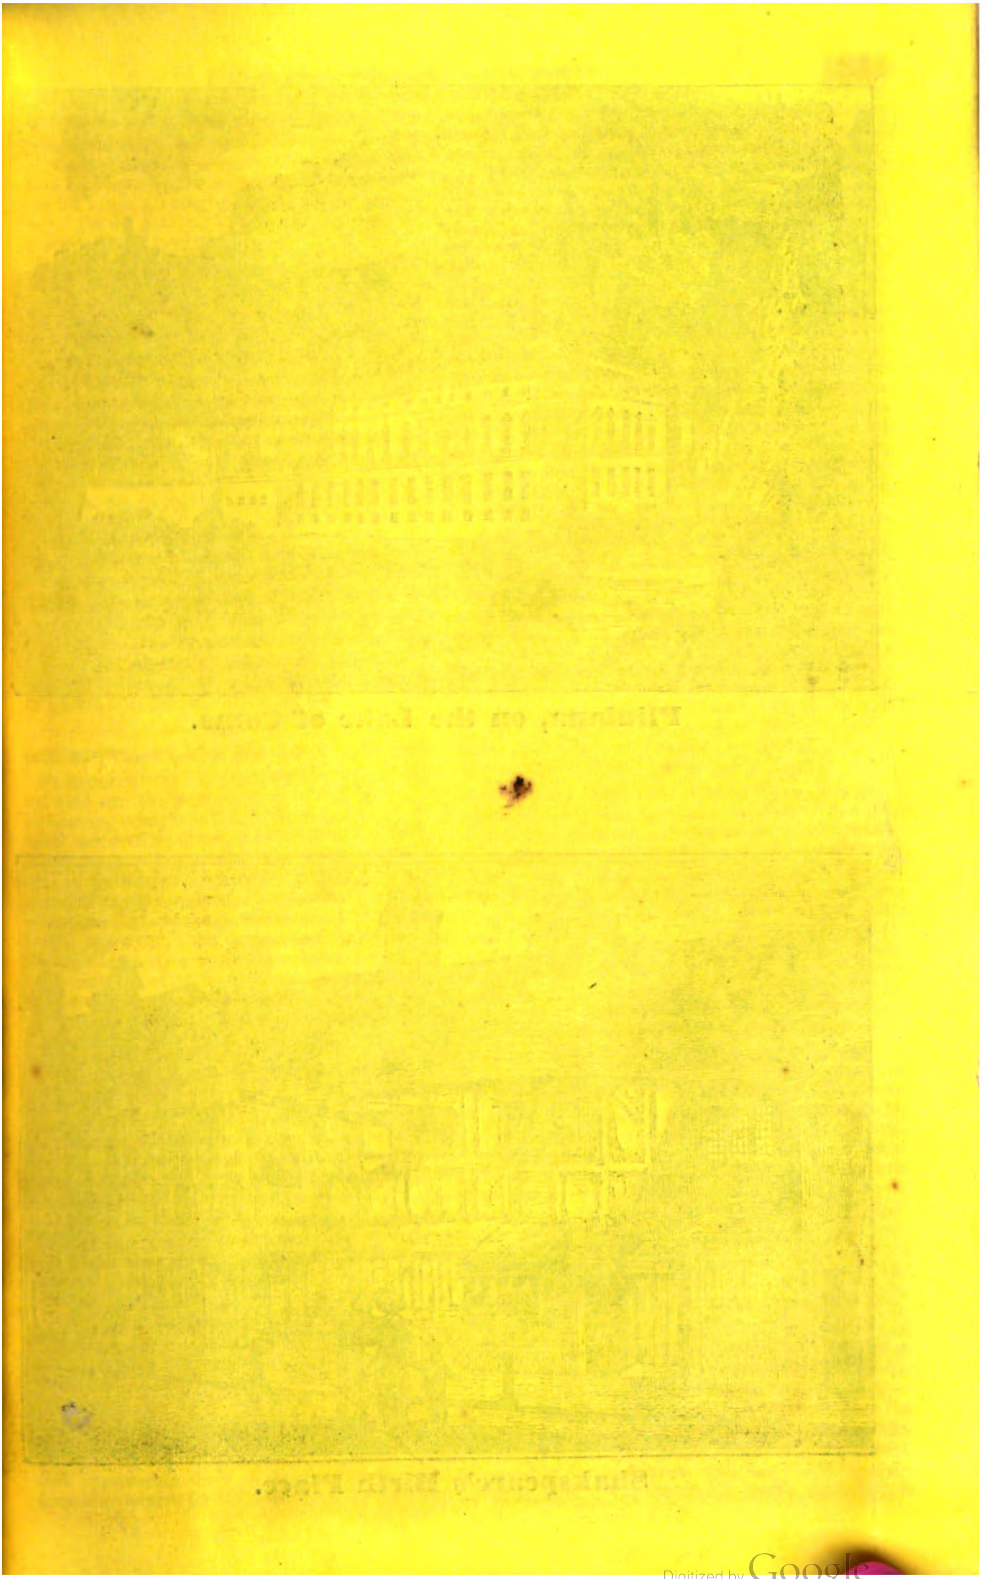
Forget me not, when all those stars are melting
In the moon's light—and the sun's rays we see,
Where last night's lamps the firmament were belting,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, when the storm spirits waking,
Make war on man, and tempests furiously,
Pillars of earth and dome of heaven are shaking,
Forget not me!

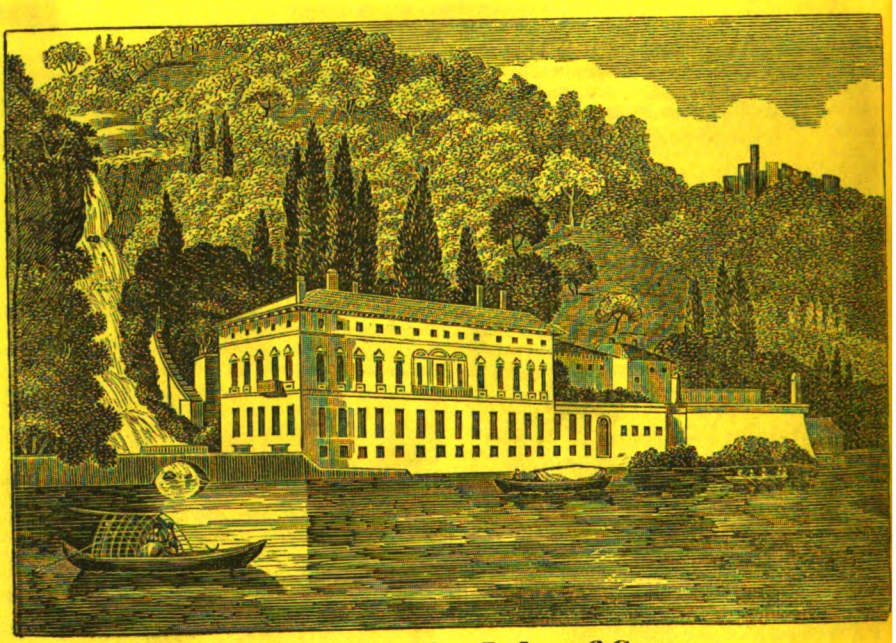
Forget me not, when into fury dashing,
The swarthy billows furrow the deep sea;
When all the elements are fiercely clashing,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, in twilight, morn or even,
When on the waves the stars sink smilingly,
I think of thee, as saints converse with heaven.
Forget not me!

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google



Pliniana, on the Lake of Como.

Shakspeare's Birth Place.

Digitized by Google

PLINIANA AND THE LAKE OF COMO.

On the bank of the lake of Como, between Urico and Forno, is seated the elegant villa called La Plininia, from its being conjectured to be the site of a house belonging to the younger Pliny. On the general beauty of this view it is unnecessary to expatiate.

The hill rising behind the villa, is covered with a variety of luxuriant foliage; not interfering, however, too much with the picturesque effect of the rugged eminences, over which the fine cataract to the south dashes with impetuosity. The villa itself is delightfully situated, and may be said to gaze upon itself in the transparent mirror of the lake, with as much complacency as the roses of Ariosto.

In the court yard of this villa is seen the curious intermitting spring which the two Plinys so highly admired, and of which they have left an elegant description. According to the elder Pliny, it ebbs and flows every hour, but the younger states that this phenomenon occurs regularly three times a day.

The lake of Como is one of the most beautiful as well as one of the most extensive of the Italian lakes. Though it receives but one river, the Adda, it is nevertheless subject to considerable swells, especially when agitated by the wind. With care and prudence, however, the navigation is attended with scarcely any danger.

THE BIRTH-PLACE OF SHAKSPEARE.

Shakspeare was born on the 23d of April, 1564, and died on the anniversary of his birth-day, 1616, having completed his fifty-second year. His father, according to some writers, was a dealer in wool, according to others a butcher, and according to others a glover. William was the second of eight children. In regard to his early education, there is much uncertainty. It is probable, however, that he learned Latin in the school in his native town: the French and Italian, which he often introduces in his plays, he may have acquired afterwards by himself. Before he was sixteen years old, his father required his aid in his trade; and, in his eighteenth year, he married Anne Hathaway of Shottery, who was twenty-five years of age, and who became the mother, in 1583, of his favorite daughter Susanna, and, in 1584, of his two children, Hamnet and Judith. It must have been soon after this event he visited London. The time usually assigned is 1586, when he was in his twenty-second year; but the cause of his leaving his native place, as well as his connexions and prospects in London, are unknown. Rowe relates, and others have adopted the opinion, that, having fallen into bad company, he was induced more than once to assist his associates in stealing deer from the park of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlcote, near Stratford. For this he was prosecuted by that gentleman so severely, that he at first wrote a satirical ballad on him, and afterwards fled from his home to avoid arrest. This story, however, does not rest on sufficient evidence to entitle it to credence. Without dwelling on the circumstance, or crediting another improbable story of holding horses at the door of a theatre for his livelihood, we shall find a rational motive for his visiting London, and resorting to the theatre, by knowing that he had a relative and townsman already established there, and in some estimation. This was Thomas Green, a comedian. He became an actor, but, according to Rowe, he never rose higher than the performance of the ghost, in his own Hamlet. Others, however, have endeavored to prove that he was an excellent actor. His greatest patron was a friend of Essex, the earl of Southampton, who is said to have presented him, on one occasion, with a thousand pounds. Queen Elizabeth, who was much delighted with his Falstaff in Henry IV, is said to have ordered him to write another play, in which the facetious knight might appear in love, which gave rise to the Merry Wives of Windsor. He was also favoured with a letter from James I, in return, as doctor Farmer supposes, for the compliment in Macbeth. How long he acted has not been discovered; but he finally became a proprietor and manager, by license, of the Globe theatre in Southwark; and it was in this situation that he afforded Ben Johnson the opportunity of appearing as a dramatic writer. Having a sobriety and moderation in his views of life, not very common in the profession which he adopted, the great dramatist retired early, with a respectable fortune of from 200*l* to 300*l* per annum, equivalent, perhaps, to 1000*l* in our own day, and spent the remainder of his life in ease, retirement, and the conversation of his friends. For some years before his death, he resided in Stratford, in a house which continued in the possession of his descendants until the restoration. Garrick, Macklin, and others, were entertained, in 1742, under the mulberry-tree planted by Shakspeare. The house wes afterwards sold to a clergyman of the name of Gastrel, who, being rated for the poor higher than it pleased him to pay, peevishly declared that the house should never pay again; and, from ill-will to the inhabitants of Stratford, who were benefitted by the company it brought to the town, he pulled it down, and sold the materials. He had previously cut down the mulberry-tree for fuel; but a silversmith purchased the whole of it, which he manufactured into memorials of the poet.

Though the shrine of many a catholic saint has had more numerous, yet none had ever more sincere or enlightened devotees, than those who have paid homage to the genius of Shakspeare, at Stratford-on-Avon. The room which is there shown as that in which the immortal bard was born, is covered in every part with the names of visitors; even the ceiling, the sides, the projecting chimney, and every partition of the surface, have been written on. A list of the names would exhibit all the rank, character, and genius of the age. Among these names are those of the present king of England, the duke of Clarence, and of at least one half of the members of both houses of parliament; as well as those of many distinguished foreigners, among whom are Lucien Bonaparte, and the Russian and Austrian princes, who visited England since the peace. Even the tomb of Shakspeare, and his bust, are in like manner covered with names, proud of an association with him, "who was not for an age." On the scroll, under the effigy, is the name of "Wellesley," inscribed by the successive viceroy of Hindostan and Ireland himself, and near it the name of Lucien Bonaparte, with the following lines:—

Digitized by Google

"The eye of Genius glistens to admire,
How memory hails the sound of Shakspeare's lyre;
One tear I'll shed, to form a crystal shrine
Of all that's grand, immortal and divine."

From the engraving which is appended, it will be seen that a portion of the humble dwelling in which he was born is now occupied by the Swan public house, the other part is occupied by a butcher's shop; these two tenements were originally but one house—the birth place of the poet, the spot where he drew the first breath of life, where fancy

——fed the little prattler, and with songs
Oft sooth'd his wondring ears.

In a lower room of this public house is a curious ancient ornament over the chimney, relieved in plaster, which from the date, 1606, that was originally marked on it, was probably put up at the time, and possibly by the poet himself, is a rude attempt at historic representation which has passed unnoticed by most of the multitude of visitors that have been on the spot, as it is not generally known. The motto runs thus, in old English black letter,

Golith comes with sword and spear,
And David with a sling,
Although Golith rage and swear,
Down David doth him bring.

In the corner of the chimney, stood an old oaken chair, which had for a number of years received nearly as many adorers as the celebrated Shrine of the Lady of Loretta. This relic was purchased in 1790, by the Princess Ozartoryska. She made a visit to this place in order to obtain intelligence relative to Shakspeare, and being told that he often sat in this chair, she placed herself in it and expressed an irresistible desire to become a purchaser, which she accomplished after much difficulty, at the price of twenty guineas.

THE SNOW.

BY WM. SINCLAIR.

The fair, the light, the sparkling snow
By gentle breeze or whirlwind driven,
Thou seek'st the changeful world below,
And wend'st thy way from heaven:—
O! thou may'st shame the purest heart,
For Purity itself thou art!

The virgin snow—the chaste, the free,
The myriad winged—the stainless white!
The mountain's brow is wreathed with thee,
As with a wreath of light:
And garments of the vestal bride
Are very darkness by thy side.

For thou dost clothe our parent Earth
With matchless robes, and bid'st her throw
Ten thousand radiant sunbeams forth—
Bright as the gems that glow
Above the purple throne of Night—
When thou hast kissed the morning light.

Thine icicles in radiance bright,
In hollow caves and ancient halls,
Are hung like crystal lamps of light,
That gladden festivals;
Thy floor of frost-work thou hast spread,
Clear as the ocean's coral bed.

The avalanche in thunders dread,
The might of man indignant scorns;
The wild volcanic furnace red
Above thee ever burns;
And o'er the vast Siberian wild,
Thou sleepest as a new-born child.

Thou art too poor for subject earth,—
And thou hast made thy loved abode
In giant regions of the North,
Where foot hath never trod:
There thou hast pitch'd thy thousand tents,
And reared thy deathless monuments—

Where thou ne'er feel'st the bosom throb—
The heart give forth the crimson flood—
And where thine ever-spotless robe,
May not be stained with blood,
Nor Death's high feast, nor scattered arms,
Bedim the lustre of thy charms.

Emblem of God! effulgent snow!
The beautiful, unspotted vast—
Unto the fair green earth below
Thou comest on the blast;
O! thou may'st shame the purest heart—
For Purity itself thou art!

From the Georgia Telegraph.

THE OCEAN.

I have been on Continent and Isles,
When War and Peace dwelt there;
And wandered o'er the ruined Piles,
And breathed their perfumed air—
But where a scene so wildly grand,
So boundless, or so free,
As where in distance sinks the land—
The Ocean still for me!

The gilded halls of Kings I've trod,
And mingled midst their crowd,
I've wandered where Alhambra stood,
The beautiful! the proud!—
But not for me are scenes like these,
Nor valley, brook, nor tree,
The sea toss'd bark, the wave, the breeze—
The Ocean still for me!

I've rambled over field and fern,
O'er mountain, vale, and wood;
And hunted 'midst the wildest glen,
And woo'd its solitude—
But give me still my ocean home,
And ever merry sea;
Contented ever there I'd roam—
The Ocean still for me!

I've been where Earthquakes shook the pole,
Upon the trembling land;
See mountains from their bases roll,
And cities crushed to sand—
As others will, I love the wave,
And its wild revelry;
Home of the daring and the brave—
The Ocean still for me!

Digitized by Google

THE PARTING AND RETURN.

BY JOHN MALCOLM.

One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws
Its bleak shade alike o'er our joys and woes,
To which life nothing darker nor brighter can bring,
For which joy hath no blame and affliction no sting.
MOORE.

Passing one evening along the piazzas of Covent-Garden theatre, I entered the house, and with some difficulty wedged my way into the pit, which, owing to the first appearance of a new play, was more than usually crowded.

Whether the fault was in the piece itself or in the acting I cannot say, but, certain it is, I felt little or no interest in the performance, and began—as is usual in such cases—to look about, and to seek amusement in a survey of the company.

While I was busily engaged in scanning the faces around me, I observed that my own was diligently perused by a gentleman dressed in black, who was sitting close beside me. I looked at him in my turn, and felt a dim and confused remembrance of having seen him before.

"If I am not much mistaken," said the stranger, "your name is ——?"

"Your acquaintance with my name," replied I, "confirms the conjecture that I had begun to form; that yours is not unknown to me, though at this moment I cannot recollect it, or tell when and where I have seen you."

"Is it possible," returned he, "that a few years passed in India can have wrought such a change, that you cannot recognize your old friend Morris?"

Morris, indeed, it was; and after the first burst of pleasure and surprise, at this unexpected meeting, was over, we left the theatre, and adjourned to a tavern in the neighborhood, where we partook of a light repast. As soon as the supper equipage was removed and we were left to ourselves, "I congratulate you," said I, "upon your return to your native country, and almost envy you the feelings arising from it, which I have no doubt more than compensate for the pain of absence and privation;—indeed, the trials of a few years spent abroad are not to be regretted, since they enable us to appreciate and enjoy the comforts and delights of home during the rest of our lives."

"You are mistaken," replied Morris; "the enviable feelings which you suppose I possess, exist but in your imagination, as they once did by anticipation in mine; but let not him who has sojourned in a distant land, give way to his longings to revisit the scenes of his childhood and retrace the walks of his youth,—let him keep the mountains and the sea betwixt him and his place of birth. Shrined in his heart and glowing with the light of happier days, lies that fairy land of memory; but to revisit its scenes would be to dash the picture with shade, and to strike out from it the fair familiar faces that gladden our dreams, or touch them with the dreary traces of time,—let him therefore enjoy the beauteous vision as it exists in memory, but not seek to view the reality with a faded eye and a disenchained heart."

"I am well aware that all our enjoyments come short of our anticipations, yet I fear there must have been some untoward circumstances in your case which have mingled unhappy associations with the senses which should naturally give rise to the sweetest emotions."

"That is too true," said Morris with a sigh,—"there is in my case a circumstance of sorrow that well may cloud the brightest day and the fairest scene; and though perhaps it is wrong in me to trouble you with a record of my errors and sufferings, yet, since by communication we lighten the burden of our woes, I know you will forgive me." He then began as follows:—

"I had nearly completed the course of education which is generally considered sufficient for young men destined to seek their fortunes abroad, when, through the interest of an uncle who had been long resident in India, I was appointed to a cadet ship in the Company's service.

"I left the scene of my studies in order to pay a farewell visit to my relations in the North Highlands of Scotland, and for that purpose took my seat in the mail coach, which brought me, at a turn of the road, within a few miles of my birth place, where I left it, and, striking off from the highway proceeded on foot towards my native glen.

"It was Sabbath morning, and as I advanced upon my journey I began to see the 'dwellers of the hills' assembling towards the church, and to hear the chime of the bells. Before the commencement of divine service, I also had reached it, and entered in along with the humble friends and companions of my early youth.

"In a few minutes a middle aged gentleman walked in, accompanied by his wife and daughter, and seated themselves in a pew almost opposite to the one which I occupied; and by the stir and bustle of curiosity which their entrance excited among the congregation, I guessed that they were strangers in that part of the country. There was nothing remarkable in the appearance of the gentleman, except an expression of worldly shrewdness, which I felt to be disagreeable; but his wife had a mild and dignified demeanour, and his daughter was one of those who, once seen, are never to be forgotten.

"She might then have been about the age of seventeen; but her countenance had more thoughtfulness and feeling than generally belong, or indeed seem natural to such early years. Her features were not of that regular description with which painters and sculptors body forth as their conceptions of perfect beauty, but possessed in a far greater degree, the power of fascinating the beholder; for they beamed with that light of the soul which the cunning of the pencil cannot steal; nor need I regret that it had not the power to fix upon earth the image of that beauty which is now in Heaven, since the picture is better engraved on my heart; and there, at least, the cheek hath not lost its rose, nor the eye its ray. But to return.

"The service of the day commenced, and the sermon seemed to be a farewell address to men about to leave their country, and to seek a home in a distant land. They were exhorted not to despond because their place of refuge lay beyond the great waters,—they were reminded that God is every-where present, and would be with them in the wide wilderness as much as in the haunts of men; that we are at best, but strangers and sojourners upon earth, as all our fathers were,—and that having here no continuing city, we seek one to come.

Digitized by Google

"These passages of the sermon seemed to give pain to the strangers; by which circumstance I conjectured that they were a family which had been expected for some time past in the parish, and that the gentleman was the person who had taken a lease of the surrounding district for the purpose of throwing it into sheep farms; in consequence of which, so many poor people were about to be turned adrift upon the world, and obliged to seek a home in the wilds of America.

"When the service was concluded, the strangers left the church, and passed hastily through the crowd, who eyed them in sullen silence as they walked along the glen towards a house lately erected by the proprietor of the district for his new tenant, by which circumstance my conjecture respecting them was confirmed.

"There they go!" exclaimed an aged woman who had once seen better days,—"there they go, but the blessing of the poor goeth not with them! I had hoped," continued she, "to have been allowed to die where I have lived, and to lay me down in peace beside my fathers: but it may not be,—the stranger hath come and left me neither house nor home; yet mark my words. Yon blighted tree was once strong and flourishing; it fed upon destruction, for its stem was in the grave, and was nourished by the tears of the widow and the fatherless; but the thunder came at last; it scathed the boughs, and the trunk withered; and so shall it fare with the despoiler of the poor. The hope of his heart, the child of his love shall perish,—even yon young maiden, fair a flower though she be as ever gladdened a cottage or graced a court; but it needs not the vision which is now upon my soul to foretel her doom; for there is that on her pale and thoughtful face, which to the experienced eye of a mother, who like me, has seen her own fair daughters drop away, speaks of an early grave."

"I was much shocked at this speech of the old woman, whose denunciation of death against the young, beautiful, and unoffending girl had something fiendish in it, which curdled my blood, and seemed the curse of the withered heart on which the prophet spirit had come down before death.

"I arrived at my destination in the evening.—It was the house of a friend with whom my sister resided, who was the nearest living relative I had.

"We were happy to meet, and had much to ask and communicate. I retired to bed at a late hour; but the image of the fair stranger whom I had seen at church, and which had engrossed my waking thoughts, came back upon my dreams.

"I will not dwell upon the minute details of the progress of my affection for the fair Emma. Suffice it to say, that I soon became acquainted with the family, where I was a frequent visiter; and my sister being the only young woman of a rank corresponding to her's in that part of the country, they were often together, and I had frequent opportunities of enjoying her society and gaining her affections.

"From me her young unsophisticated heart received the indelible impression of first love, and I in turn became devoted to her. Our attachment was unsuspected by her parents, and indeed was known to no one but my sister, who, although she disapproved of it as imprudent and likely to end in disappointment, had yet too much sympathy with our happiness to throw any impediment in the way of our meetings, or deprive us of the pleasure which we felt in each other's society.

"The time at length approached for my departure: we had our last meeting, and at that feast of tears I vowed eternal fidelity, and promised that as soon as my services abroad should entitle me to leave of absence, I would return, when, with improved prospects, I might solicit her hand with the reasonable hope of obtaining the consent of her parents.

"I took my departure with a heavy heart, and proceeded to London, where I embarked on board a vessel bound for Calcutta. We dropped down the river in the night, and having entered the Channel on the following day, bore away in the direction of the Land's End, and then stood out to sea.

"The sun was setting in the west, and gilding the green earth, then sinking in the deep; and, oh! what a world of slumbering feelings and long-lost memories flashed back upon my heart as I beheld the 'land of my birth and of my father's grave,' and the scene of my past joys and sorrows, which held all that was dear to me in life, waning over the waters, faint and far away as the phantom shores of the land of dreams! I watched it as it lessened along the deep to a dark line,—a speck that glimmered a while through the mist of tears which obscured my gaze. I dashed the dew from my eyelids and looked again; but the vision was gone,—all gone,—it might be forever. I shall never see these shores fade again with such a pang, and strange as it may seem, I grieve thereat. So blessed a thing is youth, that we regret the loss even of its sorrows.

"After a voyage of the average length, we reached our destination, where I was received and welcomed by my uncle in the most flattering manner, and entered with the fairest prospects upon oriental life. Yet still I was a stranger in a distant land, whose mode of life were foreign to my heart,—where day was a season of languid repose, and eve, which at home was sacred to quiet walks and soothing contemplations, was the time of bustle and excitement. Night alone was to me the time of enjoyment; for it wafted me away into the land of memory, and gave me back in vision the smiles and sweet faces that were far away.

"Would it had continued ever so! but by degrees I began to mingle with and at length to relish the society among which my lot was cast.

"About this time it was my misfortune to become acquainted with a set of young men whose peculiar boast it was to be proof against the fascinations of woman, or as they expressed it, the cunning of the sex. Love, as it is felt in young and innocent hearts, was to them the inexhaustible theme of ridicule, and the existence of female virtue they considered entitled to the same degree of credit as that of the Phœnix. While they confined themselves, however, to general and sweeping assertions, their opinions had little or no influence upon me; but when these were backed by a multitude of corroborative facts and particular examples of dereliction from virtue, with which their own evil experience had supplied them, my mind insensibly but strongly imbibed the poison of their principles, of which the baneful effects soon became evident, and I began to repent of my vows to the fond, confiding girl who had given me her heart.

Digitized by Google

"For a considerable time I had combated opinions which I saw, if generally received, must be utterly subversive of the social charities; but the fiend of suspicion once fairly roused, could not be laid, and shook, like an earthquake, the peace of my once unsuspecting heart.

"Hitherto my correspondence with Emma had been both frequent and regular; but now, although I still duly received her letters, my replies became gradually colder, then less punctual, and at last ceased altogether. She could no longer misunderstand my meaning, and wrote me a last letter, seemingly calm and passionless; for though my apostacy was death to her young heart, yet the dignity and proper pride of a true woman concealed the wound. In that letter she absolved me from my engagement to her, wished me every happiness through life, and bade me an eternal farewell.

"After our correspondence had finally ceased, I heard nothing of her for a considerable time. At length I received a packet from my sister, who did not seem to be acquainted with what had happened, as her letter did not contain one upbraiding word; yet it was written in a strain which cut me to the heart.

"It informed me, that, in consequence, she feared, of some secret sorrow, her amiable friend, Emma, had fallen into bad health and low spirits, ending in a brain fever, from which her recovery was imperfect,—that her intellects continued in a disordered state, and that she appeared to be rapidly sinking into a decline.

"It was then for the first time that I felt the pangs of remorse; and it was by awakened feeling that my reason was enabled to detect the miserable sophistry by which it had been deluded, and to be sensible of the absurdity of forming an estimate of all womankind from the conduct of some of the worst of the sex whom my companions might have known in England or in India, in whose alliances the heart had no share, and with whom wealth, even if coupled with age and disease, was preferred to every thing else. I felt ashamed of myself for having been the dupe of fools, and longed to make reparation to the girl whom I had so deeply wronged, if it might not yet be too late.

"For this purpose I was just about to apply for leave to return home, when my uncle died, leaving me sole heir to his fortune, which was considerable. I immediately resigned my situation in India, and embarked in a vessel about to sail for England.

"Once more did I behold the cliffs of Albion soar like a white wall over the sea; but they rose upon my gaze with troubled emotions, for my soul was dark, and cast a shadow over every scene. Immediately upon landing, I set off for Scotland, and, leaving the coach a few miles from my native spot, took my solitary way towards the glen that sheltered the dwelling of Emma.

"The scene was still the same as when I last beheld it,—and yet how changed! The same, for its green hills, 'all light and silence,' towered as heretofore into the sky, and over them the winter-storms of a thousand years had shed their snows, and wreaked their fury in vain,—but changed; for where the smoke of an hundred hamlets rose curling in the calm, and where the milkmaid's song was heard at morn and eve mingling with the chorus of the woods,—all was silent, save the whistle of the solitary shepherd, or the bleating of his flock on the lonely hill. It was spring-time, moreover, when I last looked upon my native vale, and the flower was in bud, and the woods were green, which had now fallen into the 'yellow leaf.'

"Upon approaching the dwelling of Emma, I became wild with emotion, and a nameless, undefined foreboding of ill,—my heart beat as if it would leap from my breast, and by the time I reached the house, I was almost overpowered by my feeling. The door was opened by a female servant; but I had no power of utterance. She desired me, however, to walk into the parlour. I knocked at the door, and a voice—which seemed the faint echo of one I had heard in other days—bade me come in. I entered in a state of breathless agitation, and my startled gaze rested upon the faded form of my first love!

